Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to elaborate an essay upon this road, but I must be permitted to notice for a few moments the very summary method by which gentlemen with great apparent ease acquit their consciences of all censure for voting down now and for ever all further appropriations of the kind. Yesterday the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] spoke of the supposed importance of the road west of Wheeling for military purposes, as an idea too ridiculous to merit a moment's serious thought. It seemed to him perfectly idle to imagine that ordnance or military stores would ever be transported by land westward while the Ohio river remained; and so, with undoubting confidence and the utmost self-complacency, he assures us that a "fool's cap and bells" should be bestowed upon any one who entertains a contrary opinion. Sir, I hope I may be allowed, with great humility, not indeed to deny to the conclusions of the gentleman the greatest certainty possible in matters of this kind, but merely to suggest a fact or two which it may be well to consider a moment before we swear to the infallibility of his judgment on this military question. In the first place, the road and river, though both running from east to west, from Wheeling to the Mississippi, are distant from each other, from north to south, from 90 to 150 miles at various points. I think it possible in the chances of war that it might become necessary to march a military force directly from Wheeling to Columbus, in Ohio, or to the capitals of Indiana or Illinois, and to take along with such force a train of artillery. Would the Ohio river, think you, be so obliging as to leave its ancient bed, and bear your cannon on its waves across the country from Wheeling to Columbus, in Ohio, and from thence by Indianapolis to Springfield, in Illinois? If we could suspend the laws of the physical world, or if a miracle could be wrought at our command, then the confident opinion of the gentleman, that this road is, in no sense, of military importance, would, in my poor judgment, appear somewhat plausible. But the gentleman seems also to forget that the waters of the Ohio, in spite of our wishes to the contrary, will freeze into hard ice. For three months in the winter it is not at all times navigable. On account of shoals, it is not navigable at a time of low water in the summer. And hence it would follow, that your military movements in that quarter, if ever necessary, would have to wait for the floods of summer and the thaws of winter. But I will not venture to oppose any speculative notions of mine to an opinion so confidently entertained by several gentlemen from the South who have spoken in this debate. I will fortify myself by an authority which I am sure will command, as I know it should, infinitely more regard than any opinion or argument of mine.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that this Government, soon after the late war with Great Britain, admonished by the experience of that war, determined on prosecuting a general system of military defence. To this end, General Bernard was brought from France, and placed at the head of the Engineer corps. In the year 1824, it became the duty of this officer, under the direction of Mr. John C. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, to survey and report to Congress such rivers to be improved, and canals and roads to be constructed all over our territory, as were conceived to be of national importance for commercial or military purposes. On the 3d of December, 1824, Mr. Calhoun submitted to the President, and through him to Congress, the result of the labors of this corps, accompanied with his own reflections and recommendations. It will be found, on examining that document, that this very Cumberland road is classed with other great works of internal improvement, which, in the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, were necessary to the defence of the country in war, and that the road now under the consideration of the House is there pronounced to be of "national importance." This was the opinion of Mr. Calhoun in 1824. The construction of the Cumberland road, as a work of commercial importance, as well as a sure means of binding in union the Eastern and Western portions of our country, had been urged upon Congress by Mr. Gallatin, as Secretary of the Treasury, as early as 1803, and by Mr. Giles and Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, in reports which they respectively submitted to Congress about the same time. Before the navigation of the rivers of the West by steam, no one could cast his eye upon the map of the Western States, and not perceive at once the incalculable value of this road to the commerce of both East and West. If the application of steam to navigation has diminished the importance of the road, this was known and considered by Mr. Calhoun, when he made the report to which I have referred. In 1824, the steamboats were flying on their wings of fire from Pittsburg to New Orleans, as they are now; yet Mr. Calhoun pronounced the Cumberland road then a work of "national importance." I beg the gentleman from South Carolina who spoke this morning [Mr. PICKENS] to peruse that report of his friend, Mr. Calhoun. I beg him to ponder well the magnificent and expensive works of internal improvement there commended to the favorable regard of this Government. The waters of the Chesapeake and Ohio were to flow together. From the Ohio the chain was to be stretched across that State to the Northern lakes, and thus the North and South are to be bound up together, one in their internal interests, as they are one and identical in their national and extra territorial relations. But I need not particularize; what I have specified comprehends not the twentieth part of those works in magnitude and expense then recommended by Mr. Calhoun as proper to be constructed by the Federal Government, at the expense of the common Treasury of the nation.

The Cumberland road, as I have said, is one amongst the rest there recommended as of "national importance." Mr. Speaker, I must beg the indulgence of the House to read a single paragraph from the document referred to. After speaking of the great advantages to the whole Union of one of the great Western works to which I have already adverted, the Secretary proceeds:

"The advantages, in fact, from the completion of this single work, as proposed, would be so extended and ramified throughout these great divisions of our country, already containing so large a portion of our population, and destined in a few generations to outnumber the most populous States of Europe, as to leave in that quarter no other work for the execution of the General Government, excepting only the extension of the Cumberland road from Wheeling to St. Louis, which is also conceived to be of national importance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if in the bill under discussion there be any feature akin to "swindling and plunder," I ask the gentlemen from the South to return to that gigantic project of kindred works projected by their own justly favorite son, and tell me in what vocabulary amongst the "tongues of men" they can find epithets odious enough to shadow forth the diabolical tendencies of his plan. Sir, if this bill be swindling, his scheme is robbery. If this bill be petty plunder, his plan was wholesale desolation. But, good or bad, whichever it be, we have his authority for it. Well do I remember, sir, in what high esteem the Secretary of War [Mr. Calhoun] was held throughout the the West in the year 1824. The sober affections of the aged, and the ardent hearts of the young, all, all were attracted to him. His altars blazed every where throughout the broad valleys of the West. Right loyally and prodigally did we pour out our incense upon his shrine; and lo! what now do we see? Whilst the smoke of our sacrifice yet ascends in gathering clouds; whilst the distended nostrils of our deity inhale its grateful odors almost to suffocation; he in whom our affections were all enshrined; he the author of this our faith; he the chosen object, it may be, of our very profane and heathenish, but still sincere idolatry; he, with the selected high-priests of his faith, suddenly rush upon us from the South, overturn their own altars, and scourge us, their misguided, but still honest devotees, from the temple themselves had erected. Not content with this, but determined, it seems, to consign both the authors and the followers of the creed to hopeless infamy, they have compared their own system of policy to a system of plunder, and themselves and us to a combination of swindlers.

Let not the gentlemen from the South suppose that I quote the authority of Giles, and Randolph, and Gallatin, in 1802 and 1803, and Mr. Calhoun as late as 1824, to fix upon Southern gentlemen the sin of inconsistency, or sinister motives, for change of principle. No, this is not my motive. I wish to convince, and not to taunt, the gentlemen. I wish them to pause upon their own present opinions, and to compare them with the views of those, living and dead, to whom I have referred, in the hope that the light of those great minds—that light that has been to them "a pillar of fire by night," in all their political wanderings heretofore—might, haply, now serve to keep them in the right way. I beg the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr RHETT] who so readily voted "cap and bells" to the heads of such as entertained particular notions, which he condemned, of the utility of this road, to take back his gifts a moment, and see whether he may not possibly be found unawares placing these badges of imbecility and folly on the graves of Randolph and Giles; and whether, if he is to be impartial and just in the distribution of such honors, he may not be compelled to pass over into the chamber of the Senate, and bestow one set of them upon the illustrious Senator from his own State. Mr. Speaker, I venture to suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] in a spirit of sincere respect, that there is a posterity for him as well as those great and good men whose opinions he sets at naught. I hope I may, without offence, suppose it possible that in some distant day, when this very road, paved from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, shall be crowded with commerce, and groan beneath its load of travel; when, by the speed with which your armies can pass over it, from the centre to the remote border of your country, some fearful rebellion is happily quelled, or, for the same reasons, some insolent foreign foe is speedily repulsed, the age that then is may possibly remove the "cap and bells" from the last resting place of Giles and Randolph, where he has hung them, and look for the tomb of another, as better deserving the honor of these significant emblems. Sir, when I glance at the history of this road; when I remember that it was begun in the Administration of Jefferson, and approved by him; when I group together the other illustrious names who have for thirty years also given it their sanction, I am prone to believe, my own judgment concurring, that I am right in carrying on what has been thus begun. I cannot reverse the settled and long unquestioned decisions of the fathers and founders of the Republic, upon the faith of the last night's dream. I cannot so readily believe that the sages of past times violated the Constitution to make a road. I cannot see why, if that were so, it has not been discovered in the [illegible] of thirty years. Sir, I know much is said, and truly, at this [illegible] advance of the human mind. I know, sir, it was written [illegible] ago, "Men shall go to and fro, and knowledge shall increase." All this I know, and yet I cannot quite believe that us young gentlemen here, in this year of grace, 1838, have now, this morning, descended to the bottom of the well where truth lies, as is said, and for the first time brought up and exposed her precious secrets to the long anxious eyes of the inquiring world. Just as slow am I, Mr. Speaker, to believe that the great men, who gave us a country forty years ago, did not understand what its true interests were. They who projected this great work were not men to rush into hasty and ill-considered measures. They had been accustomed to settle the foundations of society, and they did their work, in all things, under the habitual reflection and responsibility which their immortal labors inspired. Sir, let us beware, in the midst of our party conflicts, how we hastily question their calm resolves. Let us take care, in this day's work, with the hoarse clamor of party resounding ever in our ears, that we are not deaf to the voice of wisdom, which calls out to us from the past.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus far considered the bill upon your table as providing for one work, itself a part of a system of "internal improvement;" I have referred so far to the opinions of men whom we are accustomed to regard as good authority, to shew that the road in question has been regarded as one of national importance, and, as such, is within the acknowledged powers of Congress. But, sir, this bill rests its claims to our support upon a basis far less liable to those assaults which consider it only in the isolated view of expediency. It is, in truth, a bill for the fulfilment of a contract. It proposes to carry into effect a compact, to the performance of which the faith of this Government is pledged to three sovercign States of this Union. I know, sir, that many gentlemen here are familiar with this view of the subject, but I feel equally certain that there are others who are not.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] the other day discussed this branch of the subject with great ability, but I am impressed with the necessity of presenting it more at length, even at the risk of being tedious. I shall endeavor, by a reference to acts of Congress and public documents, to show that we are bound to construct this road as far as the Mississippi river; that we have contracted to do so; that we have received the cosideration for this contract from the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. If I can establish these as facts, it will follow that to stop the road short of the Mississippi would be a gross neglect of duty, and a flagrant breach of national faith.

In the year 1787, "the territory northwest of the Ohio" comprehended what are now the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin Territory. The celebrated ordinance of 1787, amongst other things, provided that there should be three States at least out of this territory, which should be bounded by the Ohio river on the south, the Mississippi on the west, and a specified line on the north. This last line, many gentlemen here will recollect, was finally established as the northern boundary of Ohio, Indina, and Illinois, very lately, on the admission of Michigan into the Union.

Early in the year 1802, the eastern division of this territory petitioned Congress to provide for its admission into the Union under the ordinance of 1787, which provided that certain portions of the territory, having 60,000 inhabitants, should be entitled to come into the Union as sovercign States. This application, with a census shewing the number of inhabitants then within what are the present limits of Ohio, was referred to a committee in the House of Representatives, of which William B. Giles, of Virginia, was the chairman.

On the 4th of March, 1802, Mr. Giles made a favorable report on this petition, and, amongst other things, referring to certain matters of compact in the ordinance of 1787, the report concludes in these words:

"The committee, taking into consideration these stipulations; viewing the lands of the United States within the said territory as an important source of revenue; deeming it also of the highest importance to the stability and permanence of the union of the Eastern and Western parts of the United States, that the intercourse should, as far as possible, be facilitated, and their interests be liberally and mutually consulted and promoted—are of opinion that the provisions of the aforesaid articles may be varied for the reciprocal advantage of the United States and the State of ——, when formed, and the people thereof; they have therefore deemed it proper, in lieu of said provisions, to offer the following propositions to the convention of the Eastern State of said Territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, without any condition or restraint whatever, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States."

The report then sets forth three propositions to be submitted to the Ohio Convention; the third proposition, being the one applicable to this subject, is in these words:

"That one tenth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying in the said States, hereafter sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making turnpike or other roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the State of ——, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass, provided that the convention of said State shall on its part assent that every and each tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the States, whether for State, county, or township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of ten years from and after the completion of the payment of the purchase money on such tract to the United States."

Attached to this report is an official letter addressed by Mr. Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, to Mr Giles, dated Washington, 13th February, 1802. Mr. Gallatin, deeply impressed with the advantage to the Government of this contract with the new State, urges it upon Congress as a mean of increasing the value of the public lands owned by the Government, and then pledged for the payment of the national debt. After stating a variety of arguments to that effect, he says:

"It follows that, if it be in a high degree, as I believe it is, the interest of the United States to obtain some further security against an injurious sale, under the Territorial or State laws, of lands sold by them to individuals, justice, not less than policy, requires that it should be obtained by common consent: and it is not to be expected that the new State Legislatures should assent to any alterations in their system of taxation which may affect the revenues of the State, unless an equivalent is offered.

He then goes on to insist that "Such conditions, instead of diminishing, would greatly increase the value of the lands, and, therefore, of the pledge to the public creditors."

The last paragraph in this document urges another argument in favor of this road, which I hope will not be overlooked by gentlemen who consider it a boon merely to the young States of the West. Mr. Gallatin thought this road would be highly advantageous to the old States, and he addresses their cupidity accordingly, in these words:

"The roads will be as beneficial to the parts of the Atlantic States through which they are to pass, and nearly as much so to a considerable portion of the Union, as to the Northwestern Territory itself."

On the 30th of April, 1802, an act was passed authorizing the people of the eastern division of the Northwestern Territory to form a Constitution and State Government. In that law the proposition, somewhat modified, is inserted, and by Congress proposed to the Convention which was to assemble the next summer. In the act just quoted, five per cent. of the proceeds of the lands within the State are proposed as a fund to make a road "from the Atlantic waters to and through the State, and the condition of the grant is, that the State shall abstain from taxing the lands sold by the United States for five years from and after the day of their sale."

In the month of November, 1802, the Convention of Ohio assented to the proposition contained in the act of April, 1802, with this modification: that three-fifths of the five per cent. fund should be appropriated to laying out and making roads within the State, and under its direction and authority, leaving two per cent. on all the sales of lands within the State to be appropriated to a road leading from the Atlantic waters to and through the State of Ohio. To this Congress expressly assented at its next session, upon the recommendation of a committee, of which John Randolph of Virginia was the chairman, and thus the compact was closed. Here let it be observed that compacts of the same kind, and in the same words, have been concluded between the States of Indiana and Illinois and this Government, at the times when these States were respectively admitted into the Union. In this way, following up the project began in 1802, of constructing a road "from the Atlantic waters to the Mississippi river," passing from the Ohio the whole distance to the Mississippi, through your own public lands, it was carried out by compact with each State, as soon as it became capable of entering into such engagements, by assuming the powers and dignity of a sovereign State of the Union.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that you had contracted to construct a road from the Atlantic waters, through the new States of the West, to the Mississippi river. I have shown, by reference to public documents, that the motives to this contract were, first, to increase the value of the public domain, to and through which this road was to pass, and thus put money into the national purse to pay the national debt; secondly, to bind together in union of interest the East and West, by creating a quick and constant intercourse between the western and Atlantic divisions of your common country. Now the first and main object, the increase in value of the public lands, never could be effected, unless you carried the road, not merely "to and through" Ohio, where, in 1802, your public lands for sale chiefly lay, but would only be fairly realized by carrying the road "to and through" each of the other western States, as your lands, by the extinguishment of the Indian title in these States, should come into market. These were the views upon which you set out, in your propositions of compact at first. These were your "inducements" held out to Ohio, and repeated in each of your engagements to make the Cumberland road with Indiana and Illinois. With these determinations, asserted through your public and authorized agents, you ask of the western States, in consideration of inducements thus held out, to do what? To grant you a trifling sum of money to aid you in your effort to improve the value of your own lands? No. To allow you to pass through their territory in such way as you choose? No. No such inconsiderable demands as these were on your lips. You demanded of them to surrender up for your benefit the tax on nearly all the property in these States for five years. In other words, you asked, and you received too, into the public Treasury of the Union, a direct tax for five years on all, or nearly all, the lands in three large and populous States. You said to the purchaser of your lands, buy of us, and your property thus acquired shall be free from taxation for five years; and thus you got an increase of price paid to you, what otherwise would have gone, in the shape of taxes, into the coffers of the States. This is true in regard to almost all the lands in the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Each of these States was admitted into the Union with barely sixty thousand inhabitants. The quantity of lands then sold was so inconsiderable as to make no sort of change in the estimated value of the right we surrendered. Take Ohio, for example: She gave up to you her right to tax all lands then unsold for five years after they should be sold. She had then sixty thousand inhabitants, she has now probably one million and a half of population, and there are yet public lands unsold in that State. Thus, you can see that we have released to you our right to tax lands in the hands of nine-twentieths of our people for five successive years. This, too, was done at a time when there was scarcely any other subject of taxation but lands, and when, in the infancy of our several State Governments, the first movements of political and social machinery require heavy expense from those least able to bear it. Let us see what it was in money that we gave. It will be found, on examination, that the three States interested cover an area, according to the best authorities, of something over one hundred and twenty millions of acres of land. Deducting something for reservations made before the compact, we may safely estimate the lands then to be sold in the three Western States at one hundred and twenty millions of acres. We gave up the right to tax these for five years from the day of sale. What has been the usual rate of taxation upon lands in these States? I think I may fairly affirm that the rate of taxation on lands in the three States interested has been one dollar on every hundred acres. This, levied on one hundred and twenty millions of acres, would give one million two hundred thousand dollars per annum, which, in five years, the time for which the tax was surrendered by the States, would give the sum of SIX MILLIONS OF DOLLARS. This sum have we paid into your Treasury for your promise to complete the road in question. In addition to this, we surrendered our sovereign right of taxation within our own limits—a right itself so dear to States that, as matter of pride, just pride, its surrender could only have been extorted by the strongest hope of advantage—the hope of some great and striking improvement in our whole country, such as this great work will be when you complete it, as you have promised.

Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the three Western States have given into the National Treasury, in effect, six millions of dollars, for the promise to construct this road. Let us now advert for a moment to the cost of the work as estimated at the time of the contract, and we shall find that the Government then understood that this sum would construct the road from the Atlantic waters to the Mississippi; nay, that, in all probability, there would be a surplus remaining in the Treasury after the road was finished. The kind of road, its location, and the time of its completion, were all left with this Government to be adjusted, under a fair interpretation of the compact. After proper examination, it was determined to commence at Cumberland, and strike the Ohio line at Wheeling, in virginia.

On the 3d of March, 1808, Mr. Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, reports to Congress that the road had been located from Cumberland towards Wheeling, a distance of seventy miles, and adds, the expense of completing that part of the road is estimated at $400,000. This estimate shows that the average estimated cost of the road, over by far the most expensive part of it, was a trifle less than six thousand dollars per mile. The whole length of the road, from Cumberland to the Mississippi, as surveyed, is 650 miles; it may be a mile or two, more or less. Now, take the estimated cost per mile, as reported by Mr. Gallatin, which was for the mountain region entirely, and remember that one half less, it was supposed, would suffice to make the road across the level plains of the West, and we shall see at once how reasonable it is that the Congress of that day, after receiving what was equivalent to six millions of dollars, should make an unconditional promise to construct the road to the Mississippi river.

The contract, as then understood from the estimate, was simply as follows:

Value of the tax released in favor of the Federal Government by the three Western States	$6,000,000
Cost of the road, 650 miles, at $6,000 per mile, according to Mr. Gallatin's estimate for the first 70 miles	3,900,000
	$2,100,000

Leaving two millions in the Treasury, after making the road as then estimated. Upon this view, founded on facts and representations of public men, contemporaneous with this compact, it is clearly shown that the States paid the Federal Government what the parties then believed a full consideration for completing the road the entire distance proposed. From this, what follows? Why, surely, that the Government promised to do what in conscience it ought, that is, to do the act which they were paid for doing—to make the road complete according to the contract.

But here, Mr. Speaker, I am told that whatever may have been the reasonable expectations of the parties, as to the completion of this work, when the contract was made, the Government only bound itself to appropriate two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands, and that this has been done, and no moneys remain of this fund applicable to the purposes of the contract. To this I reply, that such is not the contract, and I think I have shown this from the proofs already adduced. I grant you that two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands are pledged for the performance of your promise to make the road; but this pledge does in no sense limit the contract for which it is only a mere security. Let it be remembered that, when this contract was made, the public lands were pledged for the payment of a large national debt. To increase the value of these lands was one motive to make the road, and the States aided you in this, paid you for it, by relinquishing the taxes on them for five years after sale; it was, therefore, only fair, as the Government was deeply in debt, that the States should have some security for the performance of your contract. This security was given by pledging the two per cent. named in the contract. But it was not the contract, it was only a security given to the States for its faithful performance. This interpretation is fortified by other stipulations in the contract. The time, manner, and location of the road are all left to the General Government. Why was this? Because you had bound yourselves, in general terms, to make a road. And it was, therefore, only reasonable that you should have control over a work which you bound yourselves to finish. Had you bound yourselves only to pay, for the purposes of the work, a specified sum, such as the two per cent. mentioned, is it possible to suppose the States would have left you to appropriate their money, for which they paid you, in your own way, and according to your own discretion? Such a contract, on the part of the States, would have been absolute insanity. It involves an absurdity too gross for serious consideration. This itself shows that the two per cent. fund was only a pledge, a security, and not, as some have supposed, the contract itself. Thus you have always construed the contract. According to your own admission, you have gone on to make the road without regard to the two per cent. fund. You say vastly more than this has been expended. Why did you do this, if only two per cent. on the sales of lands were to be given to the road? No rational answer can be given to this question but one. The two per cent. did not limit the contract, it only secured its performance; and this has been your own uniform construction of it, as evinced by all your conduct up to this day, throughout a lapse of more than thirty years.

Let me suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the two per cent. fund was all you promised, which, however, I by no means admit. You say it was to be expended by you; you are the trustee of the fund, and the agent for its appropriation. Be it so, then, for the sake of the argument. What was this fund committed to your charge? Two per cent. upon the sales of one hundred and twenty millions of acres of land. This you was bound to sell for $2 per acre, for this was the price fixed by law at the time of the contract. This would produce $240,000,000. Two per cent. upon this would be $4,800,000. You had estimated the road to cost $3,300,000. Thus you see that, by every calculation based upon the state of things as existing at the date of the contract, the States and yourselves had a right to suppose that happen what might, if you acted up to your engagements, the road would be made. But $2 per acre was then the minimum price of the land, and we, being interested in the fund, had, and now have, a right to demand of you that you, as trustee, shall get as much more as possible, by selling all the land at auction in the way fixed by law as it then stood. Now let us see how you have complied with the law and reason of this contract in the management of this fund given in trust for its execution. In the first place you sunk the value of the fund nearly one-half by reducing the price of the land from $2 to $1 25 per acre. In the second place, you have given away immense amounts of this fund in bounty lands to soldiers, which you never can sell, and for which you can render no account. Thirdly, you have given to individuals, for purposes unconnected with this contract, a very large amount which never has or can be accounted for upon the principles of your solemn engagements with us. Fourthly, you have given very large amounts to the States to make canals, exacting from them as an equivalent the right to carry your mails, arms, armies, and munitions of war on them free of tolls forever. Fifthly, you have given away many millions of acres in pre-emption claims, at the minimum price, without any attempt to sell, and account (as you were bound to do) for the proceeds. Thus you, our agent to manage a fund destined to make our road, have so wasted it, and used it for your own purposes, that you never can tell whether it would have produced the expected amount or not. What is the consequence in law, in reason, in justice? What follows? Why, sir, any justice of the peace can tell you. You, the agent, must answer for this by replacing, out of your own funds, what you have wrongfully taken from us. But as you have so disposed of the trust fund that you never can tell what, if sold at auction, it would have produced, and so cannot, by any certain rule, therefore, ascertain the amount you have taken wrongfully from us, you must suffer the inconvenience; you must take from your own funds, and do what, when you contracted with us, you affirmed this wasted fund would do, that is, complete the road in question from Cumberland to the banks of the Mississippi river.

Is not this equitable, fair, honorable just? Why then stick in the bark? as the lawyers say. Why these pettifogging quibbles, these dilatory pleas? Does such conduct become a great nation? Sir, it has been said that honor is the vital principle of monarchy. You say you represent sovereigns—the sovereign People. Act then as becomes the dignity of your royal constituents. Leave no room to doubt your probity. Observe fully and entirely the faith of your promise whenever made. No such thing, says the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CLOWNEY,] this morning. If you have made a contract, no matter, you had no constitutional power to do so, therefore cease your efforts to fulfil your engagements. And there the gentleman would stop; he goes no further. What a beautiful example of political morality would you then exhibit! Some years ago you entered into a contract, a treaty, with three sovereign States. You have received from them all they agreed to give you. You have their money in your pockets. Now you turn to these States, with all seeming honesty, and say, true I promised, but I had no right to promise, my conscience is affected. I have sinned, I repent, I will do so no more, but I will keep your money. I cannot violate my conscience by doing as I agreed. Oh, no, that is too wicked; I pray you do not ask it; but still I shall keep the money you paid me. Yesterday my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CALHOON,] with a power of argument and generosity of sentiment equally honorable to his head and heart, spoke in favor of this bill; he adverted to certain objections made by his colleagues [Messrs. GRAVES and UNDERWOOD] They had opposed the bill as partial in its operation, as giving to the three States through which the road passes a disbursement of money which Kentucky was not permitted to enjoy. He said the disbursements in Indiana would flow into Louisville, in Kentucky, where goods and even liquors would be bought, with which the labor on the road would be paid. Upon this another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] takes fire. "This (said he) shows the demoralizing tendency of the system! This is the motive to vote appropriations, that money be raised to buy whiskey for the poor laborer to drink!" Sir, I have no objection to the gentleman's moral lectures, but I do not see the necessity of throwing his moral sensibilities into convulsions at the sight of a glass of punch, while he can look with a sanctimonious composure at broken promises and violated national faith.

Mr. Speaker, I have one word to say, before I sit down, to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD] He spoke the other day in opposition to this bill. He did not deny that the Cumberland road might be useful; but, as he could obtain no money here to enable his people to build dams and make slack-water navigation on Green river, he would not help us to make a road on the northern side of the Ohio. And then the gentleman proceeded in a grave disquisition upon our constitutional powers to make roads and improve rivers. What says the Constitution? "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." What is the gentleman's commentary? You have, says he, a clear and undoubted right to improve rivers, but not so of roads. And why, Mr. Speaker, why? Do you, sir, remember the reason for this distinction? It was this: "Providence (says the gentleman) has marked out rivers as the proper channels and avenues of commerce." What a beautiful and exalted piety is here shedding its clear light upon the dark mysteries of constitutional law! And then how logical the conclusion! Thus runs the argument: Since it is not the will of God that commerce should be carried on on dry land, but only on the water, the powers over commerce, given in the Constitution by our pious ancestors, must be understood as limited by the Divine commands; and therefore, says he, you have power to remove sand-bars and islands, and blow up rocks out of rivers and creeks, to make a channel which Providence has begun and left unfinished; but beware, he would say, "how you cut down a tree, or remove a rock, on the dry land, to complete what Providence has begun there. You have no power by law to do this last; besides, it is impious, it is not the will of God."

Mr. Speaker, I know of no parallel to this charming philosophy, unless it is to be found in the sayings of Manse Hedrigg, an elderly Scottish lady, who figures in one of Sir Walter Scott's novels. In one of her evangelical moods, she rebuked her son Cuddie for using a fan, or any work of art, to clean his barley. She said it was an awsome denial o' Providence not to wait his own time, when he would surely send wind to winnow the chaff out of the grain. In the same spirit of enlightened philosophy does the gentleman exhort us in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to cease our impious road-making, and wait the good time of Providence, who will, as he seems to think, surely send a river to run from Cumberland over the Alleghanies, across the Ohio, and so on, in its heaven-directed course, to St. Louis. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is not the author of this theory. Our Atlantic brethren, especially of the South, have long held the same doctrine. They have long since discovered that our glorious Constitution was nothing more at last than a fish! made for the water, and which can only live in the water. According to their views, he is a goodly fish, of marvellous proper uses and functions while you keep him in the water; but the moment he touches dry land, lo! he suffocates and dies. The only difference between this school of constitutional lawyers and the gentleman from Kentucky is this: he believes your Constitution is a fish that thrives in all waters, and especially in Green river slack-water; whereas, his brethren of the South insist that he can only live in salt water. With them the doctrine is, wherever the tide ceases to flow, he dies. He can live and thrive in a little tide creek, which a thirsty musquito would drink dry in a hot day; but place him on or under the majestic wave of the Mississippi, and in an instant he expires. Mr. Speaker, who can limit the range of science! What hand can stay the march of mind! Heretofore we have studied the science of law to help us in our understanding of the Constitution. Some have brought metaphysical learning to this aid. But now, in the middle of the nineteenth century, these labors are all ended. Ichthyology, sir, is the key to open all the doors that have hitherto barred our approaches to truth. According to this new school of philosophy, if you just teach coming generations the "nature of fish," those great problems in constitutional law that vexed and worried the giant intellects of Hamilton, Madison, and Marshall, are at once revealed and made plain to the dullest peasant in the land. Sir, if I appear to trifle with this grave subject, the fault is not mine; it arises from the singular nature and contrarient character of those arguments which I am most unwillingly compelled to combat.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has inquired, with a very significant look, what has become of the three per cent. fund, given to the States, for improvements within their respective limits. He says he has inquired of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he can give him no account of the disposition the Western States may have made of this fund, and hence the gentleman seemed to infer that no one could tell him any thing satisfactory on the subject. Sir, if your Secretary of the Treasury is the only source of information, then are the fountains of knowledge scanty indeed, and nearly dried up with us. If every thing is unknown which he does not know; if we can see nothing which has not been revealed to him, why, then, the Lord help us; the lights of the age burn dimly enough, and must be well-nigh extinct. Sir, if the gentleman, instead of consulting the "Penny Magazine" of the Treasury, had gone to the libraries of this city, and looked into the statistics of these States, he would have found that this fund had been faithfully, to the last dollar, expended in making roads "to and through" the public lands in the States; thus increasing the value and hastening the sale of your national property. The gentleman reproaches the three States on the right bank of the Ohio for having obtained from the national domain large grants for making roads and canals. Does not the gentleman know that in every instance you have received an equivalent for these lands, by obtaining from the States or companies the right to carry your mails, arms, troops, and munitions of war, over such roads or canals, at all times free of charge? If you gave the alternate sections of land for a road or canal, you held up the remaining section at double your minimum price, and have always realized it, and thus made money for yourselves out of the capital and labor of the States, whilst you boast the transaction as a benevolence to others.

But, sir, Kentucky should be the last State in the Union to raise an argument of this kind against her sisters of the West. How came she by the whole of that very Green river country which now comprises one-fourth part of that State? Virginia had reserved that territory to satisfy her Revolutionary debt to her troops. When she ceded the northwestern territory to the United States, she reserved the land between the Little Miami and Scioto rivers (now in Ohio) as a residuary fund for the satisfaction of her Revolutionary land warrants; if the lands reserved for that purpose in Kentucky should prove insufficient. Well, sir, what happened? Soon after this, Kentucky seized upon the whole Green river country, and refused to the war-worn veteran of the Revolution the right to locate his warrants there. The consequence was, the whole country reserved in Ohio was exhausted, and the Virginia claims, to the amount of many millions, have been lately paid out of the Treasury of the Union in the shape of land scrip. Sir, I have said this domain, thus seized by Kentucky, was equal to one-fourth part of the State. Now, suppose you had given to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, what Kentucky received—one-fourth part of all the lands within their respective limits—sir, it would have constructed this road through their territories ten times over. And yet, with these facts all before him, the gentleman sits weeping over the dams and slack-water of Green river, like a froward child, spoiled by too much indulgence, complaining of its mother's partiality, to the really much less favored members of our common family. Sir, this is unlike Kentucky; it is unlike the uniform justice and generosity of both the gentlemen, [Messrs. GRAVES and UNDERWOOD,] who have so vehemently opposed this bill. I beseech them to desist. Cease to drive this Jew's bargain with your sister States. Relax the miser's gripe you have laid upon your neighbors' rights. Throw away the knife of Shylock, clothe yourselves in the robes of justice and generosity. Stand out in your true characters, and in the proper costume of your noble State. Look upon this bill with the eye of the American statesman. The interests of the whole valley we inhabit in common are the same. You cannot separate them by lines or rivers. Sir, the same cloud that dispenses its fertilizing showers upon Kentucky, drops fatness upon the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The same sun that warms vegetation into early and vigorous life, on the rich plantations of Kentucky, also mellows the fruit and ripens the harvest that cover the vast plains outstretched upon the right bank of the Ohio. The God of Nature has decreed us a common lot, and it is vain and impious to interpose our feeble opposition to his will.

Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen have complained that one section of land out of every thirty-six has been given to the Western States for the use of common schools. Do gentlemen recollect to whom this benefit results? Who are they that inhabit the great valleys of the West? Emigrants surely from the old States of the South and East. The children to be educated there are your children. Sir we heard (some at least) an English gentleman [Mr. Buckingham] in one of his interesting lectures lately delivered in this city, say, when speaking of British emigration to America, that he was sorry they had not sent to this country better specimens of their population. Sir, I can say to my friends on this side of the mountains, with equal sincerity, as to some of those you sent out, "I am sorry you did not send us better specimens." But the truth is, we get in the West the very best and the very worst of your population. The poor come there for bread, and the enterprising and industrious come to find a field which gives ample scope to their energies, and rewards to their labor. This fund, then, is for the education of the poor, and the rich, too, if any such there be, which you send in masses every year to the West. And I can assure gentlemen it has been faithfully applied in Ohio. It has been added to by heavy taxation upon our people. Some gentlemen (I speak it in no spirit of pride or vain boasting,) some gentlemen from the old States might learn something new to them in the history of civilization, would they but visit that Western world, of which they often seem to me to know very little. They might see there, in the very spot where but yesterday the wild beasts of the wilderness seized their prey by night, and made their covert lair by day, on that same spot to-day stands the common school-house, filled alike with the children of the rich and the poor—those children who are to be the future voters, officers, and statesmen of the Republic. Over that vast region, so lately red with the blood of savage war, the seed-fields of knowledge are planted, and a smiling harvest of civilization springs up. And there, too, may be seen what a Christian statesman might well admire. The schoolmaster is not alone. That holy religion, which is at last the only sure basis of permanent social or political improvement, has there its voices crying in the wilderness. Upon the almost burning embers of the war-fire, round which some barbarous chief but yesterday recounted to his listening tribe, with horrid exultation, his deeds of savage heroism, to-day is built a temple dedicated to that religion which announces "peace on earth, and good-will towards men." Yes, sir, all over that land, side by side with the humble school-house, stand those

"steeple-towers
"And spires whose silent finger points to Heaven."

Is it, sir, can it be in the heart of an American statesman, to check in its progress, or crush in its infancy, a social and political system, which has tendencies and fruits like this? But, sir, I find myself tempted, by themes so full of hope, to wander, as some may think, into subjects having a bearing upon the immediate question, too remote to justify their discussion here. I beg to remind this House that the bill now before it is a part, small, indeed, but still a part of a system of policy which long ago you established for the Western country, which hitherto you have cherished, and which, aided by the patient, perseverina labor of your people there, has produced the happy results which I have so hastily and imperfectly laid before you. I feel an assured confidence that I do not plead in vain to an American Congress in such a cause. Still should I unhappily be mistaken in this, conscious of the rectitude of my own motives, I shall cheerfully submit to whatever decision it shall please the House to make.

CONTINUATION OF THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

REMARKS OF MR. WILLIAMS, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, Friday, April 18, 1838—

The House having again resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois;" the question pending being the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill to provide for the surrender of said road to the States through which it passes—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to make a few remarks upon the subject now under consideration. In fact, sir, it was my wish to have done so this morning, before the previous question put a stop to the debate. I am aware that I rise to address the House under very unfavorable circumstances; still I cannot permit the occasion to pass without expressing to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] my sincere thanks for the motion he has made to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill surrendering to the States through which it passes the Cumberland road. Should the motion prevail, or should the appropriation be refused by this House, I shall hail it as the harbinger of better and purer days—I shall view it as a new era in the history of our national affairs, and shall proudly, and gladly, proclaim to my constituents that the long agony is over; that the corrupt and corrupting influence of a wide-spread system of internal improvements by the General Government has received its quietus. When my friend from Kentucky made his motion, I immediately seized upon the fond idea that the representatives from the gallant State of Kentucky were determined to bow to the circumstances with which their country was surrounded, and surrender a system that I know they have cherished with delight, to the necessity of the times. The pleasure that was imparted to me from that view of the subject was of short duration. The vote of to-day, which exhibits a division in her ranks, coupled with the able and ingenious speech made a few days ago by a distinguished member of that State, [GOV. POPE,] proves most conclusively that I was too eager in arriving at that conclusion. The honorable gentleman to whom I have just alluded, not only instructed, but amused this House; and from the rough draught of the splendid system of internal improvement that he presented to this House, and declared himself ready and willing to adopt and support, he must certainly think that day has dawned never to close. Far otherwise is the case. For, in my humble opinion, if ever there was a time in the history of any nation on God's earth when the word of command should be given to halt, and form, in relation to their moneyed concerns, we stand pre-eminently qualified and ready to receive and obey. In the language of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] we are dead aground, and will have to be floated off by shin-plasters. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to give to my remarks a partisan cast; nor do I hold the past or present Administration accountable as the sole authors and supporters of the extravagant mode of appropriation that has become the order of the day during the last six or seven years. My own observation, and the journals of your House—nay, sir, the vote of this day, will prove that both parties are blameable. True, sir, I hold the past Administration accountable for a string of bold, high-handed, and unnecessary measures, that gave the first impulse to a state of things that surrounded us with a fictitious and unhealthy prosperity, which caused your Treasury to overflow; but candor compels me to admit that Administration and anti-Administration men enough to constitute a majority in this House, not only nibbled at the bait, but they seized hook, sinker, and all, and twisted it under their tongues as a sweet morsel. Nor am I surprised at this; for plenty, both in our private and public relations of life, begets extravagance, with almost the same unerring certainty that water will run down hill. I hold the present Administration accountable for not having attempted to arrest this state of things, when plenty has vanished, and bankruptcy has ensued. Perhaps they are both to be pitied and, to some extent, pardoned; for I know it is extremely hard for a spendthrift, after he has wasted his fortune, to lower his expenses, and bring them within his means; and this reforming and economical Administration would be much and deeply mortified to acknowledge to the American people that they had been humbugging them in relation to the expenses of the Government. Though I have promised not to give to my remarks a partisan cast, and, in order to keep from violating my promise, I must pass to another view of the subject. I am not, Mr. Speaker, opposed to the system of internal improvements on the grounds of its unconstitutionality, for I most heartily with the able chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, [Mr. MERCER,] that Congress has the power to appropriate money for precisely such purposes as that which is embraced in the bill now under consideration; but even if I had my doubts upon the subject, I would feel ashamed (being a mere mushroom, that has sprung into political existence from the growth of a night, and will, perhaps, wither in another,) to get up here and gravely attempt to prove the unconstitutionality of a measure that has received the sanction of this Government almost every session of Congress since the commencement of the Government. Having on all proper occasions declared this opinion to my constituents, it is due to myself to avow them here, and declare that my opposition springs from the unjust workings of the system. Allow me to say to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] that his age and talents entitle his opinions to the highest deference and respect. Hence, sir, his calling into question the constitutionality of this doctrine sits well upon him, while it would be presumption in me. I feel no disposition on the present occasion to detain this House with any expose I might be able to make of the unjust and unequal operation of the system of internal improvements. The only object I had in view in addressing the House, was to appeal to the members to stay all appropriations of this kind, if not forever, at least for a time. That it is an important matter to curtail the current expenses of the General Government all parties and all sides agree. It is an acknowledged fact that the expenses of the Government are annually increasing, and its annual income gradually decreasing; and in 1842, if the compromise tariff is not disturbed, the duty on foreign importation will be collected according to value. It is the received and universal opinion, I believe, that when that period arrives, the revenue to the Government through that channel will be greatly diminished. Then, sir, is there not great danger that the favorite doctrine of not collecting more money than is indispensably necessary for the support of the Government will be rushed to the contrary extreme, and, in the place of an overflowing Treasury, we will be compelled to create a national debt?

Sir, I have anxiously looked for a move from some quarter of this House to lessen the expenses of the Government. True, sir, my colleague and friend [Mr. CARTER] has introduced some general resolutions of inquiry upon the subject of retrenchment, but they are permitted to sleep the sleep of death upon your table. I want not an injudicious movement upon this subject; no, on the contrary, I would be pleased, indeed, to see the leading and experienced members of this House, on both sides, (forgetting for a time, if they could not forever, their party associations,) make a united and vigorous effort to consummate the object contemplated by the compromise tariff. There is patriotism and intelligence enough in this House to bring about that result. It must be, sir, it cannot be otherwise, that much useless and unnecessary expense can, by a proper course of conduct, be lopped off. I do not want to see a curtailing that would prove detrimental to the public good; on the contrary, I want to see the move made by the practised arm of an enlightened and an experienced statesman, free as possible from the partizan politics of the day. For, sir, it is my opinion that in that way only can this country be saved from a national debt that is now hovering over us; and unless an effort is made to check the present tendency of things, by 1842, instead of the income and expenses of the General Government meeting upon a level as was fondly believed, the debit side will lap over considerably. That there is a probability that such will be the case no gentleman will deny. Then I ask this House if they are willing, under all the circumstances that surround this question, to vote $459,000 for the continuation of the Cumberland road, when there is no pressing necessity for its completion? It is the duty of the Government, as well as individuals, to look at their means before they engage in expense either for ornament or profit. Then, sir, let us look for a few moments at the condition of your Treasury. This report which I hold in my hand exhibits the probable income and expenses of the Government for the present year—the income is estimated at $31,800,000, the expense of the year is estimated at $32,230,000, which shows a deficit of near a million of dollars; it will also be recollected that seven millions of Treasury notes, authorized to be issued by the act of October last, is estimated among the resources of the Government. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had as good a right to estimate the ten millions of Treasury notes now proposed to be issued by the bill upon your table as the seven millions. If you will deduct the seven millions, this report exhibits a deficit in the resources of the Government, for the present year, of near ten millions of dollars. Let me ask this House, when will a change take place for the better? Never, I fear, unless you reduce your expenses as well as your income. Here let me say to my political friends that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the acknowledged leader of the Administration party in this House, insists in his report that the estimate of the expenses for the year can be lessened two or three millions of dollars. Are they willing that the organ of this extravagant Administration shall exhibit to the country greater evidence on the score of economy than they? If so, those who refuse to join in the reduction should stop their denunciation upon the subject of extravagance. I also wish this House to recollect that we are now in the midst of an experiment—not the exploded one, sir—I mean the compromise tariff. Two favorite objects it was thought would be effected by this compromise. First, it was thought to be an important matter to lessen the resources of the Government, and thereby put a stop to the scramble that was here waged for the surplus revenue. Nobody seemed to doubt that such a state of things would beget corruption. Another great object was to allay the excitement that had been produced by the adoption of the protective policy. This compromise act is not yet matured; and while the friends of the manufacturing interest, so far as I know or believe, are confident that they have sufficient age to live under the operation of the compromise, would it not be strange, passing strange, that a reforming Administration would have to revive this exciting question in order to act out its economical wants? I hope the cup will be permitted to pass, for, sir, the peace, prosperity, and permanency of the Union are involved to a considerable extent in that question. When 1842 arrives, if your Government is in debt, and an increase tax has to be resorted to, my life on the issue that the protective policy will be revived, not for the purpose of protecting your manufactories, but for the purpose of covering your profligacy. What a strange spectacle this would present to the American people. While the party in power are studiously endeavoring to make the people believe that, if they are turned out of power, the friends of the manufacturing interest would come in and revive the odious tariff, they, themselves, are galloping down the hill of insolvency, which will ten times more assuredly revive the tariff. For myself, sir, knowing that it is the anxious wish of my country that the expenses of the Government should be brought down, I will vote against all appropriations that can possibly be dispensed with, regardless of when or on whom the honor may attach, should any follow from a return to the days of economy; for although I feel an anxious solicitude for the success of my political friends, yet I trust I feel a greater solicitude for the peace and prosperity of my country. I have said as much or more than I designed to say when I arose to address the House; I will, therefore conclude by expressing my earnest hope that the appropriation will be refused, and that the bill will be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means with the proposed instructions.

REMARKS OF MR. SOUTHGATE OF KY.

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Mr. SOUTHGATE rose, and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It was no: my purpose to have spoken for the first time on this question; nor do I now intend to elaborate an argument in support of the bill. But, sir, the extraordinary proposition of my colleague, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and his yet more extraordinary argument, compel me to come to the rescue of my own principles, and to sustain, in opposition to his acknowledged power in debate, feebly, but firmly, on my part, those primary principles which Kentucky, so far as I am advised, never has, and never intends to surrender. We may be compelled for a time to abondon them; but, sir, Kentucky never will despair in her efforts to restore to our once prosperous but now afflicted country those great questions of power and of policy which have fallen in the din of party strife, and now lie in ruins before us, a melancholy spectacle of the folly of the times.

It was but yesterday, sir, when Kentucky was a unit in opinion, in relation to the great question involved in this bill. To-day I find myself in a minority.

[Here one of the Kentucky delegation remarked, you are mistaken, a majority of us have voted for the bill.]

I rejoice that it is so. I feel a proud satisfaction that Kentucky has not yet cowered under the influences that we know are exerting here to defeat this bill. The principle, yes, sir, the vital principle is indivisible, and hence I regard the proposition and argument of my colleague as founded in a selfishness of purpose not characteristic of himself, or of the State from which he comes. He proposes to abandon this road, and surrender the jurisdiction to the States, in its present unfinished condition, and upon what principle? Not because we have not the money and cannot get it; not because we are released from the moral and legal obligation to extend this road to the Mississippi: not because the advantages of this road to the commerce and social intercourse of the East and West are not apparent; not because we have not the constitutional power; not because the road is not national; but, sir, strange to tell, because Green river and Big Barren river are not embraced and have not received the kind and fostering care of the General Government, presented and pressed as they have been in past times to the favorable consideration of Congress, with all his zeal and energy! Sir, I will not stop to inquire whether Kentucky has had her full share of the public money. I know she has not; but is that an argument why we shall withhold from other parts of our own West that which in justice and right belongs to them. The people of the West have paid into the public Treasury, since the year 1816, upwards of eighty millions of dollars for public lands, besides their full share in the consumption of those articles of foreign production upon which the tariff operated. They have submitted to the erection of cordons of forts, light-houses, beacons, and other Northern and Eastern improvements on the seacoast and elsewhere, for the protection of the people and the security of commerce. Yielding to the force of circumstances they could not control, they have been truly the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for other more favored parts of the country; and now, sir, when they demand for you, not a favor, but the fulfilment and execution of your own contract, the performance of that for which you have long since received a valuable consideration, they are told, not by the man of the North, but by one of her own sons, "I am determined to abandon you, because Green river and Big Barren river have not long since received their share of the public money." And, sir, the South is invoked to aid Kentucky in her zeal to end a system founded in csmpact, and carried out thus far in good faith; and they come with congratulations that this abominable symtem is about to be surrendered and sacrificed on the altar of public opinion: but they come not with an argument against the policy; not with reasoning and deduction drawn from the Constitution, that commerce means a traffic, confined to the sea and not to the land; not that this road is sectional, and that only some six or more States are interested and to be benefited by its construction; not that the Government itself might not in winter or autumn use this road for the purpose of transmitting supplies and munitions of war for the protection of our frontier, when our rivers were closed with ice, or the supply of water insufficient; not protesting that the South itself had not always opposed this road upon high constitutional ground, and resisted it because it was partial, sectional, and selfish: no, sir, with no such arguments as these, but with threats that we are "digging mines which will produce an explosion that may shake our political fabric!" And are these the arguments we are called upon to answer? Are we to be threatened and forced to abandon this road, surrender our long-cherished opinions and our policy, and, above all, our plighted faith, because, by possibility, the tariff may hereafter be increased, and, as a consequence, the fear of a Southern earthquake?

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOLSEY] gravely reminded us the other day that if we persisted in this measure he would not be answerable for consequences; that something serious might follow; dissolution seemed to be squinted at. Well, sir, I confess that I am tired of these continued sectional denunciations, thrown out in terrorem to act upon us in the discharge of our high and responsible trust. I can tell the gentleman from Georgia he mistakes the character of the people of the West, if he supposes they are to be driven from their purpose by threats as to consequences. No, sir. Give us an argument; we will listen to you. If we have wronged you, tell us how, when, of what you complain; give us the "story of your misfortunes," and, if we have done you injustice, most cheerfully will we retrace our steps; but do not, I beseech you, do not threaten us with your volcanoes. We can be persuaded, but not driven or frightened. We compromised the tariff with you because you said you were injured; and now you say that you forced us, you compelled us, to yield; and, emboldened by that experiment, you are making another. I regret that I am compelled thus to notice the argument, if argument it can be called.

But we are told that this appropriation ought not to be made because the Treasury is empty; that is no fault of mine, nor has Kentucky had any agency in producing it; nor is it necessary I should stop to inquire who has. The people are now busily engaged on this question themselves; they are determined to know where the money is, and why and wherefore this state of things exists. One thing we do know, and that is, that some few of the defaulting receivers of public moneys, not now in office, have more than doubled the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill in their hands. Yes, sir, upwards of one million of dollars. Whether we shall ever get this money or any part of it, I know not; it would seem to be doubtful, from the fact that in one or more instances the defaulter owes upwards of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the Government has security for twenty thousand only! How much more of the public money is in the hands of the two thousand and upwards of defaulting postmasters and receivers of the customs, not now in office, I will upon some more fit occasion endeavor to show. And, sir, when the veil shall be removed from the new swarm who are now in office, and the amount reported for which they are liable and unable to pay, the people will be able to see where a few more millions of their money have gone. But this is not the question before the House. If we have not got the money, then the appropriation, if made, cannot be applied; but it is our duty to provide the means, because we solemnly agreed to make the road, have performed part of the contract, and yet we are told we ought not to fulfil it, for fear the tariff may be increased, and for fear also a great political Southern tornado may sweep over our land.

Mr. Speaker, there is a certain furioso sort of argument resorted to by certain Southern gentlemen that I regret to hear. If we dare name the tariff or internal improvements, they are thrown into ecstacies, and we are warned, nay more threatened; and they tell us of their rights, and, "knowing their rights, dare to maintain them." It has often occurred to me, sir, that some of the political notions of the day are somewhat atmospheric, or tinctured with the pounds, shillings, and pence consideration. I listened the other day to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. YELL,] when he was so earnestly engaged in discoursing about economy, and reform, and retrenchment, and who seemed to have taken upon himself the paternity of that measure. Now, sir, he said nothing about the want of economy, or constitutional power, touching this appropriation; he votes for this bill; in fact, he sees no want of economy or constitutional power to make a road in Arkansas, provided you will call it a military road. You find Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, men of all parties, all voting for this bill; no supposed want of power or notions of economy can induce them to vote against this bill; all conscientious scruples are removed; not even an empty treasury restrains them. But, sir, I have said more already than I intended to have said; and, in conclusion, permit me to remark, that appropriations to this road, under the faith of the compact and agreement made by this Government with the people then inhabiting a wilderness, but now grown full of strength and power, have been made by almost every Congress, and approved by every President from the days of Jefferson to Jackson, and at periods when a large national debt was hanging over us. And now, sir, I demand to know, will you abandon this road? Will you tell that people who have never forsaken their country in the hour of her peril, that you have now forsaken them? No, sir, you cannot, consistent with the immutable principles of justice, and, for one, as long as I have the honor of a seat here, I will carry out in good faith that which our fathers so wisely commenced, and that which I believe will promote the welfare of our common country.

DEBATE ON THE SEMINOLE WAR,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 24, 1838.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, on leave, reported a bill making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838.

The bill having been read twice, Mr. C. sent to the Clerk's table, to be read, a letter from the Secretary of War, and another from the Acting Quartermaster General, setting forth the absolute necessity for an immediate appropriation.

The bill having been committed—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole on that, and the bill for the protection of the northern frontier.

Mr. WISE inquired if the motion was a debatcable one.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. WISE said if it had, he should have offered some objections to going into committee on this bill, for he saw no reason for taking up a partial bill, when there was a general bill already before the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG might be permitted, after the remark of the gentleman from Virginia, to repeat what he had before said, that, when the other bill came up, he anticipated a general debate; but the necessity of the present bill was shown from the fact that the War Department had nothing to pay but drafts, and they were returning protested.

Mr. WISE. If the appropriation is now made, there will be nothing to debate about.

Mr. BELL had examined, as well as he could, the grounds upon which this partial appropriation was made; and he believed that there was a necessity for some amount; how much, it would be for the House to ascertain.

Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion was agreed to, and the House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONNOR in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the above bill.

As soon as it had been read by the Clerk,

Mr. WISE rose to address the committee in opposition to the measure in the form in which it was presented. This, said he, is just such a bill as I expected. It is just in this way that all the immense sums of the public money which have already been expended on this war have been extracted, like teeth, from this House. They wait to the last moment, when debt has accumulated till payment cannot any longer be deferred, and then, at the pinch of necessity, we are told we must pay, or the credit of the country will suffer. In this way there have been dragged from us the nine or ten millions of dollars which have already lavished on this disgraceful, wicked, fatal contest. We have just been told here, by the Delegate from Florida, that the regular troops of our Army are without their pay, and that the disbanded militia are in the same situation. Ask how much will ultimately be required for this war when this is the state of matters after all the sums we have appropriated? Will any company, any capitalist, or moneyed combination of men, be willing to take thirty millions, and agree to pay the expenses which have already been incurred? Will any gentleman here undertake to tell us how much this war has cost us already? I here take the responsibility, and I will act it out, to declare in my place that I will not, with my own knowledge, vote one dollar more for it, till we have some details, some intelligible account, as to the expenditure of what has already been given. Has the Committee of Ways and Means informed us how this money has been spent? Will they tell this House how many steamboats are at this moment lying idle in Florida, at an expense for their hire of many thousands of dollars a day? Will they let us know how many harpies are now feasting on the spoils of Government in that Territory? Is there, in fact, a war there at all? I have information from the best sources, sources which are now within reach, gentlemen recently from the spot, and now in this city, and who will come forward and testify, if you will grant the investigation I have demanded—which assure me that there is, at this moment, no war in Florida, but that which is kept up by the Government officers, and by the people who are battening and fattening on the money of the nation voted by this House to prosecute that war. These Cherokee mediators, whom you employed, whom you have withdrawn, and whom you have treated with such base perfidy by seizing and binding the Seminole chiefs whom they had succeeded in bringing in to treat with you, while the white flag of truce was yet flying over their heads. These Cherokees tell you that the Seminoles desire peace. Sir, it is acts like these, acts of base and double perfidy, first to the Cherokee mediators and then to the Seminole chiefs, men who ought to have been taught morality by your examples as civilized men, professing to be christians,—it is these things which keep up that disgraceful war which is wasting and desolating your Southern frontier. Will not this House inquire how the millions we have given have been made away with? For one, I as an American citizen, feel sufficiently disgraced already by this base, dishonest, and disastrous contest, and I will not budge one step farther until matters are explained. Let the troops wait: if all the money is wasted which should have paid them, let them wait. I cannot help it. I will not give another dollar till we have the money accounted for.

Mr. DOWNING, the delegate from Florida, addressed the House in reply. [Owing to his very inconvenient situation, in one corner of the House and on the opposite side of the Speaker's chair, the first part of his remarks was in a great degree lost to the reporter. He subsequently removed his place, and was better heard.] He said he felt himself called upon, by the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, who had declared that he would vote no further supply till some account was given, to vindicate the course of the Administration in the conduct of this Seminole war. The gentleman had stigmatized the advisers and conductors of it from the beginning, and had characterized the war itself as base and wicked in its origin, disastrous in its progress, and almost ridiculous in its conclusion. Now, as to the commencement of this contest, it had been based upon a treaty made between the United States and the Seminole tribe of Indians; a treaty which had been entered into by their great leading chiefs, which had never been disavowed, and against the fairness of which not a whisper had ever been heard, as having been obtained by fraud, or by the dealing out of whiskey. The treaty had been made by a man whose character in his own country was unimpeached and unimpeachable; to whose escutcheon no stain, no stigma, dare attach; he meant James Gadsden. It was a transaction which could not be said to have been hurried over with a view to deceive; it had been entered into coolly, and with full deliberation. It was therein provided that certain chiefs of the Seminole tribe should go, and with their own eyes view the country to which they were invited to remove, and which they were to receive in exchange for the lands they were to relinquish. The provision was complied with. The delegation did go, and on their return acceded to the treaty, as did afterwards the Seminole nation. Was there any thing like fraud in this? But afterwards, when the land was to be delivered up in exchange for our money and other lands, they acted as Indians are found to act in every case—they failed to comply. They took the money, and after they had wasted it, then they said there was fraud. This was their usual course; they would do so in every case. And now, after these wretches had thus broken the treaty, murdered our citizens, burnt our property, and ravaged and burnt our towns, now gentlemen refused to appropriate any more money to carry on the war. It was very true that the progress of the war had been unfortunate. It had been prolonged beyond the expectations of any human being; but let him say to gentlemen who complained so vehemently of its ill success, that it had been thus prolonged by them.

Mr. D. said that they had prevented the Administration from using effectually the means in their power, from ending the war by brisk and energetic means, in pushing the enemy to extremity, by so acting on public opinion as to create sympathy for the savages, and thus force the Government to listen to long and delusive parleys for peace, and to waste precious time in so doing; and this out of sympathy—sympathy entertained by gentlemen who, living far at the North, know little or nothing of the real state of the matter. He repeated the assertion, that all the procrastination complained of had been justly chargeable on Northern men. From them came the cry to let these poor devils have time; yes, let them have time, do not press them to remove. This sympathetic cry was heard all over the North, from the pulpit and the press. There was no sympathy with the Southern white man, no feeling for those who had suffered, whose estates had been ravaged, and their families butchered in cold blood. Yes, had these Indians been placed, as they ought to have been, under the jurisdiction of the law; had they, when they had perpetrated their savage murders of women and children, been handed over to the civil magistrate, the war might long ago have been ended. But no, the public sentiment at the North called for sympathy—for sympathy with any thing that had color, whether red or black. When the wives and children of white men were butchered mercy and without provocation, were there any overflowings of this tender sympathy for them? Oh! no, it was all for the Indians and negroes; here, above all, it boiled and bubbled over in abundance.

The gentleman from Virginia had said that the people of Florida were battening and growing fat on the spoils of the Government. He wished he could carry that gentleman to the spot, and could show him the desolate fields, the streets crowded with fugitives from the scalping knife of the Indian. Fattening! Where could the people of Florida find the means of making money out of this war? What had they wherewith to supply the Government? with provisions? horses? mules? Their fields were ravaged, their property laid waste, their horses driven off, their country a wilderness. Had the gentleman been able to prove a single item of all the charges made of these people fattening on Government spoils? The House had heard one story of wagons hired at $10 a day that might have been got for $5: and they had heard another about certain frauds in Alabama, where a Government agent made a contract and put a balance in his own pocket. But was it for the people of Florida to be abused and taunted for this? The gentleman, he was very sure, did not know their true situation? When the very means of life were taken from them, were they to be told that they were battening on spoil? On what testimony had the gentleman made such a charge? Whatever it might be, no man who knew the facts could believe the charge for a moment: and he felt assured that the gentleman himself, from his known candor, would, when better informed, retract the charge.

Mr. WISE here interposed to explain. He had not charged the people of Florida, or any body in particular: he declared that there had been a lavish and enormous expenditure of money, and had called the House to inquire. The charge of fattening on the public spoils was pointed more particularly at Government contractors.

Mr. DOWNING resumed. In the whole Territory of Florida there was not a single Government contractor; whether for horses, shot, or provisions The contractors were to be found where the supplies were to be furnished, but there were no supplies to be furnished from the wasted fields of Florida. It was in Kentucky the gentleman must look for the contractors for horses; in New York and Charleston for the contractors for provisions. Where did the public money go to? Not to the poor settlers in Florida. All they got of it was $6 a month as the price of their sweat and their blood, and even that poor pittance the gentleman was for refusing to pay. Was that the justice of this Government? After the people of Florida had undergone the toil and danger of the field, and had been regularly discharged, were they not even to receive this poor $6 a month?

Mr. WISE again interposed. He had not said that. He had said, let the Government pay all necessary CONTRACTS; but, before they appropriated more, even for these poor citizens of Florida, let Congress take some steps to get at an account of the expenditure of its money; and not let the harpies hover over that suffering region, and devour what ought to go to pay these troops.

Mr. DOWNING said let Congress give the money, and the people of Florida would see to that. The difficulty with them had been the impossibility of getting the Government's money out of the hands of the disbursing officers, for want of an acquaintance with all the formalities of office, of which they knew nothing. They had been in this way kept out of their just dues until their very heart was sick.

But what did the gentleman from Virginia propose? Why, after he had got a committee of investigation; after they had called for persons and papers from all parts of the universal world; after he had there discussed this whole mass of evidence; after the committee had made a long report, nay, two reports, why, then, and not till then, the troops in Florida were to receive their money. Now, Mr. D's plan would be, first, let the Government pay a just debt and end the war, and then go on and canvass, and censure, and impeach, whoever deserved punishment. Had he [Mr. D.] the management of matters, he would certainly give the gentleman a committee to his own full satisfaction—a committee of his own choice; and not let the friends of the Administration make the report; because, however true it might be, coming from them it would have little weight with the public. Give the gentleman his own committee, and then, humble as Mr. D. was, he pledged himself to be able to justify this Government against the world in every act it had authorized in this Seminole war. It might have been deceived by agents at a distance, whom it was obliged to trust and to believe. But had not its army been commanded by some of the Generals of highest standing in the service? Was the Quartermaster General a corrupt person? Would any man say it? As to the hire of wagons, &c. was the country to be told that, because nearly a thousand militia officers had been employed, and many of them from necessity made disbursing officers, this was made a reproach upon the Government? Were his constituents to be publicly abused on the floor of Congress for this? These things, if true, do not attach to the skirts of the Government. What unjust and illegal claim had been passed by the Departments? What Quartermaster had been proved guilty of malfeasance? Was the Government to be held answerable for all the acts of these thousand militia officers? Were charges to be publicly made here based on anonymous letters—anonymous, at least, to the House?

[Mr. WISE here said the letters to which he had referred were not anonymous; and he had produced affidavits, with the names of the witnesses signed to them.]

Mr. D. said all that might be so; let the gentleman carry this testimony to the proper public officers, and if the charges were proved fraudulent, he was very sure they would not be passed at the Department. If the real object of the gentleman was to prevent frauds, that was his obvious course. If his papers were not presented at the Department, he ought not to complain if the Government did not notice them. If the gentleman had had no experience in these matters, Mr. D. would willingly lend him his.

[Mr. WISE said he had had experience of his own, which was quite enough to warn him from trusting, at least, one of the Departments.]

Mr. D. resumed, and said he had always believed the gentleman from Virginia to be an upright, worthy man, who aimed at doing justice; he never had entertained any other opinion of him; but it was Mr. D's firm belief that his own knowledge of the Indian character was better by far than that gentleman's. He had lived very near the Indians for ten years; and it was his deliberate conviction that, if the Cherokees had never gone to Florida, this war would have been ended before this time. Those mediators, of whom the gentleman spoke so warmly, had peace on their lips here, and war there. Mr. D. had received letters, which were not anonymous, which stated that Jumper and Alligator, two of the Seminole chiefs, declared that the Cherokees had told them that, if they would only hold on till the spring, Congress would appropriate no more money, and they could hold the country. He had three letters, which confirmed this statement, and similar statements had been published in Florida. Sam Jones, the celebrated chief who now held out, would have come in with the others but for this assurance. And had not these Cherokees proved true prophets? Had not the House refused to appropriate, save in the most pressing emergency? If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had not been fearful of the state of feeling in the House, he would not have been driven to bring in a partial appropriation, like that now asked for.

One gentleman had said, a few days since, that we had 10,000 troops in Florida, and that there were more soldiers there than the entire number of the Seminoles, chiefs, squaws and papooses included. This might be so; Mr. D. was not sure of their numbers. But he had always heard that, in conducting a war, if 10,000 were found insufficient, the proper course was to send 20,000. But gentlemen now said, that if 10,000 were found not to be enough, withdraw all of them but 2,000 or 3,000! Now, whether these Seminoles were in a fair field or foul, in swamps or in hammocks, or wherever they might be, one thing was certain, that they were like the Irishman's flea, when you put your hand upon them they were not there; and therefore the army had to be divided into different portions, and therefore a greater number of troops was necessary. Would the gentleman, to save a few dollars for an Administration which was lately charged with having so much money that it was not safe to trust it in their hands, send but a few troops where many were needed, and thus risk or sacrifice white lives? And all for economy! Why, but yesterday, and it had been said that the war was just; that the barbarities of these Indians were such that they must be put down; but now Mr. D. had learned, for the first time, what the justice of a war was; a war was just up to five millions of dollars; yes, up to that amount the war was just; but if it it went over five millions it was unjust and we must investigate. [A laugh.] The Seminoles were said to be oppressed! This was the first time he had heard the war spoken of in that strain. After suffering all that his constituents had done at the hands of these savages, the poor Indians were to be pitied! and part of the Territory of Florida must be given up rather than carry the war any farther. If it had been proposed to the gentleman from Virginia to give up the Dismal Swamp to Nat. Turner, would the gentleman have consented? Yet they in Florida were to give up their territory to these Indians, and applications were coming in from all parts of the country for Congress to free their slaves. He would tell gentlemen here, once for all, that whatever might be the legislation of Congress, they should never locate these Indians among them, and they never should free their slaves.

They had been told, by the speeches in that House at the commencement of this war, that fourteen skeletons of companies might have suppressed the whole Seminole disturbance. Then the tune was changed, and a body of troops was to be forced into that Territory sufficient to carry on a European war. And now they were told that too many troops had been sent. At the time this war broke out, if any one had told the inhabitants of Florida, who lived almost in the midst of these Indians, that their lives and property were in danger, that there was the slightest possible apprehension of Indian hostilities, the man would have been set down as a fool. No man dreamed that the troops in the Territory were not sufficient to put down any thing of the kind. When, afterward, the war broke in like an avalanche upon the astonished people, immediately those wiseacres had known it all beforehand. Oh, yes; they had foreseen every thing that had happened! Mr. D. insisted that the Government was not at all to blame. General after General had been sent, and troop after troop. And had they ever been defeated in the open field? Never. They had driven the Indians to the wall, once and again; but no sooner were the wretches beaten than they begged for peace, and we had spared them and fed them. It was these Indians, and not the people of Florida, who had fattened on the public spoil. But, after we had spent enough money upon them to have paid the expense of another campaign they had broken through the guards, and were now fighting us again. Inquiry had been made about the conduct of General Hernandez, for imprisoning the chiefs. What would gentlemen have had him do? Would they have had him say to these wretches—Go, take your freedom, return to your people, come back again, armed, and fight it out like men? Was that what they meant to say? If it was, let them speak out. Mr. D. said that it was believed in Florida, by those who had an opportunity of knowing, that Powell had come to the post of Hernandez with the express purpose of seizing him, and holding him as a hostage; and, but for the vigilance of Hernandez and Jesup, that he would have effected his object. And if he had, did any body believe that that House would have heard any thing of a resolution for inquiry in regard to this conduct of Oceola? No. Gentlemen had no sympathy for those who had not color on their skins. White men might be betrayed or murdered, and all was well; all their tender feelings were reserved for Indians and negroes.

Mr. D. said that the character of their country was peculiar, and rendered it difficult to conduct a war; that the militia forces employed had been enlisted for three months only, and of this short period much was consumed in coming and returning; besides, all which, being raw troops, they were wasteful in the field, and consumed as much provision as would subsist nearly double the number of regular soldiers accustomed to service. Then, in addition to all, Florida was sickly in the summer season. During that part of the year, the war must necessarily cease. All the country thus lost had to be regained the next campaign. Provisions had to be recarted to the points where they were required. Vexatious delays were unavoidable; and, in fact, if all the time wasted should be deducted from the campaigns heretofore, it would be found that, since the commencement of the war, our troops had actually had scarce nine months of fighting time.

Mr. WISE rejoined. I said that the Florida war was iniquitous in its inception, disgraceful in its progress, and disastrous in its termination; and if those who hold the power in this House will give me the opportunity of testing the truth of that position, I am ready to meet them on every ground, and to demonstrate such to be the fact. I speak, indeed, nothing on my own knowledge; but I speak from information, part of which is official, and has been submitted to committees of this House. Great as has been the extravagance in the expenses of this war, that forms the least disgraceful feature in it. It was with unfeigned surprise that I heard the delegate from Florida say that not a whisper had been heard against the Seminole treaty. I will now tell that gentleman that, more than twelve months ago, the complaint was made here in this House that the treaty was a fraud. And how was it fraudulent? A proposition was made by the Indian chief, who was their agent in conducting the treaty, to which the nation agreed, that commissioners should be appointed as well on the part of the United States as of the Semi-noles, who should go and visit the land of promise which had been offered them beyond the Mississippi; and that no treaty was to be concluded until these commissioners came back, reported the result of their examinations, and the plan of removal should be approved by the nation. But, instead of complying with these provisions of the treaty, the United States commissioners, when they had once got their Indian colleagues across the river Mississippi, persuaded and bribed them to make a treaty there, which they accordingly did. But the treaty was never confirmed by the Seminole nation. I say, therefore, that the Seminole tribe, with whom you are at war for a breach of treaty, never did make the treaty; they took the initiatory steps towards a treaty, which the United States authorities chose to regard as making the treaty, but no such treaty was ever consummated; and I affirm again that this was iniquitous in its inception, and, if opportunity shall be afforded me, the fact can be as fully demonstrated as that other similar and undeniable fact, that you never made a valid treaty with the Cherokees. I must say that the gentleman betrays a total want of information on the subject. He told this House that, at the time of the breaking out of this war, there was not a man in Florida who believed that any armed force need to be sent there to guard against Indian hostilities, and that the man would have been called a fool, or a coward, who should have suggested such an idea. Does the gentleman know to whom he is applying these epithets? Does he know that the Governor of Florida himself, JOHN H. EATON, did not only suggest such an idea, but embody it in an official letter to the War Department? That in that letter he expressly warned the Government that if it did not take the necessary steps of precaution, hostilities must necessarily ensue? That the course the Government was pursuing was calculated to give countenance to the idea then prevailing among the Indian chiefs, that it was intended to make slaves of their children, and that, if peace was to be preserved, it was indispensable to have such an armed force in Florida as would be sufficient to overawe opposition? Can the gentleman be ignorant of this fact? And yet is it not in perfect contradistinction to the position he has assumed here?

Mr. DOWNING here rose to explain. The gentleman from Virginia could not but know that when men had a favorite measure to carry with the Government, it was a very common expedient to prophesy utter destruction to the Government and the country, unless that particular measure should be adopted. Governor Eaton never did believe that a military force was necessary to overawe the Seminoles. As to what had been said about the treaty, they had a statute in Florida that the word neither of an Indian nor of a negro was to be believed against that of a white man; and, independently of the statute, Mr. D. was not inclined to take either Indian or negro testimony against that of respectable officers of the American Government.

Mr. WISE. I made no request that the gentleman should do so. I am myself a southern man as much as he, and I have much the same feelings toward the black or the red skin, and the testimony of either; but I take the testimony of the Government's own agents. I shall call upon those commissioners themselves to state if that Seminole treaty was not made beyond the Mississippi; and I will produce the testimony of white witnesses on the question, whether it was ever submitted to the Seminoles for ratification. And besides, if this tribe is a people, with whom we are to treat as a nation, as a foreign nation, or a nation quasi foreign, then their voice is to be heard. The gentleman may be a lawyer, as I understand he is. I appeal, therefore, to him as such, whether both parties to a treaty are not to be heard? And I now again say, that when the facts shall be exposed, it will be proved that this was a fraudulent treaty, and that the Indian chiefs had good grounds to believe that their children were to be enslaved. This I believe on the credit of Secretary Cass, who furnished me with the letter of Governor Eaton. Yet no armed force was sent into Florida for nearly a year after this warning had been given to the Department, and not till hostilities had actually broken out. The gentleman is very ready to become the champion of the Administration; but he will find it a heavier task than he imagines to relieve the War Department from its responsibility in this matter. The people of Florida themselves ought to know who it is by whose criminal neglect desolation and ruin have been brought upon their homes. I make no attack upon the people of Florida. I will vote not for five millions only, but for fifty millions, if it be necessary for their defence. But as to the appropriation now asked for, I believe that, instead of arresting the hostilities in Florida, its only effect will be to render that unhappy Territory still more desolate.

Again: I have said that this war has been most disgracefully conducted. How many millions has it cost us? Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tell? Has the War Department communicated the amount to him? I do not ask to wait till a committee of investigation has been appointed to have every possible obstacle and stumbling-block cast in its way by the whole Executive Department, from the President himself down to his lowest agents. I will call upon the Secretary of War to give us a statement of the total amount, and how it has been expended. I will call for his balances, and I will see whether the enormous sums we have appropriated have gone bona fide to pay our own troops, or to feed the harpies who are battening on the public purse. I am told that this war is now costing us at the rate of $73,000 a day. We have already appropriated eight or nine millions, and twenty millions will not pay our expenses thus far; and yet how much nearer are we to the end of the war than when the predecessor of that gentleman [Mr. White] made his first pathetic appeal to this House? I heard that appeal, and I made no cavil. I said that the Territory must be defended. I voted the money asked for. I voted more and more year after year. I helped to pour out the public money in floods for the same object, till the reports of the national degradation and disgrace have come up to me with a tongue to which I must listen. I cannot refuse. It is a public duty to inquire. What has been the course of the war? Have not corps after corps been massacred, from Dade's bloody field to the last disastrous battle? You have captured Micanopy and Oceola, and does not Oceola boast in his prison to this day not forty braves have been taken? And this by the utmost force of a nation which, a little while ago, was boarding France, and now talks of calling England to explanation about the capture of the steamboat Caroline. You have been putting out your strength for years, and you have killed about forty braves. Yes, you had Jackson's own troops, the veterans of your standing army, besides all your militia and volunteers, and these heroes of nature have met you with the loss of forty braves. How, I ask, can this have happened? Is nobody informed? Is the Government not at all to blame? Does the whole fault lie in distant contractors? Surely the gentleman himself must find it his duty to join with me in this inquiry, and to hold the head and not merely the members responsible.

I say further, that this war has been conducted in a manner morally wrong. It has been marked on our part by perfidy after perfidy, and treachery upon treachery. Was there no perfidy in the capture of the young chief, Wild Cat, the son of Philip, whom you used as a spy to bring in Micanopy and Oceola under the white flag of truce, and then seized him and carried him a prisoner to St. Augustine? The Cherokees have been here abused and trampled upon for acting as mediators. But was it not your Government itself who sent them? Were they not applied to to become mediators, and officially employed by the Government to tempt the Seminoles to peace? They went to Gen. Jesup. He officially recognised their character, and sent them to the Seminoles as mediators. And were they successful? Yes. They carried in the head chiefs. They were unarmed. There was no ambuscade. Does not this contradict the assertion that the Cherokees acted a double part, and told them to hold on till spring, and Congress would not appropriate. Gen. Hernandez will swear that Jesup gave him orders to capture those chiefs at all hazards; and, if Gen. Jesup should be put on his oath, he will bring the responsibility of that order to another quarter. There is an old chief, well known here, who writes from the wigwam in Tennessee, and who originated those instructions—

Mr. DOWNING here interposed, in explanation, and stated that Alligator and Jumper, instead of having been brought in by the Cherokees, came in after they had left the ground. He did not know what might have been the authority of Gen. Jesup, or what would be the testimony of Hernandez, but this he did know, that although he did not possess the bloodthirstiness of the writers of some of the letters he had received, if he had been Gen. Jesup, the whole of those chiefs, who were all murderers, should have not only been taken prisoners, but left pendent on the crooked limb of a yellow pine.

Mr. WISE resumed. I have no doubt, from the feelings of that gentleman, that he might be led to commit an act which he would afterwards deeply repent. But though the force of feeling might betray him into acts of violence, or even of inhumanity, I never could bring myself to believe that he would be guilty of deliberate treachery. If he had caught these Indians in the act of murder, he might, as he says, hang them on the branch of a yellow pine, but he never could have had recourse to treachery and perfidy to entrap them.

I am now going on, said Mr. W. with the facts of the Cherokee mediation. These mediators made three successive visits among the Seminoles. The first attempt to bring them to a conference was unsuccessful. The second so far succeeded as that they brought in the chiefs, all of them that would come, under their flag of truce. The gentleman asks why Sam Jones was left behind when the others came in? I will tell him why, and the reason exhibits but one specimen of the conduct of Jesup towards these people. Gen. Jesup had threatened, for certain reasons, that if Sam Jones was ever caught, he would put petticoats on him—a species of treatment of which the Indian warriors stand in the utmost dread and horror—and therefore he told the Cherokees he never would surrender himself. The chiefs were brought to the camp; they came under a flag of truce, in reliance on our good faith, and they were immediately bound and carried to prison. A runner who had accompanied them, and who stood waiting to watch the result of the interview, no sooner witnessed this act of American perfidy, than he instantly turned about and carried the intelligence back to Jones, who renewed the war. Again the Cherokee mediators were employed to make a third effort. They went, and at the risk of their own lives, penetrated within the lines of the Seminole force. They were met and told that they must not approach; that if they attempted it they would be in danger of being scalped by Jones. They then returned to Gen. Jesup, from whom they obtained letters expressive of his entire satisfaction with the manner in which they had discharged their mission, and his confidence in their integrity and good faith.

Mr. EVERETT, of Vermont, here asked that the letters of Gen. Jesup might be read, and they were read at the Clerk's table accordingly, viz: one to the Secretary of War, and the other to the delegation of Cherokees, both dated the 15th of December, 1837.

Mr. WISE now requested that the delegate from Florida would read the letters on which he founded the assertion that the Cherokee mediators had played a double part.

Mr. DOWNING thereupon read, in his place, portions of two letters addressed to him, dated December 29 and December 31. He then stated that, at the time Gen. Jesup's letters, just read, were written, he was unacquainted with the fact of the dissimulation of the Cherokees. But Mr. D. was informed that the General had now become of the same opinion with himself.

Mr. WISE proceeded. Now the gentleman from Florida has done just as I did. He has made a statement on the authority of letters, parts of which letters he has read, without reading the names of the writers. So did I, and my letters were subscribed with as good names as his; nay, I perceive (for the gentleman has had the goodness to hand me the letters) that one of these names is the very same which was subscribed to the letter to me; and whenever that gentleman will get his party in this House to take up the gauntlet which I have cast down to them, I will produce letters here, not anonymous, but from as high and honorable men as are to be found in the United States army. And now I ask all generous and high-minded men whether the character of these Cherokee mediators is to be blasted by rumors like these, and that in the face of the fact that they did go to these Seminoles at the risk of their lives, and did succeed in bringing in their war-chiefs, and when it is owing alone to their mediation that Gen. Jesup now holds those chiefs as his prisoners? And how did he get them? By an act of atrocious double perfidy: first to them and then to the Cherokees who brought them in. Is not this the true cause of the continuance of hostilities? Is it not the obvious and the sufficient cause? The Indians can no longer rely on Gen Jesup's flags of truce. His own conduct has demonstrated to them that if they venture in, for the purpose of negotiating, they will immediately be seized and made prisoners. What more can be wanting to continue the war? And though these people are Indians, and under the ban of this Government, these facts will rest on their own internal evidence. They stand as a dark monument, a lasting opprobrium on our national character; and now, to turn away the public indignation from themselves, they charge treachery on their own pacificators. But I appeal to the generous feelings of the gentleman from Florida himself to cast such suspicions from his mind, and I ask him whether he ought not to be very careful how he ventures to whisper such a charge without the most conclusive proof. I am sure the gentleman himself will say that the whole matter wants investigation.

And now, to show the information which this gentleman had from Florida before this war began, I refer that gentleman and this House to the documents for 1835 and 1836, for the letter of Governor Eaton, to which I before referred. Hostilities broke out in December, and this letter was written in the March previous.

[Here Mr. WISE read the letter of Governor Eaton, commenting upon it as he proceeded.]

Mr. DOWNING here observed that Governor Eaton had afterwards been ashamed of that letter, and retracted the opinions it contained, and that legislative action had subsequently been had with regard to it. He said that he had never known a man from the North to come into Florida that was not an Indian philanthropist, and he had never known any one to leave that Territory who continued to be such. He had himself been once in the same situation, and he would now venture to say that, let him carry the strongest advocate of the Indians in this House into Florida, and make him their neighbor for a little while, and when twenty or thirty of their cattle had been stolen, all their Indian sympathy would vanish in a moment.

Mr. WISE said that he cared not for the sickly sympathies to which the gentleman alluded. He was now speaking, not about men's individual feelings, but on affairs of a public and national character, on the operations of the War Department. I have shown that Governor Eaton argued against the good faith of that treaty, on the policy of its execution, and gave timely warning to the Government that the steps they were taking were wrong. Why should he ever have retracted these opinions, and how did it come to pass? Now, it does so happen that I know all about that retraction, and I know this because all the papers and correspondence in the War Department in relation to this whole subject were confidentially communicated to me by Governor Cass. I introduced into this House a resolution calling for information, which was adopted; and the next day a messenger from the Department came to me to know what papers I wanted. I answered, all; send me all; and I got the whole. I never permitted myself to regard these papers for one moment as confidential. They were the regular files of the Department, officially communicated on a public call, and among them I found a clue to this retraction of Governor Eaton. As to the letter itself, it proved to be prophecy. Had it been given by inspiration, it could not have proved more correct. Every prediction it contained was fulfilled to the letter. Hostilities did break out, as he had predicted they would, and there was no force present in the Territory to overawe the enemy. But, after every line and letter of this communication had thus been sealed by fact, circumstances afterwards arose which rendered it the interest of this same Mr. Eaton to look out for an excuse for having written such a letter. Letters passed between him and Mr. Secretary Cass, in which Mr. Eaton was told that it would never do to have the people of the United States know that such a letter as this had been written, and that yet no steps had been taken by the Secretary, and hence the retraction of which that gentleman speaks. I know of what I speak, and the files of the War Department, if they have not been ROBBED, will prove its truth. [Mr. WISE here proceeded to read various other letters and documents, addressed to the War Department, confirming the opinion expressed by Governor Eaton.]

So the House will see that Gov. Eaton is not alone to be hissed at. There are the orders of the Department; here is the warning. Every body knows the result.

The Seminole treaty was made in 1832. It was not ratified till 1834, and the Seminoles and Mickasukies never did agree to it. Instead of pursuing the advice given in these letters, Wiley Thompson, the Indian agent, laid hands upon Oceola, and bound him fast to a log until he should consent to bring in his Indians to give their assent, and a list of the Mickasukies, containing details of the names of men and women, with their children, were delivered to him for that purpose. Thus coerced, he did bring them in, and obtained a certificate from Thompson that he had fully complied with his engagement. He then returned to his people, and the next day Thompson died with nineteen balls through his body.

Before the late seizure of their chiefs by Hernandez, so pacific were the feelings and intentions of the Indians, that when the United States soldiers were found by them wandering in the woods, having lost their way, the Indians sent them in with guides to their own camp. If it be said that Oceola, in person, slew Thompson, I answer that that chief, since his capture, has said that he defies the proof that he has ever been guilty of massacre or murder. He admits that he killed Thompson, but avers that he did it as an open declaration of war. He declares that he will have nothing to say to General Jesup; all he asks and desires is, that he may be sent to his "Great Father," (to be sure, there is something ludicrous in the application by such a chief of that phrase to our President,) and that he may have an opportunity of telling to the children of his Great Father the grounds and causes of this war. I say bring him here. Let us hear his story. We have heard of his battles, let us now hear from him the history of his wrongs. Indian or white man, I cannot but say that he excites my wonder and admiration. This nation and its army are bound to accord him praise for his great qualities and achievements, and if he is not to be believed because he is an Indian, I can point to white witnesses who will confirm his testimony.

Why, then, should this war be carried on in treachery, and at such a boundless cost? Why shall we hunt down, at the point of the bayonet, a people who have forced us to respect them? a people who declare that they desire peace, but dare not meet your Generals to propose it, for fear of treachery and murder? As to the people of Florida, whenever their delegate shall come here, and ask that they be admitted as a State, I pledge to him that he shall have my aid; but I beseech him not to persist in driving these Indians into the sea. Why may they not be suffered to remain on the soil as their brethren have remained in Virginia! The remnant of the Pamunkies are now in that Commonwealth; and to this day they continue regularly to bring in their pairs of wild ducks as tribute to secure the tenure of their land. Let these Indians alone, and they will gradually melt away and disappear before the white population. But if you insist on driving them away, what is to become of them? The Indian policy of General Jackson is now going into effect. You have carried tribe after tribe over the Mississippi, and concentrated them in vast numbers, with all their feelings and resentments burning in their bosoms, on the frontiers of Arkansas and Missouri. Behind them are the Pawnees and the savage Camanches. All they have to do is to catch wild horses from the vast herds on the prairies, and to make a dash into your settlements without a moment's warning, and, before you can get your troops in motion, to retire beyond your reach; and how can you prevent it? As to provisions, they have the innumerable herds of buffalo; and what, I ask, will be the end of all this? How many thousands of troops must you embody into a standing army to protect you from this tremendous power? Already you hear a voice from the Seminoles. Already you have more than one Oceola beyond the Mississippi; and believe it, the day is coming when you will see the policy of the immortal Tecumseh carried into complete effect, and all these tribes united as one man. Nay, the Government is carrying it out for them. It is forcing them to remain at peace with each other, while, at the same time, it is putting arms into their hands. Be assured that their long debt of vengeance will one day be paid to the full. In the meanwhile, I, for one, will never vote another dollar to carry on this war, unless I have some stronger demonstration of its necessity.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

SPEECH OF MR. DAVIS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Senate, June 18, 1838—The motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Maine, for leave to bring in "a bill to provide for surveying the Northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783, being under consideration—

Mr. DAVIS of Massachusetts, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who has just resumed his seat, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] has deprecated in earnest terms, a war with Great Britain, and so do I; but neither that, nor any other consideration, shall deter me from meting out to our citizens that measure of justice which is necessary to preserve peace at home. This is a very important question, and one that ought to engage the most serious attention of the Senate; for the tardy progress of events here has nearly exhausted the patience of Maine. I know it is a dry, uninteresting labor to investigate old lines, and to trace through a long period the evidence by which they are sustained. It is the last task that one can covet here, especially after the searching mind of my colleague has exhausted itself upon the subject. But the attention of the country must be aroused to the matter. It cannot and must not sleep in its present posture; and, however painful the effort, I feel bound to employ the time of the Senate while I advert to some proofs and views of the subject which were left unnoticed by my colleague. To apply these proofs, I must necessarily advert to evidence, which he dwelt upon with a force and clearness that I cannot hope to improve. I have bestowed time enough upon this subject to give it a full examination; and I hesitate not to declare that there really is no question in the case, so clear and decisive is the evidence; and it really seems to me that while our commissioners have examined the case with great ability, by far the larger portion of the evidence and the argumente are about any thing and every thing but the direct question raised by the treaty. The language of the treaty is so explicit that nothing is left in doubt to argue about. By introducing collateral matter, and thus making up, as you see, Mr. President, great folio volumes, Great Britain has succeed in compelling us to print books to refute reasoning that has but a remote bearing, if any at all, on the subject. This is the fruit of diplomacy. I shall prove, before I sit down, that this process has worked us into our present condition; for, when we began to negotiate, no doubt darkened the mind of either Government in regard to the questions now agitated. Great Britain reasoned as we reason, and admitted what we now claim.

If the Senate will examine the treaty of 1783, on which rest our rights, they will perceive that his Britanic Majesty, in the first article, "acknowledges the United States, viz: New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, [&c. naming them all,] to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such; and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquishes all claims to the Government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof." This language shows a plain intention of separating for ever from Great Britain the entire territory of each State, without diminution. The treaty, then proceeds:

"And that all disputes which might arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are and shall be, their boundaries, to wit:

"Article 2. From the NORTHWEST angle of Nova Scotia, to wit: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands, along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river," &c. round to the Atlantic Ocean.

Then it proceeds:

"EAST by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth into the Bay of Fundy to its source; and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Such is the plain, unambiguous reading of the treaty; and yet Great Britain denies that, by this description, we can find the lines described.

The question then is, where is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia? This is the point of departure, and manifestly spoken of as a known, pre-existing place. I shall first consider this question upon the evidence contained in the treaty; and I hold that the proof on the face of this instrument is so plain, so unequivocal, and so decisive, that it is next to impossible that this point should not be ascertained with precision. The northwest angle of Nova Scotia is the angle formed by the north and the west boundary of that province. This north line is continued along the highlands westerly, between the United States and Canada. The intersection of these lines, therefore, constitutes also the northeast angle of the United States. The northwest angle of Nova Scotia is selected as the starting point, doubtless, because the north and the west lines of Nova Scotia were ancient and known lines, and, consequently, the angle an ancient, known angle. If, then, we can by the treaty find the northeast angle of the United States, as it springs from the same point, we shall identify the place in question.

The treaty tells us, in substance, that there is no monument at this place, but points out how the angle is to be found, viz. by drawing a line from the source of the St. Croix river due north to the highlands which divide the rivers emptying into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean. The source of the St. Croix is ascertained by agreement, and a monument has been made. From this monument, if a line be run due north till it falls upon the highlands described, then at its terminus is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. Whoever looks at the map will see that there is an elevation of land which forms the southeastern skirt of the valley of the St. Lawrence, from which waters divide and flow both ways, and that this is the only highland, south and east of the St. Lawrence, from which water flows into that river. It is equally obvious that a due north line from the monument will fall upon this highland, and that it can fall upon no other which sends down rivers into the St. Lawrence. We can then at once satisfy the two great and leading requirements of the treaty. We can run a line due north from the head of the St Croix, till it reaches the summit of land which sends its waters down into the St. Lawrence. The treaty requires that the northern boundary of the United States shall run along this summit; and at the intersection of these two lines, the one running north and the other westerly, shall be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and the northeast angle of the United States. Is there, then, any embarrassment whatever in identifying this point? I think, to an ingenuous mind, there is none.

But Great Britain is not satisfied, because she says the treaty requires highlands from which water flows into the Atlantic Ocean also. Look, then, on the map, and you will see it every where diversified with the sources of streams flowing down the other slope of these highlands into the sea. There are the head-waters of the Ristigouche, the St John's, the Penobscot, &c. Do not these waters flow into the sea? Yes, says Great Britain, but the Ristigouche flows first through the Bay of Chaleur and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the St. John's through the Bay of Fundy; therefore these rivers do not fall into the sea, and the treaty description fails in this particular. Is this a just conclusion? Suppose this circumstance created a real doubt whether these rivers do flow into the sea, can that control the other evidence in the treaty, or must that doubt yield to evidence which is clear and decisive? The highlands spoken of must send down their rivers into the St. Lawrence; the line from the St. Croix must be due north to such highlands. And shall it be said that we can find neither the one nor the other when we find both, because the waters of the Ristigouche, where this line terminates, flow through the Bay of Chaleur into the sea? Nothing is plainer than that this doubt must yield to evidence that is thus decisive, and the Ristigouche must be taken as a river referred to, whose waters flow into the sea. The map shows us that you cannot run a north line to any other highland which divides the rivers which empty into the St. Lawrence from those which empty into the Atlantic ocean.

But, sir, the Bays of Fundy and Chaleur, and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, are parts of the Atlantic ocean. That ocean embraces all bays and inlets formed by it. These waters are parts of the great whole, and Chaleur and Fundy are places in that ocean as much as the Grand Bank or George's Bank, or the Gulfs of Mexico and St. Lawrence. The names are given as matter of convenience, and we might as well contend that Washington is not in the District of Columbia, because it has a name of its own, as that Fundy is not in the Atlantic, or that the oceans of the earth combined are not the great sea, because each has a separate name.

But this part of the question has been so fully argued that I will not further dwell upon it than to say that the treaty itself, independent of all other considerations, leaves no doubt where the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is.

But there is another view of the question, and I rose chiefly to add something to what my colleague advanced on this head.

1st. I will prove that a line drawn due north from the head of St. Croix river to the highlands was established in 1621, and has ever since been the west boundary of Nova Scotia.

2d. That since 1763 the south line of Canada has been, and now is, a continuous line drawn from Chaleur bay, which separates that province from Nova Scotia, along the highlands southwesterly which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to the waters of Connecticut river.

3d. That the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was, at the making of the treaty of 1783, in this south line of Canada, at the point where the west line of Nova Scotia intersected it.

4th. That it follows, from these facts being established, that the lines described by the treaty coincide with the lines of the two provinces as they had long existed, so far as Massachusetts (now Maine) is bounded on them.

5th. That Great Britain established and maintained these lines as the true boundaries till 1783, when the treaty was made, and afterwards, till she found her interest would be promoted by owning a portion of Maine which lies between Canada and New Brunswick, and would afford a freer and better communication between these provinces.

All this I will prove from the official acts and declarations of the Government of Great Britain.

The great question is, where is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia? for at the same point is the northeast angle of the United States. When the treaty was made, Maine was a part of Massachusetts, New Brunswick a part of Nova Scotia, and Canada was called the Province of Quebec. With this explanation I proceed:

First, as to the west line of Nova Scotia. The Province of Nova Scotia was granted by James the First, in 1621, to Sir William Alexander; and I will ask attention to the west and north boundary, which alone are important in this inquiry. The west line begins at Cape Sable, the southwest point of Nova Scotia; thence across the entrance of what is now called the Bay of Fundy, but was then called a great inlet of the sea, to the St. Croix river; thence up that river to its highest spring or head; thence north to the waters of the St. Lawrence, or, as it was then called, the Great River of Canada; thence down the bank of that river to the sea, and round to the place of beginning. Mitchell's map of this province, published in 1755, was, as is agreed, used by the negotiators in making the treaty in 1783, and on this map this line appears running due north until it reaches the south branch of the St. Lawrence, and then down the bank, making the northwest angle at this point.

In 1763, France ceded Canada, which was bounded on the south bank of the St. Lawrence, which separated it from Maine and Nova Scotia, to Great Britain, who thus became the proprietor of a great portion of North America. In that year, the King issued his proclamation establishing the Province of Quebec. By this proclamation, it appears that he moved the south line of Canada from the river to the highlands, so as to embrace within the Province of Quebec the valley of the St. Lawrence. Thus, a large tract of land was taken from Maine and Nova Scotia, and annexed to Quebec. In passing from west to east, this new south line is represented as crossing the St. Lawrence in the 45th deg. of north latitude, and continuing on that parallel across the Lake Champlain to the highlands, then "along the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the said St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, and also along the north coast of the Bay des Chaleurs," to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, &c. Thus, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was moved back with this line, which extended along these highlands from near the head waters of Connecticut river, northeasterly, for three hundred miles, to the head waters of Chaleur bay, which lies between Canada and Nova Scotia. No other change was made in the lines of Nova Scotia or Maine by the proclamation, except thus to place their northern front on these highlands.

In 1774, this south line of Canada was confirmed by an act of Parliament, in which the description is reversed, and runs thus:

"Bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleur, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty five degrees of northern latitude, and the eastern bank of Connecticut river," &c.

In 1763, James Murray was made Governor of Quebec, and his south line of the province, as described in this commission, is identical with that in the proclamation and act of Parliament.

In 1767, and in 1774, Guy Carlton was made Governor, and in both of his commissions the line is similarly described.

In 1777, Frederick Holdimond was made Governor, and the renewed description of the line in his commission runs in this language:

"Bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleur along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to," &c.

I read this description, for this commission bears date only six years before the making of the treaty of 1783, and the line remained unaltered when that treaty was ratified.

I will now bring down the history of the west line of Nova Scotia to the same period.

In 1763, Montague Wilmot was made Governor of this province. His commission says, in allusion to the removal of the north line from the river to the highlands:

"We have thought proper to restrain and comprise [the province] within the following limits, viz: to the northward our said province shall be bounded by the southern boundary of Quebec, as far as the western extremity of the Bay of Chaleur," &c.; "to the westward it shall be bounded by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of Quebec."

The same description is repeated in the commission of Francis Legge, in 1773, and in that of John Parr, in 1782, and the line continued unaltered till the ratification of the treaty. Here let us stop, and see how the facts are.

The proclamation, the act of Parliament, and the commissions of the several Governors of Canada, all concur in making the south line of Canada, one and the same continuous line, from 1763 to 1783, stretching along the highlands that divide the rivers emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, from Chaleur bay, at the northeast, to the waters of the Connecticut river at the southwest. In running this distance, it passed first between Canada and Nova Scotia, next between Canada and Maine, and, lastly, between Canada and New Hampshire; in all, about 300 miles.

In regard to the west line of Nova Scotia, the patent of Sir William Alexander, in 1621, and the commission of each successive governor, demonstrate clearly that this line run due north from the head of the St. Croix, in the first instance, till it came to the bank of the St. Lawrence, but, after 1763, only to the highlands, where it fell upon the south line of Canada, and there terminated, making, with that south line as it stretched eastward, from this point of intersection, towards Chaleur bay, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia.

Thus were the south line of Canada and the west line of Nova Scotia described, and thus did they intersect each other, forming the northwest angle of Nova Scotia in 1783, when the treaty of peace was negotiated.

Now, sir, I think I have redeemed one part of my pledge, by proving that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, at this point of time, was at this south line of Canada, which formed one leg of it.

Such were the facts in 1783; and now let us look at the treaty and consider the boundaries assigned to this quarter of the United States. The King of England, in the first article, acknowledges the United States, naming every State, "to be free, sovereign, and independent States. * * * And r linquishes all claims to the government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof." Thus showing a clear purpose to make every part and portion of the territory of each State free and independent, however the bounds might be. The treaty then proceeds:

"And that all disputes which might arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are and shall be their boundaries, viz: from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz. that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands, along the said highlands, which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river," &c.

The place of departure is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, spoken of, evidently, as a pre-existing angle made at the northwest corner of Nova Scotia by the west and north lines of the province, as they were established by royal authority and an act of Parliament. But as no monument had been made at this corner, and the precise point where these lines intersected had not been ascertained, the treaty points out where both the lines had been before established, and where they must intersect and make the angle. Having done this, the negotiators proceed with their description along the north boundary of the United States, &c. till they come to the Atlantic Ocean, and then the treaty runs thus:

"East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the Bay of the Fundy to its source, and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Thus you see how cautious the makers of the treaty were, for in this short description they have twice carefully delineated both the lines now in question. Allow me to ask, in what does this description of the south boundary of Canada differ from that in the act of Parliament; and in the subsequent commissions of the Governors of the Province? In nothing, except the province line begins at Chaleur Bay, and the treaty line begins at a point in this province line called the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. In describing the province line, also, the rivers are said to fall into the sea; while in the treaty they are said to fall into the Atlantic Ocean. This shows a difference in words, but none in meaning. The language of the act of Parliament bounding Canada is:

"Bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleur, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea."

This language, without any change of sense, is transferred into the treaty, and doubtless designedly, because it had been employed for twenty years to describe the line, and had received a practical exposition by common consent. No reasoning can make the truth, that this old line and the treaty line are identical, more obvious than this plain statement of facts, derived from official British documents.

In what does the east line of the treaty differ from the ancient west line of Nova Scotia? In nothing. Both pass up the St. Croix, and both in a line due north to the highlands. It is true the words south boundary of Canada are used in the commissions instead of highlands, to designate the north terminus; but I need not again show that this line was on the summit of land here meant by highlands. The old west line of Nova Scotia, as described from 1763 to 1783, is identical with the east line of the United States, as set forth in the treaty, and the language formerly employed to describe it was incorporated into the treaty. Now, sir, if it be possible that a lingering doubt can remain in the mind of any one, I entreat him to examine the British description of those lines, since the treaty of peace was made. In 1786, Guy Carlton was made Governor of the Province of Quebec, and the south line is described thus in his commission:

"Bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleur, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean."

At this time the line run first between Nova Scotia and Canada, and next between Canada and the United States, and yet not a word of the old description is abated or altered, except sea is changed into Atlantic Ocean, so as to conform to the treaty. Mr. Carlton was also Governor of New Brunswick; and in his commission for that province, of the same date, is a description of the west line of Nova Scotia, which runs thus:

"Bounded on the westward by the mouth of St. Croix river, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our province of Quebec; to the northward by the said boundary [of Quebec] as far as the western extremity of the Bay des Chaleurs."

This differs in nothing from the descriptions I have recited, which were made before the treaty, but makes the lines after the making of the treaty coincide with those which existed before, and places the northwest angle of Nova Scotia where it was before and at the time of making the treaty.

This description has been reiterated in the commissions of the following Governors of New Brunswick, viz: Sir James Craige, in 1807; Sir George Provost, in 1811; Sir J. C. Sherbrooke, in 1816; the Duke of Richmond, in 1818; and Earl Dalhousie, in 1819. This is all British authority, British description, and British exposition, defining the lines of jurisdiction of her provinces where they bound on the United States. How do her diplomatists refute it? How do they prove that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is so vaguely described, and by such ill-chosen terms, that it can never be ascertained? How do they prove that the highlands of the treaty are south of the river St. John's? How do they prove that there are no highlands dividing the waters in the manner mentioned in the treaty? When Great Britain sees the coincidence of the old province lines and the lines of the treaty maintained by the clearest proof, nay, the very description of the old lines carried into the treaty, and when by her own authority she has maintained the jurisdiction of each province to these lines, and no other; how can she set up lines unheard of in the provinces, unknown to the treaty, and unsustained by any of the requirements in it as to the boundaries? lines which, instead of dividing the waters of highlands, run across the rivers, and are one hundred miles from the highlands that turn their streams into the St. Lawrence?

It is to be accounted for in but one way: she desires a portion of our territory for her convenience, and her selfishness blinds her to all other considerations. She perverts, evades, and misconstrues the plainest meaning of language—language invented by herself, and steadily employed through a long series of years to describe the same objects.

She contends that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia cannot be identified, because if it be at the terminus of a line drawn due north from the monument to the highlands, it will strike them where the waters flowing down the southern slope do not fall into the Atlantic ocean, as required by the treaty. But, sir, let us begin at Chaleur Bay, and trace this line westward, or rather southwestward, for that is its more general course. We find it first separating Nova Scotia and Canada. On one side the waters flow into the St. Lawrence; this is as it should be. On the other, they flow into the Ristigouche, and through the Bay of Chaleur into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and thence into the ocean. They, therefore, fall into the ocean. Passing this part of the line over, we come to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, at the northeast corner of the United States; and here we find Canada, still stretching along the northern slope, with the waters flowing into St. Lawrence and Maine on the other slope, with waters still flowing towards Chaleur, until we come to the head waters of the St. John's. These run down the south slope till we come near to the head of the Chandiere, a river of Canada, opposite to which we find the head waters of the Penobscot. From Chaleur to this point is estimated to be two hundred and thirty miles; and all the waters flow into the Bay of Chaleur, or the Bay of Fundy, through the Ristigouche and St. John's. Proceeding westward, the line passes out of Maine, and along between Canada and New Hampshire, to the head of Connecticut river. The distance is estimated at ninety miles; and the head waters of the Penobscot, the Kennebec, and the Androscoggin, start along the south slope; while those on the north slope fall into the St. Lawrence. The Penobscot falls into the sea through a bay of the same name. The Kennebec and Androscoggin meet and pass through the Bay of Sagadahoc into the sea. From Chaleur Bay, therefore, along the highlands to Connecticut river, three hundred and twenty miles, all the waters are gathered into these rivers before they fall into the sea, viz: the Ristigouche, the St. John's, the Penobscot, and the Kennebec, and each of them enters the ocean through a bay. If, then, Great Britain is right in her assumption, that a river passing through a bay or gulf does not fall into the ocean, none of the waters of this slope fall into the ocean. Yet, from 1763 to 1783, when the treaty was made, all the waters from Chaleur bay to Connecticut river, running down the south side of the dividing highlands, are represented as falling into the sea. So say the proclamation, the act of Parliament, every commission of the Governors, and the treaty itself only changes the word sea into Atlantic ocean. Is this language, so often reiterated, so carefully transferred into the treaty itself, so plain and explicit, really without meaning? Does it utterly fail to delineate the object intended to be described, so as to become wholly inapplicable to the line? Add to this the fact that every thing besides this answers exactly to the description. The waters flow down the other side of these highlands into the St. Lawrence. And there are no other highlands from which they do so flow, or which, in this particular, can answer to the description. Is all this evidence to be controlled and set aside upon the suggestion that a river flowing through a bay does not fall into the sea? By no means. I cannot persuade myself that the suggestion can raise a reasonable doubt in any ingenuous mind; but if it does, that doubt must yield to the other clear and certain proofs that, by rivers falling into the sea, these identical rivers were meant. If this view needs strengthening, let me add that Mitchell's map, in which these streams and bays are represented, was before the negotiators, and used to settle the topography, and for other purposes, in making the treaty. The matter was doubtless treated by the negotiators as it really is; bays were, as they always had been in defining these lines, esteemed parts of the Atlantic ocean; places in it, having names, like the Grank Bank. It is impossible that those who drew the proclamation, the act of Parliament, the commissions of the Governors, and the treaty, could have entertained any other views, unless they designed to use language without any appropriate meaning; for they cannot be understood otherwise than as meaning, by rivers falling into the sea, all those streams which had their sources on the south slope of these highlands. Great Britain herself practically refutes all her reasoning, for she maintains to this day the jurisdiction of Nova Scotia, or rather New Brunswick, to that part of the south line of Canada which separates those provinces. This line is always described as passing from Chaleur bay along highlands which divide the rivers emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence from those falling into the sea. But there is not a drop of water flowing from the southern side of this line which does not find its way to the sea through the bay of Chaleur. Yet she understands well how to find this line, by this description, and how to maintain the jurisdiction of New Brunswick to it.

I might call up many other matters to sustain my views, but I forbear, feeling assured that I have redeemed my pledge by proving—

That the south line of Canada, from 1763 to this time, has been a continuous, unbroken, and unaltered line from Chaleur bay to Connecticut river.

That the west line of Nova Scotia has, during that time, undergone no change.

That consequently, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia which is formed by this line, and so much of the south line of Canada as runs between that province and Nova Scotia, existed from 1763 to the making of the treaty, and still remains at the same point.

That the language employed to describe and establish these lines was transferred into the treaty of 1783, without any material alteration, for the purpose of establishing them as boundary lines of the United States.

That consequently these old lines and the treaty lines are coincident and identical; and if the old lines can be discovered, all embarrassment is removed.

If these things are so, (and who can doubt it?) there is not, and cannot be, a question where the lines of the treaty are, nor whether they can be found.

But, obvious as these truths are, clearly as it is proved that the provincial and the treaty lines are coincident, yet I must ask the indulgence of the Senate to listen for a short time to the reasoning of Great Britain herself on this subject, before the rapacious desire of acquiring our territory had bewildered her understanding. In 1794 a commission was appointed to decide which among several streams was the St. Croix of the treaty. The British commissioners claimed that the western branch of the Scoodiac was the point to start the line from, which was to run north to the highlands. The American commissioner proposed the head of the Magaguadavic; but the main branch of the Scoodiac was afterwards agreed on as the river St. Croix named in the treaty. There was, however, much debate on this point; and I propose to read some extracts from the argument of the British commissioner, to prove that he strenuously contended that the province and treaty lines were identical, and that the west line of Nova Scotia did not stop short of the St. John's, but crossed it, and extended to the highlands, where we say the south line of Canada and the treaty line is.

"The limits of Nova Scotia, at the time of the treaty of peace, were the same that were established when the province was anciently and originally erected and named, [1621,] in every respect, excepting the island of St. Johns, and the northern boundary line, which, by the erection of the Province of Quebec, after the peace of 1763, was altered from the southern bank of the river St. Lawrence to the highlands, DESCRIBED IN THE TREATY OF PEACE, [1783,] NOW UNDER CONSIDERATION; and, further, that with these exceptions, there never was but one and the same tract of country and islands that formed the Province of Nova Scotia."

It would be difficult for me to find terms to express a more decided opinion that the provincial lines of Nova Scotia remained unaltered by the treaty, and that the south line of Canada established in 1763 is along the highlands described in the treaty, and therefore identical with the treaty line.

He next proceeds to prove by an earnest argument that the west instead of the main branch of the Scoodiac should be assumed as the stream intended by the river St. Croix in the treaty, and holds the following language, which proves clearly that the thought of finding highlands south of the St. Johns, or of that entire river being assigned by the treaty of peace to Great Britain, had not as yet occurred to her agents. He labors by the argument to prove the expediency of leaving the streams rising in each country within that jurisdiction where they rise, as far as possible, and affirms that by starting the west line of Nova Scotia from the west branch of the Scoodiac this might be accomplished as to all the rivers except the St. Johns.

"A line due north from the source of the western or main branch of the Scoodiac or St. Croix will fully secure this effect to the United States in every instance, and also to Great Britain, in all instances except in that of the river St. John's, wherein it becomes impossible, by reason that the sources of this river are to the westward not only of the westward boundary line of Nova Scotia, but of the sources of the Penobscot and even of the Kennebec, so that this north line must of necessity cross the St. John's; but it will cross it in a part of it almost at the foot of the highlands, and where it ceases to be navigable. But if a north line is traced from the source of the Cheputnatecook, it will not only cross the river St. John's, within about fifty miles from Fredericton, the metropolis of New Brunswick, but will cut off the sources of the rivers which fall into the bay of Chaleur."

How distinct and decisive this language is. He affirms that if the Cheputnatecook branch of the St. Croix or Scoodiac is established as the boundary of the treaty, and a due north line is run from its head, it will cross the sources of the rivers which fall into Chaleur bay before it reaches the highlands. The monument was placed at the head of this stream, and a due north line, as he declared, does cut off the head waters of the Ristigouche, by extending to what we call the highlands of the treaty, and Great Britain knew this would be the result when she agreed to that river. There was, therefore, no disagreement about the highlands, but Great Britain openly conceded that they were no th of the sources of the St. John's and the Ristigouche. This is all we contend for.

He next proceeds to prove, but I cannot trouble the Senate with the whole argument, that the west and north lines of Nova Scotia, down to the time of making the treaty in 1783, remained unchanged, and continued so after the ratification of the treaty; the west line of Nova Scotia and the south line of Canada being, in fact, the lines adopted in the treaty as the boundaries of the United States. He concludes his remarks thus:

"Can it be believed, or for a moment imagined, that, in the course of human events, so exact a coincidence could have happened between the actual boundaries of the Province of Nova Scotia and the boundaries of it described in this treaty, if the latter had not been dictated and regulated by the former?

"Can any man hesitate to say he is convinced that the commissioners at Paris in 1783, in forming the second article of the treaty of peace, in which they have so exactly described the northwest angle, had reference to, and were governed by, the boundaries of Nova Scotia as described in the grant to Sir William Alexander, and the subsequent alteration of the northern boundary by the erection of the Province of Quebec?"

This argument literally runs on all-fours with us in its leading views upon the questions now at issue. It repudiates the idea that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia cannot be ascertained, as well as the idea that the sources of the St. John's are not designed, by the treaty, to be in the United States. It is equally clear that the highlands of the treaty are north of all these waters, and, of course, rejected the late notion that the St. John's does not fall into the Atlantic ocean according to the terms of the treaty.

Great Britain, then, stands condemned by her own conduct, and out of the mouths of her authorized agents. She has nothing left to stand upon in support of her claims, but the fact that she succeeded in so puzzling the head of the Dutch King that he could not discover the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. I will not occupy the time of the Senate in attempting to refute such absurd pretensions as that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is at Mars Hill. If Great Britain cannot be satisfied with the treaty description of the highlands, because the waters descending the south slope fall into bays instead of the sea, while in every other particular the description is full, accurate, and complete, how can she content herself with a line from Chaleur bay to Mars Hill, which, instead of running on highlands, crosses first the streams of that bay, and next the waters and valley of the great St. John's? How, again, can she reconcile it with her objections to the true highlands, to contend for those between the St. John's and the Penobscot, which, in no one particular, correspond to the requirements in the treaty?

This is only proof that selfishness will lead us to extremities; that it is a blind guide, and often conducts those who take counsel of it into the paths of folly and dishonor.

Absurd as these claims are, they have been gravely urged by Great Britain. She seems to me to be anxious to discuss every sort of proof but the simple language of the treaty; to rely on every thing but that which is really too plain to admit of much argument or illustration. I had almost said she resorts to evasions and subterfuges discreditable to her. Is it consistent with the character of elevated, high-minded statesmen to set up such pretensions as I have described, to resort to doubts and quibbles which have nothing to rest on, to see if she cannot worry or intimidate us out of a portion of our territory? This country should never countenance such a course; it should mark with disapprobation all petifogging in diplomacy; all shifts and evasions interposed to delay an adjustment of this controversy; we should stand on the treaty; hold to the evidence there, and prevent its being smothered by the accumulation of other matter. Do this in the spirit of manly firmness, in a tone that will rebuke the folly of quibbles and evasions, and this dispute will soon end. We shall hear no more of highlands from Chaleur Bay to Mars Hill, or from Mars Hill west. We shall hear no more of a northwest angle of Nova Scotia at Mars Hill, or of any difficulty in finding the true northwest angle. Great Britain must not be allowed to trifle with us, or to humbug us. When she understands we are resolved not to cede any of our territory to her while she sets up unfounded claims to it, she will at once abandon that course, and we shall hear of no more theories about the necessity of finding mountains to answer to the description of the treaty, when it exacts nothing but land high enough to divide the waters and turn them down each slope.

I have now gone through with the remarks I intended to submit respecting the proof to sustain the claims of the United States to these lines, and, consequently, to what Great Britain is pleased to call the disputed territory. I am aware that it is next to impossible to make this matter understood without the aid of correct maps to acquaint the hearer with the topography of the country; and after the very able and lucid arguments of my colleague, nothing but a conviction of the duty I owe to Massachusetts, who has given her Senators instructions to press this matter upon Congress, could have induced me to address the Senate.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WILLIAMS] moves for leave to bring in a bill directing the line to be run and marked according to the treaty of 1783. The details of the bill are not before the Senate, for the leave is not granted. But the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has addressed us upon the subject; and while he goes firmly and strongly with us on the question of right, he avows in very explicit terms his opposition to such a measure.

I am happy to have his influence with us on the main question; but as his opinions indicate the policy to be pursued by the Administration, I regret to find him arrayed against the measure.

His reasons are two-fold: that such a measure would involve us in a war with Great Britain; and, secondly, suspend a negotiation now proposed to be opened to adjust the controversy.

I should deprecate a war as much as he can; but I have no fears of such a result, for the measure itself can give no just cause of offence, and Great Britain understands her own interests better than to interrupt the peace of the two countries about this boundary.

The controversy relates to the point of intersection of two lines, and this point is to be ascertained by certain natural objects described in the treaty. Now, sir, can this be done without examination? Do you know whether these objects will be found until you examine, and whether it is possible to run the lines? It is plainly the meaning of the treaty, and the intention of the parties to it, that this examination should take place, for in no other way can this part of it be executed. We say the provisions of the treaty are plain, and the lines easily run. Great Britain denies all this, and affirms that the description is so vague and unintelligible, that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia can never be identified. What do we propose by this measure? Nothing more than to search and see if we can find the objects described in the treaty, and run the lines by them. The bill does not propose to assert our jurisdiction, but to ascertain what our rights are. Now, sir, it is absurd to characterize an examination made for this purpose as a hostile or unfriendly act. A controversy about boundary lines at all times involves necessarily the right to examine the lines and the ranks by which they are identified. Who ever heard of this right being denied to an individual? I confess it is new to me that it is questioned any where. Can Great Britain deny that she disputes our claim? Can she deny that the matter is unsettled? She will do neither. On what principle can she maintain that an examination with a view to satisfy ourselves where the treaty line is (for this is all the bill proposes) is an unfriendly act? If I should find Great Britain so unjust as to be alarmed at this kind of inquiry; if I should find her afraid of the investigation, I should think she held back to conceal what ought to be known. I do not desire that this act should be couched in any but the kindest, most respectful, and friendly terms. But if we have not the right to proceed in this way, we have no absolute right to make the examination at all; for no right can be absolute which depends on the will of another. If we have no right to go on without the assent of Great Britain, and she withholds her assent, we are forever barred the right even to look for highlands, or any of the objects specified in the treaty, or of inquiring into our boundaries at all. This is neither the meaning of the treaty, nor the common sense of the thing. Gentlemen may, if they think proper, urge the inexpediency of the measure, but the right is clear, and may be exercised without any cause of offence; and, for one, I am decidedly for going on with it. This region, as the Senate well know, was the theatre of surveys and explorations for many successive years by a joint commission, who agreed ultimately in nothing; but, after all, so far as I know, the line of the treaty has never been marked out according to our views. It is time it was done, and an accurate description of that line reported to this Government. When that is done, it will be time enough to decide upon what future course is expedient.

But the chairman of the committee says this bill will arrest pending negotiation. In what way? It proposes no final adjustment of the controversy; nor does it suggest a resort to forcible measures to maintain our jurisdiction. It proposes nothing incompatible with a friendly adjustment by agreement; for it is merely taking and perpetuating the evidence of our title, which is a matter entirely separate and distinct from an attempt to close the dispute by agreement.

But what are we to negotiate about? We were long since told by Mr. Vaughan it was in vain to negotiate about the line described in the treaty, for negotiation was exhausted—all having been said which could be said, without any favorable result; and he very properly asks, what possible utility can come of beating over the ground again? The invitation of Mr. Livingston was, therefore, steadily declined, although he varied it so as make it substantially a proposition to travel out of the treaty in search of a line. Mr. Vaughan contended that all bases of negotiation were hopeless, except an open one for a conventional line; in other words, that the treaty should first be abandoned, and then the parties should agree, as they were able to, upon some line dividing the territory. The minister of the United States came to the conclusion that this Government had no constitutional power to agree to such a line without the consent of Maine: and here the matter rested until Maine roused up this winter, and insisted on having her right to the territory asserted. Under these circumstances, the British minister comes forward and proposes, as I understand the matter, what Mr. Vaughan refused to accept at the hands of Mr. Livingston—a joint exploration, on condition that the highlands shall not be sought for any where except in the territory which we hold to be ours. This proposition is unfair and unjust in the outset, and less favorable than the joint exploration under the treaty of Ghent, for that was unlimited. At best it is but a repetition of that thing; and Mr. Vaughan has declared it will be as futile, if repeated, as it was then. Twenty-four years have elapsed since that commission was agreed upon, and we are now, obviously, in a worse condition than when we agreed to it; and, having the authority of Mr. Vaughan for saying it will end in nothing, I am constrained to look upon it as a proposition to delay the adjustment which we insist upon. Great Britain has possession of about one-third of Maine, and, while we make no objection, she is satisfied; but her policy, I fear, is to maintain possession by such plausible means as are within her reach. Delay, negotiation, any thing but an investigation and decision of the merits. I go for measures that tend to other results than mere delay. I do not see that any thing else is likely to come of this negotiation. But whether there is or not, this survey of the line need in no shape interfere with it.

The chairman of the committee exhorts Maine to be patient, and to hold out a little longer. And how long is this appeal to be made? It is now fifty-five years since the treaty was made, and we have less prospect of establishing our rights than we had on that day. The citizens of Maine, acting under her own authority, and in execution of her own laws, on what is clearly her territory, as all here admit, have been seized, imprisoned, and found guilty of offences against the laws of New Brunswick, and ignominiously sentenced for that cause. This has been reiterated again and again after long intervals. Thus she is forced from her jurisdiction, deprived of her property, inhibited from extending her settlements and expanding her resources; and, after having waited for twenty years, from the treaty of Ghent, she is told, when she simply asks to have the line surveyed and marked, Be patient; don't be hasty; it is a rash, precipitate act! When, in Heaven's name, is the right time to come? When will the work of patience be perfect? When are indignity, insult, and injury to cease? Has not Maine waited long enough? Where has this pacific proposition, this spirit of friendly adjustment, rested for years and years, since the decision of the Dutch King? I fear it interposes now for no good purpose.

The chairman repudiates the idea that this exploration is to be a conventional line. If this be so, then the joint commission can do but one thing, and that is, to survey a north line from the monument to the highlands; for, if they vary from it, what will they be in search of but some unknown boundary? He treats as unfounded the comments of the Senator from Maine, showing that an agreement to run from the monument to lands which both parties agree are the highlands described in the treaty, is full of danger, and substantially conceding every thing. The only thing that could reconcile me, under any circumstances, to such a proposition, is the declaration of the Secretary of State, that the survey would be experimental, and, therefore, not binding. The British have anxiously endeavored to treat on that basis, because it evidently places the matter at their disposal. Suppose, for example, they refuse, as they do, to agree to the highlands due north from the monument, and you then begin to move along the highlands southwesterly until you arrive at a point west instead of north of the monument, and she says here are highlands described in the treaty. Can we deny it? By no means; for we not only admit, but contend, that the highlands are at this point, and all the way between it and a point due north from the monument. In a word, that they extend all the way from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to Connecticut river. We cannot deny, therefore, that any point or place in this whole range is not a place in the highlands described in the treaty. If, then, we assent to a proposition that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia shall be where both parties agree there are highlands, Great Britain will place it where she pleases. Maine ought to be alarmed at such a proposition, for it yields all Great Britain asks.

The Senator also contends strongly against passing a law investing the President with a discretionary power to make this survey, as it would be unwise, impolitic and mischievous. Sir, we passed exactly that law last year, for we made an appropriation of $20,000 to survey this line, and authorized the President to do it; but he declined executing it. There was no fear of war then, nor any objections to such a discretion, which every body believed would be exercised by running the line. The question, therefore, is not new.

Mr. President, one thing is plain, and that is, that Great Britain has not a shadow of rightful claim to this territory. Another thing is equally plain, and that is, that a halting, doubting, temporizing policy will never end this dispute. We must act with decision and firmness. There is not the remotest danger of war; for, whatever folly Great Britain may be guilty of in diplomatic chicanery, still she has pride of character and self-respect; and, I believe, too high a sense of what is just and lawful to attempt to enforce such pretensions as are set up in this matter. I will not look upon her as a pirate or a robber, but as a high-minded people, too just to themselves and us to sustain such a claim as this by violence. She will do no such thing. It would be worse than folly, in any point of view. If we mean to preserve peace, we must be just to our own citizens, and require foreign countries to respect our rights. This matter has been too much neglected, and Great Britain has gathered courage and strength from our negligence and disregard of the rights of Maine. I feel assured that if the Senate had bestowed proper attention upon the subject, if they had properly considered the facts, there would be but one voice here as to the policy to be pursued. It would be to go forward firmly, temperately, but with unshaken resolution. When Great Britain sees this spirit animating us, she will cease to delay our rights and vex our citizens.

THE DUEL REPORTS.

REMARKS OF MR. NAYLOR, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, April 28, 1838—On the report of the select committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. Jonathan Cilley.

Mr. NAYLOR, of Pennsylvania, succeeded in getting the floor immediately after Mr. STANLEY had concluded, and said that he was opposed to the motion of the committee, and in favor of recommitting the report to them as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS.] I am opposed (said Mr. N.) to the motion of the committee on two grounds: first, I believe the committee has violated (though unintentionally) the Constitution and laws of the land; and, secondly, that they have omitted to do what their duty and the positive rules of this House required them to do.

My first objection involves a wrongful act of commission on the part of the committee, and my second, one of omission and neglect. I will now endeavor to sustain these two propositions by a few remarks, and show that, whilst the committee has exercised a power not given them, and against the rules of this House, they have at the same time omitted to perform one of their most important duties.

What is the resolution under which the committee was appointed, and how was it adopted? At the time the resolution was introduced and carried, there could be no discussion, debate, or deliberation. You, Mr. Speaker, know the excitement that prevailed in this House upon that occasion. Every one who rose to speak was called to order almost as soon as his lips were opened. You know, sir, with what difficulty you restrained that excitement—an excitement ready to break through and break down all barriers between it and unlimited indulgence. It demanded all your promptness, experience, vigilance and great ability to preserve order. There was a slumbering volcano in the breasts of members, which, if once it had found vent, no human power could have well controlled. Nor was this all. Party spirit was aroused, and the fiend of party had reared his horrid front, and was stalking through this hall, breathing his malignant breath and maddening influence into the hearts and bosoms of members here; trampling alike on the dead and the living, he saw only in the prospect a new subject of excitement, once more to win back the people to the embrace of power.

In this condition of the House there was no proper deliberation. There could be none. Amendments were offered to the resolution. They were rejected. A motion was made to postpone for a few days for the purpose of giving time for the subsidence of the excitement. I voted for that motion because I really thought the House was not in the temper to decide upon the best course to be taken in the matter. The motion to postpone was lost. Next came the previous question—the rule of despotism; and by its tyrannical aid the members of the House were driven, without a proper consideration of the whole subject, to vote upon the resolution. I voted for it. I voted for it because I was for sustaining inviolate the privileges of the House, and for suppressing, as far as we had the power, the barbarous and unchristian practice of duelling. But I did not vote for it to empower a committee to retire to the black holes of the Capitol, and there, in darkness and secrecy, try, condemn, censure, and punish, without the knowledge of Congress and the country, a part of the members of this House.

The resolution passed. Now, sir, what is it? It consists of two branches, and authorizes the committee, first, "to investigate the causes which led to the death of the honorable JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of this House, and the circumstances connected therewith;" and, secondly, "to inquire whether, in the case alluded to, there has not been a breach of the privileges of this House."

This is the resolution, and these are the inquiries to which the attention of the committee is directed. Well, sir, is there any member accused in this resolution? Certainly not. Is there any power given here authorizing the committee to try, condemn, censure, and recommend expulsion of members from the House? Certainly not. No one can pretend that there is an express grant of such power; for there is no member named in it; nor did the House put any member on his trial. So that, take the naked resolution by itself, without reference even to any rule positively denying the exercise of such authority, there does not appear to be such a power granted as the committee has assumed. Their duties were not judicial; they were mere inquirers. They were not to try, and to judge, and denounce censures and punishments, nor even to propose them; they were not to hear and determine, but to "investigate" the facts and circumstance, and "inquire" whether there had not been a breach of the privileges of this House. Investigate and inquire is the language of the resolution, not try, adjudge, condemn, and propose punishment.

Take, therefore, the resolution by itself, unlimited and uncontrolled by the fundamental rules of this House, and I contend that even then they had no right to roam at large through the House of Representatives, to select here and there a subject for their condemnation, sit in judgment on the Representatives of the people, and interfere with the rights of the vast constituency of the country; for the privileges of members of this House are the privileges of their constituents.

But, sir, there ought to be no difficulty about this matter. The rules of the House appear to me to be positive, direct, and conclusive upon the subject, that, if I did not see and hear the contrary, I would suppose it impossible that there should be any controversy in the case. Now, what is the rule upon the subject? Here it is. I read what has been frequently read in the course of this debate, from Section 11th of Jefferson's Manual:

"When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member, prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon, the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him."

Well, sir, I have read both the resolution and the rule. Now, what does the committee do? Recollect that the resolution under which they were appointed neither charged nor named any member of the House; but directed them to "investigate" the facts and circumstances, and "inquire" as to the breach of privilege. Upon the very threshold of this "inquiry" they were met with the fact that "members" were "involved." This being the case, what does the rule of the House require of the committee? Why, not to proceed against them, but make a special report to the House. And what does the committee do? They violate this rule. They do not make a special report. They do proceed against a part of the members "involved;" yes, sir, without accusing them, or notifying them that they are on their trial, they try them, condemn them, censure them, denounce punishment against them, report resolutions and arguments against them, ask this House to adopt the former, concur with them in the latter, and sanction a violation of one of its most important rules—a rule founded upon an express provision in the Constitution, thus incorporated with it, and becoming, during its operative existence, as obligatory on members as that sacred instrument itself.

Is not this so? Let us see. In the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States it is provided that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." In pursuance of this grant of power, this House, at the last session, determined the fundamental rules of its proceedings, and by the 118th of these rules adopted Jefferson's Manual as a part of their code. Here they all are, the Constitution, the rules, and Jefferson's Manual, printed and published and bound together in one volume, and furnished to every member by express resolution of this House, in order that every one might know what are the laws which govern our proceedings. And here is the rule which the committee has trampled upon, and which we are invited to brush away from our regard as a "mere cobweb of form;" in order that the purposes of a mere majority of the committee may be carried into effect.

But, sir, this is not all. They have not only usurped authority and trampled upon constitutional rules prohibiting their proceeding, but have omitted to do what the rules required of them. They have tried, condemned, censured, and denounced a part of those "involved;" at the same time, other members "involved," and one of them, at least, as deeply involved as either of those censured, have not only been left untried and unarraigned, but even unaccused. Whilst they have condemned some, they have shielded others. Such rank, palpable, monstrous injustice, I, for one, never can and never will sanction.

No, sir, I am for having the committee perform its duty and its whole duty. I wish them to take back their report, strike out its resolutions, personal arguments, censures, and denunciations, and submit the facts and circumstances and all the evidence. Then let them report that their inquiry as to the breach of privilege "involves" members of this House, and state the names of all the members who are involved in the inquiry. When they do this, they will comply both with the resolution and the rule of the House, and equal and even-handed justice will be meted out alike to all.

By the rule before quoted, the committee is required to report not those whom they adjudge guilty or whom they condemn, (for they are prohibited from proceeding against any,) but those who are "involved;" not one, nor two, nor three, but all who are "involved"

Let them make such a report. This will furnish ground of accusation against those "involved." If the House or any member think proper, they can then be accused before the nation, be put upon their trial, be heard in their defence, be judged of by their peers, and be punished or not, accordingly as they are or are not guilty of a breach of privilege, each one according to his deserts, and as it may seem best to the wisdom of the House.

But, as the matter now stands, some are already condemned, and this condemnation, thus made in defiance of law, we are called upon to sanction, whilst we leave others equally guilty to go scot free. I say equally guilty, for I have listened attentively to the reading of the evidence, and I will defy any one to discriminate between the guilt of those visited with the censure of the committee, and some of those who were prominent actors in the sad and melancholy scene, and whom the committee have kept entirely in the back ground.

Thus, sir, it is that I maintain that the committee has been guilty of a twofold wrong. First, in secrecy and silence in the dark cells of the Capitol they have tried and condemned some without authority, and against law; and, secondly, they have shielded others, equally guilty, even from accusation itself, when it was their bounden duty to have "proceeded" against none, but to have reported to the House all who were "involved." I will never confirm such a direct violation of Constitution and law, and such a monstrous and glaring piece of partisan, partial injustice.

Sir, what have the people petitioned for? For gentlemen have all at once grown very tender of the right of petition: When it suits their purposes, they are for stifling the voice of the people; and, without compunction or regard, their petitions are trampled under foot. But now, sir, when the Constitution lies torn and tattered beneath their feet by the action of this committee, they stand unconcernedly amidst the fragments, and mock you with the exclamation that the people have petitioned for it!

What have they petitioned for? Did they ask you for the appointment of a partisan committee to judge and condemn and punish some, whilst they shield from accusation the guilt and impropriety of others? No, sir, they ask for no such thing. They call upon the House to protect its privileges, uphold its dignity and character, inquire into the whole matter, punish all who have been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and, above all, to adopt such measures as will prevent like occurrences in the future. They do not seek vengeance for the past, but security and propriety for all time to come.

This, sir, is what I contend for, what I insist upon. I call upon this House to leap beyond the contemptible trammels of mere party, and, before Heaven and the country, be just.

Now, sir, how has the report of the committee been sustained, and what are the arguments opposed to the views that other gentlemen, in common with myself, have taken of this very grave question? One honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. FOSTER] sneers at the rule in Jefferson's Manual, mocks at our Parliamentary code, as shadowy and unsubstantial, and says it is but a mere "cob-web"—a technicality. These are his arguments! Another honorable gentleman from the same State, [Mr. PARKER,] says that our rules are but special pleas, special demurrers, technical objections! These are the arguments that are made use of in one of the most important constitutional discussions that was ever had within these walls; one, too, involving nothing less than an expulsion of the people's representatives from Congress.

Yes, sir, the pettifogger's vocabulary has been exhausted of all its technicalities and cant terms, to throw them into this debate as arguments and answers to grave and well-sustained views. A cobweb, a technicality, a special plea, a special demurrer!

S r, is this Constitution which I now hold in my hand, the object of so much deep reverence, but a mere cobweb, to be brushed away without consideration, whenever it interposes its wholesome provisions between honorable gentlemen and their purposes? A cobweb! This sacred instrument declares, in the fifth section of the first article, that "each House may determine the rule of its proceedings." Well, what is this? Nothing, says the gentleman from New York, but a "cobweb!"

Sir, our fathers, the sages and heroes of seventy-six, through a struggle of seven years, encountered and endured suffering in every form; fought, and fell, shed oceans of blood, and, finally, conquered; and all for what? For their independence and this holy Constitution. It now turns out, however, as the gentlemen from New York have discovered, that the result of all their wisdom and all their heroism is but a cobweb, a special plea, a special demurrer, a technicality! If these honorable gentlemen be right, then was the struggle of our fathers vain and wicked, and their wisdom nothing but foolishness.

But, sir, I cannot agree with them. I look upon the fruit of their labors and wisdom as a treasure beyond all price. So important did they deem it that each House should have the undisputed power of making its own rules, that they inserted an express provision in the Constitution for that purpose. Sir, it is the root from which all the rules spring. Whilst they are in force, they are as binding on the consciences and conduct o members as the Constitution itself, and a violation of the one is an outrage upon the other. Violate these rules with impunity, and you tear up by the roots the provision of the Constitution which I have just read, and leave the minority in this House and the rights of their constituents dependent alone upon the uncontrolled will of the majority.

Other gentlemen may do as they please; I, for one, at all hazards, will uphold and obey the Constitution and laws of the land, cobwebs though they be, in the estimation of the honorable gentleman from New York.

Another honorable gentleman, from the same State, s fruitful in these extraordinary constitutional arguments, [Mr. LOOMIS,] declares that the resolution under which the committee was appointed "over-rides," subdues, and controls the rule in Jefferson's Manual, and, therefore, that rule is to be disregarded. Well, let us look at this. Is there any thing in the resolution conflicting with the rule? Certainly not. Does the resolution suspend the operative effect of the rule, or give the committee power to violate it? Is there the least possible degree of contrariety between the resolution and the rule? Not the least. No man can possibly answer these questions in the affirmative. The resolution authorizes the committee to make general inquiries—accuses no member, nor does it mention any member's name. The rule says that when a committee charged with an inquiry finds that a member is involved, they are not to proceed with the inquiry, but are to report specially to the House that a member is involved, &c. I perhaps may not be as astute at discovering discrepancies as the honorable gentleman, but, for my part, I cannot see how the language of the resolution can even be tortured into a conflict with the rule, and made to "over-ride" and suspend its operative effect.

But, suppose they did conflict with each other in terms, which would have to yield? Which is of superior authority, the rule or the resolution? Why, sir, the rule is superior. It constitutes a part of the fundamental law of the House, and stands unimpaired, until it shall be repealed, or suspended, or changed by the House, in the manner and form prescribed for that purpose.

Sir, I ask, what are constitutions worth, what are fundamental rules good for, if every hasty expression breathed out against them operate their repeal, controlling them, "over riding" them, and rendering them of no effect? They are made to bind all, the majority as well as the minority; and can be no more violated by the one than by the other. All resolutions contrary to them are void. Constitutions are emphatically made for the minority. Majorities, having the power in their own hands, can take care of themselves. Strength needs no protection: its inherent quality is an ability to protect itself. The great value of a constitution consists in the security it gives to the rights of the minority—a security which no power on earth can destroy.

A citizen of the United States, though standing alone, rests firmly and securely on his constitutional rights. Faction may rage round him, party spirit may breathe out its desolating vengeance, power may threaten, the voice of the Union may be raised against him, but, under the panoply of the Constitution, he stands, like the everlasting rock amid the tempest, secure, unharmed, unmoved.

This, sir, is what a constitution is made for; but for this protective quality of the weak, a Constitutional Government would be worthless!

The rules of this House, springing from and founded upon the Constitution, form the code for the government of the House and all its members. These rules are at all times to be observed. If the House pass a resolution authorizing a committee to do what the rules forbid, the resolution so far is void, unless the rules had been previously suspended, in the mode prescribed for that purpose. To maintain the contrary, is to annihilate all proper notions of a Constitutional Government. It is unmixed, unmitigated, unrelieved despotism.

But, as I have said before, the rules and the resolutions do not conflict with each other. There is not the least possible degree of antipathy between them; and, therefore, whether I am right or not in my notion of the superior influence of the rule, it is of no consequence whatever, so far as this case is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, this positive rule, embodying as it does the very spirit of liberty, and clothed by our immortal Jefferson in language too strong and precise to be misunderstood, is a stumbling block in the way of the purposes of honorable gentlemen on the other side of the question. It must be got rid of if possible. So the same honorable gentleman to whom I last alluded, [Mr. LOOMIS,] has started another very grave objection to it. He insists that even if his other objections have not entirely annihilated it, it deserves to be wholly disregarded by the House, because it is an "English rule." He has found out that it was adopted from the English Parliament. Even the great name of Jefferson himself, whom the gentleman recognises as the father of his democracy, and who introduced the rule into our code, cannot save it from the gentleman's condemnation! He is really horror-struck at it; and says if the House had only taken time to examine into Jefferson's Manual, and had known that it was of "English extraction," they never could have adopted it! These being the honorable gentleman's premises, his conclusion is, that the rules of the House, codified by the great Jefferson himself, are to be trampled upon, and the great principles of liberty embodied in them contemned, because they are of "English extraction."

This may be very good reasoning, although I am too dull to comprehend it. Let me, according to the best lights my poor understanding can furnish, carry it out, and see where it will lead to.

What language, I ask, does the honorable gentleman speak, but the English language? Had he not better, in his horror of the "English," and fully and consistently to carry out his principles, adopt the Latin, or Arabic, or some other language most unlike the English? Nay, if his objection be good, and his principle a sound one, (and I have no doubt of his full confidence in it,) ought he not immediately to bring in a bill for the keeping of our records and proceedings in some foreign tongue? And, after that, advancing still further in the work he has so boldly begun, move a resolution to expel every member from this House who is so unfortunate as to bear an "English name?" because, forsooth, he is of English extraction.

Cobwebs and technicalities and special pleas and special demurrers and, to crown the whole, "English extraction!" Yes, sir, English extraction! These are the arguments, the weapons, which honorable gentlemen bring into this great constitutional conflict; and by which, contrary to Constitution and law, they are to expel members from their seats, and deprive a portion of the people, the constituency of the country, of their representatives.

Oh! but, says another honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr PARKER,] for you perceive that New York has all the honor of bringing in her "cobwebs," and "special pleas," and "English extractions," and such like arguments, to the rescue of the committee—oh! says that gentleman, why oppose your technical rules against the wishes of the committee? The parties interested in this House do not object. I answer the honorable gentleman that I object! I object in the name of the Constitution, which has been violated, and which I have sworn to support. I object in the name of the people of the United States, whose representatives, if accused, I am bound to see fairly, fully, and impartially tried, not by a partisan committee in the cells of the Capitol, but here, in this hall, before the country, with their accusers meeting them face to face, and eye to eye, in the broad light of heaven! I object, because the proceedings of the committee have been characterized by a disregard of the rules of the House, and by a palpable partpartiality, in trying and condemning, and stating the case most strongly against some, under an assumed authority, and shielding under the same authority others at least as guilty, from accusation and blame. For all these reasons, I object. I stand upon the very threshold of the Constitution. I will not yield an inch.

But, sir, the same honorable gentlemen tell us that we oppose the printing of this report upon the ground that the people will be deceived by it, and that it ought to be circulated among them. Can any thing be more unfair? Oppose the printing! What a mockery! Do not gentlemen know—do we not all know—that now, whilst I speak, this report is printed, and is circulating among the people from one extremity of the country to the other? Yes, sir, and that, too, before it was known to this House. Yet, with this fact staring us in the face, we are gravely told that we desire to suppress it from the people. I treat such an imputation with contempt. I trample it under my feet. I am as willing to trust the people with the report as I am myself. They are as capable of forming opinions upon it as I am. I have been educated in that political school that trusts and confides in the people. I am willing to give them the report. They shall have it. They have got it.

I do not oppose the printing of this report. In making it, I believe as firmly as I ever believed any thing, that the committee have usurped authority inconsistent with the Constitution of the land, and violatory of the most sacred rights of representatives and their constituents. For this reason I must withhold my approbation from it. I can do nothing that will sanction its principles or approve its partiality. I will vote for sending it back to the committee in order that it may be corrected; and that with it the committee shall submit to the House all the evidence, facts, and circumstances of the case, and the names of all, yes all those who are "involved" in the inquiry as to the breach of privilege.

SPEECH OF MR. WM. COST JOHNSON,
(OF MARYLAND,)

Delivered in the House of Representatives, February, 1838—On resolutions which he had offered proposing to appropriate public land for educational purposes to all the States and Territories.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will be recollected by the House that, on the 11th of December, an able member from Alabama (Mr. LAWLER) proposed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce, according to some equitable scale of graduation, the price of such portions of the public lands as will not sell within a reasonable length of time at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; and that the lands which cannot be sold at such reduced prices, after being so offered for the term of — years, should be relinquished to the States, severally, in which they are situated."

On the 22d of December, I submitted the following resolution, to be printed, stating at the time that I should move it either as a substitute or as an amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Alabama, when his resolution should come up for consideration, viz:

"Resolved, That a committee of one from each State be appointed by the Chair, to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill to appropriate, for the purposes of free schools, academies, and the purposes of education, an increased portion of the public lands, for the benefit of all the States and Territories."

On motion of a member from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) a few days ago, the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the resolution which I have had the honor of offering now takes precedence in the House.

From this circumstance, the whole order of the debate became changed.

I had flattered myself that, before I should trouble the House with any remarks, I would have profited by the arguments of the able member who submitted the first resolution,* and of those members of this House who advocate a reduction of the price of the public lands, and a surrender of them to the States in which they lie; but, instead of coming in at the eleventh hour in support of what I intended to offer as a substitute, I am unexpectedly forced to lead in this discussion.

I shall not make my remarks more fatiguing, by a trespass upon the time of the House, with a long apology for offering them; but, in order to present the proposition which I have made in more definite terms, I must request the Clerk to read the following resolutions, which I beg leave to offer as a modification of the resolution now under consideration:

Resolved, That each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefits of the public lands, the common property of the nation.

Resolved, That each of the States in whose favor Congress has not made appropriations of land for the purposes of education is entitled to such appropriations as will correspond, in a just proportion, with those heretofore made in favor of other States.

Resolved, That the Committee of —— report a bill making an increased appropriation of the public lands, the property of the United States, yet unappropriated, to all the States and Territories of the Union, for the purposes of free schools, academies, and the promotion and diffusion of education in every part of the United States.

It is my purpose to be as brief as I may, in the examination of the subjects embraced in the resolutions; and their importance must plead my excuse if I should fatigue the attention of the House. They are of great and important interest; and, in my apprehension, no propositions could be submitted to the consideration of Congress which would have higher claims to urge them upon the earnest attention of every member in this hall. Not only are the general interests of every State deeply concerned, but I maintain that the individual interest of every citizen in the Union is most obviously involved. Then, as a question of either individual concernment or as a subject of national policy, the distribution of the public lands, as proposed by the resolutions, addresses itself to the calm and dispassionate deliberation of all.

Not being allowed the benefit of the oral arguments which may be offered in support of the proposition to reduce the price of the public lands, I have devoted as much time as I could control, in the multifarious labors I have had to perform, in examining the printed reports which have been made at various times by the Committees on the Public Lands. The committee of the present Congress have already made a short report on the subject, which comprises the views of former committees, and, in some respects, the precise phraseology and arguments.

I will first examine the report made on this subject by the committee of the 23d Congress, as it is more comprehensive and elaborate, and was prepared by the chairman, who has since filled the most distinguished places within the gift of his State, (Mr. CLAY, of Alabama.)

The report states:

"That the committee have felt it their duty to look into the origin of the claim of the United States to the public domain, the better to comprehend the motives and inducements to the various cessions which were made by the States having claims to Western lands, and the obligations incurred by the General Government under those compacts. It is from this source that the title of the United States to much the larger portion of the public lands is derived."

The report then alludes to the manner in which the General Government has acquired its claim to the Western domain, and finally comes to the significant conclusion that the Western States would now, perhaps, "be reluctant to raise the question" of the Government's right to the Western lands.

I should, I am sure, exhaust the patience of the House, and my own strength, were I to give a particular history of the claims of the United States to the Western lands, and the various antecedent controversies between the colonies and different European nations, relative to territorial jurisdiction and right of soil. In taking a brief notice of the past, my object will be to present some substantial principles upon which this subject rests, and to explain, in some degree, the reasons for the deep interest which Maryland, as well as others of the old States, has always taken in the honorable and fair adjustment of every controversy relating to the Western lands. It is fresh in the recollection of the historical reader, that at one time the entire country north of the Gulf of Mexico, to the present northern boundary of the United States, was called Virginia; and that Queen Elizabeth gave Sir Walter Raleigh a patent, almost without a name or limit.

The patents granted afterwards to the London Company were scarcely more definite. By that granted in 1609, South Virginia comprised all the country, including Pennsylvania, Maryland, North and South Carolina, from the Atlantic ocean to the South sea. Embryo kingdoms were given away in a world unexplored and but little known. The extent of the grants was unknown, for the magnitude of this continent was not comprehended at that time in Europe. At the date of those grants, the South sea was thought to approach near the Atlantic; and no one imagined that, in this latitude, it was some three or four thousand miles distant. Sir Francis Drake had seen the Pacific and Atlantic oceans from the same point on the Isthmus of Darien, and the proximity of the two seas was supposed to be the same along the northern coast. The history of Virginia, by Stith, will show "that, in 1603, a company was organized in England, and built a barge that could be taken to pieces, with which the company were directed, under the command of Captain Newport, to go up the James river, with a view to discover the country of the Monakins; and from thence they were to proceed, carrying their barge, beyond the falls, to convey them to the South sea."

The charter of Virginia was repeatedly forfeited. Maryland was carved out of its limits, as was North Carolina. Indeed, from Maine to Florida, the whole seacoast was (if I may be allowed the figure used by Mr. Clay, before the Virginia Legislature, in speaking of the Kentucky land claims) shingled over with charters to various individuals and companies, from different nations of Europe, claiming title to the land, by either the right of discovery, of possession, or of conquest.

Virginia, by the forfeiture of her charter, was made a Royal Government, and, consequently, the waste lands were claimed by the Crown.

By the treaty of 1763, between England and France, the Mississippi was established as the boundary between British America and Louisiana. This brought the line of Virginia very much short of the Pacific ocean.

The Western lands were claimed by the British Crown, and ceded to it by the treaty of Paris. Virginia now ceased to claim the territory "north of the lakes."

In fine, thirteen colonies had been carved out of Virginia at the period of the revolution, and England had relinquished to France all her claims to the lands west of the Mississippi river. At that period, the waste and unappropriated lands were regarded as Crown lands; and, during the war, the large States, and especially New York and Virginia, claimed nearly all of the Western and unappropriated lands, because they were alleged to be comprised within their original charter limits.

The colonies made common cause in the war of independence, and, from the very commencement of the revolutionary struggle, seeing its necessity as well as policy, were desirous of making a Confederated Government. The anxiety of the large States to have their claims recognised to all of the Western domain, at once awakened the small States to the true state of the question of right and justice in this enlarged pretension. The small States were all willing to make common cause against the common enemy, and regarded it but reasonable and just, and as politic as just, that what was rescued from the common enemy should be the common property of all.

Maryland, ever alive to this subject, took a leading and active interest in it. The experience of the past made her sagacious as to the future. She had found that although her charter had been the most liberal, and her limits better defined than those of the other colonies, still, by the adroit management of William Penn, she had lost much of her northern territory, whilst Virginia was urging claim to a portion of her southern territory, east of the Chesapeake bay, as well as to a large portion of her western and southern territory. This latter boundary is still in dispute, and ought yet to be referred to the Supreme Court of the United States for its final decision.

The large States, and especially Virginia, persisting in their pretensions, induced Maryland to urge the strongest arguments to their justice; nor was she willing to join the Confederacy until those arguments were listened to and their truth admitted.

In 1776, the Convention which framed the Constitution of Maryland expressed its sentiments unequivocally on this subject, in the following resolution:

"Resolved, unanimously, That it is the opinion of this Convention that the very extensive claim of the State of Virginia to the back lands hath no foundation in justice, and that if the same or any like claim is admitted, the freedom of the small States and the liberties of America may be thereby greatly endangered: this Convention being firmly persuaded that, if the dominion over those lands should be established by the blood and treasure of the United States, such lands ought to be considered as a common stock, to be parcelled out, at proper times, into convenient, free, and independent Governments."

As a matter of justice, the ground Maryland took was right, and calculated to promote it; and, as a measure of political wisdom, it was sagacious. She foresaw that to give those large States all they desired would be worse than political folly—it would be political suicide; to confederate with them would be but placing herself between the upper and the nether millstone. At the adoption of the present Constitution she stood equal in political power with New York. Each, under the Constitution, was allowed six Representatives in Congress. How have things changed! By the recent apportionment bill, Maryland has eight and New York forty; and, at the same ratio, in forty years Maryland will have about four, and New York SIXTY—all consolidated and united. I hope, however, before that period arrives, it will be for the interest of New York, as well as of the other States, that she will divide into two States. Such is the contrast now. How would it have been had not Maryland urged the surrender of the Western lands claimed by New York and Virginia? The small States would long since have been overshadowed in political influence, and their impoverished soil been abandoned.

Although all the States had signed the articles of confederation in 1779, save Maryland, she still persisted in declining, and, in a most masterly and irresistible argument, instructed her delegates in Congress to refuse assent until the States should relinquish their unjust pretensions. In their instructions, the General Assembly of Maryland say to their delegates that—

"Having conferred upon you a trust of the highest nature, it is evident we place great confidence in your integrity, abilities, and zeal to promote the general welfare of the United States, and the particular interest of this State, where the latter is not incompatible with the former; but to add greater weight to your proceedings in Congress, and take away all suspicions that the opinions you there deliver, and the votes you give, may be the mere opinions of individuals, and not resulting from your knowledge of the sense and deliberate judgment of the State you represent, we think it our duty to instruct as follows:eth on the subject of the confederation; a subject in which, unfortunately, a supposed difference of interest has produced an almost equal division of sentiment among the several States comprising the Union. We say a supposed difference of interests; for, if local attachments and prejudices, and the avarice and ambition of individuals, would give way to the dictates of a sound policy, founded on the principles of justice, (and no other policy but what is founded on those immutable principles deserves to be called sound,) we flatter ourselves this apparent diversity of interests would soon vanish, and all the States would confederate on terms mutually advantageous to all; for they would then perceive that no other confederation than one so formed can be lasting. Although the pressure of immediate calamities, the dread of their continuance, from the appearance of disunion, and some other peculiar circumstances, may have induced some States to accede to the present confederation, contrary to their own interests and judgments, it requires no great share of foresight to predict that, when those causes cease to operate, the States which have thus acceded to the confederation will consider it as no longer binding, and will eagerly embrace the first occasion of asserting their just rights and securing their independence. Is it possible that those States who are ambitiously grasping at territories to which, in our judgment, they have not the least shadow of exclusive right, will use with greater moderation the increase of wealth and power derived from those territories, when acquired, than what they have displayed in their endeavors to acquire them? We think not. We are convinced the same spirit which hath prompted them to insist on a claim so extravagant, so repugnant to every principle of justice, so incompatible with the general welfare of all the States, will urge them on to add oppression to injustice. If they should not be incited by a superiority of wealth and strength to oppress, by open force, their less wealthy and less powerful neighbors, yet depopulation, and, consequently, the impoverishment of those States, will necessarily follow, which, by an unfair construction of the confederation, may be stripped of a common interest and the common benefits desirable from the Western country. Suppose, for instance, Virginia indisputably possessed of the extensive and fertile country to which she has set up claim, what would be the probable consequences to Maryland of such an undisturbed and undisputed possession? They cannot escape the least discerning.

"Virginia, by selling on the most moderate terms a small proportion of the lands in question, would draw into her treasury vast sums of money; and, in proportion to the sums arising from such sales, would be enabled to lessen her taxes. Lands comparatively cheap, and taxes comparatively low, with the lands and taxes of an adjacent State, would quickly drain the State thus disadvantageously circumstanced of its most useful inhabitants; its wealth and its consequence in the scale of the confederated States would sink, of course. A claim so injurious to more than one-half, if not to the whole of the United States, ought to be supported by the clearest evidence of the right; yet, what evidence of that right has been produced? What arguments alleged in support either of the evidence or the right? None that we have heard of, deserving a serious refutation. We are convinced policy and justice require that a country unsettled at the commencement of this war, claimed by the British Crown, and ceded to it by the treaty of Paris, if wrested from the common enemy by the blood and treasure of the thirteen States, should be considered as a common property, subject to be parcelled out by Congress into free, convenient, and independent Governments, in such manner, and at such times, as the wisdom of that assembly shall hereafter direct.

"Thus convinced, we should betray the trust reposed in us by our constituents, were we to authorize you to ratify on their behalf the confederation, unless it be further explained. We have coolly and dispassionately considered the subject; we have weighed probable inconveniences and hardships against the sacrifice of just and essential rights; and do instruct you not to agree to the confederation unless an article or articles be added thereto in conformity with our declaration. Should we succeed in obtaining such article or articles, then you are hereby fully empowered to accede to the confederacy."

Though Maryland refused to sign the confederacy, she never for a moment abated her zeal and energy in opposing the enemy, and in giving protection and aid to the adjoining States. Indeed, in the darkest hour of the revolution, her zeal and patriotism stood pre-eminent. For, after General Washington had been defeated on Long Island, and compelled to evacuate New York and Philadelphia, and to retreat into New Jersey with the whole amount of his force, consisting of but three thousand men, a majority of that army were Marylanders; and Maryland, as if to give a higher and more indubitable earnest of her fidelity to the cause of independence, and of her confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of the commander-in-chief in this disastrous epoch of the war, elected at that very period, (1776,) for her first Republican Governor, an individual* who was, at the very moment when he received his appointment, in General Washington's camp, at the head of seventeen hundred men whom he had marched from Maryland. And the individual who received this appointment to the chief executive station of Maryland, was the same who had, in the Congress of 1775, nominated General Washington to the command of the continental army.

If in error as to this latter fact, the distinguished member

* After my speech was delivered, Mr. LAWLER obtained the floor in support of his resolution, and in answer to those offered by myself, and my remarks upon them. He occupied a portion of the morning hour, and the following day moved that the resolutions which I offered should take the same direction which his had; and therefore moved their reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that both propositions could be discussed fully at the same time, and without such frequent interruptions, when he would complete his remarks; which motion, by general consent, prevailed.

I deem it due, under the circumstances, and to my own feelings, to offer my humble tribute of respect to the memory of one who was intercepted by death in the midst of his public career, and before he had concluded his speech, which promised to endear him to his State. My seat adjoined his, and I knew him well. I esteemed him as pure in public as he was amiable and kind in private life. Intelligent without ostentation; eminently useful without vanity; purely honest for the love of virtue; and feeling no other incentive to ambition but that which characterizes an honest man; devoting his best talents and judgment for the interest of his constituents and his State, and to leave, as he did, an unimpeachable reputation to his family and his country.

from Massachusetts may be able, and, if so, I beg him to correct me. But I do not perceive him in his seat.

I stand not here to eulogize Maryland. The history of the revolution sufficiently tells her praise; the tribute of approbation has been amply accorded to her, by poet, by orator, and by historian, but by none has her conduct been more eloquently spoken of than by the distinguished member from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) when, in his splendid eulogy upon the life and character of Lafayette, he thrillingly alluded to the zeal and patriotism of the ladies and merchants of Baltimore, in this the darkest hours of the struggle for independence. What I have said has been merely to show that, whilst the enemy overran and desolated other States, Maryland not only defended her own territory, but liberally gave her treasure and sent her troops to protect the remotest portions of her sister States.

She refused to sign the articles of confederation, unless they should contain some provision for settling the question as to the Western domain. She resisted the claims of particular States, as an extravagant pretence of right, inconsistent with reason and repugnant to justice; she contended that what was rescued from the common enemy, by the common effort, ought, of right, to be a common property, to enure forever for the common benefit of all the States. The position which Maryland thus took was approved by several of the States, and most of them contended, on similar grounds, for a participation in the public lands.

On the 1st of February, 1779, Delaware signed the articles: but her act of accession was accompanied with the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That this State think it necessary, for the peace and safety of the State, to be included in the Union; that a moderate extent of limits should be assigned for such of those States as claim to the Mississippi or South sea; and that the United States in Congress assembled should and ought to have power of fixing their western limits.

"Resolved, also, That this State consider themselves justly entitled to a right, in common with the members of the Union, to that extensive tract of country which lies to the westward of the frontier of the United States, the property of which was not vested in, or granted to, individuals at the commencement of the present war; that the same hath been or may be gained from the King of Great Britain, or the native Indians, by the blood and treasure of all, and ought, therefore, to be a common estate, to be granted out on terms beneficial to the United States."

New York led the way to effect the compromise. In February, 1780, the Legislature of that State passed an act "to facilitate the completion of the articles of confederation and perpetual union among the United States of America." This act declared that the territory which she ceded "should be and enure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as should become members of the Federal alliance of the said States, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Maryland, having succeeded so far as to arouse other States to a sense of the importance of the question in relation to the Western domain, to prevent the injurious impression that irreconcilable dissension existed among the States, signed the articles of confederation on the 1st of March, 1781, protesting, however, at the same time, against any inference being drawn that she had, by so doing, relinquished her claim to a participation in the Western lands; but assigned, as her reasons, that

"Whereas it has been said that the common enemy is encouraged, by this State not acceding to the confederation, to hope that the Union of the sister States may be dissolved, and therefore prosecute the war in expectation of an event so disgraceful to America; and our friends and illustrious ally are impressed with an idea that the common cause would be promoted by our formally acceding to the confederation; this General Assembly, conscious that this State hath from the commencement of the war strenuously exerted herself in the common cause, and fully satisfied that, if no formal confederation was to take place, it is the fixed determination of this State to continue her exertions to the uttermost agreeably to the faith pledged in the Union; from an earnest desire to conciliate the affection of the sister States, to convince the world of our unalterable resolution to support the independence of the United States, and the alliance with his Most Christian Majesty, and to destroy forever any apprehensions of our friends, or hopes of our enemies, of the State being again joined to Great Britain."

Great Britain, by the treaty of peace in 1783, relinquished "to the UNITED STATES all claim to the Government, property, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof."

To the relinquishment of what "property and territorial rights" did this treaty allude, if it was not to the Crown lands (for all the vacant unsold land was claimed as such) that were known to be situated within the limits of the charters of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; the charters of all of which extended westwardly to the South sea or Pacific ocean? New York had an indefinite claim to a part of the Northwestern Territory.

Then, under the treaty of peace with Great Britain, which met the entire concurrence of the thirteen States, Virginia included, the United States became entitled to the Western domain.

This right in some degree became qualified by the acquiescence of the General Government in the subsequent acts of cession of those States within whose limits the unappropriated lands were situated.

Georgia, in 1802, relinquished to the United States her Western lands, comprising now the entire States of Mississippi and Alabama, excepting the southern portions of the same, which, with East Florida, were purchased of Spain by the United States in 1819, for five millions of dollars. The articles of agreement and cession between the United States and Georgia explicitly declare "that all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognised by the preceding conditions, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

The cession on the part of Virginia, which may be considered as the most important, from the magnitude of the territory comprehended within the grant, after specifying certain conditions, requiring, among other things, the United States to reimburse the expenses which Virginia had incurred in defending the territory, explicitly states that the lands ceded "shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

By the treaty of 1803, France ceded Louisiana to the United States, for which the United States agreed to pay that nation fifteen millions of dollars. Then, viewing the public lands as having been acquired by conquest, by purchase, or by cession, there is no avoiding the conclusion that they are the common property of the United States, in which each State has an interest in proportion to its significance in the Union.

The clear and specific language of the acts of cession dissipates every vapor and shadow of doubt on the subject, could any have existed, and clearly shows that Congress has no other power, if it is true to its trust, as an agent created by the States, with a specified and restricted power, than to dispose of those lands to create "a common fund," for the benefit of each of the States of the Union, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure;" and that the public lands can only "be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

It must be apparent to all, that, as a common property, designed in the articles of cession to be granted for the benefit of all of the States, and not for the partial benefit of a part of the States, any mode of distribution or appropriation which is partial in its tendency operates an injustice to the rest, in direct violation both of the language and intention of the acts of cession. So far as they have been or may be appropriated for objects of national defence, so far as they have been sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury, the Government has acted faithfully; but so far as they have been applied to State and not national purposes, so far as they have been granted to particular States for specific purposes, when they might have been granted for the like purposes to all the States, the Government has acted in direct violation of the very language and spirit of the compacts.

The Government has acted, in its unmeasured liberality towards the Western States, with great injustice to the old States—an injustice which is doubly severe upon those old States whose limits are comparatively small, and whose means of revenue are not very great, in giving immense bounties of the public domain for specific, and local, and State purposes.

The Government has given to the Western States one thirty-sixth part of the public lands, for the purposes of education in those States and Territories in which the lands are situated. And thus has been carved out of the general property of the whole nation, which Congress solemnly pledged itself to appropriate only for the benefit of all, this vast amount for the local and exclusive benefit of a part. Have not the old States an equal—I might say, truly, a superior—claim to a like proportionate appropriation of the public property for the same purpose? Is not education equally as important in one region of the nation as it is in another? And is it not as expensive in the old as it is in the new States? Can this Government, I will ask, consider itself as acting in honest and just faith as long as it omits to make similar appropriations of the public lands to the old States for purposes of education? The appropriations have been made for State, not national purposes; they were of a character that might have been made to all the States. Is it in good faith to restrict them to a part only?

The number of acres which the Government has given to the new States east of the Mississippi amounts to 7,909,903. If the same policy be pursued with the territory west of the Mississippi, (as it ought to be, provided it be extended to the old States also,) the number of acres which will be appropriated in that region will be 6,666,666;* making an aggregate of 14,576,569 acres, which, at two dollars per acre, will make the enormous amount of $29,153,138, given exclusively to a particular section of the country, from the common property of the nation.

This calculation is placing the land at the low price of two dollars per acre, (much of it has sold for ten dollars, and, intrinsically, on an average, it is worth, I believe, more than five;) and Seybert has shown that, before the reduction of the Government price, it averaged more than two dollars per acre; which will make, when the Western country shall have been settled, land worth, perhaps, seventy or eighty millions of dollars of the general property of the nation, which Congress will have given for local State benefits.

In addition to this vast amount of land which has been given to the Western States for purposes of education, they have received two and a half per cent. on the sales of the public lands, and large grants for purposes of internal improvements. The amount of money which the General Government has expended in the purchase and management of the public lands, including interest thereon, is upwards of $49,000,000. In 1831 it was $48,077,551, including interest. This amount has been chiefly paid by the old States, and much of their wealth has been drawn from them, while the amount of money which had been paid into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands, up to 1831, is but $37,272,713; therefore the National Treasury had not, at that time, been reimbursed, by including interest, by $10,804,838. And yet this Congres is gravely asked—by whom? not the People, but by a few honorable members—to reduce the price of the Western lands!

Nor should Congress refuse to grant to the old States their fair distributive share of the public lands for the purpose of education; and, if they are true to themselves, they will insist upon the grant. Maryland contains 8,960,000 acres; at the ratio of one thirty-sixth part, she would be entitled to 298,665 acres; which, at two dollars per acre, would amount to the sum of $597,330, as a perpetual fund for common schools and academies. United with her present school fund, this amount would enable her to diffuse more generally the benefits of education throughout the entire State. By the adoption of such a policy, the like benefits would result to every State in the Union. Pennsylvania would be entitled to 995,732 acres, and all the rest of the old States to an amount proportionate to their limits. But I shall allude to this subject more particularly in another part of my remarks. In 1821 the Legislature of Maryland passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the Union.

"Resolved, That the States in whose favor Congress have not made appropriations of land for the purposes of education, are entitled to such appropriations as will correspond, in a just proportion, with those heretofore made in favor of the other States."

Another resolution was passed, inviting the attention of the Legislatures of the several States to the subject, and also their Representatives in Congress.

These resolutions were accompanied by a report from Mr. Maxcy to the Senate of Maryland, which, for clear, irresistible reasoning, and enlightened policy, is second to no report that has ever been made on the subject. If the report of Mr. CLAY (I mean the American statesman) on the subject of the Western lands should be decided more able, it would be for the reason that Plato gave why one of Demosthenes's orations was better than the rest, "because it was the longest." Most of the States gave favorable responses to the resolutions of Maryland, and the subject was brought before Congress. Congress delayed action, upon the ground that to grant lands to the old States might, for the time, retard the payment of the national debt, and derange, in some degree, the sinking fund system; but I will, before I conclude, allude more particularly to the propositions and reports made in relation to the public lands as a fund for education. That debt has been paid off; the nation is free from debt; so that argument cannot now be used. And Congress should now pay a debt of gratitude—no, sir, not a debt of gratitude, but a debt of justice—to the old States. Justice is all that they ask, and it is what they have a right to require.

I have dwelt much longer upon this branch of the subject than I had intended; and, before I proceed to that part of the report of the committee which relates to the reduction of the price of the public lands, I will make a remark or two upon a portion of the report which alludes to the relative power of the Government and the new States, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The report states "that the committee do not propose a discussion of the question whether, in the language of some of the acts of cession referred to, the new States have been admitted into the Union with the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States; nor whether there is strict propriety in the declaration, to be found in all the acts and resolutions of Congress for the admission of new States, that they are 'admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.' It is not now, (the committee state,) and we hope it never may be, necessary to inquire how far the want of eminent domain, the power to dispose of or tax soil within her limits, is compatible with the 'sovereignty' of a State; nor to show that the original States, from the time of their independence, and at the date of the several compacts, had that right."

Then, to come back to the immediate consideration of the report: The committee hold that the right of eminent domain, the right to dispose of and to tax soil, are essential attributes of State sovereignty. These attributes may exist in a sovereign State; but to make these powers attach to, and be possessed by, the new States, presupposes the fact, that, when a State is admitted into the Union, with equal political and municipal powers, it becomes, by that admission, a sovereign State. It might be saying too much, Mr. Speaker, though I think not, to assert that there is not absolute sovereignty in either the General Government or in a State Government.

This feature and argument of the report is peculiar. It half asserts, half yields, the right of a State to tax and dispose of the national property within its limits, and dwells upon the word "sovereignty" with much stress. The ground is not boldly taken in the report, that the power of the western States over the unappropriated lands is paramount to the authority of the General Government, but an inference is clear in every mind that an attempt is made to inculcate such a doctrine. I know that the bold position was asserted, a few years ago, by the Chief Magistrate of Illinois, (Governor Edwards.) The same views are also urged in one or two other reports which have been made to this House; and I have before me resolutions and an address from a public meeting held in Indiana, unequivocally asserting it.

Before distinguished members on this floor commit themselves in favor of such doctrines, I would warn them to look at the past. Before they use their powerful names in urging their States to take such rash grounds, I would admonish them to reflect upon the results of all the controversies which have existed between State decisions, both legislative and judicial, and those of the National Legislature and Judiciary; to examine well the Constitution and the powers delegated to Congress and the Supreme Court under that instrument.

The term "State sovereignty" is used in almost every document and public address, as if it were conceded on all sides that each of the States of this Union really possessed unqualified, absolute, national authority and privileges. If I were to attempt to explain the philosophy of the error (if the terms are admissible) which controls the course of so many gentlemen, in both State and national councils, in their interpretation of the Constitution, the powers of the General Government and the States, I would trace it to their superficial examination of the subject; to their adopting the opinions of prominent men as their guides, without examining the date of their opinions, and the attendant circumstances which may have elicited them. Such opinions are often found to be contradictory in themselves, yet easily reconcileable with the times and incidents which may have given rise to them. Another cause of error is the omission, on the part of too many public men of the present day, to draw a distinction between the limited powers given to the old Confederacy, and the great mass of powers reserved at that time by the States—the increased powers given by the present Constitution to the General Government, and the more limited powers reserved under that instrument by the States. They too frequently use the arguments of distinguished gentlemen who were opposed to the adoption of the Constitution, as the true rule of interpretation after its adoption. They use the arguments of those who were in favor of the old Confederacy, as proof that the States should have all the powers possessed under it, and that the General Government should be as impotent as the old Confederacy; not sufficiently reflecting that, though opposed by great names, the Constitution was adopted, and became potential, with all the numerous and very great powers ingrafted upon it, and became supreme within the scope of the powers delegated. Such gentlemen do injustice to themselves, as well as injury to the fame of those great names whom they quote.

I greatly respect the influence of authority, but I venerate in a higher degree the weight of argument and reason. That individual who takes as his political creed the acts, sayings, and writings of any one leading politician, from youth to the grave, through every vicissitude of government and modification of policy, may spare himself much reading and reflection; but I much question if he will ever be able to render himself either eminent or useful. Such men are like the mildewed and sickly plants that vegetate beneath the shades of the ample oak, bearing neither character nor name. They may creep around its rough trunk, and crawl to some weak and decayed bough, may be occasionally cheered by some faint sunbeam, but they give no strength, and only obstruct the healthful air from the noble tree.

* This is predicated upon the calculation that Louisana contains, according to Mr. Seybert's estimate, 200,000,000 acres; but it contains 750,000,000, by Senator CLAY's estimate, which would more than double the amount.

I like to see every public or private man in this nation standing erect like the native forest tree, and proudly supporting himself. It is such men who are really the pillars of the State.

Mr. Jefferson was opposed to that feature in the Constitution, before its adoption, which rendered the President eligible for re-election; yet, after the instrument was adopted, did Mr. Jefferson refuse to serve a second term in the Presidency. All know that he did not.

In the last powerful speech which Patrick Henry made in the Virginia convention, against the adoption of the Constitution, he said, if the Constitution were adopted, "My head, my hand, and my heart shall be free to retrieve the loss of liberty, and remove the defects of that system in a constitutional way. I wish not to go to violence, but will wait with hope that the spirit which predominated in the revolution is not yet gone, nor the cause of those who are attached to the revolution yet lost; I shall, therefore, patiently wait, in expectation of seeing that Government changed, so as to be compatible with the safety, liberty, and happiness of the people."

What did Patrick Henry say after the Constitution was adopted? When his own beloved Virginia was arraying herself against the laws of Congress, Patrick Henry, at the age of sixty-three, quit his repose and his retirement, to become a candidate for a seat in the State Legislature, in order to oppose the course of his State. In his address to the people he said: "If ever you recur to another change, you may bid adieu forever to representative Government. You can never exchange the present Government but for a monarchy."

Luther Martin made an address to the Legislature of Maryland, stating with unparalled power and ability why he had, in convention, opposed the adoption of the Constitution, which, in my humble judgment, is much the ablest paper ever written against the adoption of the Constitution; but he did not hesitate, as all well know who have read his many masterly arguments, to give all of the provisions in that instrument, after its adoption, a rational and effective construction.

Under the old Confederacy, Congress was not authorized to adopt an efficient system of revenue; it could levy quotas on the States, but could not enforce their observance. It was fettered as to commerce, and, in the language of Chief Justice Jay, "Prior to the date of the Constitution, the people had not any national tribunal to which they could resort for justice, the distribution of justice was then confined to State judicatories, in whose institution and organization the people of the other States had no participation and over whom they had not the least control. There was then no general court of appellate jurisdiction, by which the errors of State courts affecting either the nation at large or the citizens of any other State, could be revised and corrected. Each State was obliged to acquiesce in the measure of justice which another State might yield to her or to her citizens; and that even in cases where State considerations were not always favorable to the most exact measure. There was danger that from this source animosities would in time result; and as the transition from animosities to hostilities was frequent in the history of independent States, a common tribunal for the termination of controversies became desirable, from motives both of justice and of policy.

"Prior also to that period the United States had, by taking a place among the nations of the earth, become amenable to the laws of nations; and it was their interest, as well as their duty, to provide that those laws should be respected and obeyed. In their national character and capacity the United States were responsible to foreign nations for the conduct of each State relative to the laws of nations and the performance of treaties; and there the expediency of referring all such questions to State courts, and particularly to the courts of delinquent States, became apparent. While all the States were bound to protect each, and the citizens of each, it was highly proper and reasonable that they should be in a capacity not only to cause justice to be done to each, and the citizens of each, but also to cause justice to be done by each, and the citizens of each; and that not by violence and force, but in a stable, sedate, and regular course of judicial procedure."

In more than one hundred instances have the courts of the Union decided upon the acts and claims of the various States; and of that number fifteen were of Maryland—more than from any other State in the Union; and, of all the old States, Delaware, which was the first to adopt the Constitution, is, I believe, the only exception; and in every case the decision of the national courts has been sustained.

Massachusetts pronounced the embargo unconstitutional; Pennsylvania opposed the excise law; Connecticut denied that her militia should be commanded, in time of war, by officers appointed by the National Executive; Maryland and Ohio sought to tax the branches of the United States Bank; Kentucky set up her land laws; yet each and all were quieted by the decision of the national tribunals. Pennsylvania had her forces in the field, yet the national laws and authorities prevailed. More recently one of the southern States arrayed herself against the laws of Congress. I allude to these historical facts in no spirit of unkindness, but as historical facts that teach a salutary warning. Nor do I wish to range over so expansive a debate as arose on Foot's famous land resolutions in the Senate, where the whole doctrine of State interposition and State sovereignty was discussed for months, with an ability never surpassed by any deliberative assembly. But, as an American, I cannot regret that that discussion was had; I do not regret it, because it elevated the American name without destroying the American Union, and opened a new and brilliant leaf in the volume of American genius.

It was a conflict, in my apprehension, more sublime than the warring of contending elements. It was a conflict of mind, where mind met and subdued mind. The occurrence to which I allude formed a new epoch in the history of this nation, and presented a spectacle of the highest sublimity. I do not use the word "sublimity" in the august sense of bookmen; of old ocean, when the elements fret its vast bosom into fearful terror; of the grand prairie on fire, which forces the heavens to reflect its lurid light, and fills the mind with an idea of immensity of flame; of the pale and blue mountain crag, which lifts its aspiring head to the heavens, as if to defy the terror of the lightning and the thunders; nor of the wide and headlong cataract, which precipitates itself from the fearful height above to the abyss below, dashes its angry waters into foam, and hangs its spray and its rainbow in the heavens as a trophy of its awful power and sublimity. I have seen all this; but there is a sublime spectacle which has struck me with more peculiar force, and one which reminds me more of the influence and power of Daniel Webster's great speech on that memorable occasion. It is the confluence of the Missouri and the Mississippi, or the silent meeting of the Ohio with the Mississippi. There is no awful terror there which astonishes reflection; no dreadful noise that subdues the senses; but you see the meeting of mighty waters; you see a vast river swallowing up, without commotion, vast rivers; you see that great mother of waters flowing on in sullen and silent grandeur, as if it received no aid, as if it were unconscious that there were other streams. You are not amazed at its breadth, nor its depth, but you are awed at its quiet, sublime silence, and power. Your mind is not alarmed or astonished, but forced to reflect. It is thrown into a new and endless world of meditation. You behold a stream which has flown on from the beginning of the world, and will roll on through all time, which defies the control of all human power, and is the same, unchanged and unchangeable. Such was the moral power of the speech to which I allude—its calm and unostentatious power, its moral sublimity, which bore down all resistance, and forced its influence through all the channels of human thought. The doctrine of State supremacy had spread from town to town, from county to county, and from State to State. It rolled on like mighty waters, overleaping their banks, from South to North, as each aspiring wave strove to overreach its predecessor in the anxious progress. It was then that the reproach of being a Northman was thrown upon Daniel Webster; he was accused—no matter how wrongfully, he was still accused—with having been an accessary of the Hartford Convention, which was charged with having had the design of a dissolution of the Union: in the same breath he was called a consolidationist, and a federalist, and an opposer of the war. Under such a cloud of prejudice, he rose in his Senate place, and by a mighty effort of mind, such as history furnishes but one parallel to, in its influence upon a nation, and that the master effort of the great Cicero, he dashed back the angry waters to their fountains, to flow on in future in their usual and well-defined courses. It was a victory more glorious than any won on the battle-field—a victory without carnage. It was the triumph of intellect controlling intellect, and staying physical hostilities by the moral force of reason and the sublime eloquence of wisdom.

The hero chief of the Presidency, who had added lustre to the arms of his country, and covered his brow with perennial laurels amid the savannas and morasses or the South; who had defeated, on the plains of New Orleans, Wellington's gallant soldiers of the Peninsula, iron-willed as he was, was subdued by that speech, and became ultra, as all sudden converts do. He sent, after that speech, his proclamation abroad, more ultra national than Webster's speech, and never thought more of publishing General Hayne's able speech in letters of gold.

In the days of Cicero, there were one hundred and fifty of the speeches of Cato, the censor, extant; and although he flourished less than a century before the former, yet Cicero asks, in his dialogue, "what living or lately deceased orator has read them?" I might ask, though it would not be in place, how many of the orators, who figure in the present age, will find a reader in the next—who will search out, and read, their evanescent productions on constitutional construction and policy of government. By the bill of the eminent statesman of the West, a salutary compromise united the whole South in its support, and quieted, it could be hoped, all collisions between State and national jurisdiction.

Daniel Webster's speech, and Henry Clay's compromise bill, should gain each the gratitude of individuals most immediately interested in that contest, and of the nation. What has been the effect upon individuals, is not my province to inquire. It is true that Rochefoucault has a maxim, that "whenever you do an individual a service beyond his power to repay you, he is sure to become your enemy, in order to cancel the obligation." I will let others judge of its truth, if it is true, and make its application, if it has any. But I fear I have digressed so newhat from the subject, and will return to its examination.

The Federal Government has less power than the Houses of Parliament in England. The latter are governed by no fixed, written Constitution. The common law of usage regulates, in some degree, the sphere of their actions; and the vagueness of their power, undefined and uncontrollable, (for the veto has become obsolete,) is asserted, nor will either House define the limits of its power.

The General Government of the United States, on the other hand, has been shorn of, or rather not allowed, absolute and unlimited power. The Constitution is the rule of action—giving to the General Government strictly defined and limited powers, and general discretionary powers, on specific subjects, to be exercised, or not, in the wisdom of the law-making power. There are, moreover, inhibitory powers mentioned in the Constitution, which the Government may not exercise; yet uncontrolled sovereignty would not be absolute without the power to exercise them. "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."—Sec. ix. The General Government has not absolute sovereign power granted it under the Constitution; but that instrument, on the contrary, has circumscribed and limited its power, beyond which it cannot operate. In the language of Chief Justice Marshall, "The General Government, though limited as to its objects, is supreme with respect to those objects."

The States have reserved to them, in the Constitution, all the powers which they have not expressly granted and delegated to the General Government; consequently, whenever a law may be enacted by a State Legislature, which is in derogation of the Constitution, or which may conflict with that instrument, the Supreme Court is the arbitrator, and the law is declared void; for the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land.

Chief Justice Marshall has said, in the case of Mr. McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland:

"If the controlling power of the States be established, if their supremacy as to taxation be acknowledged, what is to restrain their exercising this control in any shape they may please to give it? Their sovereignty is not confined to taxation. That is not the only mode in which it might be displayed. The question is, in truth, a question of supremacy; and, if the right of the States to tax the means employed by the General Government be conceded, the declaration that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land is empty and unmeaning declamation."

A sovereign State can have a standing army—may lay imposts, duties, and may levy war against a foreign State or Government; and no State is sovereign that cannot exercise these essential attributes of sovereignty: yet all the States are expressly inhibited from doing so by the Constitution. They have yielded up those powers to the General Government. Then, a State, to be sovereign, must first destroy the Constitution, and rebel successfully against it. The right of revolution is not a constitutional right, but is an instinctive, natural right, overruling all written law. Whilst all admit that doctrine, against intolerable oppression, as a dernier resort, none are willing, because none think it necessary, to resort to it. Instead of the sword to settle domestic differences, the American people appeal to, and use successfully, the moral artillery of reason.

"Sovereignty," like the word "same," is used in the Virginia and other acts of cession in a relative, comparative, conventional sense. With other restricted rights of "sovereignty" of the States is that to "dispose of or tax the soil" of the United States within the limits of the Western States. There are no derelict lands in the Western States. What is not owned by the States, or has not been purchased from the United States by individuals, or given away by the United States for specific purposes, is owned by the United States, for which the General Government has given a valuable consideration. Are the forts in the old States, which are owned by the Government, taxed for State purposes? They are not. Are they more the property of the Government than the lands for which the Government has paid a greater amount of money?

The distinction should be borne in mind, for it is obvious, between the right of jurisdiction and the right of soil. The municipal influence of a State pervades its entire limits. The right to seize upon, and appropriate, the soil or property of the General Government cannot be exercised by any State in the Union. Then, if the Western States desire the land of the United States within their limits, and are unwilling to effect their wishes by violating the law and the principle of the decalogue, they must possess it by purchase; and I will not deny their right to purchase, as individuals do, the public lands, and on the same conditions. That condition of the act of Congress which exempts the land from taxation for five years after it has been sold is looked upon as injurious to the interest of the Western States. That condition was annexed upon the ground that it would benefit the Western States, by holding out inducements for the industrious and enterprising to emigrate and settle the public lands. Nor do I doubt that it has had that effect, in a very great degree. But if any honorable trans-Alleghany member thinks otherwise, and should desire to have that condition removed, as one of the Representatives from an old State, I am free to avow my entire willingness to vote for a bill to effect that object.

The same year that Virginia passed the act of cession, Congress passed a resolution which, among other conditions, after regulating the manner in which the northwestern territories should be admitted into the Union as States, has this condition clearly set forth:

"Provided that both the temporary and permanent Government be established (in the State admitted) on these principles as their basis:

"1. That they shall forever remain a part of this confederacy of the United States.

"2. That they shall be subject to the articles of confederation in all those cases in which the original States shall be so subject, and to all the acts and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled, conformably thereto.

"3. That they shall in no case interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with the ordinances and regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers.

"4. That they shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts contracted, or to be contracted, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States.

"5. That no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States.

"6 That their respective Governments shall be Republican.

"7. That the lands of non-resident proprietors shall in no case be taxed higher than those of residents within any new State, before the admission thereof to a vote by its delegates in Congress."

The necessity for reducing the price of the public lands can only be made manifest by showing that the price, as established at present, is higher than the real value of the lands, and for that reason the sales are comparatively limited, and the settlement of them greatly retarded. Has any such proof been offered? None that I have read or heard. But, on the contrary, the history of the settlement of the Western lands illustrates the unparalleled liberality of the General Government to that region of country; and the rapid advance of the new States to wealth, their rapid increase of population, and unprecedented prosperity, are the proofs unanswerable that the Western States have not the shadow of a cause to reproach the Government for want of liberality.

To the clear understanding of this subject, it is proper to recur to the past, and examine the present prices of the Western lands with the relative effects which those prices have had upon the old and the new States.

At the close of the Revolutionary war, the General Government commenced the present land system, and established two dollars as the price which should be given per acre for all the public land which was not disposed of at public sales, and allowed a liberal time for the purchaser to make payment.

In 1820, the Government thought it advisable to abolish the credit system, and to require that the purchase money should be paid in hand at the time of making the purchase; in consideration of which, the price was reduced to $1 25 per acre, and the sections were divided into smaller allotments; so that, with fifty dollars, a purchaser might be enabled to procure forty acres of good land in perpetuity, with a title never to be questioned.

What, let me ask, has been the operation of this policy? Has it been the aggrandizement of the old States, and the tardy settlement of the new States? No voice will utter such a belief; for the very reverse is the fact.

Has the amount of sales augmented or diminished?

By the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, sent to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, January 30, 1838, tables B and A, give the amount sold each year.

The above shows the quantity of land entered, and the purchase-money thereof, from the earliest period, annually, to the 30th of June, 1820, without regard to their subsequent reversion to the United States, or their subsequent relinquishment to the United States under the several relief laws. The net quantity of land actually sold or retained by the purchasers under the credit system is 13,648,645.43 acres; and the net amount paid is $27,905,099 76; which amounts are put down in table A, as the "quantity of land sold," and the "amount paid by purchasers," from the earliest period to the 30th June, 1820.

The lands sold from 1787 to 1796, inclusive, are the lands sold, prior to the opening of the land office, to John Cleves Symmes, the Ohio Company, and to individuals, at public sales held in New York and Pittsburgh.

These facts rebuke into silence every idea that the policy of the Government is illiberal, or that the price of the public land is too high; it cannot be, when the demand for land in the West is so rapidly augmenting.

What are the facts in relation to the settlement of those lands? Forty-seven years ago the entire population west of the Alleghany mountains hardly amounted to 100,000 souls. That region of country is now the home of nearly 4,000,000 people; whilst the old States have increased within that period at a rate of about 15 per cent. every ten years, the new States have augmented in population at the rate of 33 per cent. in the same period. The new States have increased with more than double the rapidity of the old States, and some of them at more than quadruple the rate of many of the old States.

Has it been the mere result of accident that the old States, with their superior situations for agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, which, more than any thing else, will throw a dense population in the cities contiguous to, or connected with, the ocean, should be so far outstripped in their advance to wealth and population by the new States? Or has it not been an effect growing out of and consequent upon the policy of the Government, in disposing of, at so low a price, the public lands of the United States, and thereby inviting, by the strongest inducements, the population of the old States to emigrate from them and to settle on the cheap and fertile lands in the valley of the Mississippi?

The ravages of the revolutionary struggle impaired the agricultural interest of the old States, and the consequences growing out of it exhausted the fertility of the soil in a very great degree.

To support the armies of the revolution, and to pay the heavy quotas and taxes which were levied upon them, compelled the farmers, those few who were not under arms, to adopt that mode of cultivation which was cheapest and least laborious, but the most ruinous to the soil. They were compelled to pitch crop after crop, in rapid succession, in the same fields, to supply the urgent wants of the army, and to enable them to pay the enormous taxes assessed upon them. The consequence was, that all the fresh lands became impoverished, the virgin soil exhausted, and the land almost worthless for culture.

The farmers had no time to rest their lands from repeated exhaustion, or to supply, by extraneous means of compost and the minerals, the vegetable crops which they annually took from them. Peace, which brought independence to our nation, and repose to our army, brought neither repose nor rest to the fields of the farmer. A national debt of some two hundred millions, and State debts of most onerous amounts, were to be paid, and paid chiefly by the agricultural industry of the country. This compelled the farmers to persist in that ruinous mode of cultivation, which, to supply pressing and urgent demands, was impoverishing the whole face of the country. Then were opened to market, by the General Government, the rich and extensive lands of the Mississippi valley, and at the low price of two dollars per acre. Its consequences were felt by all the old States, and more especially by Maryland and those States whose situations were marked with the like peculiarities. Maryland had furnished her most abundant share in men and money to defend the Western lands, as well as the general liberty of the colonies. The treaty of peace had surrendered those lands to the United States, as a common property; yet Congress accepted the acts of cession of Virginia and Georgia, paid the troops of the former as a condition of cession, and paid the latter several millions of money. Thus have many of the old States first fought for those lands, and then purchased them of the States and of foreign Governments; yet some of the old States have not only to pay all the State debts incurred out of their own State coffers, but to pay the troops that defended these very western lands. Maryland is called on every year to pay revolutionary claims; and all this comes chiefly from the agricultural interest of the State; the consequence of which is, that the lands of that State are taxed most heavily; indeed, the land taxes in Maryland are higher than in any State in the Union. Then, what recompense do those devoted States receive for paying those vast amounts, in having their soil impoverished and their lands highly taxed? Does the Government adopt a policy which will improve the value of lands in the old States, or which will justify the farmer in incurring the onerous expense of enriching his greatly exhausted lands? No, sir; such has not been the policy of the Government. It has been the policy of the General Government to offer inducements to the people of the old States to abandon their farms and let them lie waste; to tell the emigrant that liberty is won by the men and money of the old States, and that he can now reap its benefit, whilst they have paid the cost. It has been to tell the stranger that he will give you benefits which shall not be enjoyed by any patriotic citizen of the old States, unless he leave the home of his childhood and the State of his nativity.

The citizens of the old States have found it to their advantage to dispose of their lands at any price, rather than incur the labor and expense of enriching them, when, with an amount sufficient to enrich ten acres of land long in cultivation, they could purchase perhaps fifty acres of the rich lands in the West, and lands exempt from the burden of taxation for five years. Yes, one increasing tide of emigration is setting to the West, leaving the old States, where taxes are high, and soil less productive and less cheap; going to the West, where land is rich, taxes low, and the munificence of the General Government carrying education to every village and to every cottage. The sagacity of self-interest has induced the rich and the poor, the industrious and enterprising, to migrate to that country, where homes can be procured for a consideration so small that it requires little more than the will to possess them, to be owned and occupied, and but moderate industry to make them yield most abundantly. The reduced price of the fertile lands of the West has had a tendency of reducing the price of landed estates in the old States. Many portions of Virginia and Maryland are not as populous now as they were thirty years ago. Yes, sir, the picture drawn in the late Virginia convention, by a distinguished member of this House, (Mr. MERCER,) was not a mere fancy sketch of the present impoverished and desolated condition of the lower counties of his native State, when compared with their former wealth and population. Those fields, where once waved the golden harvest, are now a barren waste; those mansions, which were once the abode of chivalry, refinement, and generous hospitality, are now "as desolate as the dwelling of Moina;" and the wild beasts have returned from the mountains to find a shelter amid the thickets of their ancient hiding-places. Should any member on this floor doubt these things, one hour's ride from this city, into either Maryland or Virginia, will give him proofs of the melancholy reality. Yes, sir; you may look from the balustrades of this edifice, or ascend its lofty dome, and, ranging your view into the Maryland or Virginia side of the Potomac, see lands thus contiguous to the capital of the nation which can be bought for three or four dollars per acre; some have been sold within the last year for less than three dollars per acre. The sparse inhabitants, though patient and laborious, find that, even with the most rigid economy and frugality, wealth does not augment, and that their most untiring industry must be applied,

"To force a reluctant soil to yield
Them bread."

These lands were originally productive, but have become exhausted, from the causes which I have already assigned. To enrich them would require an expense of fifteen or twenty dollars per acre; an expense which but few will encounter (and but few are able) as long as they can purchase, at the low rate of $1 25 per acre, rich and fresh lands on the navigable rivers of the West, which will yield more abundantly.

I will invite the attention of the committee to a passage of the report, which, I think, and I believe it can be shown, assumes a false position:

"The Government of the United States," says the report, "is probably the only vender, either of land or any other property, that holds the most inferior quality of any article at the same price with the best. If an individual were to maintain that all domestic animals of a given species were of the same value, how inconsistent would he appear! If a merchant were to refuse to sell kersey at any lower price than he could obtain the superfine broadcloth, his conduct would certainly be deemed utterly absurd. Yet there is not greater absurdity in either of these propositions than there is in maintaining that land of every quality is worth, or should command, the same price."

"But give me a foothold," said one of old, "and I will move the world." Grant the gentleman's premises, and I will admit that there is some plausibility in his conclusion; but I utterly deny that it is a fact that the "Government holds the most inferior quality of the public lands at the same price with the best."

This leads to a more particular inquiry into the mode adopted by Congress for the sale of the public lands. Prior to 1820, those lands which were not sold at auction at above $2 per acre could be entered by purchasers for that sum, to be paid in four equal annual payments; the first within forty days, and the three other payments within two, three, and four years after date of purchase. No interest was to be charged if punctually paid, and a discount of eight per cent. was made by the Government if the purchaser paid cash; so that, by prompt payment, the price would be reduced to $1 64 per acre, and the purchaser was allowed to purchase any amount above a quarter of a section of one hundred and sixty acres. The present law permits sales of an eighth of a section, and establishes a minimum price of $1 25, which is required to be paid in hand. But before any land is liable to private entry at the price of $1 25 per acre, it must have been first offered at public sale.

The lands are now first offered at public vendue, exposed to fair competition, and not unfrequently, instead of $1 25 per acre, they bring five and ten times that amount. By the recent sales of the lands on Red river, within the last three years, they have sold as high as from twelve to thirteen dollars per acre; and yet we are, with these undeniable facts before us, told that the Government asks as much for her worst lands as she does for her best.

By the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which is appended to the report of the Committee on the Public Lands of the twenty-third Congress, it will appear that, in three years, beginning with 1826, there were sold 413,607 acres of public land in Alabama, for $576,087; making the land sold average $1 39 3 per acre, which is considerably more than the Government rate, as fixed at the minimum price; and yet, with that evidence appended to the report, the committee gravely asserts that the Government holds all of its lands at the same price. The honorable chairman of the committee complains that the price of the public lands is too high; and, as proof, he exhibits the fact that some hundred millions of acres have been surveyed, and remain unsold. This may be true; but it does not establish a clear inference that the price is too extravagant, because, in the space of some twenty or thirty years, the whole Western forest has not been made to yield to cultivation, and to swarm more redundant with population. If the ratio of the increase of population, as contrasted with the old States, were to be regarded as a criterion of the relative prosperity of the several regions of the Union, I think that I have already shown that the new States have no cause for complaint. Most clearly it would leave an inquisitive reader a better ground to judge of the reasonableness of the committee's complaint of a want of ready sale of the Western lands, if it had favored us with an estimate of the quantity of the public lands which have been annually sold in the West, rather than the aggregate amount of acres which is still in market. And if the committee had shown that the sales were annually diminishing in quantity, then, possibly, some cause of complaint might exist against the policy of the Government. But when the glaring fact is known to all, who are anxious to know it, that the sales are annually increasing beyond the most credulous expectation, I think that those complain without cause or reason who charge the Government with a want of liberality to the new States. The progressive augmentation of the sales of the public lands has been rapid to an extent which awakens surprise in the mind of every reflecting individual. All the public lands sold prior to 1787, were but 72,947 acres. The Government has sold within the last year more than 2,000,000 acres. Then, when it is made manifest that the rapid increase of the sales of the public lands has been beyond all expectation, and only surpassed by the more rapid augmentation of the population in those new States, it must be undeniable that the liberality of the Government has been as munificent to the new States as their complaint of the measures and policy of the Government towards them is ungenerous and unjust.

Still we are told that the price of the public lands is too high. If we were to apply the trite maxim of the factor, that

"The worth of a thing
Is what it will bring,"

(which I will readily grant is a good maxim, when applied to the productions of the workshops, when the supply bears a just proportion to the demand, but which is not so strictly applicable to land, when the supply is more than commensurate with the demand,) its price should be controlled in a great degree by the value of the productions which it may yield.

I have shown that the increase of sales and the increasing demand for lands prove that the land is regarded as fully worth the price which the Government has established. I am fully convinced that the maxims of political economy are less to be consulted in the present investigation, because they are too frequently the mere refinements of theory, which will not always accord with practical results, than the illustrations from actual experience, which easily lead to just and reasonable conclusions.

To investigate the true standard by which the price of lands should be valued would require details of calculation which I have not had time to make, and a familiarity with the practical science of national economy which I do not pretend to thoroughly possess. A few general observations may be indulged.

The nominal value of land is controlled by the price which it would bring in market or at sale. This nominal value is controlled, in a great degree, by the quantity thrown into market, as well as by the quality of the soil. Were all the soil owned by the United States, from the Alleghany mountains, or from the Mississippi river, to the Pacific ocean, thrown into market within the coming year, I am disposed to believe that they would not bring six cents per acre, because the supply would be greater than the demand. The absence of capital and population would restrict the demand, whilst the intrinsic value of those lands would be many dollars per acre.

Where is the capital to be found to purchase quickly all the public domain? All the gold and silver coin in this country will amount to some sixty millions. Commerce and the multifarious wants of life will not allow it to be abstracted from those urgent purposes, to be invested in land. Were you to melt up all the gold and silver in the nation, it would not make one hundred millions of dollars. The pockets of the People have not yet been filled with the precious metals, and we are told that they would be ruined by the credit system. The farmers now can hardly pay their debts, and are but poorly able to make extensive purchases of land. The magician's wand has not yet been wielded over their fallow fields, nor touched their stones into gold. And if all the public lands were at once sold to hungry and devouring speculators, where is the labor in this nation to cultivate them? If every merchant and mechanic were to become an agriculturist, three-fourths of the public lands would remain uncultivated for a quarter of a century to come.

The intrinsic value of land is governed by the quantity and value of the commodities which it may yield. If an acre of ground costs one hundred dollars, and money is worth, for the use of it, six per cent. per annum, and the land will yield productions, after defraying all the attendant expenses of improvement and cultivation, that will yield a profit, in value, upon the capital invested, and all the contingent expenses of every kind, of six per cent., no one will deny that the intrinsic value of the land is equal to its original cost. The yield above that amount is clear profit to the cultivator. Or, to illustrate from fact instead of theory, lands now on the Savannah river, the choicest rich rice lands, will command three hundred dollars per acre; and they are really cheaper, in point of productiveness and profit, at that price, than the more sterile lands of South Carolina would be at ten dollars per acre; because on those rich lands, the expense of cultivation is not so great, and they yield more abundantly, in proportion to the capital invested. They will yield from ninety to a hundred bushels of rice per acre, which is worth, in the cane, about one dollar a bushel; and one hand will cultivate about five acres.

Dr. Black has demonstrated in his prize essay, which was published in the American Farmer in 1820, and never read but with approbation, that every acre of arable land in New Jersey, which now sells at from ten to thirty dollars per acre, is intrinsically worth five hundred dollars per acre; and might be placed in such a state of cultivation as to yield, after paying that great amount, and all the numerous expenses of cultivation, from six to ten per cent. upon the capital employed in the purchase and cultivation. The attested history of the present day illustrates the theory of that essay. The experiment has been successfully tried in the State adjoining. I must request the Clerk to read the following article, in the first number of the Delaware Register and Farmers' Magazine, printed in February, 1838. It is headed "Improvement of the soil—profit of crops—Italian spring wheat." The article will be interesting to every farmer, and to all who feel any interest in their posterity:

"In the year 1833, Messrs. Sipple and Pennewell, wishing to secure a landing and ship yard on St. John's creek, in the immediate vicinity of Dover, purchased several acres of very poor land, then offered for sale, at the rate of about thirty dollars an acre. After setting apart a sufficient area for the ship yard and landing, they had remaining about five or six acres of land, which they determined to improve, more by the way of experiment than the hope of much profit. They commenced liming and manuring their new purchase, and at the same time put a part of it in cultivation. It may now be called good land, but by no means as rich as it can be, and soon will be, made, in consequence of the enlightened mode of improvement adopted and continued by those gentlemen.

"From the beginning, they more than realized, from the sale of various crops, all the expense of tilling and manure; but have kept no correct account, except as it regards two acres and one quarter, measured and laid off for the express purpose of testing the capability of the land as a source of profit. From this they have taken, since 1833, a crop of oats, and one of red spring wheat. On the 15th day of March, 1837, they sowed on these two acres and a quarter four bushels and one gallon of Italian spring wheat, which they harvested on the 14th day of July following. They obtained sixty-eight bushels of clean wheat, weighing sixty-one pounds to the bushel, which they immediately sold at three dollars per bushel, for seed, and had left three bushels of inferior quality. From this and the corn crop of 1836, from the same lot, they realized the sum of $344! and they say the fodder and straw fully compensated them for every expense of tilling. Mr. Sipple thinks the wheat was sown too thick, and that one and a half bushel to the acre would have been quite sufficient. The Italian spring wheat has a remarkably bright straw, and is supposed not to be subject to rust.

"They are now receiving from the land, thus improved, an annual clear income equal to the interest of five hundred dollars an acre! All the land in the neighborhood of Dover, and most of that of Kent county, is naturally of as good quality as the lot thus improved, and yet we find much of it selling at from five to ten dollars the acre! It is what may be called a light loam, in which sand greatly predominates.

"The above statement of facts is wholly derived from this source, and may be relied on, and is well worthy the serious consideration of all such persons as contemplate selling at a low price such lands, in a country remarkable for its health, beauty, advantages of location, and proximity to the best markets in the United States."

It may be asked, why, then, are these lands sold in the old States? I reply, first, because agriculture has not attained that perfection in this country which it has in some parts of Asia and Europe, and especially in China, where each acre of land is made, by prudent cultivation, to support an inhabitant. To enrich lands and to cultivate them well requires a great expenditure of money, and still greater of labor. At least one-fourth of the lands in cultivation in the old States, would be greatly improved by having fifty bushels of lime, or compost, used upon each acre; and at least another fourth would require one hundred bushels, and another fourth one hundred and fifty or two hundred bushels.

It is not unfrequent in Derbyshire, England, to use as much as six hundred bushels, and the average quantity used in England and Scotland is about one hundred and fifty bushels per acre. But take an average of one hundred bushels to the acre, and each bushel to cost ten cents, and estimate the number of acres requiring lime to make them productive and profitable at but six millions, the amount of the capital would be sixty millions of dollars. And to this should be added the expense of the labor to be employed in the process of enriching and cultivating the lands, which would be at least sixty millions more. It would require more than double the amount of gold and silver which is now in this nation. If the amount of capital and labor required was really available, I have no doubt the profit would be abundant in the immense increase of production. But the farmer is told that if he goes into debt, and ventures to use the credit system, he deserves to be a bankrupt, and is forced to gather, as he is wont to do, his scanty crops from his impoverished soil. A few who have the means may highly cultivate a few acres; but the number of those who own large or even moderate farms is small, that can highly enrich their lands. Those who labor on the soil do it as a means of supplying the primary necessaries of life, and for the accumulation of wealth. They apply their capital and labor where it is most productive and profitable. Their own sagacity and experience convince them that they would do well by cultivating the lands less fertile in the old States; but the quickening principle in self-interest teaches them that it is more profitable for them to emigrate from a State where their profits are but ten or five per cent. and go to the new lands, which will yield them from fifteen to one hundred. Thus it is that the price of lands is kept down in the old States, whilst their population crosses the mountains, and the lands in the valley of the Mississippi are made to enhance in value and in productiveness.

The taste of this age in this nation seems to be wild and impetuous speculation; to move forward as with a steam pressure in pursuit of sudden wealth, to rifle our descendants for present lucre, and to gamble away in politics or speculation the whole public domain—to use the present moment, regardless of the wants of the many millions who are quickly to take our places in existence, instead of adopting a policy that would advantage the present generation, without doing injustice to those which are to follow. We boast of our agriculture, and yet have often to import our bread-stuffs; for in a single month, but a year ago, were imported into New York alone 2,000,000 bushels of wheat and rye. We boast of our knowledge, and make no provision, with means abundant, to provide for the education of the hundreds of thousands who annually grow up in ignorance and vice.

We can judge of the resources of this country by viewing the rise and progress of other nations, less advantageously situated for agricultural advancement, and for augmentation of population. I will, therefore, read the following extract from the able pen of Dr. Humphreys, who obtained his information from the reports of parliamentary committees and other authentic documents. He says, (writing at the time from England:)

"It is the opinion of competent judges, that the advances made in the agriculture of Great Britain during the last seventy or eighty years are scarcely exceeded by the improvement and extension of its manufactures within the same period; and that to these advances no other old settled country furnishes any parallel. That they have been very rapid, indeed, the following figures and comparisons abundantly show: In 1760 the total growth of all kinds of grain in England and Wales was about 120,000,000 bushels. To this should be added, perhaps, 30,000,000 for Scotland—making a grand total of 150,000,000. In 1835, the quantity in both kingdoms could not have been less than 340,000,000 bushels. In 1755 the population of the whole island did not much, if any, exceed 7,500,000. In 1831 it had risen to 16,425,180, being an increase of 9,000,000 or 120 per cent.! Now, the improvements in agriculture have more than kept pace with this prodigious increase of demand for its various productions; for it is agreed on all hands that the 16,500,000, or rather the 17,500,000, (for more than a million has been added since 1831,) are much fuller fed, and on provisions of a far better quality, than the 7,500,000 were in 1755. Nor is Great Britain indebted at all, at present, to foreign markets for her supplies. Since 1832 she has imported no grain worth mentioning, and till within the last six months prices have been so exceedingly depressed as to call forth loud complaints from the whole agricultural interest of the country. England is, at this moment, so far from wanting any of our bread-stuffs, if we had them to export, that she has been supplying us all winter liberally from her own granaries; and, according to the latest advices, she has still bread enough and to spare. Again: it is estimated by British writers, of high authority, that the subsistence of 9,000,000 people costs, in raw produce, no less than £72,000,000, or £8 for each individual, per annum. According to this estimate, the annual product of this great branch of national industry is $350,000,000 more at present than it was in 1755; which is more than twice the value of the whole cotton manufacture of the country in 1831. Now, if it costs $250,000,000 to feed the increased population of 9,000,000, then to feed the present population of 17,500,000 must cost near $700,000,000! What an amazing agricultural product for so small a territory! And yet it is the opinion of practical men of the highest respectability in England, that the raw produce of the island might be well nigh doubled, without any greater proportional expense being incurred in its production. That is to say: 35,000,000 people might draw their subsistence from that one little speck in the ocean! Now, we have a territory more than fifteen times as large as the island of Great Britain; and what should hinder it, when it comes to be brought under no higher cultivation than some parts of England and Scotland, from sustaining a population of five or six hundred millions of people? This would give to Virginia something like thirty millions; to Illinois and Missouri about the same number each; to New York near twenty-five millions, and so in proportion to the other States. I am quite aware that this estimate will be regarded as extremely visionary and incredible by many of your readers; but not more so than it would have been thought in the middle of the last century, that England, Scotland, and Wales, could ever be made to sustain thirty-five or even thirty millions."*

If the report of the committee had shown that, from the present price of the public lands, it was impossible for a purchaser to realize a profit from their cultivation greater than the interest of the amount of capital invested in the purchase, there would have been some cause, not perhaps for complaint, but for a deliberate investigation of the present policy of the land system, and its relative bearings upon the Western and Eastern land interests of the nation. But when the report does not attempt to urge such an argument, (and it is the only feasible argument, I humbly conceive, that could be urged,) we are left to the irresistible inference that a request has been made of Congress which is supported by neither the powerful auxiliary of reason nor the still more potent influence of justice.

So far is it from the fact, that the investments of money in Western lands do not realize profit, reasonable and abundant, the very reverse is established by the experience of every individual who has tested the experiment. And the truth of the assertion which I now make cannot be denied: that in no part of the United States is wealth so rapidly augmenting, upon the amount of capital invested, as is being realized in the every State in which the honorable chairman of the committee who made this report (Mr. CLAY, of Alabama) resides, and in the adjoining State of Mississippi. Whilst the most laborious and judicious farmers of the Atlantic wheat-growing States realize scarcely, on an average, five per cent. on the amount of capital invested in land and its cultivation, the cotton planters of Alabama† and Mississippi are realizing from fifteen to forty per cent. upon the capital employed. I have in my hand an estimate which, at my particular requst, was given me by a skilful and distinguished planter of one of the Southwestern new States, in which it is shown that, from a capital of $20 000, invested in the purchase of a cotton plantation, and hands and stock, and all the incidental expenses attendant upon a year's cultivation, at a usual average of crop, and a moderate price, the investment would realize fifty per cent., or ten thousand dollars clear profit; and this estimate does not place the price of the land at $1 25, but allows ten dollars per acre. From the best information I can gather, I am led to the conclusion that, upon the capital

*A judicious gentleman (Gen. Dearborn) has also recently well said that—

"With us land is so abundant, in comparison with the population, that we have no just conception of its value, as estimated in those portions of the globe where the inhabitants are so numerous that a few roods are considered an estate so ample that the fortunate proprietor is accounted an independent man.

"But even in the vast extent of the United States, with the millions of acres still in a state of nature, how many thousands are now cultivated which, a few generations since, ay, in our day, were deemed worthless? In England, what extensive morasses have been reclaimed, and added to the domain of agriculture, while the heath-covered mountains of Wales and Scotland are rapidly being planted with magnificent forests, not for embellishment merely, but as inexhaustible sources of wealth. The old Duke of Athol planted on his estates in Perthshire 15,593 acres, which contained 27,431,600 young trees; and his successor set out 6,500 acres of poor mountain ground solely with larches. The land was not then worth over 22 cents rent per acre; and now, with the timber on it, is valued at $32,500,000. The citizens of this country have, here and there, selected the most fertile and eligible locations, and call most of the vast remainder of the land either refuse or worthless. Time, and the increase of population, will show that nearly the whole will become more valuable than even what is now deemed the most choice."

†Alabama, which some years since grew not more than 1,000 bales of cotton per annum, it is estimated will this season produce not less than 170,000 bales. The value of the present crop is computed, by the Mobile Examiner, to be little short of $15000,000.

employed in the cultivation of cotton in Alabama and Mississippi, for the last few years, the profits have been more frequently higher than forty per cent. than lower than twenty. The profits are enormous; and there are no gold mines in the world that are realizing such considerable profits from the capital invested, as is being acquired from the cultivation of cotton on the cotton lands of the Southwestern region of the Union.

Not only has the cultivation of the land proved profitable, but the speculations in land uncultivated have been, in most cases, equally so. I would ask if there are not many who have purchased land of the Government at the trifling price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, who have realized large profits from it? Are there not gentlemen within the sound of my voice who have purchased land of the Government, within the last twelve months, and have realized more than a hundred per cent. upon it? Are there not gentlemen in this Capitol who have purchased land within the last year at $1 25 per acre, who have since sold it, realizing by the sale more than seven hundred per cent.? (A voice on my right says, yes, more than a thousand per cent.) I believe it. This I know to be the fact; and yet I do expect that many gentlemen will be found in the negative vote upon these resolutions.

Speculations in land are carried on now to a most unexpected extent at the present prices; reduce the price, and adventurers in that pursuit will increase to an extent which will make land-jobbing, instead of frugal cultivation, the business of many thousands who have capital or credit to use, and throw into the hands of large capitalists a vast amount of land, which will be sold, as is too much the case already, in small parcels, to settlers, at a very advanced price. The present low price of public land has not been calculated to improve the mode of cultivating the soil in the United States, and to reduce the price will induce further neglect. The present operation of the system has been to induce those who purchase to buy large tracts of land, cut down the timber, and, by a rapid succession of crops, to exhaust the soil without replenishing or enriching it; but, as soon as it becomes exhausted, to discard it, leave it an exhausted waste, and then purchase fresh lands for $1 25, renew the same operation upon those, and in turn discard them. This has been the case to a great extent; and even in Tennessee, at this moment, there are vast quantities of lands which have been thus used and abused, and are now called waste or discarded lands. If a still further reduction should take place, you would invite the farmer not to look upon his farm as his home—his abiding place for life—but merely as a resting place for a few years in his migratory excursion from farm to farm, from section to section, carrying destruction with him, and leaving ruin and poverty in his wake like the devastating locust of Egypt or of South America, preying in their progress upon the verdure of the soil, leaving naught but gaunt hunger and desolation to mark their progress; or, like the shepherds of antiquity, whose gregarious herds would destroy the spontaneous yieldings of one plain but to depasture upon another, so that a sparse and itinerant few comprised the entire inhabitants of vast national territories.

I am not one of those economists who think that the prosperity of the agricultural interest depends upon each farmer holding in possession vast tracts of land; and that, by reducing the price of land, you will allow him the means of appropriating to his exclusive use extensive tracts of the public domain. By doing so, you neither promote the agricultural interest of the nation, nor do you, by such a policy, improve the mode of cultivation. The wealth of a nation, like that of a farmer, depends upon the amount of useful and profitable productions which are brought into market. Where farms are small, the cultivation becomes improved, and the yield per acre becomes more abundant and profitable; the land is made more valuable, and the expense of cultivation greatly reduced. Look at those regions of the United States where the land is naturally good, and cultivation has improved its quality! They are distributed in small farms. You will find not only the greatest amount of production and profit, but a population prosperous, numerous, and happy. Phelpstown, in Ontario county, New York, contains perhaps the most dense agricultural population in the United States, and the farms will average not more than from fifty to one hundred and fifty acres. Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, is more densely populated and abundant in wealth, than any county in the State, of its geographical extent. The farms there are very small, yet highly cultivated. In the county of Frederick, in my own State, the farms are generally small—smaller than they are in any other county in the State; yet agriculture has attained a degree of improvement, which characterizes no other county; and that county prospers in wealth and population beyond any in Maryland.

Look at the history of Germany, Belgium, and Poland, where agriculture has attained a high state of improvement. You will find the farms small, the yield great, and the population crowded; and in the latter nation especially, notwithstanding it has been so frequently desolated by wars. For it is true that population will increase in proportion to the facilities of supporting its wants; and hence it is that Russia increases in population more rapidly than any nation of Europe, because its vast extent of territory, much of it very productive, affords all the means of producing all the prime necessaries of life. So in the United States, whose population increases more rapidly than that of any nation on earth, because we have not only a climate of every temperature, and in many respects the most congenial that could be desired, but because we have the means of producing the substantial necessaries of life, with the least expense and labor, in consequence of the cheapness of lands and their immense fertility. When on a tour to the north, a few years since, I saw on the borders of Crooked lake, in New York, land which sold for but ten dollars an acre, and had been clothed with the richest forests of timber, which had been felled, and yielded to the proprietor, for the wood alone, about fifty dollars per acre. The soil unbroken by the plough, was well set in wheat, which had been sown upon the surface of the earth, and mingled with it only by the slight aid of the harrow, and was expected to yield from twenty to thirty busheis to the acre. I have seen the same process of pitching a crop in the western States, that promised a greater production. Then why cannot a purchaser afford to give $5 instead of $1 25 per acre?

When such immense productions and profits result from so small a capital invested, and such moderate labor applied, in a latitude so far north, what must be the profits upon an investment in fresh lands in the southern portions of the Union, where there is a more genial sun, and a soil ready to produce, almost unaided by art, by the mere spontaneity of nature! You can imagine the individual profit to those persons living in such favored regions of the country, when the fact is known, that in the new and fertile State of Mississippi, which contained a population, at the last census, of about eighty thousand white inhabitants, the exports, two or three years ago, amounted to the immense sum of ten millions of dollars.* Range your inquiries over the whole Atlantic tier of States, and where will you find any agricultural population, of equal numbers with that of Mississippi, which produces in value one-half the amount of productions? Where else, on the face of the habitable globe, will you find the same number of people as are comprised within the limits of that State, who realize the like amount of profits from a similar amount of capital and labor? Its parallel is nowhere to be found. All the merchandise and the productions of the forest, soil, mines, and work shops, which passed through all the New York canals during the last current year, amounted in value to $55,809,288, which was the result of the labor of perhaps more than two millions of persons. And the whole amount of our national exports of domestic articles, during the same period, was but $95,564,414.

And yet we are gravely called upon to adopt the levelling, the agrarian system, upon the pretext that it will benefit the agricultural interest of the nation; that, by reducing the price of the public lands, by virtually giving up and surrendering to squatters, to idlers, and adventurers, the whole landed property of the nation, we will promote the welfare of the agricultural portions of the country. If, in violation of the law of the compacts, Congress should thus give up and divide in common, to whoever may seize upon it, the public domain, what guaranty will you have that the principle may not be carried one step further? That the next attempt will not be to divide all the property of the nation? Sir, the same reason that will justify the former measure will sustain the latter. I ask, can such a policy, in part or in general adoption, promote the interest of the farmer? Did Lycurgus adopt the agrarian laws for the purpose of promoting the domestic pursuits of agriculture? Or was it to destroy them? His policy was to destroy the attachment which men of industrious habits acquire for the soil which sustains them—an attachment made doubly strong when the land is acquired by hard industry, and for a valuable consideration. He was not for encouraging the rural and and domestic arts; he was anxious to rear up a band of soldiers, a mere army of plunderers, too idle to work, and trained only to depredate upon and plunder the hard earnings of his more industrious neighbors. They were taught to despise the tame pursuits of honest industry, and boys were trained, from infancy, first to steal, and afterwards to rob. All Laconia was nothing more than a camp of outlaws and freebooters. Men were made to choose their wives in the dark; and children too puny to make soldiers were drowned, to prevent being a tax upon the State. Justice was outraged, and every moral sense of delicacy offended.

One of the features of the Lycurgus agrarian system, which has been much panegyrized by all historians, has been omitted, perhaps through prudential considerations, in the bill before me, reported from the Committee on Public Lands. Whilst Lycurgus divided the property of the nation, he also abolished the habits of extravagance and luxury, and had all vine trees cut down in his kingdom. Whilst modern politicians and lawmakers will advise the passing of laws to divide the property of the nation, and expect to render themselves popular by such a scheme, you cannot find one who will hazard the consequences of recommending a provision to destroy vineyards or to demolish distilleries. To arrest this tendency to levelling ism, Congress should promptly mark it with the frown of its disapprobation; or many ambitious men who, having a small capital of talent to sustain their aspiring views, will resort to the public property, in order to hold out a bribe to the indolent, that, in consideration of their suffrages, they will reward them by giving each voter a farm, to serve only as a pepper corn, to show by what tenure their lands and their votes shall be holden.

Sir, I disclaim any personal allusion to any member on this floor. I have nothing to do with the motives of honorable members, and shall not inflict the cruelty of impugning motives. But in these days of ambition, of levelling talent, and equalizing property, I do most verily believe that there are in the United States some politicians who would pull down any thing short of the pillars of heaven, to aggrandize and elevate themselves.

To induce Congress to reduce the price of the public lands which have been conveyed, an appeal is made to awaken the prejudices of what the honorable author of the report calls the "poor," who have been "driven"—yes, sir, that is the language of the report, "driven"—by the oppressions of the rich "capitalist;" or in the words of the report, "if the bill (to reduce the price of the public lands) were adopted, 'portions' of the lands would be purchased by poor men, who have been driven from the more fertile tracts by men of large capital, and by speculators." How have the poor been driven from the rich lands? If they had seized upon them without purchase, they had seized upon what was not their property; and they were not more entitled to them than an individual who would rescue from you part of your wealth, upon the justification that you had more than you could wisely appropriate or use. If they had purchased the rich lands, the rich capitalists could not deprive them of such lands; for evenhanded justice protects every man in the rightful possession of his property. Then I am at a loss to conceive how it could have entered the contemplation of the author of this report, that the rich could drive the poor from rich lands. But does the gentleman design to benefit the poor, by placing them upon poor lands, as is intimated in the report? Induce the poor man to settle on poor lands, and you will compel him to remain poor all his life; he must live poor, and must die poor. One acre of rich land is more valuable to a poor man than fifty acres of poor land; whilst less labor and less expense are incurred in the cultivation of the single acre, the productions may be greater than those arising from the fifty.

It would be perhaps ungenerous to charge the honorable author with introducing this part of the report for captandum effect; and I will not do so, though there are those who would beguile the People, outrage the law, and endeavor to delude the poor; and, to win their favor, would inculcate in them the belief that the laws oppressed them; and, for that reason, they should not respect the laws. Politicians who would promote an evil under such a pretext do not merit any feeling higher than the cordial censure which excited indignation may inflict. But, sir, such arguments have been used in all times to effect such ends. Graphic Shakspeare knew well what argument to give his characters, to operate upon the human passions and prejudices, and what to induce a violation of the law—that even poison itself might be administered:

> "Art thou so bare, and full of wretchedness,
> And fear'st to die? Famine is in thy cheeks,
> Need and oppression starveth in thy eyes,
> Upon thy back hangs ragged misery,
> The world is not thy friend, nor the world's law:
> The world affords no law to make thee rich;
> Then be not poor, but break it, and take this."

Human passions are ever operated upon by designing men to effect a favorite scheme, or to promote an intended measure, by like arguments and kindred hopes. Though laws may change with the ever-changing condition of society, yet the laws of human nature are always the same; and now, as in times past, the designing man knows how to wake the prejudices of the People, and to draw ideal lines between the rich and the poor. Poor himself in the rich virtues of the human heart, he urges them first to complain, then to remonstrate, then to spread wide their excitement; whilst he ranks himself by their side, in hope finally to ride on their backs into exalted office.

I am sorry to find in the report a distinction between the People of the United States, and that one portion are called poor, another portion rich. I neither know, nor recognise any such distinction. The only poor, as a class, that we have in this favored nation are the paupers in the various poor-houses throughout the nation. There is no other class that merits the epithet. Is the man in the prime of life, with vigor of body, industriously earning, by labor, enough to support himself with comfort, and to supply himself with all the necessaries of life, to be called poor? Assuredly he cannot be called so, when he can so easily procure all that is essential to his comfort and happiness. Though not a landholder, though not spending his life in luxury and indolence, a man who can live comfortably by his honest industry is rich in all the essentials of happiness. And who that is honest and industrious cannot make a decent livelihood in this nation, where labor is in such great demand, and where wages are higher than in any part of the world? Have any memorials been presented to this House from the poor, calling upon Government to give them lands, or to give them money, to make them a class to be fed from the National Treasury and national bounty? No, sir; the honest man, however indigent, makes no such request; his pride, excited by justice, will not deign to make such a demand. All that he asks of the Government is to protect him in all his civil, political, and religious liberties; to adopt that policy that will allow him ample wages for his industry, and render secure and inviolate his own property. However inconsiderable it may be, to him it is as valuable as the large possessions of the more fortunate. Less should not be required, more cannot be expected, in reason or in justice.

But once adopt the bill under consideration, and what will be the consequences? Such as I have already described. By the reduction of the price of the lands, you induce persons to take possession of them; not for permanent abiding places, but simply to cut down and destroy or sell the timber, exhaust the lands by rapid and repeated culture, then throw them away, discard them as waste lands, and enter fresh lands, in order to abuse them in like manner; which, in the language of the report, "would result in the sale of many thousands, if not millions, of acres which otherwise will not be sold so quickly, but be deprived of timber, exhausted and worn out, by those who have no inducement to preserve the soil longer than for even temporary use; which is not only detrimental to the interest of the United States, but highly injurious to the particular State in which they happen to lie."

This language of the report sustains most forcibly my own positions, and destroys the force of the recommendation of another part of the report.

But it is almost always the case that arguments are contradictory, when they are used to urge a ruinous measure, or to sustain one which is not wise and reasonable.

Such, then, will be the operation of this policy, if adopted, and such will be its inevitable consequences.

I ask honorable gentlemen from the new States, how can they reconcile their support of a measure to reduce the price of the public lands with their duty to those of their constituents who have purchased lands at the present price, under the belief that the policy of the Government was fixed and permanent? Are they willing to sacrifice the value of the property of one portion of the people of the new States to gratify the cupidity and hungry appetites of another? If they are, I am not. I ask, would it be in good faith, on the part of Congress, to sell to one portion, lands at twenty-five cents an acre, when they have exacted of another one dollar and a quarter? Will you thus depreciate the price of the property of the industrious farmers who have bought lands, and tell the eager speculator that he may enter lands adjoining at twenty-five cents, and thereby be enabled to undersell his neighbor?

The report frequently repeats the assertion that the measure proposed will advance the interest and prosperity of the farmer; and quotes a passage from the President's message, which can have but little applicability to the question, and can merit but little favor from the farming interest of the country. The report reads:

"But the amount of money to be realized from the public domain is not the sole nor even the chief consideration which should influence and determine the policy of a wise and patriotic Government. In the language of the President, in his annual message of December, 1832, 'the wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are every where the basis of society, and true friends of liberty.' These sentiments, it is hoped, will find a cordial response in every bosom. Their truth and justness are attested by all history. It may be asked, triumphantly, when did the cultivators of the soil willingly abandon the principles, or knowingly become the enemies, of free government? The soundness of the principle laid down is sustained by the most approved doctrines of political economy, and sanctioned by practical experience."

This all reads very well; but are the farming interest to be lulled by a compliment of this kind, or can they regard it as a compliment, in the refinement of this nineteenth century, to be called honest and friends of liberty? Why the presumption of law, not only now, but in the feudal times, and before, sanctioned the belief that even a thief, arraigned before the bar of justice, was honest and virtuous, however strongly charged, until the proof of guilt was made manifest by a verdict of his peers. Why, then, quote the President as authority to prove what no one has ever for the last thousand years questioned? And why not say that the mechanics are likewise friends of liberty? Or is this design to quiet the suspicions of the farmers, and silence their indignation, by the garnishment of an ill-graced compliment, whilst you sacrifice their property by depreciating its value in order to win favors with the land speculators of the West and their tribe of dependents?

* Mississippi.—The population of this State, by the census of 1830, was 70,443 whites and 65,659 slaves; and by the census taken in pursuance of a late act of the Legislature, it was 144,351 whites and 161,383 slaves—showing an increase in seven years of nearly 74,000 whites and 100,000 slaves. The cotton crop was returned at 317,748 bales, and the acres under cultivation at 1,048,530. There are nearly 36,000,000 acres in the State.

I cannot but esteem the mechanic as patriotic as the farmer, and as truly devoted to liberty. If I felt desirous to follow the illustrious example of the committee, I might say that, although General Jackson complimented the farmer, the like is done once a year by the Emperor of the Celestial Empire. There are equally illustrious examples in favor of mechanical pursuits. Peter the Great, Czar of all the Russias, did not hesitate to work at the ship-yard, in respect for mechanical pursuits, and to stimulate his people to do likewise. Charles V, Emperor of Germany and King of Spain, resigned the sceptre which he had wielded over more than half of Europe, and became a clock maker.

This language of General Jackson's message is quoted in the report made by the Committee on the Public Lands to the twenty-third Congress; it is carefully copied in the report made by the committee to this twenty-fifth Congress. When arguments fail, General Jackson's name and messages are brought in to fill the chasm, in every long or short report.

When Mark Antony desired to deceive the people, that he might himself be elevated to the first honor in the State of Rome, he read to them Cæsar's will, and told them how much Cæsar loved them:

"To every Roman citizen he gives,
To every several man, seventy-five drachmas.
Moreover, he hath left you all his walks,
His private arbors, and new planted orchards,
On this side Tiber. He hath left them you,
And to your heirs forever; common pleasures,
To walk abroad and recreate yourselves.
Here was a Cæsar: When comes such another?"

The report which has been laid on our desks this session made by a Committee on the Public Lands, contains several passages from General Jackson's messages, which have been quoted a hundred times:

"A large portion of our citizens have seated themselves on the public lands without authority, since the passage of the last pre-emption law, and now ask the enactment of another, to enable them to retain the lands occupied, upon payment of the minimum Government price. They ask that which has been repeatedly granted before."

What a spectacle of lawless outrage does this present! And yet the only argument urged to countenance it is, that the public property has been seized upon by force, and therefore we should legalize that force and lawless depredation, when the very sentence quoted proves that the countenance given by Government to former squatters was hailed as an invitation for every adventurer to seize upon as much of the public domain as his avarice could desire. Yet the argument is used as well as quoted, that the outrage of one measure upon the interest of the nation should be sanctioned and justified by that of a former. If such is the political morality of any public man, I do not wish to be considered a convert to the creed.

The most dangerous doctrine to liberty is the doctrine of precedent, unsanctioned by the voice of reason and justice. Glaring infractions are quickly seen and exposed, and at once awaken the indignation of the public; but slow, gradual, and constant usurpations and abuses awaken but little alarm, and, finally, become sanctioned by time; and even error itself almost becomes consecrated by habit and usage. That distinguished writer who aroused, by the force of his brilliant imagination, his attic wit, his withering sarcasm, and powerful reasoning, the whole British realm to check and awe prerogative, in the dedication of his "Letters of Junius" to the English People, summed up the moral essence of all his writings in a caution against the prescription of abuses:

"Let me exhort and conjure you (he says) never to suffer an invasion of your political constitution, however minute the instance may appear, to pass by without a determined, persevering resistance. One precedent creates another; they soon accumulate, and constitute law. What yesterday was fact, to-day is doctrine. Examples are supposed to justify the most dangerous measures; and when they do not suit exactly, the defect is supplied by analogy. Be assured that the laws which protect us in our civil rights grow out of the constitution, and that they must fall or flourish with it."

Abuses as well as errors are to be sustained by usage and habit, and the terror of General Jackson's name is to be held up to awe or to allure all who pause to doubt. Hence its frequent introduction.

"His silver locks
Will purchase us a good opinion,
And buy men's voices to commend our deeds."

Can it be urged, in justification of the daily depredations which have been committed on the Government lands, that none are surveyed and ready for entry at the land offices in the various States? That cannot be urged; for the following statement from the Commissioner of the Land Office will show that, at this time, there are 88,339,336.44 acres.

Both reports state:

"That the committee concur in the views of President Jackson, in his annual message to the two Houses of Congress in 1835, in which he says: 'It seems to be the true policy that the public lands shall cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue; and that they be sold to settlers, in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expenses of the present system, and cost arising under our Indian compacts.'"

This proposition, so ruinous to the old States, and I believe to the new, if adopted, was used by the President, when there was an overflowing surplus in the Treasury. This language is now quoted and used, in the report of this session, when the Treasury is bankrupt, and has not one dollar of gold or silver in it but what is purchased, and is driven to the shift of issuing a suspicious kind of paper money. To reduce the price of the Western lands would be to invite all who desire to purchase Government land to delay making purchases until the limitation of the time shall expire, when the lands may be entered at the low price of twenty-five cents per acre, which is proposed; and in the mean time it will force those who have already purchased, for the purpose of reselling, to dispose of their lands at a reduced price. So, whilst it will destroy in a great degree all revenue to the Government by sales, it will have the tendency of ruining many who have purchased of the Government upon its faith to continue the present system and the present price.

How gentlemen can sacrifice the interests of so large a portion of their constituency by sustaining such a proposition, to indulge the avaricious longings of another portion, is not my business to inquire. Or how any member from any of the old States can countenance, with the slightest look of approbation, such a measure, puzzles my judgment. What maxim of political economy will justify it? What principle of reason? What sentiment of justice? I am slow to believe that motives of policy which war upon sound reason and strict justice can induce its support, or that the considerations of interested influences, which have ulterior hopes and sinister objects, will warrant so great a departure from the faith of the compacts, or so unwarrantable a surrender of the interest and property of all the States to the cupidity of a few, so that a portion of the new States shall be aggrandized at the expense and sacrifice of the old. Or are the prophecies of old to be twice fulfilled: that "the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger?"

If there be any member on this floor from an old State who "despises his birthright," I would repudiate the belief that I am that member. I do not belong to that Esau tribe that will dispose of the pledged inheritance of myself, my constituents, and my State, for a present feast of "red pottage."

The behest of a party, if given, could never, I hope, induce me to commit so wanton an injury upon the people of my State and the nation, whilst a Representative on this floor, as to surrender their dear-bought interest in the great public domain. Nor could the command of any individual, however exalted his station, or elevated his hopes, influence my calm judgment on this subject. Political triumphs or defeats should never enter into the consideration of this question. I rejoice not, like the Swiss, at the setting sun; nor, like the Persian, at the rising. I would look more at things than persons, less upon men than their measures, and severely scrutinize both. I cannot adopt the diplomacy of the Scotchman in the Man of the World, who could never stand straight in the presence of a great man. I would judge of virtuous men by their acts, and of public men by the wisdom of their measures. He who acts upon measures by principle, and makes the broad and enduring interest of the nation his controlling consideration, cares but little whether he be with the many or the few, so long as he has the approbation of an upright and approving conscience: that affords him abundant consolation, and, if placed in retirement, he can then truly say, with the Grecian, that he never feels less alone than when alone.

On this occasion, I cannot but allude to what I consider a false position which General Jackson is made to take by the report of the Committee on the Public Lands at this session.

General Jackson predicated his reasons in favor of a reduction of the price of the public lands upon the ground that they furnished a surplus revenue, made an overflowing Treasury; and he thought that an evil would result to the nation from an eager avidity on the part of the States to be possessed of the distributable surplus. Others, I know, thought that his reasons were more of a personal character, because some of his distinguished opponents advocated a distribution of the surplus revenue among the various States. I am willing to believe that the former were the reasons which induced the recommendation in his message.

Do not the committee perceive that the reasons urged by the President at that time are inapplicable now? Where is your surplus treasure now? Have you a redundancy of money in the Treasury at this time? Is it overflowing, as it was a few years ago? It cannot have been forgotten that you passed a bill at the extra session to withhold the fourth instalment of the distribution act, upon the ground that the Treasury was bankrupt. It cannot be forgotten that you passed a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue ten millions of Treasury notes. All know that the chairman of the Financial Committee has reported a bill to issue another ten millions. Then, when the Treasury is delinquent some twenty millions, how can the arguments of General Jackson apply, which were predicated upon a surplus of some forty millions? The committee should recollect there was no distinct proposition presented at the time when General Jackson wrote his message, to have the public lands, or a portion of them, distributed among the old States, for the specific purpose of education; the propositions were different and compound. Nor was there a simple and definite proposition of this character when Mr. Van Buren wrote his last message. As limited as my favorable opinion is of both of those distinguished personages, as wise and practical statesmen, I do not believe that either of them could be so unmindful of the public interest, so deaf to the voice of the indigent, so cruel to the offspring of the needy, so indifferent to the interest of all of the States, as not to give a cordial sanction to a measure which would exalt the condition of all, by carrying education to every habitation in the nation. Had the direct proposition been submitted to General Jackson to distribute among the States, upon some equitable basis, the whole proceeds of the public lands, as a permanent fund for educational purposes, I have no doubt in my mind that he would cordially have approved of it. Were it submitted to Mr. Van Buren, I fully believe that he would sanction it. They have both risen from the plain and humble walks of life to the first honors of the nation; and they could not be so unnatural as to arrest the facilities which general education would afford to the humble poor as well as to the more fortunate in life.

The proposition which I have offered is to extend to the old States the like quantity of the public lands which have been given to the new. It goes further: it proposes an appropriation of an additional quantity to all the States and Territories, without specifying the precise amount.

It is the principle and the policy of the measure which I have thought sufficient for the present to discuss, without embarrassing it with details, leaving the latter to be adjusted by the committee which the House may charge with the subject.

I have no hesitancy in stating, however, that I should prefer that the whole proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be set apart for the exclusive support of academies and common schools in all of the States. Such propositions have been made, as I will presently show, at various times.

If the same amount should be distributed to the old which the new States have received, they would receive, as the following table will show, which may not in all respects be accurate, the following amounts:

		Acres.
New Hampshire contains 6,674,240 acres.

Total amount to the States which have not received lands		9,370,760

This amount of the public domain, sold at $2 an acre, which is about the average price which the public land has sold for, would make an aggregate of $18,741,520. The simplest rule of mathematics will easily inform us how greatly these several amounts would increase, not only for the same beneficent purpose to the old, but to the new States likewise—for all would have a proportional interest, and would receive a similar benefit in the measure—if all of the public domain were set apart for the promotion of education among all of the people of the nation. Nor do I entertain the slightest doubt that every State in the Union would give the measure its cordial and zealous sanction if the question were brought home to the bosom of every man in the Union. Many propositions of a like and kindred character have been submitted in this House and in the Senate.

On the 12th of February, 1823, Mr. White moved that the House do come to the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating and setting apart a moiety or portion of the avails of the annual sales of the public lands, for the purpose of establishing a permanent increasing fund; the interest of which, after it shall have increased to a given sum, shall be distributed for the promotion of education in the several States, according to the principles of equal right and justice."

The following year, (1824,) Mr. Strong submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That all moneys which shall be received on account of the sales and entries of the public lands, after the 4th day of July, 1825, ought to be appropriated exclusively to the support of common schools, and the construction of roads and canals; and that the said moneys ought to be divided between the several States and Territories, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives of the United States, and applied by them respectively to the aforesaid purposes, in such manner, and with such limitations and conditions, as the Congress may prescribe."

The next year, (1826,) Mr. Dickerson, of the Senate, made a report upon a similar resolution:

The committee state that they "have come to the conclusion that great advantages would result to the United States from an annual distribution among them, by some equitable ratio, of a portion of our national revenue, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, as the State Governments may respectively deem most to their advantage, &c.

"Money, distributed as proposed, would give new activity to industry and enterprise in all the States, and that equally and simultaneously.

"It would create a vigilance on the part of the State Governments over the expenditures of the General Government, and thereby prevent the waste of money, and the adoption of extravagant measures that might diminish the amount of the annual dividends.

"It would secure impartial justice to all the States in the distribution of the expenditures of our revenue, a failure of which at present is a subject of loud and just complaint.

"It would relieve the General Government of the serious inconvenience of an overflowing Treasury, which, if not provided for in the manner proposed, or by a reduction of our revenue, will impair the most important principles of our Constitution.

"It would relieve the two House of Congress of a large portion of legislation, now devoted to the disposal of our surplus funds—legislation of the worst kind, calculated to produce combinations, sectional feelings, injustice, and waste of the public treasure."

Although there was at that time a large national debt, estimated by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to be, on the 1st day of January, 1826, $30,965,537 25, yet the Senate's committee reported in favor of the plan of dividing the revenues from the public lands among the States for the purposes of education and internal improvement, and state that—

"Under a plan to distribute among the States a portion of our national revenue, and at the same time to provide for the gradual reduction of the public debt, it is proposed to divide annually, after the year 1827, one-half of the amount appropriated for the sinking fund, to wit, five millions of dollars, among the several States, by some equitable ratio, until the funded debt bearing six per cent. interest shall be extinguished; after that, to divide among the States ten millions of dollars annually, until the funded debt bearing five per cent. interest, and that bearing four and a half per cent. interest, shall be extinguished; and, after that, to divide among the States fifteen millions of dollars annually, leaving the residue of the funded debt, bearing three per cent. interest, to be redeemed at some distant period."

Various other propositions have been urged, or rather introduced into each of the two Houses, prior and subsequent to the period I have alluded to. One, which was reported by Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, and was ably supported, passed both Houses of Congress; but the executive veto of General Jackson prevented its being carried into operation. It was in some degree a modification of the various other propositions which had been introduced: it allowed a bounty of some fifteen per cent. upon the amount of sales of the public lands, in favor of those States within whose limits the lands might be situated. As a measure of final compromise, that measure was approved by both Houses of Congress.

But I never could appreciate the force of the reasoning, upon principle, which would justify such a discrimination. The same reasoning which will allow a bounty to the new States, because the land is generally sold within their limits, and the money paid into the Western land offices, would justify the old and importing States in exacting a similar bounty on the amount of revenue which they have to pay in the form of duties. Why should not Maryland exact fifteen per cent. upon the amount of revenue collected at the port of Baltimore, on the same grounds? That revenue is paid by her citizens. And the mariner who pours the rich freight of his vessel into the lap of that city encounters, in truth, more peril and more hardship, in navigating the ocean, and breasting every danger, from pole to pole, than the Western pioneer does in felling the dark forests of the West.

It was one of the strongest grounds of opposition to the adoption of the Constitution, which Luther Martin took in convention, as well as afterwards, in his speech before the Legislature of Maryland, that, by the operation of the Constitution, if adopted, Maryland would surrender all control over her commerce and its revenue, and it was one of the causes of his withdrawing himself from the convention.

To be just before generous, is a maxim of equity as well as law, derived from the soundest principles of morality.

I have read all the articles of cession, all the compacts, and can nowhere find even an intimation, a sentence of doubt, that will allow one State to have a greater proportion of benefit from the proceeds of the public lands than another. The General Government has been made an agent, a trustee, by the States, for their mutual convenience and benefit, with express injunctions to be impartial in the appropriation and distribution of the common property of all the States of this Union.

On this part of the subject I shall offer one other extract, and that is from the proceedings of the Legislature of Ohio; and I cannot withhold my admiration of the sound and firm grounds which it has taken on this subject. A State, which but forty years ago was a vast wilderness, by the bounty of the General Government and its soil, with an enterprising population, is now the third State in the Union in population and power, and already ——"leads

New colonies forth, that towards the Western seas
Spread like rapid flame among the autumnal trees."

The resolutions were passed on the 2d February, 1838, and the part which I shall read is as follows:

"We do, therefore, declare that the public lands of the United States are the property of the whole Union, held in trust for the States; that this trust can only be answered by giving to all the States the proper proceeds of their value; that we protest against any change in the long established system of managing the national estate, as it was devised by the Congress of the revolution, and sustained by every administration of the Government till the present; and we maintain that the lands shall be sold at their proper price, for the benefit of all the people of the States, not squandered and confiscated for the benefit of a few; and we also maintain that the six hundred millions of acres yet unsold are the great inheritance of the future people of these States; and that any faithless consent of this generation to abandon that inheritance to the Federal Government, to be sold piecemeal, and the money used as common revenue, would be to make that Government more powerful, and to foster extravagance in public expenditure, while it would lessen the rights of the States and deprive them of this unfailing means of advancing the condition of their people for centuries to come."

For the reputation of the new States, I could wish that such sentiments were more generally prevalent among them. And I may as well say at this time that my remarks in relation to appropriations of land, made by the General Government to the Western States for the promotion of education, do not apply but in a very limited degree to Kentucky and Tennessee. Kentucky has received a small portion, to aid some of her elemosynary institutions, and Tennessee has received about two hundred thousand acres for academies and colleges.

The views taken by the Legislature of Ohio are worthy of that enterprising and enlightened State, and commend themselves to the emulation of the older, less fortunate, and less prosperous States of the Union; they show practical intelligence and sagacious wisdom; they look beyond the present, and point to the distant future. Instead of treating and using the vast public domain as a fund for political gambling and political bribery, instead of throwing it out as a lure to the ambitious or the avaricious, as is too much the case in the present day, how much better would it be for the present and future generations if it were set apart as a sacred fund, to be used for educational purposes, and no other; not to be touched for any other purpose, in either peace or war. If the whole proceeds were set apart for that exclusive purpose, with the privilege of the States to invest one-half of their distributive shares in works of internal improvement, first guarantying to the Government, as the agent of all, (for I would have the present land system of the General Government continued,) the legal interest of the State on the amount invested in improvements, to be faithfully paid into the school fund of the State, this warfare between the State and General Governments would cease; this conflict between different sections of the Union would end; and a policy as enduring as our institutions would be established; and our institutions would be made enduring by this very policy.

"A despotism," says Montesquieu, "is supported by fear, a republic by virtue." Our institutions can only be supported by the wide diffusion of moral education among all conditions of the people. Those who limit their views to the present, and close their eyes to the future, are unsafe agents of the people. The lifetime of an individual is but a day in the history of a nation.

Congress should legislate as if this nation and its free institutions were to be lasting; it is only by viewing them so that they will be made perpetual; to look not alone at ourselves, selfish as human nature has formed us, but, in the language of Bulwer, to look at the eternal people, the teeming millions who are to crowd these States, to draw their support from its soil, and who must sink into ignorance, into anarchy, or into despotism, if they have not the means and facilities of early and progressive education.

The calculation which I have already exhibited shows the probable increase of population. I will offer a few more facts, as they will elicit, in every judicious mind, better arguments than any I could offer.

The number of inhabitants to the square mile in the United States at the last census (1830) averaged 16; in New England 20.9, in the Middle States 26.3 in the Southern States 7, in Massachusetts 81, in New York 41.5, in Pennsylvania 30.6, in Ohio 24, in Illinois 3, in the Western States 11. Now, suppose that each State had, at the present time, a sum set apart to educate all of their children, (which I will presently show is not the case,) how immensely that amount will have to increase to be sufficient to educate all the children of each State, when the population of each State becomes even as numerous as some of the nations of Europe at the present time. The number of inhabitants to a square mile in England is about 230, in France 160, in Germany it varies from 100 to 200. Humboldt has made a calculation, predicated upon the capability of the soil of America to produce the prime necessaries of life, and estimates that it is abundantly capable of supporting a population of 3,600,000,000; a mass of human beings five times as numerous as all who now exist upon the face of the globe. He estimated that the number would be, in 1830, 21,000,000, without including Indians and negroes: in 1930, to be 336,000,000; in 2030, to be 2,380,000,000. The United States is the most productive region of the continent, excepting a portion of Mexico and a few provinces still further south.

I will not fatigue the attention of the House by dwelling much longer upon these general considerations, but will attempt to present the question to the contemplation of the House, in relation to its bearing upon the present age and the rising generation; for it seems to be a controlling principle of our nature to look less at the past, and to be more indifferent of the worldly future, than to seize, with salutary avidity, the present; and it is a trait which all will admit the existence of in the American character, and which controls their pursuits in an eminent degree—the acquisition, by the shortest road, of the prize of affluence and wealth. The slow and gradual pursuit of gain our restive and enterprising minds will neither appreciate nor comprehend. We lie down with dreamy visions of wealth, and awake boldly nerved for its speedy attainment. But we know the value of education, and I am confident in the belief that the Government will adopt commensurate means for its more general diffusion. And, were we to extend our inquiries abroad, in order to ascertain if there is an urgent and pressing necessity to send the "schoolmaster abroad in the land," we would find, to our national reproach and deep and abiding mortification, that every region of the nation calls aloud for his services. There is no civilized and christian nation on earth which boasts of its refinement, its wisdom, and its fame, that so imperatively requires a more liberal system of public schools.

Let us examine, for a moment, the condition of education in the nations which we have too often been in the habit of considering as inferior to our own in the onward march of civilization and instruction. According to Lord Brougham's statement, in 487 parishes in England, there had been educated in 1818, when England adopted a more liberal system of popular education, 50,000 children. What, let me ask, was the effect of that system? In the same parishes, in 1828, there were educated 105,000; so that, in the brief period of ten years, the number of children who had received the benefits of education had more than doubled. What, let me ask, is the extent of the system pursued in other nations, and especially Prussia? We find, from an extract in Cousin, from a report published in the Royal Gazette of Berlin, in 1828, that according to the census made at the end of 1825, the number of inhabitants in the whole of the Prussian monarchy, amounted to 12,256,725; amongst whom were 4,487,421 children under 14 years of age; which gives 366 children for every 1,000 inhabitants, or about eleven-thirtieths of the nation.

Admitting education in the public schools to begin at the age of seven years complete, we may calculate that three-sevenths of the entire population of children are of an age to go to school, and we should have for the entire Prussian monarchy the number of 1,932,200 children capable of receiving the benefits of education. Now, at the end of 1825, there were in the kingdom:

Elementary schools for town and country, ordinarily for both sexes together			20,887
Burgher, or middle classes,	for boys, 458
	for girls, 278		736
Total			21,623
In which were employed:
Masters		22,264
Mistresses		704
Total		22,968
To which must be added		2,024	assistants.

These schools extended instruction to

Boys,	Elementary schools	822,077	871,246
	Burgher schools	49,169
Girls,	Elementary schools	755,922	792,972
	Burgher schools	37,050
Total number of children			1,664,218

Now, we have reckoned the total population of children from 7 to 14 years of age, in the whole monarchy, at 1,923,200; it follows, then, from the foregoing calculation, that out of every FIFTEEN children, THIRTEEN actually attend public schools; and as we have to allow for those who go to private schools, or who receive instruction at their fathers' houses, or who have perhaps already entered the lower classes of the gymnasia, the general state of things appears sufficiently gratifying. What a contrast will this exhibit to the condition of education in most of the States in this Union!

In Prussia, Austria, and Germany, scarcely a child grows up uneducated. In most of the States in this nation, thousands and tens of thousands are destitute of education, as will presently be shown. Sweden (says Lord Brougham) is perhaps the best educated country in the world; it is difficult to find there one person in a thousand who cannot read and write.

Even Russia, semi-barbarious as we are prone to regard her, is improving in a liberal way her system of education. The St. Petersburg Journal states that 160,105 children of soldiers and recruits were educated at the expense of the Crown, in the year 1832. During an interval of eight years, 4,342 such children were brought up as clerks in offices, 2,308 as assistant surgeons, 452 as land surveyors, 586 as ship-wrights, and 120 as musicians. Where is to be found the law in our national statute books which makes provision for the education of children of the soldier and recruit who may be called on to lose his life in defence of his country's interest and honor? The man who is forced in times of necessity to peril his life for his country's welfare may sacrifice it in the cause of liberty, and leave behind him his indigent children unprotected, to become the victims of ignorance and slaves to vice.

If we contrast the condition of education in most of the nations of Europe with the limited systems in this nation, we will be mortified to find how far we are behind the former. It is true that Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Ohio, and one or two other States have adopted a liberal and general system of public schools; but even in those States there is much room for improvement; and although in Connecticut one-third of the population of 275,000 attend the free schools, still the foundations of education should be extended deeper and wider. In most of the other States the system of education is most culpably deficient. Although the system of education has been greatly improved since, yet, by a report made seven or eight years ago, it was stated that—

"This country contains more than four millions of children, who ought to be under the influence of common schools. But by a recent estimate it appears that more than a million of children are growing up in the United States in ignorance, and without the means of education; of these, 250,000 are said to be in Pennsylvania. An estimate made in 1828 showed that, of the children of New Jersey, 11,743 were entirely destitute of instruction, and 15,000 adults unable to read."

Between the statement which I have read, and the following extract from Governor Wolf's message afterwards, there will be discovered a discrepancy; but either statement presents a deplorable state of education at the time. Governor Wolf says that,—

"According to the last census, we have in Pennsylvania 581,180 children under fifteen, and 149,087 between the age of fifteen and twenty, forming an aggregate of 730,267 juvenile persons of both sexes under the age of twenty years, most of them requiring more or less instruction. And yet, with this numerous youthful population growing up around us, who in a few years are to be our rulers and our lawgivers, the defenders of our country and the pillars of the State, and upon whose education will depend, in a great measure, the preservation of our liberties and the safety of the republic, we have neither schools established for their instruction, nor provision made by law for establishing them, as enjoined by the Constitution. I have no means of ascertaining, but am inclined to the opinion that 80,000 are entirely uninstructed."

Pennsylvania has adopted, within the last three or four years, a more liberal system of public instruction; and, in that brief period, the benefits have been beyond all anticipation. And never was a system more zealously opposed. During the conflict arising out of that measure, it was my fortune to travel through the greater part of that State, and I discovered that those portions of the State most uninformed, and requiring in the greatest degree education, were most zealously hostile to it. They enlarged upon tariffs and taxes, and were vehement in denunciations.

It was then that the truth of the remark of Dr. Chalmers forced conviction upon my mind, "that the inappetence of a people for education is in the exact ratio of its ignorance." What has been the effect of that system? From the report of Mr. Borrows, Superintendent of Education, to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, February 7, 1838, we find "that the whole number of scholars taught during the year, in the districts which reported, was 182,355." "The whole number of young persons, between five and fifteen years of age, in the districts that reported, is supposed to be about 200,000.

"So far as the returns have been received, the whole number taught in schools of all kinds, in the same districts, before the adoption of the system, was 80,000."

Then it appears that, in the short interval from the adoption of the measure to the present time, more than 100,000 children are now receiving the advantages of education, who otherwise would have grown up in degrading ignorance.

The measure of public education, which was at the moment of its adoption so unpopular, is now in those very regions hailed as the greatest public blessing, which proves conclusively another fact, that, whatever may be the prejudices against a liberal system of education, when once adopted, he who would then oppose it would make himself infinitely more unpopular in the most illiterate community than was the original supporter.

As in State Governments, so in the National: prejudices may be created; timid apprehensions may alarm; worse considerations than either may influence individuals in opposing a measure to appropriate the public domain for the diffusion of education among the States; but when such a policy shall, and I believe and hope will, prevail, the individual, if it should be possible that one such could be found in Congress, who would attempt to divert that fund, once set apart, from its munificent purpose, would be regarded as a more barbarous heathen than he who would, in other times, have wildly rushed into the sanctuary of the solemn temples of the gods, and extinguished their vesta! lights.

By the report of the committee appointed by the Legislature of Georgia, "of 83,000 children who ought to be in school, but 25,000 have the advantage of any education whatever."

Thus Georgia, the mother of two powerful and wealthy States, presents the sad picture of allowing 58,000 children to grow up within her limits in the most cruel and profound ignorance; a State which reserved in her articles of cession her just proportion of the public lands. When was the voice of that State heard in this hall in favor of a distributive share of the public lands for education, which she so much requires?

I have seen no report from North Carolina; and I deeply regret that there is not a feeling of reciprocity between the States and the National Government, to furnish each with all their reports and public proceedings; for, alike in State or the National Legislature, its members are embarrassed in their public deliberations, from a want of access to useful reports. But North Carolina must greatly require an improved system of education; for you will find in the Journals of this House, in the evidence in relation to the contested election from North Carolina, in the 1st session of the 22d Congress, that, out of one hundred and eleven voters who gave testimony, twenty eight had to make their marks; in other words, one third could not write their names. And her voice has not been heard in this Hall or the other, claiming a portion of the public domain for the education of her ignorant children. A State which is the parent of Tennessee; a State in which Sir Walter Raleigh's emigrants first settled; a State which has the honor of standing proudly the first to declare, by a politicial State act, (to say nothing about her Mecklenburg convention,) her determination to be separated from the mother country; for, on the 12th April, 1776, the Congress of North Carolina "empowered their delegates to declare independence."*

If we were to form a general opinion of the condition of education in other States from like circumstances, we would conclude that Kentucky is but slightly in advance of North Carolina.

You will find recorded, in your journal of proceedings, a case almost as remarkable, in the first session of the succeeding Congress. That, in the evidence given in the contested election of Moore and Letcher, of one hundred and twelve names of witnesses which I counted, sixteen were marksmen, or about one-fifth, who could not write their names.

By the last report of the superintendent of common schools, it appears that in the year 1836, in the districts of New York from which reports had been received, there were 524,188 instructed, and that the number of children residing in those districts, over five years old and under sixteen, was 563,882; so of that number 39,694 did not attend common schools.

I pass over other States, and will say that my own State is far behind the age in mental improvement, from an absence of a more general system of public education. In the congressional district which I represent there is scarcely a single school in which a poor man who has not the means to incur the expense can have his children educated. And what, Mr. Speaker, can be more agonizing to a sensitive mind, when the physical energies are paralyzed by affliction, than the reflection of such a parent, that the children he is to leave behind him are to grow up in ignorance, and to be made the prey of every vice, and to be allured to ruin by every temptation?

* In a work written by J. Seawell Jones, of North Carolina, which entitles him to the admiration of the country, and the lasting gratitude of his State, he has abundantly proven that his native State is entitled to the honor to which I have alluded; and since his excellent work has been published—his "Defence of the Revolutionary History of the State of North Carolina"—the distinction which he has claimed for her is fully corroborated, if additional proof than that which he adduces were necessary, by the researches of Mr M. St. Clair Clarke, at Albany, and at other places, whilst compiling the American State Papers.

How different must be the decline of one, though poor and prostrated, when he can find his pillow softened by the belief that, though disease and poverty may harass him, his mind can still fondly linger on the consoling reflection that his offspring, if left penniless, will still be educated; and how cheering the hope that their fate may be different; and that, when the fond parent is no more, his children, by public instruction, by industry, and the force of genius, in a country where all the avenues of enterprise and promotion are thrown wide open to character and to talents, may be useful to society and adorn his country, and rescue from the grave the name of their father, and extend it with their own through a grateful nation! By the census of 1830, there were in the U. States, between the ages of five and fifteen years, 2,845,037 white children; the number now is more than 3,000,000, all of whom should receive a moral and useful education. Lord Brougham asserts that "it is not enough to say that a child can learn a great deal before the age of six years; the truth is that he can learn, and does learn, a great deal more before that age than all that he learns or can learn in all after life." I do not feel qualified to discuss the truth or error of this proposition; but will assert that, if it is true, every one who values either the institutions of his country or the happiness of the people must feel a strong solicitude in having schools established which will give instruction and proper moral direction to the youthful mind. There is no truth more fully established in morals than that a nation or people are vicious in proportion to their ignorance. In illustration of the position, I will refer to a passage in Lord Brougham's speech on Education, in the House of Lords, some three years ago. He states, that of "70 persons who were put on their trials in the winters of 1830 and 1831, charged with rioting and arson, only 150 could read and write; all the rest were marksmen. Of the number of boys committed to Newgate during three years, two-thirds could neither read nor write.

"At the refuge for the destitute it is still worse; for, from an examination there made, it appears that the number of children received who can read with tolerable facility is in the proportion of only one in every thirty or thirty-five."

But, Mr. Chairman, I feel forced to hurry through this portion of the subject, and the reflections which naturally arise from it. I am quite sure that I have fatigued the House as well as myself.

The effect of education upon a nation is not alone in the mental and moral exaltation of its people, but the consequence is in equal ratio upon its physical energies and the increasing development of its resources. To sustain the latter position I will read an extract from the very able and most valuable work of Mr. E. C. Wines, on the subject of "Popular Education." He says that "the intellect of this people is not cultivated to one-fourth—scarcely, perhaps, to one-eighth—the extent that it would be by the adoption of a wise system of universal education. And who can calculate the results? What imagination can set limits to the pecuniary advantages that would accrue to the country, if useful inventions and discoveries were multiplied fourfold?" That, "In illustration of this point, President Young has made a comparison, founded upon the statistics of Baron Dupin, between the commercial and manufacturing condition of England and France. From this calculation it appears that the muscular force employed in commerce and manufactures in these two countries is about equal, being in each equivalent, in round numbers, to the power of six millions of men. Thus, if the productive enterprise of the two countries depended solely upon the animate power employed, France ought to be as great a commercial and manufacturing country as England. But the English, by means of machinery, have increased their force to a power equal to that of twenty-five millions of men, while the French have only raised theirs to that of eleven millions. England, then, owing to her superiority in discovering and inventing, has more than quadrupled her power of men and horses. France, on the other hand, has not quite doubled hers. Is it," the learned professor then pertinently inquires, "is it now any wonder that these islanders, with a narrower territory, smaller population, and less genial climate, should immensely outstrip their less intelligent and ingenious neighbors? And can we conceive a stronger proof of the actual pecuniary gain that accrues to a nation from cultivating the intellect of her sons, than is furnished from such a fact?" How much does England gain by her superiority over France from this fact? The actual commercial and manufacturing power of the latter country is only two-fifths of that of the former. The present annual value of the cotton manufacture of Great Britain, according to the Encyclopædia Britannica, is estimated to be about thirty-five millions of pounds sterling. Three-fifths of that sum, or more than twenty millions of pounds, is England's clear gain over her less skilful rival; an amount more than three times as great as the whole present annual revenue of the United States: and for this vast and ever increasing tide of prosperity England is clearly indebted to popular education, which is the parent of intelligence, and the ultimate cause of all those improvements in the cotton manufacture by which these amazing results have been secured.

At one time England imported her cotton fabrics from India. By the invention of machinery she now imports the raw material, sends it back seven thousand miles, manufactured, for sale in a country where the hand-loom is still used. By Middleton's genius, London is saved annually about eight millions of dollars in the facilties of furnishing water for that city. What amount of labor has been saved by Whittemore's card making machine? Whitney's invention of the cotton gin has more than doubled the value of every acre of cotton land in the South. And Fulton created a miracle by his steam invention, which has propelled the present generation more than two centuries ahead of their otherwise destination. It is beyond the estimate of human calculation to compute the resources and power of this nation, if education were universally diffused, so as to bring its influence to bear upon their full development. But the limited statements which I have given show how deplorable is the condition of education in most of the States; how many who cannot even read or write. The Emperor of Austria has issued an edict preventing those from marrying who cannot even read or write. The purpose is good; yet in this country it would be regarded as cruel. By the Constitution of Peru, no one will be allowed the privileges of citizenship after 1840 who cannot read and write. With all our boasted intelligence, such a law would create in this nation a civil revolution.

What lover of his country would not hope that the day was but shortly distant when this nation would present a spectacle worthy of its destination, when every citizen should enjoy the benefit of a generous education? And I would speed, with Wordsworth,

"The coming of that glorious time
When, prizing knowledge as her noblest wealth
And best protection, this imperial realm,
While she exacts allegiance, shall admit
An obligation, on her part, to teach
Them who are born to serve her and obey;
Binding herself by statute to secure,
For all the children whom her soil maintains,
The rudiments of letters; and to inform
The mind with moral and religious truth."

Mr. Speaker, I am fully conscious that I have occupied the time of the House to an unusual extent. I am fully convinced that other and distinguished members will exert their powerful talents in support of the measure. I hope that Virginia will lift up its able and strong voice in support of the resolutions which I have had the honor of introducing. I do anxiously hope that that State will never be silent, until the letter and spirit of its articles of cession are complied with; that it will not be contented with its great State University, but will press education in every region of that noble State. State colleges and State academies furnish the best education to their pupils; but it is the affluent alone who can send their children to those institutions. It is there that education, like the Lapland sun, gilds with its rays the edifice on the eminence, but they reach not the cottage beneath the hill.

If virtue and intelligence are the true and lasting foundations of a free Government, how imperative is the duty which rests upon those intrusted with the power of legislation to adopt a general system of public education. Whilst it improves the moral virtues, and exalts the head and the heart, it would do more than the avenues of intercommunication to knit together the Union of these growing and powerful States, and would unite them in amity and good feeling like a garland of flowers.

Opposition to the proposition will be made, but I hope it will not be insurmountable. Every liberal plan of ameliorating the condition of those who most require it will have to encounter prejudices. And on this point I will read, as applicable to my views an extract from James on Education:

"The first opposition will proceed from a spirit which the necessities of the times originally generated, and which, by the outcry of short-sighted men, and the declamation of interested and ambitious men, has been carried to a pitiful and lamentable excess. I mean the spirit of petty economies, or the sacrifice of great and certain advantages to small but immediate savings."

In conclusion, I will say, if the members in this House should refuse to support a measure calculated to give their States a distributive proportion of the public lands for the promotion of education, I will renew the proposition, as long as I may be allowed a seat in Congress, in another form. I will insist upon the right of my own State to her just proportion, and will never tire in urging it until its final success. If justice should sometimes be slow, it is generally triumphant in the end.

But I hope that the members from the old States, and the liberal from the new, will take a firm ground, and take it quickly, in favor of this measure; that they will not let another census and a reapportionment of representation be taken until this question shall be carried. They have the power to do their States justice, if they have the will, and it is time for the old and developed States to "Begin, be bold, and venture to be wise.

Those who defer this work from day to day,
Do on a river's bank expecting stand,
Till the whole stream which pass them shall be dry,
Which runs, and as it runs forever will run on."

THE DUEL REPORTS.

SPEECH OF MR. TILLINGHAST, OF RHODE ISLAND.

In the House of Representatives, April 24, 1838.—The House having still under consideration the motion of MR. TOUCEY, made under the unanimous direction of the committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the late Mr. CILLEY, to print the report of that committee, and postpone it till next Monday week—

Mr. TILLINGHAST said the motion being to postpone for a fortnight, and to print immediately, he presumed this was susceptible of division, so that a vote might be given upon each of those propositions separately. (To this the CHAIR assented.) Mr. T. then said he was against the postponement. The delay seemed unnecessary. If now postponed for a fortnight, at the end of that time the same question which has been raised in this debate would then still remain to be debated. If, in pursuing this investigation, it should be deemed by the House to be necessary to recommit the report for some purposes, as he believed it would be, if only to relieve the ultimate decision from all complaints or charges of irregularity of proceeding, it was important that it should be done without delay. If the subject was not postponed, the motion which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had given notice that he should make would be immediately before the House: and, if that prevailed, the facts would probably, at an early day, be presented in a proper manner for consideration and ultimate action.

I shall not be supposed [said Mr. T.] to be inclined to suppress investigation. The gentleman from New York, who just now sat down, [Mr. LOOMIS] said there ought to be no inclination to suppress investigation. I voted for the investigation. I thought it due to the occasion, due to the House, due to the country. I think so still. I thought there should be no postponement or delay of the investigation. I believed it of great importance that the country should at once have full and satisfactory assurance that Congress was disposed, without hesitation or appearance of reluctance, and according to the measure of its constitutional powers, to do all that properly belonged to the occasion; that the people should not be left to an interval of doubt as to the moral dispositions or capacity of their representatives and legislators; that they might repose with confidence in the belief that their representatives were as well disposed and as competent to perform any duty which might grow from this occasion as any other of the high duties with which they are charged. We were called upon to institute an inquiry. It seemed to me that the time of asking it was the time for granting it; and that it was of some consequence that no countenance should be given, by refusal or delay, to an impression that, in this particular matter, the members of this House would not be as willing, or did not find themselves as competent, as in any other to provide for an inquiry into the circumstances, with a view ultimately to decide what might be due to the moral sense of the nation, as well as to their own dignity and regard for the laws. I am satisfied with the votes I then gave, and should give the same again under the same circumstances. I may, therefore, feel relieved from embarrassment and from liability to misconstruction in taking the only course which, in the present posture of this proceeding, I find myself permitted to take. Feeling that the reasons for this course are imperative and extremely clear, I desire that they should be distinctly and clearly understood by others.

The decision upon the question now raised will form a signal precedent in all future proceedings of a similar character. It is, therefore, important that the precise nature and extent of this question, and of the reasons which constrain the votes of members upon it, should be carefully made known. I trust this will be done.

When the lamented and most melancholy event which has excited so keen an interest shall have been presented to us upon its naked and unqualified facts, (as I believe was the intention of the House,) and presented according to those laws of proceeding in such cases which are as binding upon us as any constitutional principle or law under which we act in any case, we shall be in a situation to do our whole duty to the subject; and I indulge the belief that, whatever that duty may appear to be, we are prepared to do it to the full extent of our obligations. We shall meet the occasion and the call, whatever it may be, with firmness, with dignity, and with a proper regard for those high and paramount principles to which civil society owes its existence and its security. In such cases we are emphatically reminded that the legislator should distinguish between his legislative and his individual capacity. I allow myself to feel persuaded that every member of this House is able and willing so to distinguish; that each will forget himself as a person, and remember himself only as a legislator, charged with the welfare of the whole people, exercising his high impersonal functions under the most solemn and immediate responsibility to the Supreme Fountain of all law, and right, and power, as well as to that community whose present agent he is, and that posterity who will feel and judge his acts. We have been told, more than once, that we may, in our own persons, become the subjects or the victims of the decisions we may make in this case. Sir, this is true, and this is also right. Every legislator is bound to devote, and must, of necessity, devote himself to this hazard. The infirmities of which all and each must be conscious, may, in the unforeseen course of events, bring each, or any one of us as an individual, within the reach and visitation of the laws or determinations of which he is, himself, the mover or supporter here. But he cannot allow that consideration to influence his judgment or to relax his firmness in providing and maintaining, in his action here, such laws and measures as are required for the well-being of the whole community. Even-handed justice may commend the ingredients of our chalice to our own lips. The proper use of this truth is to be careful not to throw any thing that is not pure and safe and wholesome into the fountain of those waters of which all, not excepting ourselves, must drink. I repose with confidence in the belief that we are prepared to pursue this investigation to a result, whatever it may be, that will satisfy the moral feeling of the community and our own positive obligations as legislators; and that, at the same time, we shall not permit it to be the medium of any other feeling than a controlling sense of duty, nor allow ourselves, in its progress, to sacrifice any personal right or constitutional law, rule or form of proceeding.

So much I have deemed it necessary to say in reference to the suggestion that the investigation ought not to be suppressed. I do not perceive what argument upon the present question is contained in that suggestion. I am, as I was from the beginning, in favor of the investigation. To all that is proper to be done for rendering it thorough and complete I am ready to contribute my share. But I am also in favor of the Constitution and the laws. The investigation certainly can be, and certainly should be, conducted according to the laws and rules of proceeding established for cases of investigation; and whatever, in such case, the House refers to a committee, whether resolution or memorial, is referred to be dealt with according to and under those laws and rules.

Sir, I cannot persuade myself that the point now raised for our consideration is light and trivial. It is said that it is a mere question of form. But, when that is said, nothing is said which necessarily determines it to be of little importance. I can see that, so far as it is matter of form, it is of a form that might have been and may be easily complied with. But that is not a reason for overlooking or overleaping it. It certainly struck me, at the commencement, as being a question respecting form. But it must be remembered that, in proceedings of which the result may be penalty, forms are substance; and, the more high and serious the subject matter of the inquiry, the more material and substantial is the form. Every civilized country, in which the principles of civil liberty are regarded, recognises the necessity of forms and fixed rules of proceeding in such cases, which, when established and while in force, shall be inviolable.

For the purpose of meeting the argument, then, upon the ground assumed by it, let this be thought of and reflected upon as a question of form. Justice and propriety require that we should decide it separately and distinctly by itself, without being influenced by any impressions whatever upon the propriety of the investigation, or upon the subject-matter to be investigated. Whatever, if any, opinion I may have on that subject-matter, it is not necessary, nor would it be proper, that I should refer to it, discuss it, or allow my judgment to be in the slightest degree affected by it, in settling this question, which involves solely the method of proceeding in all such cases, and not the merits or demerits of this particular case.

I do not allow myself to suppose that this House, in deciding upon the existence or applicability of a form or rule of proceeding, will be influenced by opinions upon the merits of the matter involved in the proceeding. Yet the difficulty of avoiding such an influence, is the great danger to which forms and rules, established for the protection of the most important rights, are not unfrequently exposed. In many cases it happens that men know, or believe they know, in anticipation, all the material facts; they have an opinion or a feeling in regard to them which they conscientiously, and, it may be supposed, justly believe to be right; and, thus believing, there is danger that they will look with an unfriendly eye upon what seem, in the particular case, to be merely tedious and fastidious forms, and regard them as obstacles in the way of truth and justice, interposed by captiousness, or tending only to delay. But to dispense with a rule upon such grounds, is to overthrow at once all rules and all the reasons on which they are founded. The rule of one case must be the rule of all cases of the same sort; otherwise, there is, in truth, no rule for any case. Every case would be subject to the arbitrary discretion of the tribunal, which would decide in each whether it was or was not, upon its particular merits, a case for dispensing with the rule. Thus, as the rule could always be dispensed with, each individual case would be subjected to a mode of trial peculiar to itself. It is not sufficient to say that there may be cases in which there may be a captious use, or an abuse of the rule. The power which provides the rule considers, at the proper time, the possibility of abuse as well as the use. It weighs the one against the other. Finding the use, the utility, and necessity to preponderate, probably with immense disproportion, it establishes the rule. When established, it is the law of the land. It must be observed and administered by the tribunal, even where the party is ignorant of its existence, or does not expressly claim it. Generally, (as in forms of proceeding before arraignment,) it is not at his option to waive it. It is not merely the right of the man who is to be tried; it is the right of the community; the right of all men who are not on trial, that the fixed and established rules of proceeding should be observed.

If, before my eyes, one man slays another—I see and know the fact and all its circumstances—can I execute upon him the last sentence of the law? Can I call on twelve by-standers, equally witnesses of the fact, to proceed and try him? Can a court then in session, being witnesses also of the fact committed in their presence, put him at once upon trial before the jury in the box? If he consents to this mode of trial and form of proceeding, can it be done? What prevents? The rules and forms of proceeding established for such cases, and in existence at the time of the offence committed. The laws prescribe the same inflexible forms of proceeding, whether the fact be flagrant or doubtful; they require a form of presentment upon a process, strictly according to form, by a grand jury; and, in constituting that grand jury, as well as in their proceedings, and in all subsequent proceedings, every prescribed form must be complied with, however unimportant it may, at the moment, seem. Even if the lacking half hour of time elapsed at midnight, when he was asleep, and could make no use of it, it may yet avoid the whole proceeding. It is not left to the tribunal to say how much may be dispensed with and how much retained.

In regard to rules regulating proceedings upon inquiries instituted by this House, the right to the rule is not the individual right, or privilege of the member as an individual. It is the right of his constituents. It is the right of the constituents of all the members; of my constituents, sir, and of yours. By the Constitution, the House is to establish rules for its proceedings. When established, and while in force, they are constitutional law.

I can only regret, as unfortunate, that the committee, at their first meeting, did not look into that part of the Manual, and especially into that chapter upon proceedings in committees, which contains the rule now in question, with a view to applying it to the proceedings they were about to commence, and thus recognise and thereupon take the plain course which it seems to me lay before them. They would then, probably, after their first sitting, after the examination of the first witnesses, or at such other time in the session as they deemed expedient, have reported a state of facts embraced in the rule, as ascertained upon sworn evidence, which would have placed the House, for the first time, officially and constitutionally in possession of matter upon which all subsequent proceedings must be founded. The House would then, probably, without delay, either have come to a resolution to proceed here, or else would have given at once to the committee the special authority stated in the rule. Very probably the latter would have been the course, as more convenient to the parties and to the House.

But this has not been done. The rule has been overlooked or disregarded. I think it an omission. In this state of things, the responsibility is urged upon the House to declare that the rule does not exist, or that it is not applicable.

If it exists as a rule of the House, there can be no question that it is applicable. It applies, by its terms, to all cases of inquiries before committees.

It is said that it is to be found only in Jefferson's Manual—not in the numbered rules. This may be the reason that it was overlooked in the committee, but it is no reason that we should disregard it now that it is pressed upon our attention. At the last session, the rules of proceeding, as comprised in Jefferson's Manual, were expressly and constitutionally adopted as rules of this House. It is, therefore, as much a rule of this House as any other, and stands on the same footing and authority as every other. But it is said that it is Mr. Jefferson's "marginal note" of the case in Grey's Debates," which related to the execution of Armstrong, and the motion for his execution made as Attorney General by Sir Robert Sawyer, a member of the House of Commons. But surely the authority of a rule of this House cannot be thus avoided. A marginal note, unadopted by the House, would have no authority as law. The question upon it would be, whether it was a correct statement of that case. But it is not important that a rule, adopted and enacted by the House for its government, should be founded upon, or in conformity with, any pre-existing cases. It is not Grey's Parliamentary Debates that is adopted, but the language of this rule; and, by its own language and terms, according to their obvious and known meaning, it must be interpreted and applied.

It is the power of the House which gives it life and authority, and creates it a rule of the House. Call it a marginal note, or Mr. Jefferson's note, or Mr. Jefferson's invention, or by any other name, the thing is still the same. If its principle had even been incorrectly deduced from cases in which the author of the Manual supposed he found it, still the House has adopted the principle as it finds it expressed in the Manual, believing it wholesome and right in that form. It is wholly immaterial, in this respect, whether its origin was in England or Virginia, in China or Hindostan.

It has been suggested that the rule in the Manual comes in collision with the resolution referring the facts and memorials for investigation, and that these may, therefore, be supposed to overrule and supersede the rule. I cannot so understand the matter. The resolutions are in the ordinary general terms of resolutions for inquiry by committees; and if this doctrine were correct, then every resolution might supersede those existing rules which govern the proceeding directed by the resolution. But the rules cannot be so repealed. I cannot perceive that the rule does, in the slightest degree, come in collision with any resolution passed on this subject. But, if it did, it is the resolution that must yield to the rule, not the rule to the resolution. It is the province of the rules to "govern" the action of the House until, in the proper manner, they are repealed. By 118th rule, adopted at the last session, on great consideration, the rules in the Manual are to govern, unless inconsistent with the standing rules of the House and the joint rules of the House and Senate. As it has not been read, I will give its words:

"118. The Rules of Parliamentary Practice, comprised in Jefferson's Manual, shall govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable, and in which they are not inconsistent with the Standing Rules and Orders of the House, and the Joint Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives."

Now, it is clear that the rule in question is not inconsistant with the Standing and Joint Rules, or any of them. By its express terms, it is applicable to the proceedings of this committee, because this committee is "charged with an inquiry." Its words are these:

"When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon, the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him."

This proving to be involved, it will be seen, takes place in the committee charged with the inquiry. They take evidence as to who is involved, and thereupon it proves that a member is involved. When that is established, the rule is imperative upon them as to the form and method of further proceeding. They cannot go on to the end of their commission, omitting entirely the requisition of the rule; but must then make a special report to the House, which will thereupon either give them a special authority to inquire concerning the member thus proved to be involved, or will order the further investigation and hearing to be before itself.

Sir, this view of the dictate of this rule has not been answered. I think it cannot be answered. It is certainly no answer to say that, when the committee was appointed, it was expected that members would prove to be involved. When, in the course of regular investigation, that does appear, which was expected to appear, then, and not before, the rule attaches. It is said that when the resolutions were passed, most, if not all, of the members of the House believed, nay, knew to a moral certainty, that some of its members would be affected by the investigation. Well, sir, in the instance which I put before, of a man slain openly in a crowd, or in the presence of a court, there is a belief, there is a moral certainty, in the minds of all, as to the nature of the fact, and as to the individual who will be charged and be the subject of the trial. It is expected that he will be the individual who will be named in the indictment. Still the laws of proceeding cannot for that cause be dispensed with. Every form and rule of proceeding must be observed, as if there was no such belief or expectation. The rule for one is the rule for all. The words of the rule expressly exclude all idea of an implied authority. It must be "special authority;" it cannot, therefore be implied from any belief or supposed knowledge on the part of the members of the House. And it may be observed that no such belief or knowledge appears in any record or proceeding of the House, nor could regularly appear, except upon a special report of the committee according to the rule, or upon an investigation conducted in the House.

In regard to this it must be perceived that the course taken by the committee would deprive the House of the option reserved to it by the rule. It is the right of an accused member to be heard upon the charge somewhere. It is at the option of the House, after he is personally charged before them, and as soon as they have official possession of that fact, either to hear him and pursue the whole investigation and trial in the House, or to give to their committee special authority "to inquire concerning him," and report the evidence, in which case he may be present, and heard in the taking of the evidence before the committee. It is also the right of the member that this option should be exercised by the House, and he may give reasons for or against either course. But by the method pursued by the committee, this option would be taken away from the House.

Mr. Speaker, my single object in these remarks has been to explain the reasons of my vote. When that is done, I shall have acquitted myself of all I deemed it necessary or desirable now to say. It is no part of my object to censure or doubt the motives of any one, or in any manner to wander from the question to be now taken. I wish that my own action should stand upon its true ground; and I feel that in this so important, and certainly in this House not familiar question, it is necessary that we should examine carefully the ground on which we are advancing, and see that every part of it on which we are about to plant our feet is solid and firm. The People have a right to demand that their legislators should, in such a proceeding, regard all the established landmarks, and adhere to the fixed laws and rules of proceeding in existence at the time. They have a right to this as a portion of the standing laws of the land. I feel bound, in honor and in conscience, to a strict observance of this rule of the House, by the same obligation and under the same sanction of the oath I have here taken to regard and support the Constitution and all other laws of the land.

Believing, therefore, that a recommitment will be necessary, and that, if so, it should be without delay, I shall vote against the postponement.

REMARKS OF MR. FOSTER, OF NEW YORK,

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Mr. FOSTER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not, as did the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr SLADE,] feel constrained to speak on this question "because I am obliged to give a vote, and in order that I may place myself right before my constituents;" for I have no fears that they will misunderstand this question; and it seems to me that the avowals of those who oppose the printing of the reports of the committee presuppose either that their constituents are incapable of understanding this project, if left to themselves, or else that they feel the necessity of rendering an excuse, beforehand, for the course which they pursue. However this may be, I have no doubt we shall learn in the end that our constituents are capable of examining all the questions involved in this case, and of correctly deciding thereon.

There are two or three questions involved in the motion to print the reports of the committee. It is said by those who oppose the printing that the committee have not proceeded according to the rule of the House, adopted from Jefferson's Manual, which directs that

"When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon, the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him."

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] also objects to the printing at this time, because, as he says, the people are now so much excited that they should not be trusted with the proceedings, for fear they will do injustice to those who are implicated; and that our doings should not go abroad to the people until we have finally determined the matter, lest they should, by their intermediate action, improperly influence our decision.

In my judgment, the committee have proceeded regularly, without violating any rule of this House, and their proceedings ought to be printed and examined by us; that the objection raised against it is one of form merely, without any substance; and that the people will, as we should do, look beyond mere forms, and examine into the substance of this question.

Sir, the people are not "fanned into an improper excitement." The public pulse beats now as calmly as does ours; and they are not to be told that they must be kept still while we act! That they ought not now to know what evidence has been given and reports made in this case; or that they are now incompetent to appreciate the arguments contained in the reports. They will want to know why it is that we attempt to conceal our course from them? Why we so strenuously oppose the publication of our doings? Why, in this matter, we attempt to cover up our footsteps, while, in regard to other subjects, we permit them to trace our progress step by step? And they will not be satisfied with the answer "that they are too much excited to act justly."

Let us look at the facts. It was known to the members of this House that one of our number had been killed in a duel; that he fell in combat without another member; and that other members were concerned as seconds and friends of the parties; and the resolution authorizing the appointment of the select committee required them to investigate the causes which led to the death of the member—the circumstances attending it; and to inquire whether a breach of privilege had been committed; and that the committee report thereon to the House.

It is now objected that, although we have the right to print the evidence, which was taken before the committee yet that they had no right to make any report upon it; that they should have returned to the evidence of the House, without coming to any conclusion thereon, and without presenting any resolution for the action of the House. Such a course of proceeding on the part of the committee would not be a report, as directed by the resolution. It would be no report. The report intended by the resolution is just such a one as is made in ordinary cases: a paper, drawn up by the committee, condensing and properly arranging the evidence, so that, as a whole, it shall be easily understood by the House, embodying with it the views and reasons of the committee, and adding thereto the resolution or bill which they think the House ought to adopt. All this is included in a report of a committee; and unless all this is done, (except where the order of the House directs a mere report of facts,) the committee fails in its duty to the House. What should we say, in an ordinary case, if a committee, charged to investigate and report, should only return the evidence, in the precise form in which it had taken it, without any arrangement, and without expressing any opinion? Would we not say they had neglected their duty? Would we not require them to present it in form, with their views upon it? And would we not send it back to them and require them to complete their work? Most certainly we would, and very properly, too.

We knew that the committee were inquiring into the conduct of members of this House; and we, as well as the members implicated, (who voluntarily appeared before the committee and examined the witnesses,) acquiesced; and who, for the first time, has learned from this report, that the committee were inquiring into the conduct of members? Sir, for two months we have known well how the committee were engaged; and let us not now lose sight of the substance of the business before us, and pursue the shadows of form.

The issue presented by those who are opposed to printing is a false one. The true issue is, not whether the committee have literally followed forms in their investigation. (for that is a subordinate consideration) but whether they have fairly and honestly pursued their inquiries, and whether the parties concerned have had an opportunity to be fully heard before them. If we believe that the committee have proceeded in a way calculated to affect injuriously the rights of the members charged, then we ought not to print their reports or testimony; but if it has been fairly made, the question is not, has there been any mistake in form, but has substantial justice been done to the parties by the committee? and, if so, do not the ends of justice require that their proceedings be printed?

I shall never consent to shield a member of this House by mere technicalities; nor do I believe that any member here will put his defence upon such grounds. I will carefully endeavor to protect them from injustice, but will not interpose in their defence the cobwebs of form; at least, until I ascertain that they wish it; nor then, unless that form has substance. I cannot believe that either of the members whose conduct is under examination desires that these objections should be made, or believes that they are calculated to sustain his honor or his rights.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] admits that when ordinary subjects of legislation are referred to a committee, it is proper for the committee to report their opinions as well as the facts; and yet he contends that, in such a case as this, they had no right to take the evidence, because it affects the rights and privileges of members of this House; and in this he is more consistent than others, who object to the printing; for, if the rule prohibits the reports, it also prohibits the investigation by the committee; but, in my judgment, both grounds of objection are alike untenable. If, however, the gentleman be right, then we should have a scale by which to graduate our proceedings according to the supposed importance of the subjects before us. If the matter concerned our constituents only, we might refer it to a single member with ample powers to examine and report complete, and thus save ourselves all trouble except to pass upon it formally, by a third reading and final vote; and throw off upon the committee all the responsibility of deciding upon the merits. And if the business concerned the nation at large, or the officers of the Government, we might enlarge the numbers, and restrict the powers of our committees, according to the increased importance of the subjects presented for action, until they should affect ourselves and our privileges; and then we could so proceed as to prevent any action by committee at all; and it would not require much ingenuity on our part effectually to frustrate any attempt of the people to call us to an account. Indeed, the gentleman from Vermont has contended that we had no right to raise a committee in such a case, and that all the proceedings should be had at the bar of the House Why did he not go one step further, and insist that our privileges were of such vast importance, and our offices so sacred, that we were beyond the power of the House to punish or expel; and that as against us the Constitution has no power; that our right is a divine one; and that our conduct cannot be inquired into? Sir, this assumption might astonish our constituents somewhat, and for a time excite them; but perhaps a speech in favor of it would "set us right with them;" it would, to be sure, make the Constitution a dead letter, but it would guard our privileges! And it would not be more inconsistent than that a committee cannot preliminarily examine our conduct; for the rule from the Manual expressly recognises the right of the House to authorize a committee to inquire into the conduct of members.

Other members, who are opposed to printing even the evidence, say that we have nothing to do with the testimony taken before the committee; that their proceedings are in the nature of an examination before a grand jury in criminal cases, and should form no part of the proceedings on which we are to act. This is a great mistake; there is not a single analogy between the two cases. A grand jury are not a portion of the body before whom the cause is finally to be tried; they sit in secret; they hear evidence only against the accused; he is not suffered to appear before them, either in person or by counsel; nor is he permitted to know that proceedings against him are entertained; nor does even the court ordinarily know into what or whose offence the grand jury are inquiring; they are not appointed or selected by the court; neither has the court the constitutional authority itself to make the preliminary investigations, which belong to the province of the grand jury, and which must always precede the final trial of the accused; and, finally, the law does not permit a grand juror, who has assisted in the finding of the bill of indictment, to act either as a judge or juror on the trial. In every one of these respects, in regard to a committee, the case is different; they belong to our body; are appointed by us to perform a duty which might, if we preferred it, be performed at the bar; their proceedings have been known to us and the accused; the examination has been neither secret nor ex parte; and they, with us, are, constitutionally, judges of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and of the measure of punishment which (if guilty) should be meted out. They have been appointed simply because, as a much smaller body than ours, they could more readily take the testimony, and embody it in form, than we could, and for the further reason, that, while they were attending to this matter, we could be proceeding with the ordinary business of legislation, which must have given way entirely to the examination of this privileged question, in case the committee had not been appointed.

This is a proceeding under the Constitution, which provides that each House may "punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." It depends upon no custom or prescription, as does the right of the British Parliament to punish or expel its members; and there is no limitation in the Constitution or laws of the land of the manner in which the power shall be exercised. It may, therefore, be exercised in any way which the House thinks best adapted to secure a full and impartial trial of the accused, and at the same time prevent the inquiry from entirely clogging the wheels of legislation. It is a question of expediency, and addresses itself to the discretion of the House. Why, then, should not the power be exercised as in the other proceedings of this body? It differs from them in no other respect than that it affects ourselves instead of the people; and this is the last reason in the world for interposing formal objections in their behalf.

It is our duty to guard our members from injustice; carefully to see that none is done to them; and it is also our duty to see that they are not screened from a just responsibility. And if we attempt to screen them, the people will understand it, and be able to appreciate our motives, notwithstanding we may deem them too much "excited."

The committee were not only bound, by the resolution, to report to the House, but, after it was referred to them, and while they were engaged thereon, we from day to day received petitions from various parts of the Union, praying for specific action of this House. Some of them prayed us to inquire what members were concerned in the duel, and asked for their expulsion; others requested that individual members (whose names were stated) should be tried and expelled; and others prayed for the passage of laws to prevent duelling. All these petitions were referred to that committee: and, therefore, if there had been no previous resolution, the reference of these petitions required the committee to investigate the charges contained in them; to examine into the conduct of the members accused, and to report thereon to the House. Did not the reference of these petitions confer special authority on the committee? Why, if you did not expect action upon them, did you act the solemn farce of referring them, and thus deceive the people into the belief that you did intend to act for the maintenance of the honor of your body? If the object is not decestive, why is it (and our constituents will ask why it is) that, after referring these petitions to the committee, we refuse to receive their report, and to act thereon? Why did we not frankly tell the petitioners then that we did not intend, by the reference, to produce any action upon their memorials? Why not tell them we sent the petitions to that committee for the purpose of putting them to sleep? Sir, we then intended to act fully and fearlessly upon this subject; and had the committee merely presented the evidence, they would have deserved the censure of the House, and, I have no doubt, would have received it.

In the case of John Smith, a Senator from Ohio, who was proceeded against by the Senate, upon a charge of being engaged in Burr's conspiracy, the select committee reported to the Senate all the testimony taken before them, with an elaborate report, embracing the reasons or arguments of the committee, citing precedents, and giving the conclusions of the committee, together with a resolution directing that he be expelled from the Senate. The resolution so introduced was the subject of consideration before the Senate down to the time of the final decision of the case; and the testimony, report, and resolution, were printed by order of the Senate.

In that case, Smith was allowed to give additional testimony in his defence at the bar of the Senate, and that body acted upon the testimony so given before the committee and at the bar.

So, in this case, if the parties charged can produce additional evidence in their behalf, I doubt not the House will give them permission to do so, either before the committee or at the bar as they shall desire. The proceedings, thus far, are preliminary to the final trial, and, like any other similar step, do not preclude the House from acting as it shall deem right. If we are satisfied that the committee have not obtained all the facts necessary to a correct decision, we can supply the defect. There is no good reason why the reports in this case should be oppressed; none why they should not be printed, like any other proceeding of a committee which relates solely to the rights of the people. The honor of the House neither demands, nor will it permit, any such distinction at our hands. Our constituents and ourselves should be treated alike by this body, and there is no danger that our fellow-members will suffer injustice from us. The danger is that offending members are more likely to be screened from punishment when deserved, than that they will suffer when innocent. Our social relations with each other; the intimacy and personal friendship existing, among members of the same body; and the fact that our rights, privileges, and duties are identical, will, at all times, prevent injustice being done them. I insist, therefore, that, by the resolution and petitions referred to the committee, they were bound to go as far as they had gone, and we required it at their hands; and I have no doubt they have performed the trust impartially. But whether they have come to a conclusion warranted by the evidence, we can better determine when we have examined the whole case.

Why, I repeat, sir, should we pursue a different course in the case of our members from what we do in that of our constituents? Are we sent here to interpose obstacles for our defence, when the people call for an inquiry into our conduct? What reason is there that we, the servants of the people, should attempt to shelter each other behind forms, when they demand the investigation? We are already enough protected, without seizing upon technicalities to defend ourselves We, unlike other officers of the Government, are held not to be liable to impeachment for our official misconduct; and there is no way of removing us from office, however flagrant our offences, except by such a proceeding as this. And what will our constituents think of us, if they find us engaged in hunting up objections to evade this inquiry upon its merits? Sir, let us meet it fairly and fully, and decide it in the face of the country.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] charges the object of those in favor of printing to be to place the report in the hands of the people, to excite them to demand the expulsion of members, and for the purpose of preventing the re-election of any one who may be expelled In this he mistakes the true point, and, I think, improperly impeaches the motives of those who differ with him. The proposition is to print the usual number for the use of this House, and without which it will be very difficult, if not impossible, for us properly to examine and decide the case; and such is the object of printing. I admit, however, that a consequence will be that the report and testimony would go before the people; and if it does so, I have no doubt it will make the proper, and no other, impression upon the public mind. I do not believe that it will improperly affect the character and standing of any member of this House.

The people are not likely to do injustice to their public servants; and if perchance, through the influence of a momentary excitement, they imbibe improper prejudices against them, they are sure in the end to see their error, and the sympathy which it creates will lead them to atone for the momentary pain inflicted by doing them even more than justice.

Sir, no one suffers permanent injustice, whether in regard to his motives, or his conduct, from his constituents.

Gentlemen are willing to let the people see the report and testimony hereafter; "when they shall have got over their excitement and become calm;" "when we have decided the case." And they ask, why publish the proceedings now, inasmuch as the people are not to try the cause, and when perhaps only a part of the evidence has been given? It is true that the people are not to try the question, but they have the same right to see and examine our proceedings in regard to this, as on any other subject which comes before us. It will not do to tell them that this question is above their capacity to examine fully; that they will be likely to do injustice to members of this body; nor will they be satisfied with our refusal, because all the evidence may not have been given.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the rule alluded to from the Manual was not intended to apply to such a case as this. It was intended to prevent a committee, of their own accord, and without the knowledge of the House, from trying a member, without giving him an opportunity to be heard. It was to protect members against secret and ex parte investigations of their conduct by committees; but was not designed to shield them from a full and free examination into their conduct whenever the House believes it necessary to entrust a committee with that duty. Now, sir, I ask again, did not the House intend—when it adopted the resolution of inquiry, and when it referred the petitions to the committee—to have an examination into the conduct of the very members who are implicated by the report? And was it not well known, for two months, that the committee was investigating the conduct of those members? And have we not known that those members were daily before the committee, producing testimony, and examining and cross-examining the witnesses? If, after all this, we refuse to receive and print the reports, we shall show that we are more intent on pursuing forms than of administering impartial justice; that we care more for technicalities than for the honor of the House·

Sir, our constituents will understand this case, and it will be in vain for us to attempt to deceive them. They will look us steadily in the face, and will carefully watch our movements in this, one of the most important investigations which can come before us; and if we endeavor to evade their gaze by the gauze veil of subtle refinements, they will look through it or tear it from us, and we shall at last find ourselves exposed to their just indignation.

For one, I desire to see all that the committee have done; to examine it deliberately; and to hear such further evidence as shall be offered, in order that I may come to such conclusion as will protect the privileges of this House and its members, and at the same time do no injustice to individuals.

REMARKS OF MR. MENEFEE, OF KY.

ON THE SAME SUBJECT

Mr. MENEFEE rose, and said that he was certainly, as every member must be, apprized of the general condition of the finances, and of the particular exigencies of the Treasury at this time; but he was not prepared for the announciation just made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He tells us that there is no time for trial; to enter upon which would be wholly incompatible with a proper despatch of the public business. No time for trial! said he. Sir, when did the gentleman make that discovery? Was not the state of the public business and of the Treasury fully known, all along, to the gentlemen who originated this inquiry, and by whom it has been pressed, the chairman himself amongst them? No one will doubt it. All, therefore, who contributed to set this inquiry on foot intended, I am justified in pronouncing, that it should thus connect with the discharge by this House of other public duties; for they foresaw—must have foreseen—from the first, the direction which it was eventually to take; which was, formal trials, separately, before the House—with accuser confronting the accused, and witnesses face to face with parties—of each member against whom any accusation should be made or punishment aimed. Indeed, raising a committee, of itself, implied such final action; for the office of a committee is but preliminary, preparatory to the action of the House, and its acts are nugatory except as conducing to such ulterior action. All looked to the committee as the means, the end of which was the action of the House. This course of proceeding, nevertheless, presented, at that time, no obstacle.

Has any thing intervened since this inquiry was thus instituted, disclosing the impracticability of its further prosecution? Are we to understand, from the position which the gentleman holds, that in what he has just uttered are presented the wishes of the Administration and the intention of its friends here, respecting this subject, namely, to urge it to the point of a report, involving, to the deepest degree, the characters of distinguished gentlemen of the Opposition, members of the House, and suspending over them resolutions of censure and expulsion, and then to arrest the proceedings altogether? In other words, to raise a committee, and employ it for two months in preparing accusations and elaborating arguments against gentlemen, with a view to promulgation, and now actually promulgated, all over the Republic; and then, by instantly arresting the proceedings, to deprive the accused of the opportunity of vindication in the regular course of investigation and trial!

No time! Sir, they have found time, the amplest time, to accuse, to criminate; have they not time to hear and try? They can, without the slightest prejudice to the public interest, inculpate; have they no time to hear evidence in defence and exculpation? Is there time for calumny; none for truth?

I admit, sir, that a disposition of these proceedings in the only justifiable mode—after full opportunity of defence—will conflict with the just demands of the public interest. Their prosecution up to this point has already produced such conflict. But this does not at all prove that they should be arrested now, having already gone so far; but it may prove that they should never have been instituted. As a question of privilege, this excludes the consideration of all other business, no matter how urgent. The Treasury, now scarcely sustaining itself, may soon, for want of supplies, close against the public creditors, to the infinite prejudice of the public credit. Other alarming embarrassments may overtake the Government. Yet, sir, should such results appear, they will be ascribable altogether, in their fullest measure of responsibility, to the friends of the Administration themselves, with whom these proceedings originated. I desire to enforce upon the House and the country the truth, which no gentleman here will venture to contradict, that this measure, in its commencement, progress, and consequences, is a measure of the friends of the Administration, designed, at the hazard of great public injury, to attain objects to which I shall hereafter advert.

Why, sir, what is the nature of the proceeding in which the House now finds itself involved? For fifty years the Government has existed under the present Constitution; in the lapse of which, the nation has passed through all the vicissitudes of peace and war, of prosperity and adversity, of tranquillity and excitement, and all else, save civil war, (and that it has scarcely escaped,) to which republics are exposed. Yet our history is without a precedent for this proceeding. It is new, wholly new. It presents an epoch in that history; certainly an epoch in the history of this House? What is it?

On the 26th of February last, sir, the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, a member from the State of Maine, was announced to the House by one of his colleagues, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] and the customary funeral honors awarded. For this there was precedent. Two days afterwards, however, that same colleague introduced resolutions proposing an investigation into the causes which led to the death, and the circumstances attending it. For this there was no precedent. Here, sir, the extraordinary features of the proceeding commenced.

The gentleman from Maine and others now associated with him maintain that the extraordinary nature of the event warranted and demanded such an extraordinary investigation. Sir, extraordinary in what? It involved a duel between members of the House of Representatives. Well, suppose it did How many such duels had previously occurred, publicly and notoriously? Need I, sir, enumerate the instances in which gentlemen, now members of this House, participated? It is in vain to pretend that any solid distinction exists between those instances and the present, that death ensued from the latter. The offence, so far as this House is authorized to recognise it, consists in the challenge, its acceptance, and the combat. The result is wholly immaterial.

But, sir, if the proceeding itself was extraordinary, its form was still more so. It was a general inquiry. It pointed to nothing particularly. Its scope was not announced. It was believed by many who supported the resolutions, that they were designed merely to exhibit the lamentable event to which they related in such a light as to insure the enactment by Congress of some law, or the adoption by this House of some rule, calculated to suppress the practice, out of which it originated. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has clearly signified to the House that his main purpose in supporting the inquiry did not extend beyond such measures; and that it could in no other aspect have commanded his support. Other gentlemen have declared the same sentiments. Such, I am warranted in saying, were the sentiments of the House when adopting the resolutions.

It is nevertheless now insisted by the mover of the resolutions [Mr. FAIRFIELD] and others, that such was no part of what was meditated; that they looked to that case only, and not to future cases; that their object was the punishment of offenders; and that they aimed at members of this House. The committee have manifestly proceeded with the same view; and, as appears from the range of their investigation and the report they have offered, having supposed their powers plenary to that end, both as to matters and persons, have acted up to that supposition. The report which presents the results of their operations is now submitted to the House, and the proposition immediately before us is the printing of this report, and the postponement of its consideration for two weeks.

This proposition, sir, is resisted. Amongst others, I resist it. I admit, at the same time, that the course proposed is the customary course, not to be deviated from without strong reason. Such reason, however, does, in my opinion, exist. If it cannot be shown to exist, I am quite willing that the customary course shall be adhered to, and the proposition prevail. On what grounds, then, sir, is the proposition resisted?

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] maintains that the action of the committee is wholly irregular and unauthorized; that they had no power to extend their investigations as they have done, or to report what they have reported. Such, too, is my opinion. Should this view be just, it is plain that the report should not be printed, or, in any form, receive the sanction or countenance of the House; for if it be printed, it must be for the purpose of ulterior use. If it cannot, from its obvious irregularity and defects, be used in any event, to print it would be nugatory. It would be worse: it would operate as an implied sanction by the House of the irregularity and defects to which I have referred. To prove, therefore, that the whole proceeding of the committee was irregular and destitute of authority from the House, is to prove that the report ought not to be printed. This I propose to prove.

A committee of the House of Representatives have preferred formal accusations against three members of this House for high delinquencies, and have accompanied these accusations with elaborate arguments and a display of proofs, closing with resolutions for the expulsion of one and the censure of others. Had the committee the right or power to prefer such accusations, is the true inquiry. It is nakedly a question of power in the committee.

It is no inconsiderable matter, sir, with a citizen, especially one occupying the station of a representative of the people, to have an accusation framed against him, and promulgated amongst his countrymen. By a bare accusation, his reputation, which is a portion, and the best portion, of all that belongs to him, is not only exposed to injury, but oftentimes to absolute destruction. It connects him in the minds of men with an offence. A few may be philosophical or just enough to suspend their judgments, and remain unaffected even in their feelings, until evidence and defence shall have been heard. But, sir, none regard the accused in a more favorable light because accused. Men's minds are so organized that they turn away, not only from what is disagreeable, but from the idea with which it is associated. This, however, is but the private view of the mischiefs of an accusation. I rest it on higher reasons of a public nature.

The accusing power in a State, sir, is a great power. It is liable, by abuse, to administer to the worst tyranny In most free countries, England and the United States especially, the greatest circumspection has, for that reason, been observed in depositing this formidable power. It may be affirmed of both these enlightened nations, that the limitations and restraints which they have imposed on this power in the institution of the grand jury, class justly among the firmest and strongest pillars of civil liberty. I will not trace the history of this institution, nor expose, at length, the deep policy on which, in my opinion, it reposes, nor review the mass of blessing it has conferred, and of misery and oppression it has averted, in its progress. This must be fresh in the memory of all who have studied the rise of modern freedom, and the instruments by which it has advanced and maintained itself.

It is true, sir, that a private individual may impute, charge an offence. Proceedings may be adopted against the supposed offender, in the form of warrant and arrest. But this does not constitute in strictness an accusation, which can be made only through a regular tribunal—the grand jury—the sanction of which is interposed as a condition to the accusation. The protection which is thus afforded to liberty, results necessarily from the composition of that body, without adverting to other causes.

I trust, however, that, in the United States, an argument is not required, at this advanced period of its institutions, to establish the proposition that the accusing power is of vast magnitude, that it should be jealously circumscribed and most vigilantly guarded; that the institution of the grand jury is the only instrument known, which presents adequate guarantees against the abuse of the power to the ends of tyranny and oppression; and that not only that institution itself, where it operates, but all its analogies where it does not operate, should be anxiously cherished as portions of the armor of freedom.

So far, sir, as the House of Representatives of the United States assumes the power of proceeding, criminally, by its separate action, against its own members, it is manifest that it cannot employ a grand jury as the organ of accusation, no matter how faint or deep the delinquency. There is plainly no adaptation. If the accusing power, therefore, is, in such cases, limited at all, it must be by other means. Do such means exist? Is there no safeguard against irresponsible and oppressive accusation, analogous to that afforded by the grand jury? Are the representatives of the people exposed, to the extent of the criminal jurisdiction of the House, to all the mischiefs which the Constitutions of the United States and of every State in the Union have sought so sedulously to avert from the private citizen by the employment of the grand jury? I maintain that an analogous safeguard has been provided by the House, which, if fairly exerted, is ample.

It consists, sir, in the law of Parliament and of this House, that no member shall be proceeded against, in such cases, for an alleged offence, without a direct charge against him, by name, before the House, in writing, under the sanction and authority of the House expressly given; and this, too, usually in a form authorizing the member to be heard in exculpation in advance of any action of the House tending to an accusation. This is deducible, clearly, from the established usage of Parliament, fortified by a series of precedents in the House and in the Senate, and from the rules of the House.

The effect of this provision for the protection of members is, by requiring the imputation to be directly announced to the House itself, in the first instance, to enable the House to consider the imputation, and determine for itself whether it will authorize an accusation to be instituted; in other words, to bring the House to a preliminary trial, in which the member is entitled to be heard, not in his defence, for no accusation exists, but to show, if he can, that he ought not to be accused.

The point, sir, from which, in the absence of the security which I have stated, pernicious accusations might be most effectively aimed at members, is through committees. Being part of the organization of the House, the subjects embraced by their sphere of duty are co-extensive with the powers of the House, and nearly with the transactions of life. It would be against uniform experience that committees, if armed with an accusing power, should not, in so wide a range, seize some occasion to connect the names of members become offensive by their opposition, or formidable by their talents, with some delinquency, or abuse, or crime, and present them to their countrymen in the light of accused culprits, with a view to the destruction of their influence. Such is the tendency of party every where. The principles on which committees of this House are composed are notorious; they relate, sir, as you know, chiefly, if not altogether, to the distribution of party honors, or the advancement of party ends. As, therefore, the greatest danger was to be apprehended from committees, so against them protection has been most cautiously extended by the laws of the House.

Accordingly, sir, it is expressly provided in Jefferson's compilation of Parliamentary law, (adopted by our rules as the law of the House) that

"When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon, the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him."

Sir, can any thing be more explicit, directly applicable, or decisive than this? Here the committee was "charged with an inquiry," and "a member proved to be involved." This no one contests. What then was the duty, the simple duty, of the committee in that contingency? To "make a special report," unquestionably. But they did not make such a report. "They cannot proceed against" a member. Did they pause, much less stop short? No, sir; but did proceed against him to the extreme point of resolutions of expulsion! The member was entitled to be "heard in his place at the bar." He was not heard. "A special authority" was to have been given to the committee to inquire concerning him." Yet it was not given; never applied for! Is this, sir, in conformity to the law stated? No man of understanding, I think, can suppose so. It is the exact opposite of the law in every essential particular; and that, I had imagined until now, involved a violation of law.

Sir, this law has not been answered; and it cannot be answered.

I shall not undertake to account for this extraordinary deportment of the committee. That they have transcended their powers, in a form disreputable to the House, and flagrantly injurious and unjust to individuals, is plain. The explanation most compatible with their honor, in my opinion, is ignorance of the extent of their powers and duties, and of the rights of the House and its members. To suppose them advised of the foregoing law limiting those powers and duties, and defining those rights, is to pronounce that they have wilfully trampled it under foot, for purposes which neither the House nor the public will be at a loss to discover. Inadvertence on the one hand, and deliberate outrage on the other, lie before them. I leave them to their choice.

It is apparent, however, I think, sir, that no matter by what influences, sinister or upright, the committee were impelled, they had no knowledge of the law which has been referred to. Indeed, one of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GRANTLAND,] has admitted, very cordially, that he was not informed of the existence of such a law; that he had no suspicion that the circumstance of a member being involved could operate an abridgement of the powers of the committee; that they proceeded, from the beginning, on the supposition that those powers were plenary; and complains that those who now urge this law did not state it before the committee proceeded to act. What that gentleman thus admits, with respect to himself, was doubtless true of his associates of the majority who I regret, have not displayed equal candor; it might have spared the House much debate. That the law in question was not pressed at the time, is readily explained by reflecting that no one had a right to assume, in advance, that the committee would violate it

The committee, notwithstanding, still persist in urging their report upon the House, by laboring to reconcile their action with the law now that it is known; not that they acted in reference to the law, but conformed to it by accidental coincidence! By what arguments, sir, is this newly conceived pretence sought to be maintained?

It is contended that the committee were "specially authorized" by the House to proceed against the members whom they have accused, by the resolutions of 28th of February, by which the committee were raised. Look, sir, at these resolutions. What are they?

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of seven members, be appointed to investigate the causes which lead to the death of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, late a member of this House, and the circumstances connected therewith; and, further, to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of this House.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the means more effectually to suppress the practice of duelling, and report a bill for that purpose at as early a period as may practicable.

Where, sir, in these resolutions, is found a special authority to proceed against members, or a special authority of any kind? They warrant, I admit, an inquiry into a supposed breach of the privileges of the House; but, in a form no more special than in cases of inquiry into any other subject. In all, the subject of inquiry is stated, as in this; but stated generally, as in this. Here, no individual is named, no offence charged, either in respect to members or others. Members may have been involved; they may not. This, like any other subject of investigation, may have embraced the transactions of members; it may not. Either supposition is perfectly consistent with the terms of the resolutions. Had the inquiry been into supposed abuses in the Indian affairs or the public lands, instead of breach of privilege, the authority to the committee would have been precisely the same. The subject of investigation would have been specific; all else general. Yet, who would risk his character for intelligence, by maintaining in his place that, under a general inquiry of the kind, the delinquencies, real or fabricated, of members of this House, could, without further authority, be investigated, and those members proceeded against, accused, and presented to the nation, by the report of a committee, as culprits unworthy of honorable association, and meriting instant expulsion from their seats? In such a case it is manifest that the House must be immediately notified of the implication of members, by a special report, that the House itself might take action, either in arresting the investigation, or specially authorizing the committee to proceed. Well, sir, what distinguishes such an inquiry from the present? In both, the subject of inquiry is stated—abuses in the one, breach of privilege in the other; but nothing special in either. Neither supposes the implication of members. Both are essentially general.

It is gravely argued, however, by gentlemen, that no matter what the resolutions may express, the House well knew the facts of the transaction to which the inquiry related, and, of course, that members were involved; that they were notorious! If such an argument merited a serious refutation, it would, I think, be sufficient to ask why, if all was known and notorious, institute an inquiry at all? Why not proceed at once upon this knowledge? If the House be justified in assuming the facts for one purpose, it certainly may be for all. Why not instantly expel?

I concede, sir, that the public rumor and notoriety of facts are quite sufficient for many purposes. In the language of the parliamentary law, "common fame is a good ground for the House to proceed by inquiry, and even to accusation." The House, acting on the common fame of the event, might, undoubtedly, have directly instituted proceedings against such members as that common fame may have indicated as criminally connected with it. The mover of these resolutions, acting upon the same authority, would as clearly have been warranted in exhibiting appropriate charges against the members by name, and demanding a committee, with special authority, to proceed against them. But, sir, the question is, not what the House upon such authority might have done, but what it in point of fact has done. It can, with no reason, be pretended that the resolutions as they stand on the journal admit of the slightest abridgment or enlargement by reference to fame, rumor, or any thing else extraneous. I repeat, sir, the House is now required to ascertain, not what its powers in given cases would be, but what its action in this case has been. Our successors, in reviewing this proceeding, will do so through the records of the House. They will look to nothing else. Fame, rumor, common understanding are fugitive, perishable; the resolutions, the records are permanent and perpetual, and, like other records, impart absolute verity. They only will speak; and they must speak for themselves.

Driven, sir, as I think all candid men must acknowledge, from the positions that accusatory power was specially conferred on the committee by the language of the resolutions, and that the effect of the resolutions admitted of extension by reference to matter not contained in them, the committee now seek to derive the power from a different source altogether The reference of certain petitions and memorials is relied on as operating an enlargement of their original powers under the resolutions. That no such effect was produced or intended by such reference, I leave the House to the very able and extended arguments of others, especially of those by whom most of the petitions were presented. If any thing, however, were wanting to prove that the committee acted independently of the petitions, and without the smallest reference to them, so far as their powers are concerned, it will be found, in the most convincing form, in their own journal; from which it appears that the mass of the evidence, indeed all that is essential to their accusation, was taken, and the whole course of the committee distinctly indicated, before the first petition was referred. They had sat more than two weeks before any reference of the kind was made; and then it produced no deviation from the direction which was given to the inquiry in the first instance.

But, sir, frustrated in their efforts to deduce the power of the committee from any positive delegation by the House, it is claimed as derived by surrender of the parties accused, who it is insisted, voluntarily appeared before the committee and offered testimony in defence, and thereby waived rights which they might otherwise possess. The answer to this pretension is, that it does not appear by the journal or otherwise that the members involved received, at any time, the slightest intimation that an accusation against them was meditated by the committee. But if they had been notified of the fact in the most formal manner, and had, in a manner equally formal, signified their consent to the assumption by the committee of the power to accuse by a distinct waiver of their privileges, whatever they might be, still the question of power on the part of the committee would remain unaffected; for by the law of the House "the privilege of a member is the privilege of the House. If the member waive it without leave, it is a ground for punishing him, but cannot, in effect, waive the privilege of the House." This law, sir, requires neither enforcement nor comment.

The last resort, sir, is, that no matter how irregular or unjustifiable the proceedings of the committee may be, the public voice demands their ratification by the House. That voice I trust always most profoundly to respect. I acknowledge, sir, that a deep sensation amongst the people of the United States has been produced by the transaction to which these proceedings relate. So far from deploring, I take the highest satisfaction in beholding it. It is the spontaneous tribute of the nation to the cause of law, morality, and religion. It affords occasion for patriotic exultation. I do exult. But, sir, the feeling of which I speak is not what some gentlemen suppose it to be. It is no partial or party feeling. It looks not to this particular case, or to particular persons. It looks to the practice, to the future, to the enactment of laws, and the correction of public sentiment. It rests its condemnation, so far as condemnation is passed, alike upon the survivor and the deceased. It regards the wrong, or misfortune, or crime, or whatsoever you denominate it, as one of mutual agreement, to settle by violence and blood a private misunderstanding. One fell; it was no fault or merit of his that the survivor did not. Whose delinquency was greatest? The fatal resort was the fruit, certainly, of the coercion of a vitiated public opinion; and individual guilt depends upon the intensity of the coercion. Which party could most easily have resisted that coercion? Amongst whose constituents did public opinion demand such a resort. Amongst whose did it forbid? Who most defied the laws, the religion, the ancient and established usages, and opinions, and prejudices of those who surrounded him, and to whom he was responsible? The survivor or the fallen? Sir, these considerations enter, unless I greatly misconceive, into that public feeling of which the House has heard so much in this debate. Whilst you sit in judgment upon the living, and condemn him, that same public opinion will visit a like measure of condemnation on the memory of the dead.

Yet, sir, this deep, this just feeling of the people has, in my opinion, been disappointed, bitterly, by the action of this committee. Weeping over an event which could not be recalled, the nation hoped, as it had a right to hope, that the committee would act in a spirit and adopt measures calculated, by rectifying public opinion, to bless the country in the suppression of a practice replete with wo. But the painful spectacle has been exhibited of a transformation of a committee occupying the position of ministers of peace, into a lawless gang, trampling down, in the furious pursuit of a victim, all the restraints and forms that opposed their career of ferocity! Forgetting almost, in their eagerness, even to allude to the practice, and in their report doing nothing, recommending nothing for its suppression!

It is equally an error, sir, in my opinion, to imagine that men of intelligence in the United States regard this transaction as involving, on either side, the guilt of deliberate crime. In the eye of law, and perhaps of reason, it may involve all the practical mischiefs of crime. But, in general, such events proceed from no felon source, but from a deep-seated vice of society and manners, if not from an infirmity of nature itself. I but speak the voice of history and experience when I insist that any other judgment respecting the practice of duelling is superficial and little to be trusted. It cannot be forgotten that it has been, to a degree almost peculiar, the fate of the great and virtuous of mankind to bow to the demands of this practice. Lafayette, Pitt, Fox, Castlereagh, and multitudes like them, rank as illustrious but deplorable examples, not, sir, of the wickedness, but of the infirmity in which this pernicious practice is rooted. In our own country, too, and in our own times, the same tribute has been paid to the same infirmity by names not illustrious enough, I grant, to transform a vice into virtue, but certainly to dignify it above crime in its common acceptation.

Besides, sir, when a community of freemen like that of the United States demand of this House, by petition or otherwise, the punishment of delinquency, real or supposed, they intend and expect it to be administered under the forms of law. They cannot be supposed to desire the law and all the analogies of the Constitution to be violated, in order to reach an alleged violation of law. To torture their petitions, or expressions of opinion in other forms, into a demand for the ratification of proceedings admitted to be irregular and unauthorized, is, therefore, both to mistake and insult them.

From the public voice, then, sir, no aid can be derived.

Mr. Speaker, all the difficulties with which the House now finds itself surrounded plainly proceed from an effort to impart a special character to a proceeding essentially general. If these resolutions were meant for a special effect, why were they not expressed in special terms? The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD] who introduced them, could have prevented all difficulty by proceeding directly, by name, against the members supposed to be implicated. Why did he not thus proceed? Such had been the unbroken practice in such cases from the first exercise of such a power by the House. Why, I demand of that gentleman to know, was it departed from in this instance? His colleague had fallen, within his knowledge, under circumstances involving, as the gentleman then believed and now contends, a violation, by members of the House, of its highest privileges, so flagrant as to merit expulsion, and to demand of him to adopt measures to that end. All this he claims to have known. Now, sir, why did not the gentleman specify the offence? the perpetrators? the intended punishment? Was he restrained by his modesty? his delicacy towards the delinquents? or an infirmity of nerve? The country demands an answer.

No, sir; if reasons are to be sought to explain the extraordinary form of these resolutions, they are to be found in the extraordinary attitude of the party to which the gentleman belongs, with respect to this subject. That party has long since, in the most solemn manner, denied the power of the House of Representatives to punish, by its separate action, as a breach of privilege, any offence not committed in the immediate view of the House, or involving a direct disturbance or obstructions of its proceedings.

I proceed, sir, to bring the attention of the House and of the nation to the two most recent expositions of the principles of that party in respect to this power of the House. They are to be found in the celebrated proceedings of the House of Representatives against Samuel Houston, now President of the Republic of Texas; and in those disposing of the application of the Hon. E. Cooke, a Representative from the State of Ohio, demanding the exertion of the same power. These expositions are peculiarly authoritative, or ought to be, with the party. They are displays of its principles when in their extreme proportion. They are productions of 1832, when the elements were boiling and bubbling in a caldron more terrific than that of Macbeth's witches, combining and condensing the dreadful mischiefs which have recently overwhelmed the country. They occurred before the first inroad was made on its ascendancy. It was the rank growth, then green and waving; now become the stubble through which the devouring flames of popular condemnation have of late, like horizontal lightning, so fiercely swept. They are precedents, sir, perfect in their kind.

On the 14th of April, 1832, the SPEAKER laid before the House of Representatives the following communication;

"To the Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON,

"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"SIR: I was waylaid in the street, near my boarding house, last night, about eight o'clock, and attacked, knocked down by a bludgeon, and severely bruised and wounded, by Samuel Houston, late of Tennessee, for words spoken in my place in the House of Representatives; by reason of which I am confined to my bed, and unable to discharge my duties in the House, and attend to the interests of my constituents. I communicate this information to you, and request that you will lay it before the House.

Very respectfully, yours,

"WILLIAM STANBERY,

"Member of the House of Reps. from Ohio.

"April 14, 1832."

A resolution was thereupon offered by Mr. Vance, of Ohio, the colleague of the gentleman, proposing that the House should proceed against Houston for this supposed breach of privilege.

On the 14th of May, sir, of the same year, the Hon. E. Cooke, of Ohio, rose in his place, and said "that he held in his hand a letter from a Dr. Davis, of South Carolina, one of the witnesses who had testified in the late trial of Samuel Houston, which had been presented to him by a person stating his name to be Alexander Dimitry, of Louisiana, as the friend of said Davis, which, together with the statement of the facts connected with it, he asked leave to send to the Chair, that it might be read for the information of the House. In submitting this request, Mr. Cooke said he wished it to be distinctly understood that, without in the least waiving his personal rights as a member, or intending, in any manner, to compromit either the rights or constitutional powers of the House, it was, nevertheless, not his purpose, individually, to claim the institution of any proceeding whatever on his own account upon the subject-matter of that communication. Such had not been his motives in presenting the letter; his personal rights formed no part of the object by which he was governed. Other and higher motives prompted him to this step—motives, which, overlooking every consideration of personal feeling and personal security, regard the very existence of this House, the inviolable rights of the people of this country, and the dignity and honor of this nation." The letter was as follows:

"BROWN'S HOTEL, May 12, 1832.

"SIR: During my examination before the House of Representatives, in the case of General Houston, you very impertinently asked, among other questions, my business in this city. Whilst the trial of General Houston was pending, I deferred calling on you for the explanation which I now demand, through my friend, General Dimitry.

"I am, very respectfully, your most obedient,

"E. S. DAVIS.

"Hon. E. COOKE."

Accompanying the foregoing letter, Mr. Cooke submitted the following statement:

"On the trial of Samuel Houston for an assault on a member of this House, which has just terminated, a person by the name of E. S. Davis was examined as a witness on behalf of the accused, and, on his cross-examination, I propounded to him several interrogatories. After he had left the stand, and while on the floor of the House, he said, apparently referring to myself, and in a tone of menace, that 'there will be another hauled up here' soon.

"On Saturday last the accompanying note was handed me by a person calling himself Alexander Dimitry. To the persons, character, and calling of these individuals, I am an utter stranger.

"Had I considered this a mere personal matter, I should have passed it by without this notice; but all the circumstances of the case do, in my opinion, preclude the idea that it is so. And connected, as this is, with other instances of attempts, by menace and violence, to overawe the members of this body, and curb the freedom of debate, I have thought it my duty, in behalf of the American people, and especially that portion of them whom I represent, to present this matter to the House.

"E. COOKE, Rep. from Ohio.

"MAY 14, 1832."

This communication, sir, was followed, as in the case of Houston, by resolutions offered by Mr. Crane, of Ohio, a colleague of Mr. Cooke, proposing to proceed as for a breach of privilege.

It cannot be necessary, I think, to enforce the strict analogy, in principle, between those cases and the present; it must be manifest. That of Cooke is not only analogous in principle, but nearly identical in circumstances. It is, indeed, a stronger case than this; for the letter of Davis was a simple and direct challenge, borne by his second, given, avowedly, for matter transpiring in the House.

No just distinction, sir, can be established between the proceedings referred to and the present, because in them the House contemplated action against private citizens, not members; for, in all, the contested principle was the right and power of the House to punish, as a breach of its privileges, an offence not committed in its presence. It was accordingly argued throughout as a question of power on the part of the House, without regard to the objects on which it was to be exercised. To show that the committee in the present case repudiate such a distinction, it is but necessary to refer to their report, which expressly holds private citizens connected with the transaction amenable to this power of the House, but not meriting, for peculiar reasons, an exercise of it.

Well, sir, how did the House dispose of the two cases to which I have referred? Without fatiguing the House with a review of all that was said and acted in the progress of these memorable proceedings, I shall content myself with referring you to the speeches and conduct of a distinguished gentleman, then and yet belonging to the party, and now, as then, a member of the House; who is, at this moment, in the fruition of the highest honors that the House can confer, either as a tribute to talents and virtue, or as a compensation for unscrupulous partisan devotion; a gentleman, sir, who, whatever may be the feebleness of his abilities, or the insignificance of his authority in the estimation of others, with you, I know, possesses commanding influence. That gentleman was the champion selected by the party to announce to the nation its principles with respect to this power of the House. He uttered, moreover, by his own declaration, the opinion of the head of the party himself, the then President of the United States. What were those principles? I answer, sir, in the exact language of the distinguished gentleman himself:

"Every gentleman," said he, "must be aware that a great difference of opinion always had existed as to the power of that House to punish as a contempt any act which did not interrupt or impede the business of the House. * * * He did not admit that the House possessed any such power; and he believed that a great majority of that House, upon a deliberate and full examination of the question, would hold the same sentiments with himself. * * * * *

"He would ask whether it was not equally a contempt of the House for a citizen to challenge one of its members to mortal combat? Was that not as much a breach of its privilege as the present case? Should a member of a co-ordinate branch call a member of that House into the field to mortal combat, would not that be as much a contempt also as this? And has not that been done and passed by without notice? Or, if the Head of an Executive Department should do the same thing, would not the breach of privilege be as great? And was not that done a few years ago? Where was the limit to such a power, if you take cognizance of such cases as this? How was it to be defined or restrained? He could not perceive; and he therefore considered it as totally inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions. * * * When this case was first brought to our notice, etc. I expressed to the House the opinion hastily formed, which I at that time entertained, in regard to its powers to try and punish for this offence. Upon full examination of the question, I am confirmed in the opinion that this House is invested with no authority under the Constitution or laws of the land to punish as for a contempt, or violation of its privileges, any offence committed not in the presence of the House during its session, or in such manner as to disturb its proceedings. * * * Let us first examine the arguments of that class of gentlemen who maintain that the power may be found in the Constitution. It is said that by the sixth section of the first article, 'Senators and Representatives shall be privileged from arrest,' etc; 'and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place.' * * * The latter clause of the sentence is equally clear. It intended to provide, simply, that for 'any speech or debate in either House,' the member shall not be held to answer in any other place. That he shall not, for example, be subject to be prosecuted in the courts for libellous words spoken in debate, or be held to answer in an action of slander. Do these exemptions to members of Congress, confer the power on either House to punish?" etc. * * * "What are your privileges? The Constitution is silent in regard to them You have passed no law declaring them. They are unknown and undefined. If they exist, no citizen can know what they are, nor the sanction which attaches to a violation of them. Both their nature and the punishment which you may inflict rest in the sovereign, arbitrary, and despotic discretion of this House. * * * It is unquestionably true that, for words spoken in debate, the member of Congress can at no future period, however remote, be prosecuted for a libel, or sued for slander. And should it be attempted, he may plead his constitutional exemption in bar. But, because this is the case, it cannot, surely be contended that he is protected, more than any other citizens, from personal violence. * * * If the doctrine of privilege in England is the law here, I demand of them to show me how it has become the law binding upon Congress. Has it been adopted, in part or in whole, by the Constitution or laws? That is not pretended. The truth is, they cannot be of any sort of authority in either branch of Congress, either as law, or guides for our proceeding. They have not, and in the nature of things they cannot have, any application in our Congress, and must be wholly rejected." * * *

"The question submitted to the decision of the constituents of every gentleman here is, whether, under a Government where there are no separate orders, the public functionaries are to be elevated above the Constitution and laws, and take into their own hands the despotic and odious power of avenging their own violated dignity, whenever they may, in their unbounded discretion, choose to consider that it has been infringed." * * * * * *

"I undertake to show, sir, that the power which this House now assumes to exercise without law is the identical power which Congress attempted to assume in the enactment of the 'alien and sedition laws;' and that the arguments adduced to sustain it are the same arguments adduced in 1798 to sustain the constitutionality of the 'alien law' and the 'sedition law.'"

"The power is despotic, depending upon your whim, caprice, or arbitrary will, and is, therefore, if possible, a greater invasion of the rights of the citizen, and more despotic and arbitrary than even these obnoxious laws." * * *

"But if it be conceded that, in high party times, in periods of high political excitement, or in cases where the jurisdiction and power of the House were not drawn in question, the House may have exercised the power, the answer to any argument drawn from such premises is an easy one. It is, that one usurpation can never either justify or sanctify another." * *

"To show the absurdity of the exercise of such a power by this House, if it possessed it, without law, I ask the House what punishment it will inflict if the accused be found guilty of a contempt or violation of privilege in this case? * * You have the same power to impose one as another. You have the same power to punish with death or the amputation of a limb, that you have to inflict any other." * * *

"The evidence before us shows that when the member from Ohio first thought himself in danger of an attack from the accused, he did not then bring his complaint to this House, but prepared himself with deadly weapons for mortal combat, and put himself on his personal defence. By so doing, he waived the privilege, if he had any, which it is now insisted has been violated. He was, in fact, armed at the meeting, and his adversary was unarmed. He happened to get the worst of the rencontre, and then the complaint is made to this House, and we are called on to avenge the wrongs which he has suffered. If the member from Ohio had been the victor in the combat; if his pistol had not missed fire; and had he disabled or slain the accused, this House would never have been troubled with the case. But as he happened to be unfortunate in the fight, we are told that our dignity has been insulted, and our high privileges invaded." * * *

"Sir, I know that it is, at all times, an ungracious argument to address to any body of men like this, when you tell them that they possess no power to do that which they are strongly desirous of doing. All history instructs us that whenever the rulers of other countries have strongly desired to possess and exercise a power of any kind, they have never failed to look out for specious pretexts to do so." * * *

"I am sure I shall be borne out by gentlemen on all sides of the House, when I say further that the whole proceeding in this case shows us to be the most unfit triers; and that, in periods of high party excitement, this enormous power may be used, and probably will be, to the great oppression of the citizen. What excitement and warmth of feeling have we witnessed on this trial! How unlike grave judges have we occasionally appeared! * * Here we have been, at the most important period of the session, engaged near a month in trying it. I take upon myself no part of the responsibility of this useless consumption of the time of the House. I voted against the arrest, and have, from the commencement of the trial, viewed the whole proceeding as a usurpation of power," * * *

Who, sir, was this "most righteous judge," this "second Daniel," this Aaron, this 'spokesman of his party," to them "instead of a mouth," in this exposition of the powers of the House and the principles of the Constitution?

[The SPEAKER here interruppted him, as he had repeatedly done before whilst on this branch of the subject.]

In this oracle, sir, you make, I know, a kindred recognition. Yes, sir, in him you but behold yourself! Your own consciousness whispers, what the public voice will thunder, in your ear, "thou art the man!" The review may be painful. Like him who had "done the dead," you may exclaim—

"I'll go no more:
I am afraid to think what I have done;
Look on't again, I dare not."

Still, the deed is done. There stands the record.

Who could have supposed, sir, that, after all this, these principles would, within so short a period, have been abandoned, and those who maintained them be found, as they now are, ostensibly urging the exercise of a power then denounced as illegal, unconstitutional, usurped, despotic, odious! Can it be possible—can such shameless repudiation of opinions and principles be credited as that the exercise of that same power by that same party is really meditated in this case? I do not believe, sir, that it is meditated, or at any time has been. I am, on the contrary, fully justified, by the facts which I have just stated as connected with the recent history of that party, in maintaining that the Administration party in this House have been perfectly sensible, from the commencement of this investigation, that, no matter how deep the criminality of those implicated, they, as a party, would be forced to deny to the House any right or power whatever to punish it. To take any other ground would, in them, be so flagrantly and scandalously repugnant to their former doctrines and action, as to expose them to imputations which the most abandoned prostitution might desire to avoid. I repeat, therefore, that the direct assertion or exercise of such a power, by that party, was at no time intended.

This view, sir, of the position of that party, in regard to the power in question, will at once explain the otherwise incomprehensible form of these resolutions; why they are indefinite and general, and, in that respect, contrary to the established usage and express law of the House. For, sir, if they had been direct and specific, meditating, in terms, an exercise of the power which I have stated, they must have been instantly rejected by the House; certainly rejected, if the sentiments of that party could have prevailed. Many of the party whose names are recorded in support of the doctrines which I have imputed to them, are now members of the House—gentlemen high in station and influence, all favoring these proceedings! This general and indirect form of proceeding was accordingly adopted to escape an assertion of the power; for to have instituted proceedings expressly aiming at punishment would necessarily have presupposed the right and power to inflict it. And all this for what?

With the intention, sir, of seizing the occasion which it was supposed the death of one gentleman in a duel with another who happened to be a political opponent afforded, of diverting public attention for a season from the wretched condition of public affairs, and of effecting this under color of devotion to religion and law! To lend themselves to a proceeding to which they sought, by its generality, to give the appearance of a criminal procedure, without daring, in terms, to give it that shape! With a view to investigations, reports, and accusations, against distinguished members of the Opposition, with a perfect knowledge all along that the proceedings would be arrested, and arrested by that party, the moment the work of accusation was done! To the extent of accusation they could readily go, to attain a party end; to hear, to try, was no part of their purpose; to punish, under their interpretation, was no part of their power.

How far the country will be disposed to countenance this deliberate prostitution of the action and time of the House, for such purposes cannot, I think, be difficult to anticipate.

Any opinion, sir, which I may entertain with respect to the extent of the privileges of the House, or its power to punish violations of them, need not be now expressed, as it is not demanded by the immediate question. That those in opposition should hold, as a party, that the power of the House was fully adequate to any measure of punishment demanded by the even in which these proceedings originated, would be altogether natural and consistent. They had so held on former occasions when political adversaries were implicated; their opinion is unaltered, their conduct is unaltered, though political friends may be implicated. I honor a constancy which contrasts so strikingly.

If any doubts, sir, could have remained respecting the irregularity of this report, and the necessity of its recommitment, they must have been wholly removed by the extraordinary disclosure made, after a week's discussion, by the chairman of the committee. In answer to a question propounded by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] the chairman confessed, to the amazement, doubtless, of all who heard him, that the report had undergone alterations after it had been last seen by those whose act it purports to be! He states, however, that the alterations, he thought, did not materially vary the sense; that they were, for the most part, but critical alterations!

Sir, with respect to that report, "honor was the subject of its story." It impugns, deeply, the honor of gentlemen; an honor before spotless. Its texture is too delicate for such a touch from even the chairman of this committee. The utter impropriety of altering a report, to any extent or for any purpose, in such a case as this, must be manifest to all who duly estimate the value of honor or the delicacy of sitting, as this committee have assumed to do, in judgment upon its laws. This the chairman should have known.

"Who governs freemen should himself be free."

The principle applies with even more truth to him who would pass judgment on honorable men.

It is suggested, sir, that the report was softened by the alterations. That does not at all palliate the outrage. If the merits of this report shall ever become (which they will not) the subject of review here, it will be demonstrable that an alteration by which its violence was mitigated is more prejudicial to the accused than one aggravating it. From audacious, monstrous injustice, innocence has nothing to fear; it defeats, by its enormity, its own purpose. It is dangerous only when it becomes plausible, when, though not the truth, it is made to resemble it. So with this report.

But, sir, if the House were amazed by the annunciation that an alteration of the report had been perpetrated, it must have been astounded by the declaration which accompanied it. The chairman proceeded, on the occasion referred to, with the utmost complacency, to disclose that the report had not been agreed to or even seen by a majority in actual committee, but had been privately exhibited, and privately acquiesced in! Upon this I pass no judgment of my own; I deliver it over to the rebuke and condemnation of a law of this House, too solemn to require enforcement, and too explicit for comment.

"A committee meet when and where they please, if the House has not ordered time and place for them. But they can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent, nothing being the report of the committee but what has been agreed to in committee actually assembled."

You, sir, might have protected the House against an irregularity like this, by announcing, on the instant that the fact was stated by the chairman, as your duty clearly was, that the paper thus presented as a report was, in point of Parliamentary law, no report; that it was an unauthorized private writing, thrust, irresponsibly, upon the House; and that the only regular course was, as a matter of order, at once to reject it. Why was this not done?

Will the applicability of this law, too, be controverted? Or will an exposition of the principles on which it rests be required? Sir, it seems as if law, standing by itself, and upon its own authority, is of no consideration, merely as law, with certain philosophic jurists of this House. The principles, however, of the law in question are neither obscure nor difficult of exposition. The rule results necessarily from the nature of legislative committees, which are organized official bodies, with their peculiar privileges, powers, and duties, as such. To the extent of their functions they are as essentially organized and official as the House of Representatives itself. In every parliamentary view it would be as indispensable to obtain the consent of members of this House, separately and privately, without entering this Hall, to the highest and most responsible acts of legislation, and ascribe to them the validity and effect of acts of the House, as to obtain the consent of a member of a committee, in the private and irresponsible manner stated by the chairman, and insist on it as the act of the committee. The amplest illustrations might be readily drawn from the judicial and other tribunals; but I will not suppose them to be required in a matter so palpable.

Yet, sir, this interposition of the laws of the House between the committee and their purpose is sagely pronounced exception to form, technical, evasive of substantial justice! Sir, when you hear those whose province it is to ascertain and administer the law as it is, pronounce its provisions to be formal, or technical, or evasive, and on that account to be disregarded, especially in a criminal procedure, you have the authority of history for pronouncing them either unlearned in the doctrines or faithless to the principles of freedom. This expression, I admit, is strong; but, sir, it is just.

What is a free Constitution, what are laws, but the forms, the technicality, the evasion, interposed between the weak and the powerful, between the tyrant and his purpose? Sir, in the vocabulary of freedom, there is no justice, no right, no wrong, except as known to the Constitution and laws, just as they are. God forbid that there should be! The American Representative who, for the miserable party ends at which these proceedings aim, is unfortunate enough to entertain, much less publicly to utter, sentiments which this debate has elicited, is an object of real pity; he has mine. These sentiments originate in a region far, far below a just conception of the dignity of constitutional liberty; and there only, if any where, they are doomed to flourish; they perish by elevation.

These proceedings, sir, are intrinsically important; they are infinitely more important as a precedent. The attempt to signalize this case will, from that cause alone, attract the observation and the keenest scrutiny of our successors here and of posterity into the present action of the House. For one, I prepare to encounter that scrutiny, and to defy it; by firmly maintaining the just privileges and powers of the House, on the one hand, and maintaining with like firmness the laws of the House and of the land, and the principles and analogies of the Constitution, on the other; by recognising the sentiment, that every public functionary and tribunal—the House of Representatives pre-eminently—should, by their example, inculcate a spirit of respect for the laws—in substance, and form, and throughout—as the only means, in a free country, of averting its precipitation into faction, violence, and disorganization.

The question, sir, is no longer, "What the law is;" for that is manifest. The question now is, "Shall it be respected?" Sir, decide.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

SPEECH OF MR. PRESTON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, April 24, 1838—On the resolution for the annexation of Texas.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. PRESTON, being the order of the day:

Whereas, the just and true boundary of the United States, under the treaty of Louisiana, extended on the southwest to the Rio Grande del Norte, which river continued to be the true boundary line until the territory west of the Sabine was surrendered to Spain by the treaty of 1819: And whereas, such surrender of a portion of the territory of the United States is of evil precedent, and questionable constitutionality: And whereas, many weighty considerations of policy make it expedient to re-establish the said true boundary, and to annex to the United States the territory occupied by the State of Texas, with the consent of the said State:

Be it therefore resolved, That, with the consent of the said State previously had, and whenever it can be effected consistently with the public faith and treaty stipulations of the United States, it is desirable and expedient to reannex the said territory to the United States.

Mr. PRESTON rose and said: It is now just two years since the memorable battle of San Jacinto established the independence of Texas. Some time previous to that glorious consummation, the Republic had announced to the world its declaration of independence, and had fully organized a Government of its own. The struggle with the parent country was brief, but decisive: and, since the 21st of April, 1836, no hostile flag has for one moment been unfurled in Texas. Profound peace has brooded over her fertile lands, making them pregnant; while all the benign influences of order and enlightened liberty have been experienced as intensely as in our own country, or in any other on the face of the earth. Internal tranquility, supremacy of the law, regularity and efficiency of action in all the functions of Government, have realized whatever was predicted, or hoped, or wished, when we hailed the birth of this young Republic, and urged her prompt recognition as a member of the family of nations. While it unfortunately happens that Mexico continues to be agitated by intestine commotions, and embarrassed by the most pressing difficulties in her foreign relations, her late dependency, the valor and wisdom of whose citizens have made independent, has exhibited a most striking contrast. On one side, bloodshed and revolution, a wild and fluctuating state of politics, an ever charging Government, and a continual succession of conflicting purposes, show the presence of a disorganizing spirit; while, on the other, a growing commerce and an extended agriculture bespeak the settled state of the public mind, reposing under the action of a fully organized and established Government, every department of which is working with gravity and steadiness. Canvassing and elections go on with warmth, and without violence. The President is inaugurated, and Congress assembles, with as little commotion as we have within these walls. Administration and Opposition parties differ, debate, and denounce, with as much zeal and as little danger as here; while the judge as peacefully rides his circuit, and the sheriff as promptly executes his judgments; and the constable's staff is as omnipotent as in any other land which reposes under, and is blessed by, the common law. Such is the spectacle which this young State presents to the view of gratified philanthropy. Thus has she fulfilled the predictions which attended her birth.

The proposition which I now submit in regard to this prosperous and self-dependent State would be indecorous and presumptuous, had not the lead been given by Texas herself. It appears by the correspondence of the Envoy Extraordinary of that Republic with our own Government, that the question of annexation on certain terms and conditions has been submitted to the people of the Republic, and decided in the affirmative by a very large majority; whereupon, and in pursuance of instructions from his Government, he proposes to open a negotiation for the accomplishment of that object. The correspondence has been communicated upon a call from the House of Representatives, and thus the proposition becomes a fit subject for the deliberation of Congress.

Nor is it proposed by my resolution, Mr. President, to do any thing which could be justly construed into cause of offence by Mexico. The terms of the resolution guard our relations with that Republic; and the spirit in which it is conceived is entirely averse to any compromise of our national faith and honor, for any object, of whatever magnitude. More especially would I have our intercourse with Mexico characterized by fair dealing and moderation, on account of her unfortunate condition, resulting from a long-continued series of intestine dissensions, which all who have not been born to liberty must inevitably encounter in seeking for it. As long, therefore, as the pretensions of Mexico are attempted to be asserted by actual force, or as long as there is any reasonable prospect that she has the power and the will to resubjugate Texas, I do not propose to interfere. My own deliberate conviction, to be sure, is, that that period has already passed; and I beg leave to say that, in my judgment, there is more danger of an invasion and conquest of Mexico by Texas, than that this last will ever be reannexed to Mexico. The entertaining of this opinion, perhaps, constitutes the only difference between mine and the views of the Executive, as declared in the correspondence with the Texan Minister, Gen. Hunt. The negotiation is declined by the Secretary of State, because it would involve our relations with Mexico. Now, sir, I do not conceive that Mexico, in the obvious hopelessness of operations against Texas, should so consider it. I admit, however, that the Executive has the most legitimate jurisdiction of this question, and is doubtless in possession of more extensive and exact information upon it than we can have. It is, therefore, avoided in the resolutions, which import a declaration of opinion in favor of the annexation of Texas, only when it can be effected without a disturbance of our relations with Mexico. I do not understand—I should be very unwilling to believe—that the Administration has taken decisive grounds against my proposition, in every contingency. Indeed, I believe I can show that I am warranted in entertaining the opinion that the opposite is most probably the truth. It was obviously proper for the Secretary of State to avoid, in his correspondence with a foreign minister, any indication of the policy of the Government in the contingency contemplated by my resolution; but what that opinion would be, if it were proper to avow it, may be inferred from the fact that the President himself has heretofore, as Secretary of State, while carrying into effect the policy of his predecessor, to whose great measures he is devoted and pledged, exerted all his ability to accomplish this object; that Mr. Poinsett, the Secretary of War, has been sedulously engaged in the same enterprise, under the auspices of two Administrations; and, that Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of State, is a Georgian by birth and allegiance, and will not, therefore, be suspected of entertaining different opinions. It is not to be supposed that the remainder of the cabinet could exert sufficient influence to overcome the sentiments of these three gentlemen, or would, for a moment, entertain a purpose of reversing the favorite policy of General Jackson.

I disavow, Mr. President, all hostile purposes, or even ill temper, towards Mexico; and I trust that I impugn neither the policy nor principles of the Administration. I therefore feel myself at liberty to proceed to the discussion of the points made in the resolution, entirely disembarrassed of any preliminary obstacle, unless, indeed, the mode by which so important an act is to be effected may be considered as interposing a difficulty If the object itself be within the competency of this Government, as I shall hereafter endeavor to show, and both parties consent, every means mutually agreed upon would establish a joint obligation. The acquisition of new territory has heretofore been effected by treaty, and this mode of proceeding in regard to Texas has been proposed by her Minister; but I believe it would comport more with the importance of the measure, that both branches of the Government should concur, the Legislature expressing a previous opinion; and, this being done, all difficulties, of all kinds whatsoever, real or imaginary, might be avoided by a treaty tripartite between Mexico, Texas, and the United States, in which the assent and confirmation of Mexico (for a pecuniary consideration if you choose) might be had, without infringing the acknowledged independence and free agency of Texas.

I will now proceed to show that the territory actually occupied by the Republic of Texas was at one time a part of the United States.

In 1762, France ceded Louisiana to Spain. In 1800, by the treaty of Ildefonso, Spain re-ceded it to France.—(See the words of the treaty.)

In 1804, France, by the treaty of Louisiana, ceded it to the United States. The United States thus obtained title to whatever was conveyed to Spain by the treaty of 1762, the effect of the intermediate conveyance being precisely the same as if the conveyance by the treaty of 1762 had been made directly to us instead of to Spain. The extent of the French claim, therefore, determines ours. The title of France to the Mississippi, and to the territory drained by its western tributaries, has never been disputed. It rested upon the discovery made by La Salle in 1683, who penetrated from Canada by land, descended the Mississippi, and established a few posts on its banks. A short time afterwards, La Salle, endeavoring to enter the mouth of the Mississippi from the Gulf, passed it unperceived, and, sailing westward, discovered the bay of St. Bernard, now called Matagorda, where, penetrating a short distance into the interior, he established a military post on the bank of the Guadaloupe, (whose ruins exist to this day,) and took possession of the country in the name of his sovereign. The discovery and the possession were precisely such as gave title to the Mississippi, made by the same enterprising individual, about the same time; and the occupation for France was attended by all the circumstances and incidents which characterized that of St. Louis or the Island of Orleans. It was this perfect similarity of the muniments of title which authorized Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney, in 1805, to hold this emphatic language to the Spanish Commissioner: "The facts and principles which justify this conclusion are so satisfactory to their Government as to convince it that the United States have not a better right to the Island of New Orleans, under the cession referred to, than they have to the whole district of territory west to the Rio del Norte."

The extent of territory which should enure to the French Crown, by virtue of this discovery and occupation, was determined on the east by the discoveries of La Salle on the Mississippi, with which those on the St. Bernard's were of course connected. On the west the extent was determined by the application of a principle recognised by the European Powers making settlements in America, viz: that the dividing line should be established at a medium distance between their various settlements. At the period of La Salle's settlement, the nearest Spanish possession was a small post called Panuco, at the point where a river of that name falls into the bay of Tampico. The medium line between Panuco and the Guadaloupe, on which was La Salle's fort, was the Rio Grande del Norte, which river was, therefore, assumed as the true boundary between France and Spain. France never failed to assert her claim to that boundary from 1685, the period of La Salle's discovery, up to 1762, when, by the cession of Louisiana to Spain, the countries were united and the boundaries obliterated.

It is thus that Mr. Adams, in his conclusive letter to Don Onis, of March, 1818, recapitulates the testimony in favor of the French title.

On the part of the United States:

1. The discovery of Mississippi, from near its source to the ocean, by the French from Canada, in 1683.

2. The possession taken, and establishment made, by La Salle, at the bay of St. Bernard, west of the rivers Trinity and Colorado, by authority from Louis XIV, in 1685.

3. The charter of Louis XIV to Crozat, in 1712.

4. The historical authority of Du Pratz and Champigny and of the Count de Vergennes.

5. The geographical authority of De Lisle's map, and especially that of the map of Don Thomas Lopez, geographer to the King of Spain, published in 1762. These documents were all referred to in the letter from Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos, of 20th April, 1805. Since which time, and in further confirmation of the same claims, the Government of the United States are enabled to refer you to the following:

6. A map published by Homann, at Nuremberg, in 1712.

7. A geographical work published in 1717, at London, entitled "Atlas Geographicus, or a Complete System of Geography, Ancient and Modern;" in which the map of Louisiana marks its extent from the Rio Bravo to the Perdido. In both these maps the fort built by La Salle is laid down on the spot now called Matagorda.

8. An official British map, published in 1755, by Bowen, intended to point out the boundaries of the British, Spanish, and French colonies in North America.

9. The narratives published at Paris, of Hennepin, in 1683; of Tonti, in 1697; and of Joutel, in 1713.

10. A letter from Colonel La Harpe to Don Martin d'Alarconne, of 8th July, 1719. (A, Nos. 1 and 2.)

This work and the map of Lopez having been published after the cession of Louisiana to Spain, in 1762, afford decisive evidence of what Spain herself considered as the western boundary of Louisiana, when she had no interest in contesting it against another State. (D No. 4.)

Mr. Adams was not content to rest our title upon this imposing array of positive testimony, but examined and dissipated all the objections to it taken by the Spanish minister, and, by a masterly refutation of the Spanish pretensions, satisfied (as it has been since understood) the Spanish negotiator himself so thoroughly that he would have been willing to have characterized the result of the negotiation as a "treaty for the exchange of territories," &c. between Spain and America.

This Senate, Mr. President, is not a fit place for a minute examination of all the particulars, or the weighing of all the opposing arguments in the progress of this controversy. But I may be permitted to add, to what I have indicated as to the grounds of our claim, the fact that all our statesmen whose attention has been turned to the investigation have, with one consent, expressed the clearest and most unhesitating conviction of the validity of our title, from the first moment at which it was agitated, down to the unfortunate treaty of 1819. Mr. Jefferson, whose turn of mind led him to such investigations, and whose thoughts, as every one knows, were long and deeply engaged upon all matters connected with Louisiana, expressed himself in the most positive manner. Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, in 1805, used the language I have before quoted, in obedience to instructions from Mr. Madison, at that time Secretary of State. Mr. Monroe, when President, held an equally strong language, through Mr. Adams, his Secretary of State. Thus, sir, we have the authority of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Adams, officially and emphatically announced to us. General Jackson is known to have entertained the same opinion. And to these let me add the very high authority of another distinguished name—that of the honorable Senator from Kentucky near me. When the treaty with Spain, in 1819, was concluded, it is well known that some delay occurred on account of the internal dissensions of Spain, in the ratification of it. While it was thus suspended, the Senator from Kentucky, then a member of the other House, taking the view of the treaty which I am now urging—that it was a cession of a portion of the territory of the United States which was incompetent to the treaty-making power—offered the following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them; and that no treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid, without the concurrence of Congress.

"2. Resolved, That the equivalent proposed to be given by Spain to the United States, for that part of Louisiana lying west of the Sabine, was inadequate, and that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign power."

I shall have occasion, by and by, to advert to the assumption for Congress of power to alienate the territory of the United States. My present purpose in quoting these resolutions, is to show that, while the treaty with Spain was yet pending, it was considered as a cession of our territory. The resolutions presuppose the fact, and take it for granted. They proceed upon the ground that a part of Louisiana was ceded; and in advocating these resolutions, their distinguished author holds this emphatic language:

"He presumed the spectacle would not be presented of questioning, in this branch of the Government, our title to Texas, which had been constantly maintained by the Executive for more than fifteen years past, under three successive administrations."

He also said:

"In the Florida treaty, it was not pretended that the object was simply a declaration of where the western limit of Louisiana was; it was, on the contrary, the case of an avowed cession of territory from the United States to Spain. The whole of the correspondence manifested that the respective parties to the negotiation were not engaged so much in an inquiry where the limit of Louisiana was, as where it should be. Hence we find various limits proposed and discussed. * * * Finally, the Sabine is fixed, which neither of the parties ever contended was the ancient limit of Louisiana. * * * And the treaty itself proclaims its purpose to be a cession of the United States to Spain."

Such were the opinions and statements of the Senator in 1820, of which I gladly avail himself. It is unfortunate for the country, for the whole country, that Congress did not concur with him in the declaration that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign power; and I cannot but trust that the wisdom and patriotism which warred against that rash treaty of 1819, will now be exerted to remedy its great and growing evils, on the earliest opportunity, and by the only means left, viz: the reannexation of Texas, whose transfer the honorable genleman eloquently denounced as inexpedient and unconstitutional.

But, Mr. President, I take a higher ground than Mr. CLAY on the occasion alluded to. He rested the constitutional objection upon the incompetency of the treaty-making power to alienate the territory of the United States. I take the ground that it is incompetent to the whole Government; that it does not belong to its granted powers; that its assumption is of the most alarming consequences. The Constitution vests in Congress the power to "dispose of the territory or other property of the United States." The true exposition of this clause is found in the vast and wise land system adopted in pursuance of it at the very institution of the Government. Large cessions of territory had been made by several States to this Government, as property, for certain general purposes; and this clause of the Constitution was inserted to give the necessary power to effect the objects of these grants. The clause has this extent, no more: the power is exhausted when these purposes are accomplished. It was never dreamt that Congress could dispose of the sovereignty of any portion of the territory of the United States; and we may well imagine with what feelings Virginia would have contemplated the proposition to endow this Government with a power to transfer the Northwest Territory to Great Britain or Russia. The clause does not discriminate between the power of this Government to dispose of territory within and without the limits of the States. It is general, and applies to all territory belonging to the United States, wherever it is found—whether it be Point Comfort, in Virginia, or the vacant lands in Arkansas, or those within the Territory of Florida. The power granted within the States and within the Territories is identical: and if one can be transferred to a foreign power, both can. But the protection of the Territories against this wild power of alienation is enforced in every instance by the high guaranties of solemn compacts. Wisconsin is protected by the terms of cession from Virginia; Florida is protected by the terms of session from Spain; and Louisiana was protected by the terms of cession from France. They were all on the same footing, under the guaranty of the same faith—and Wisconsin or Florida may be alienated under the same right.

Will any one at this time of day claim for Congress the power to dispose of either of these Territories to a foreign power? If it be said that, having purchased them, we may sell them, the proposition is equally true of the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri. Can we sell them, or exchange them for Canada? If such a doctrine were countenanced for a moment, would any man south of the Potomac feel himself safe from sale or exchange, while the wild fanaticism of the Abolitionists is hurrying so large a portion of our fellow-citizens upon measures no less extravagant, and infinitely more fraught with all those disasters that make humanity shudder? Will that spirit which demands the exercise of political power for the confiscation of property, and sports itself upon the very brink of servile war—will that spirit pause in its reckless career, at so obvious a measure as the retrocession of southern territory? The treaty, Mr. President, of 1819, was a great oversight on the part of the southern States. We went into it blindly, I must say. The great importance of Florida, to which the public mind was strongly awakened at that time by peculiar circumstances, led us precipitately into a measure by which we threw a gem away that would have bought ten Floridas. Under any circumstances, Florida would have been ours in a short time; but our impatience induced us to purchase it by a territory ten times as large, a hundred times as fertile, and to give five millions of dollars into the bargain. Sir, I resign myself to what is done; I acquiesce in the inexorable past; I propose no wild and chimerical revolution in the established order of things, for the purpose of remedying what I conceive to have been wrong originally. But this I do propose: that we should seize the fair and just occasion now presented to remedy the mistake which was made in 1819; that we should repair as far as we can the evil effect of a breach of the Constitution; that we should re-establish the integrity of our dismembered territory, and get back into our Union, by the just and honorable means providentially offered to us, that fair and fertile province which, in an evil hour, we severed from the Confederacy.

It might be supposed, Mr. President, from the manner in which the public mind has been inflamed against my proposition, that it had not heretofore been heard of; and that I was startling the community with a novel policy. Not so, sir. The farthest in the world from it. For the first time, to be sure, there is a loud and wide-spread clamor against the annexation of Texas; but the project of effecting it has notoriously been entertained and urged by the two last Administrations; and, although not adopted by the present, as an Administration measure, is known to have been favorably entertained by the President, and at least one distinguished member of the Cabinet. It is strange that a measure which has been urged for twelve years past should now, for the first time, be met by a tempest of opposition; and it is very strange that he should be found riding upon and directing the storm, who was the very first man to propose the annexation of Texas, as one of the very earliest measures of his Administration, after he was made President. Yes, Mr. President, Mr. John Quincy Adams had hardly ascended the Presidential chair before he assiduously addressed himself to the task of repairing the injury inflicted upon the country by the treaty of 1819, in the making of which it has been since understood he was the reluctant agent. As Secretary of State, in 1819, he negotiated the treaty of transfer; as President of the United States, in 1824, he instituted a negotiation for the reannexation. Through his Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, (whose name heretofore has been always connected with opposition to the cession, and with advocacy of reannexation of Texas, and whom I should be glad to find standing on the same ground now that he occupied from 1819 to 1829,) the President instructed Mr. Poinsett, then minister to Mexico, to open at once and vigorously urge a negotiation for the reacquisition of Texas, and the re-establishment of the southwest line of the United States at the Rio Grande del Norte. The Secretary urged it upon the envoy, as a matter of the deepest interest to the country, and the highest policy of the Government. The advantages are elaborately and zealously set forth; and although the country at that time labored under a large debt, the envoy was authorized to offer five millions for the acquisition. It is greatly to be lamented that the joint efforts of Mr. Adams, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Poinsett, failed upon this occasion, as the joint efforts of General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren, and Mr. Poinsett, did upon a subsequent occasion, when the proposition was renewed, or rather continued, under a new Administration. From the beginning to the end of his Administration, Mr. Adams kept steadily in view this important measure; and when his successor came in, as it was supposed, with opinions differing on all points, and with promises and pledges of all sorts of changes, amidst the general bouleversement of all that had been done or attempted, this measure alone was held sacred; it was adopted as it stood upon the record, and urged with the characteristic energy of the man who felt, and truly felt, that he was not so much the functionary of a Constitutional Government, as the representative of the Democracy of this country, as Napoleon had been of that of France. Jackson, Van Buren, and Poinsett, took the place of Adams, Clay, and Poinsett, but pushed on the negotiation. How or why it failed, it were useless now to inquire. Whether it was lost sight of amongst the vulgar and paltry controversies of Scotinos and Yorkinos, or postponed by the massacres and plundering of the succado, or suspended by the ceaseless revolutions of that fated country, is now of no consequence. This is certain, that President Jackson never lost sight of it, and that he continued to look to its accomplishment as one of the greatest events of his Administration, to the moment when the title of Mexico was extinguished forever by the battle of San Jacinto.

And the object, sir, was well worthy of the solicitude of a patriot statesman, for the country lost to us by the fatal treaty of 1819 is one of the finest upon the whole earth. Its beautiful prairies expand beneath as genial a climate as ever blessed the milder latitudes of the temperate zone; and, rising with a gentle slope from the Gulf towards the north, present the appearance of a vast lawn, interspersed with streams and woodland. No heavy forests encumber its surface, and present obstacles to its settlement; no barren wastes of sand disfigure it; no marshy swamps mar its atmosphere with unhealthy exhalations. Under a sun which ripens the sugar cane and coffee, the surface is as green as New England; and it is as exempt from disease as any portion of the valley of the Mississippi. It is intersected at short distances by large rivers, which form bays and estuaries along the Gulf coast, eminently fitted for commerce. Under the quickening influences of our policy and our people, this fine tract of country, doomed to be an eternal waste if possessed by the Mexicans or Camanches, will spring into a glorious and vigorous existence. Its fields will teem with the richest productions of the earth; its rivers will bear down to what should always be considered in the policy of this Government as our sea (mare nostrum) an unbounded produce, to enhance the navigation of the Northern States, while an increasing population augments the demand for their manufactures.

But the boundary line established by the treaty of 1819 not only deprives us of this extensive and fertile territory, but winds with "a deep indent" upon the valley of the Mississippi itself, running upon the Red river and the Arkansas. It places a foreign nation in the rear of our Mississippi settlements, and brings it within a stone's throw of that great outlet which discharges the commerce of half the Union. The mouth of the Sabine and the mouth of the Mississippi are of a dangerous vicinity. The great object of the purchase of Louisiana was to remove all possible interference of foreign States in the vast commerce of the outlet of so many States. By the cession of Texas, this policy was, to a certain extent, compromised.

On this subject, Mr. Van Buren, in his instructions to Mr. Poinsett, holds the following language:

"The line proposed as the one most desirable to us would constitute a most natural separation of the resources of the two nations. It is the centre of a country uninhabitable on the Gulf; and on the mountains, so difficult of access, and so poor, as to furnish no inducements for a land intercourse; and, of course, no theatre for those differences that are almost inseparable from a neighborhood of commercial interests. It corresponds with the habitual feelings of the people of Mexico, and with the avowed policy of the Mexican Government, by causing a wide separation and difficulties of intercourse between the inhabitants of the two countries, by preventing those excitements and bickerings invariably produced by the contiguous operation of conflicting laws, habits, and interests. The commercial establishment which would be forthwith made at the Neuces, and in its vicinity, would enable us to preserve, in a great degree, the morals of the inhabitants of both sides, by the prevention of smuggling; and the Mexican Government, by thus respecting the real interests of the United States, without actual prejudice to its own, would afford the strongest evidence of that spirit of friendship by which the United States have always been influenced towards it, and which should ever characterize the conduct of neighboring Republics."

I have thus, Mr. President, shown that the territory of Texas was ours; that the constitutionality of its alienation is at least doubtful, and that its re-annexation is desirable. I have now to advert to the objections raised against it; and fortunately, these are presented in a distinct and imposing form, in the report of a committee of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, now in session. I approach with due deference, sir, whatever comes from the functionaries of that great Commonwealth; (for, although I think her opinions and policy have not been exempt from serious mistakes and errors, still, from the time of her Hancocks and Adamses, she has prosecuted her purposes with a firmness and intelligence certainly not surpassed by any State in the Union.) She has at all times been fertile in great men. She has always had the consideration abroad, and that self-confidence, (a main source of strength,) that result from a glorious past; and these advantages, combined with her superior magnitude and wealth, have constituted her the head and leader of New England. What she says and does is therefore entitled to the greatest consideration, and this is the more especially demanded at my hands by the temperate and courteous manner in which the committee has done me the honor to treat me and the resolution which is now the subject of our deliberations.

The report says:

"The committee do not believe that any power exists in any branch of this Government, or in all of them united, to consent to such a union, (viz. with the sovereign state of Texas,) nor, indeed, does such authority pertain, as an incident of sovereignty, or otherwise, to the Government, however absolute, of any nation."

Both these propositions I controvert; and, first, as to the powers of this Government.

The committee, it appears to me, has been led to erroneous conclusions on this subject by a fundamental mistake as to the nature and character of our Government: a mistake which has pervaded and perverted all its reasoning, and has for a long time been the abundant source of much practical mischief in the action of this Government, and of very dangerous speculation. The mistake lies in considering this, as to its nature and powers, a consolidated Government of one people, instead of a confederated Government of many States. There is no one single act performed by the people of the United States, under the Constitution, as one people. Even in the popular branch of Congress this distinction is maintained. A certain number of delegates is assigned to each State, and the people of each State elect for their own State. When the functionaries of the Government assemble here, they have no source of power but the Constitution, which prescribes, defines, and limits their action, and constitutes them, in their aggregate capacity, a trust or agency, for the performance of certain duties confided to them by various States or communities. This Government is, therefore, a confederacy of sovereign States, associating themselves together for mutual advantages. They originally came together as sovereign States, having no authority and pretending to no power of reciprocal control. North Carolina and Rhode Island stood off for a time, refusing to join the Confederacy, and at length came into it by the exercise of a sovereign discretion. So too of Missouri, who was a State fully organized and perfect, and self-governed, before she was a State of this Union; and, in the very nature of things, this has been the case with all the States heretofore admitted, and must always continue to be so. Where, then, is the difficulty of admitting another State into this Confederacy? The power to admit new States is expressly given. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." By the very terms of the grant, they must be States before they are admitted; when admitted, they become States of the Union. The terms, restrictions, and principles upon which new States are to be received, are matters to be regulated by Congress, under the Constitution.

The power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress is not to create, but to admit, new States. The States create themselves; Missouri and Michigan did so, and exercised all the functions of self-government, while Congress deliberated whether they should be admitted. In the mean time, the territorial organization was abrogated, and the laws of Congress superseded; and if Congress declined to admit them, they, of necessity, remained foreign and independent States.

Heretofore, in the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida, France and Spain both stipulated that the inhabitants of the ceded Territories should be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States. In compliance with this stipulation, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri have been admitted into the Union, and at no distant day Florida will be. Now if we contract with France and Spain for the admission of States, why shall we not with Texas? If France can sell to us her subjects and her territory, why cannot the People of Texas give themselves and their territory to us? Is it more consistent with our republican notions that men and territory can be transferred by the arbitrary will of a monarch, for a price, than that a free people may be associated with us by mutual consent? Can we buy, or, according to the report of the Massachusetts committee, conquer, and yet not enter into an amicable agreement to effect the same object, in pursuance of the ascertained will of all parties concerned? There is some display of learning, in the report, to show that conquest can effect what consent cannot. Not so. War itself is but a mode of argument—ultima ratio; conquest is an enforced consent. It does not terminate in actual physical restraint, permanently applied, but in the assent of the conquered party that submission is preferable to further resistance. A State or a people incorporated with another by such means has come to the conclusion that union is better than the calamities of war. Why cannot the same State come to the conclusion that union is better than other calamities to which it is exposed, or of itself promises benefits greater than those resulting from a separate existence?

It is supposed that there is a sort of political impossibility, resulting from the nature of things, to effect the proposed union? The committee says that "the measure is in fact the union of two independent Governments." Certainly the union of twenty-seven "independent Governments;" but the committee adds, that it should rather be termed the dissolution of both, and the formation of a new one, which, whether founded on the same or another written Constitution, is, as to its identity, different from either. This can only be effected by the summum jus, &c.

A full answer to this objection, even if many others were not at hand, as far as Texas is concerned, is contained in the fact that the summum jus has been exercised.

Her citizens, by a unanimous vote, have decided in favor of annexation; and, according to the admission of the committee, this is sufficiently potent to dissolve their Government, and to surrender themselves to be absorbed by ours. To receive this augmentation of our territory and population, manifestly does not dissolve this Government, or even remodel it. Its identity is not disturbed. There is no appeal necessary to the summum jus populi for such a political arrangement on our part, even if the summum jus populi could be predicated of this Government, which it cannot. Now, it is very obvious that two free States may associate for common purposes, and that these common purposes may be multiplied in number or increased in importance at the discretion of the parties. They may establish a common agency for the transaction of their business; and this may include a portion or all of their political functions. The new creation may be an agency if created by States, or a Government if created by the people: for the people have a right to abolish and create Governments. Does any one doubt whether Texas could rejoin the Republic of Mexico? Why not, then, rejoin this Republic?

No one doubts that the States now composing this Union might have joined Great Britain after the declaration of independence. The learned committee would not contend that there was a political impossibility in the Union of Scotland and England, or of Ireland and Britain; or that, in the nature of things, it would be impossible for Louisiana, if she were a sovereign State out of this Union, to join with the sovereign State of Texas in forming a new Government.

There is no point of view in which the proposition for annexation can be considered, that any serious obstacle in point of form presents itself. If this Government be a confederation of States, then it is proposed to add another State to the Confederacy. If this Government be a consolidation, then it is proposed to add to it additional territory and population. That we can annex, and afterwards admit, the cases of Florida and Louisiana prove. We can, therefore, deal with the people of Texas for the Territory of Texas, and the people can be secured in the rights and privileges of the Constitution, as were the subjects of Spain and France.

So much for the formal difficulties. I now approach those which have exercised a more decisive influence over that portion of the Union which is offering a determined opposition to this measure.

The Massachusetts committee experience much difficulty in ascertaining the mode of action by which the proposed annexation can be effected, and demand "in what form would be the practical exercise of the supposed power? In what department does it lie?" The progress of events already, in a great measure, answers this objection. Texas has taken the initiative. Her minister has introduced the subject to that Department which is alone capable of receiving communications from foreign Governments, and the Executive has submitted the correspondence to Congress. The resolutions before you propose an expression of opinion by Congress, which, if made, the Executive will doubtless address itself earnestly, in conjunction with the authorities of Texas, to the consummation of the joint wishes of the parties, which can be accomplished by treaty, emanating from one department of this Government, to be carried into effect by the passage of all needful laws by the legislative department, and by the exercise of the express power of Congress to admit new States.

I am aware, Mr. President, of the full extent and of the decided character of the opposition which this measure encounters in a large section of the Union. A vast number of remonstrances, memorials, and petitions, with countless signatures, have been presented, characterized in almost every instance by a very excited temper. Several of the most respectable States, too have solemnly adjured Congress to decline my proposed measure. Vermont led the way, in a violent and denunciatory paper. The populous State of Ohio followed in such determined hostility that her Legislature has volunteered a denial of the constitutionality of that acquisition which affords the outlet to her commerce. The gravity and dignity of Massachusetts have been enlisted to the same end; and, in short, all the Northern and Middle States, in one form or other, have urged objections upon us. If the views of so large and respectable a portion of the country be determined by broad reasons of general policy, conceived in a spirit of patriotism, and embracing the various interests of the whole Union in a just and equal consideration, they would come recommended to us by a very weighty authority; but, on the other hand, if this joint movement be a combination, conceived in a spirit of hostility towards one section, and for the purpose of aggrandizing the political power of another, then both the purpose and temper in which it is conceived constitute an irresistible reason, on the part of all who value this Union, for urging and consummating this measure.

Stripped of all circumlocution, the proposition is this. We are hostile to the institutions of the South, and propose their destruction; we have a predominating power, daily increasing, over that section; and we do not intend that it shall put itself in a condition to resist our power, when we may choose to exercise it. I put it to every candid man, whether this is not the just interpretation, the sum and substance, of the proceedings in Massachusetts and Ohio, and of all those numerous petitions which have been presented from the non-slaveholding States. I do not now speak of that wild and blind fanaticism, or still blinder cant, which infects the public mind on this subject; and which even in this country has (I say it with shame and sorrow) received an impulse from that impersonation of the blackguardism of Europe, Mr. O'Connell; but I speak of the grave language of distinguished men, and the dignified proceedings of legislative bodies; and when the South finds in these a question of political power raised against her, coupled with, or rather founded upon, an objection to her social institutions, she ought, she must, make up her mind to give up those institutions, or to demand a guaranty for them. The question of her existence is forced upon her, and if you will not consent to adopt some measure to protect her, (and I confess that I see nothing but what I now propose,) it will be her duty by her own action to provide for her own safety.

It cannot fail to make a deep and mournful impression upon the South, that the opposition to the proposed measure is contemporaneous with the recent excitement on the subject of abolition. All men, of all parties, from all sections, in and out of office, Mr. Adams most conspicuous amongst them, desired the acquisition of Texas until the clamorous interference in the affairs of the South was caught up in New England, from Old England. Then for the first time objections are made to this measure; then those very statesmen who were anxious to make the acquisition of Texas their glory, found out that it would subvert the Constitution and ruin the country. We of the South, Mr. President, bear with such composure as we may the pious horror and self-righteous indignation with which many of our brethren speculate upon us; but it is a different affair, when ignorant and impertinent denunciators rise up and demand the control of the policy of this Government. You are called upon to declare that the Southern portion of your Confederacy, by reason of certain domestic institutions, in the judgment of your petitioners wicked and detestable, is to be excluded from some part of the political benefits of this Government. The assumption is equally insulting to the feelings and derogatory to the constitutional rights of the South. It is an arrogant pretension to superiority on one side, and denunciation of inferiority on the other; which, if sanctioned by Congress, either by assuming it as the reason of legislating, or of refusing to legislate, makes us at once two people, two races, a superior and an inferior. We neither can nor ought—I say it, Mr. President, in no light mood or wrong temper—we neither can nor ought to continue in political union on such terms.

But, Mr. President, wrong, and dangerous, and subversive of our institutions as these positions are, they have their origin rather in the apprehensions of those who urge them than in actually existing facts. The Massachusetts report asserts that, at the institution of this Government, the predominance of political power was in the non-slaveholding States, and that the representation of the three-fifths was allowed in a spirit of compromise, to make an approximation towards equality. I believe, sir, that the committee is mistaken in its view of the facts. Of those who made the Constitution, and of those who sat in the first Congress, two-thirds were slaveholders. Excluding Pennsylvania, where slavery never existed, and the New England States, in some of which slavery existed to a small extent at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the slaveholding States represented in the first Congress, according to provisions of the Constitution, were—

New York	6	New Hampshire	3
New Jersey	4	Massachusetts	8
Delaware	1	Rhode Island	1
Maryland	6	Connecticut	5
Virginia	10	Pennsylvania	8
North Carolina	5	Vermont	2
South Carolina	5		—
Georgia	3	Non-slaveholding	27
Kentucky	2
Slaveholding	42

There being nine slaveholding and six non-slaveholding States, the Senate stood 18 to 12.

By the apportionment under the first census, the representatives stood thus:

New York	10	New Hampshire	4
New Jersey	5	Massachusetts	14
Delaware	1	Rhode Island	2
Maryland	8	Connecticut	7
Virginia	19	Pennsylvania	13
North Carolina	10	Vermont	2
South Carolina	6		—
Georgia	2		42
Kentucky	2
Tennessee	1

and the Senators 20 to 12.

Thus, it appears that, at the adoption of the Constitution, the slaveholding interest predominated; and that, therefore, the idea of the committee, that the growth of the South should be prevented for the purpose of preserving the original balance of the Constitution, is wholly erroneous.

And now, Mr. President, turn your attention for a moment to the present relative condition of the sections.

New York, New Jersey, and Delaware now belong to the non-slaveholding section. From the bounty of Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, have been added to that interest; and Wisconsin is making up with rapid steps to take her station abreast of the States. At this moment the non-slaveholding States have in the House of Representatives 143 members out of 240, a majority of one-sixth; and a majority of 4 Senators in this body: and then, Mr. President, when we look forward to the next census, New York, with her two and a half millions; Ohio, with her two millions; Indiana, with her seven hundred thousand; Illinois, Michigan, and the rest; where, sir, will be the South then? Where the balance of the Constitution?

Virginia gave to the non-slaveholding States the populous Northwest, for their growth and expansion. They have by law and treaty secured to themselves, and denied to us, all above the parallel of 36 deg. 30 min. from the Mississippi to the Pacific, a vast and fertile region, larger than revolutionary America; destined to receive the emigration from the teeming bosom of the North, swollen by the annual importation of nearly one hundred thousand foreigners. While, by treaty, we were deprived of all west of the Sabine, and by law of north of 36 deg. 30 min. they have kept open for themselves all the interior world of the Upper Missouri and Mississippi, all the prairies and mountains of the central West, all the valley of the Columbia, and coast of the Pacific; and with this rich and boundless inheritance, with their own noble country, and with what the reckless munificence of Virginia endowed them, is it according to the spirit in which the Constitution was conceived, is it in a spirit of kindness, is it just, is it not an outrage, that the question of political power is raised against us?

No one will venture to say that, if the South extends herself to the Rio Grande, she can, under any circumstances, contain a population equal to that of the non-slaveholding States. In the other branch of Congress we can never expect an approach to equality. The sceptre has passed from us, and forever. Whether it has been rightly wielded, let the growth and power of this country answer. All that is now left us is to protect ourselves. All that we want is some reasonable check upon an acknowledged power; some approach to equipoise in this chamber. It results from the nature of things; and all our history shows that both the interest and inclination of the South is to restrain as far as possible the action of this Government. We never require any thing from it. Ours is the let us-alone policy. All we wish is not to suffer aggression. All the power we covet is the power to resist incursions. And this much, sir, you must allow to us. The ground upon which non-slaveholding States and communities put their claim to political supremacy is an insult to us. The claim itself is an aggression, and the avowed purposes for which it is to be used are hostile and destructive.

And, Mr. President, but for the great respect which I have for the States which have taken ground on this subject, I should be disposed to suspect that the idea of checking the extension of domestic slavery was but a hollow and hypocritical pretext, to cover political designs. The slaveholding population and the slaveholding political communities may be multiplied by the proposed acquisition of territory; but I do not see that slavery or the number of slaves can be increased by it. Under the mild condition of Southern slavery, the negro population increases at a greater ratio than that of the whites throughout the Union, augmented as the latter is by the accession of foreigners. To this natural increase, your laws, making the introduction of slaves a felony, forbid any addition. Extend the territory as you may, you can only have those you now have, and their natural increase. They may be diffused over a wider surface, intermingled with a larger free population, but not one additional slave can be made. Nay, Mr. President, this annexation will produce the precise opposite result. It will prevent the increase of slaves.

It is well known that it has tasked the vigilance and power of this Government to enforce the laws to which I have just alluded, against the temptation of the vast profit which would reward the introduction of slaves; and it is also known that the combined energies of the civilized Powers of the world have not yet succeeded in putting an end to the slave trade which continues to supply the West Indies with African slaves. Our laws, sustained by our public opinion and enforced by our power, would no doubt prevent the possibility of the further introduction of negroes. But none of these checks will operate with the same force upon Texas, her extended coast, watched by a small navy; her uninhabited territory, subject to a necessarily inefficient police, afford facilities for the introduction of negroes, while, on the other hand, the temptation to introduce them will be greater than any other portion of this continent has ever been exposed to; nor, sir, will the proposed annexation deteriorate the condition of the slaves now held in bondage. Such as would be transferred to Texas would be placed in a more healthy climate, a more fertile soil; they would be less crowded together in large masses, and from the enhanced value of their labor, enlist a more intense interest on the part of their owners to attend to their wants and necessities. These remarks, I make Mr. President, to show how blind and mistaken is that humanity which has permitted itself to be enlisted against this measure. How narrow it also is, let me briefly illustrate. It is obvious that, if our laws, institutions, spirit of enterprise, and habits of order, were extended over that region, and sustained by the vigor of our Government, it would rapidly become the seat of civilization and religion. The waste of useless fertility would be subjected to a vigorous culture, towns would spring up, churches be built, and, in the place of the wild Caddoes and Camanches, would appear a race of men rapidly fulfilling the high destiny of civilized man.

It is against that spirit of aggrandizement and recklessness which is, in the prosecution of its mad career, blind to such obvious considerations as these. It is against that self-righteous arrogance which scorns and would chastise in others every thing different from itself. It is against that prurient and drunken philanthropy, more to be dreaded as a madness than to be pitied as a disease, which menaces the destruction of the Union, and a portion of it with massacre and burning, and all the nameless horrors of a servile war. It is against the perpetual and irritating agitation of bitter and unprofitable topics, which cannot come to good, that this measure is intended to provide. I wish no power for the South but enough to protect herself; no boon but to be let alone; no influence here but enough to check in this body the mad caprices of unbridled power. I expect a majority in neither branch of the Government. In the popular branch we are destined to a hopeless minority. Here we must be strong enough to be heard, to be felt, to be able to check, to be able to insist upon deliberation.

We stand entirely on the defensive; we desire safety, not power, and we must have it. I know of no mode so easy, so direct, and so efficacious, as this which I propose. Give us safety and repose, by doing now what all your most trusted and distinguished statesmen have been so long anxious to do. Give them to us, by restoring what you wantonly and unconstitutionally deprived us of. Grant us this just and humble boon, by repairing the violated integrity of your territory, by augmenting your wealth and power, by extending the empire of law, liberty, and christianity. Give it to us, and you will accomplish that "which is the greatest interest of every true American, the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety—perhaps our national existence." Mr. President, with these words of Washington I conclude.

SPEECH OF MR. BELL,
OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, May 31, 1838.—When Mr. TURNEY had concluded his speech upon the bill making appropriations for the suppression and prevention of Indian hostilities—

Mr. BELL instantly rose, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I hope the committee will indulge me in replying to the wanton and unprovoked attack of my colleague. I am astonished at the course of my colleague. His whole speech has been a studied personal attack upon me. He has, without the slightest provocation on my part, made an an assault, dictated throughout by cold and deliberate malice and vindictiveness.

My colleague commenced his remarks by informing the committee that he was the only member of the Tennessee delegation, of his side in politics, who was in the habit of public speaking; and that it therefore became his duty to reply to the speech I had made on the subject under debate. I take leave to inform my colleague that he is mistaken. He is not the only speaking member of those whose deputy-orator he has consented to become. There is another member of the Tennessee delegation, of the same politics with himself, who is far more distinguished, and at least as able as himself—a member who is in the habit of personal speaking, and who is entitled to the same privilege of debate upon this floor, and at this time, that any other member enjoys.

My colleague prefaced his personal attack upon me with another remarkable statement. He said that for me, personally, he had no other than kind feelings. This was altogether a gratuitous declaration on his part. I have neither courted his friendship nor his kind feelings. But I may say that, so far as personal courtesy and civility may go, I have deserved his kind feelings. My colleague's residence and my own, in Tennessee, are separated by a considerable distance. I have never been associated with him in any public body before we met upon this floor; nor have I either seen or known much of him in private life. What I at any time have heard others say of him, did not seem to preclude those civilities which it is convenient to extend to a colleague, and which are ordinarily due to a gentleman on this floor: I have, therefore, been uniformly courteous to him. But my colleague had no sooner made this profession of kind feeling, than he entered upon an arranged and premeditated personal attack upon my whole course. It must have been evident to all who heard him, from the materials he had at command, and the manner in which they were set forth, that he enjoyed the benefit of the counsel and experience of others better versed in the history and politics of the times; and that those parts of his speech which did not arise naturally out of the preceding discussion, had been carefully concocted and laid up for some suitable occasion for bringing them forth. But I will do my colleague the credit to say, that it is not his own gall which he has vented against me upon this occasion. He cannot have any malignant feeling to gratify against me; nor, on the other hand, can I entertain any feeling of resentment against him, though I cannot have any respect for him. He has become a voluntary scavenger for other men's uses. He has shown himself the fit and apt conduit for the discharge, upon this floor, of the hoarded and accumulated malice and vindictiveness of others. I know the source of this attack, and the men by whose prompting my colleague speaks. I refer to two other colleagues of mine, one in another body, in the other end of the Capitol, and the other a member of this House. They are both the intimate associates of my colleague before me. I have known them both long and well, both in public and in private life, and I have ever found them alike destitute of private honor and public principle. Their hypocrisy, their malignity, and their treachery towards me, are well understood. They have long sought to traduce my character through other channels; but they have never dared to meet me to my face, here or elsewhere, with their charges. What I have here said of them I have often said before. I have denounced their conduct towards me, heretofore, upon this floor. I have repeatedly denounced them at home, in public assemblies of the people, among their own neighbors, in their own vicinity, and where they had repeated opportunities to make their charges openly, and when I could reply to them, but they never had the courage to do so. They never dared to meet me. These are the authors of the present attack upon me. But I repeat that I can entertain no feelings of resentment or revenge against my colleague before me. In the part he has acted here, I regard him as the mere instrument of other men's malice—a tool of tools.

[Mr. TURNEY, who occupied a seat immediately in front of Mr. BELL, rose from his seat, and turning round to him, said: "it is false, the statement is false, and my colleague knows it to be so." Mr. BELL instantly struck him with his hand, and some disorder ensuing, the SPEAKER took the chair. After order was restored, and several ineffectual motions having been made to adjourn, or to have the quarrel adjusted, a resolution was moved that the parties should apologize to the House; and, before it was decided, Mr. BELL, and then Mr. TURNEY, voluntarily made an apology. The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and Mr. BELL resumed his speech, as follows.]

Mr. Chairman: After the time which has already been occupied in discussing the measure under consideration, when so much anxiety prevails to bring it to a close, and particularly after that anxiety has been so earnestly expressed by some of my own political friends, I would not think of trespassing further upon the indulgence of the committee, did I not feel that it was due to the friends with whom I have so long acted, here and elsewhere; that it is due to the principles which I profess, and which I have uniformly supported on this floor; and, above all, that it is due to my own feelings and to my own honor, that I should answer the various charges which my colleague has thonght preper to urge against me as an individual. This I propose to do in a manner perfectly in order, perfectly respectful to the committee, and becoming to myself. I also propose to take notice of all the material points and allegations of my colleague, in the order in which he made them.

The first of these which I deem material, is that for the appointment of the numerous officers and agents employed in the emigration of the Indian tribes and in the execution of the various Indian treaties, without authority of law, which I had charged against the late and present Administrations, I am the responsible person; that it was the duty of Congress to have corrected the evil; and that, as I was the head of the Indian committee, I am chiefly answerable for the neglect of this duty; I am, at last, the individual who is guilty of the offences which I had attempted to fasten upon the party in power. The same charge was made, in substance, against me by the gentleman from Michigan, who now stands over the way, [Mr. CRARY,] with this addition: that, for all the abuses which exist in the Indian Department, if any, I am more responsible than any other person. That gentleman called for the reports upon abuses which I have made as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs—for the bills, or measures, which I had brought forward to correct them. He was, also, pleased to say that I had great influence upon these subjects, and, by giving proper attention, could have carried any measures which were proper to be adopted in order to correct abuses. In this I beg to say that the gentleman was quite too kind to me. But, without going into the question of what I ought to have done, I should like to be informed by the honorable gentleman how I, or Congress either, could have put an end to the abuses of which I have complained. I have not complained of defects in the laws or in the Constitution. Some great and wise man (I now forget who) has said that, after all the controversy which has existed, after all the risings, rebellions, and revolutions which have filled the world, and after all the blood that has been shed in establishing and defending particular forms of government, at last "that government is best which is best administered;" and in one sense, and that a most important one, the saying is true. Many of the ablest writers in favor of republican forms of government admit that a monarchy with a prince at its head, intelligent, virtuous and able, would combine greater advantages in promoting the peace, happiness and prosperity of the people, than any other form of government. Such a prince would preserve peace, do justice, and protect the rights and interests of his people, in despite of bad laws; while no form of government can secure the same great interests of a people, with the aid of the most perfect code of laws that ever was formed, if the chief magistrate—the chief administrator of such a government—is incompetent, negligent, or unfaithful to his trust. The great and decisive objection to a monarchy is, that however the people may be blessed in one generation, or for a short time, with a just, wise, and patriotic prince, they have no security that his successor may not prove a fool or a tyrant. Our form of government proposes to correct this evil, to secure a perpetual succession of wise and virtuous rulers, through frequent elections by the people. But still I say, as I have often heretofore maintained on this floor, that all the evils of the worst form of government that now exists among civilized nations may be visited on this people, when we choose to elevate to the highest executive trusts men who are destitute either of the proper skill and talents, or, what is still more important than talents, of patriotic purposes and principles. In this country, and under our form of government, the abuse of the appointing power alone is sufficient to render the best laws abortive, and to destroy the efficiency of any branch of the public service.

What signifies it what laws we have, or what we might have passed, to provide for the proper execution of the various duties assigned to subordinate officers connected with the Indian service, if, after all, the President will fill the offices with worthless and incompetent partisans? with men who take office, and are appointed to office, rather that they may profit by their offices, than that the country may profit by their services. Depend upon it, sir, if the head is wrong, the whole system will go wrong, and fall into disorder. Let me illustrate this position by referring to the judicial tribunals of the country. Of what avail are good laws when the judge who administers them is either corrupt or incompetent? Another illustration was whispered to me by a friend sitting near me, when this strange argument was urged by the gentleman from Michigan. If your laws be ever so strict and guarded for the security of orphans' estates, yet, if the judge who appoints the guardian is unfaithful, and will appoint a dishonest knave and take insufficient sureties, what will prevent the estate from being squandered, and the orphans from beggary?

But to test the argument of my colleague, and especially that of the gentleman from Michigan, further on this point, I will put the case of the Florida war, in the conduct of which I have complained there have been the greatest abuses and the most unparalleled waste of the public treasure. Does the gentleman from Michigan mean to say—but I know he has too much good sense to entertain the idea—that, by proper attention to our duties in Congress, we could by law have prevented these abuses, this extravagance? Does the gentleman mean that Congress could have passed a law forbidding the Executive to call more volunteers or other troops into the field than two to every one of the enemy, or four to one, or six to one? And, I believe, in the last campaign we had in the field eight or ten soldiers for every Indian warrior of the hostile party. Is this the nature of the legislation which the gentleman from Michigan or my colleague thinks might have been effected, if I had done my duty? And if this is not the sort of abuse which might have been corrected, I would like to know what abuses he alludes to. For my part, sir, I have not found fault with the laws. The laws, in the main, relating to this service are well enough. As to the appointment of numerous public officers, and prescribing annual salaries without authority of law, that is an abuse which has only become striking and enormous within the last few years, and during a period when it is notorious I had no power in this House to correct any abuse which tended to curb Executive influence. If Congress had even passed laws to prohibit such a practice, the new doctrine as to the extent of Executive power and discretion under the Constitution, in the construction and execution of the laws, would probably have made them unavailing.

The next ground of attack assumed by my colleague relates to the effort which was made, near the close of the session of 1836, to have a committee appointed to examine into the frauds alleged to exist in the execution of the Creek treaty, with power to sit during the recess; and to proceed to the scene of the alleged frauds, and there take the proofs. In my first address to the committee, I alluded to, and relied upon the failure of that attempt, as evidence that Congress itself, or a majority of the House of Representatives, refused to take adequate steps to redress the complaints of the Creek Indians. I had also contended that the expensive war in the Creek country, and all the other mischiefs which ensued, had been the result of Executive mismanagement or abuse. I showed, also, that by the casting vote of the Speaker of this House, the motion for a committee to go and examine into the alleged frauds and abuses had been defeated, and that, instead of a committee appointed by the House, the duty of appointing commissioners to examine into them, as well as into the causes generally of the war, had, by the act of the House, been assigned to the President! Thus the appropriate business of the House—inquiry into Executive abuses—was transferred to the Executive himself, and he was empowered to appoint a commissioner to examine into and report upon his own alleged delinquency; for such, in substance, was the nature of that proceeding.

My colleague justifies the conduct of the House in refusing to authorize the Indian Committee to sit in the vacation, by alleging that the committee would have been engaged in electioneering—going up and down the country for the purpose of producing effect upon the Presidential election. My colleague read from the speeches delivered upon the occasion, to show that such was the ground taken by those gentlemen who opposed the motion. I well remember the arguments used in defeating that proposition, and I remember that the expense growing out of the practice of appointing these travelling committees was also relied upon, to show the impropriety of adopting the course proposed. In answer to the allegation that the committee, if appointed, would have been merely an electioneering one, I will only say, that the commissioners appointed by the President to examine into the frauds, as they were his warm partisans, might, with far more justice and propriety, have been suspected of devoting themselves to the business of the pending Presidential election, than the Committee on Indian Affairs. Sir, it is well known that the President himself was industriously employed during that summer in the same vocation. As to the expense incident to granting the committee power to proceed with their inquiry in the recess, it is a sufficient answer to say, that the commissioners appointed by the Executive have been sitting two years, and receiving the pay of members of Congress all the while, mileage included, and they have not yet all made their final report. But my colleague has examined the journal, and found that, as early as the 9th of January, 1836, the Committee on Indian Affairs had the power, under the order of the House, to examine into the frauds and abuses of the Indian Department, and he charges that we did not take the first step towards the investigation of the Creek frauds during the remainder of the session. Hence, concludes that my professions are hollow; that my complaints against the House for failing to give power to examine are unfounded; and that I have raised a clamor about abuses that never existed, or, if they did, that I had failed to examine into them, when I had full power to do so: that, in short, I was the responsible and guilty person in this, as in other like cases. Such is the substance of my colleague's allegations on this point. (1)

Now, sir, I beg leave to state that my colleague is wholly mistaken in his statements upon this subject. It is true, that the Committee on Indian Affairs had power to examine into all abuses in that branch of the service as early as January, in 1836; but it is also equally true that the committee, from that time, until they applied for power to sit in the recess, were most industriously and laboriously employed in the business assigned to them. If this statement be not satisfactory, I call upon the members of that committee, who may be present, to corroborate, as I know they will, what I say. Sir, I repeat that the committee proceeded, with all diligence and solicitude, to discharge their duties, as the records of their proceedings will show. The committee, then, had the whole range of abuses in every quarter of the country to inquire into. The Creek frauds were least accessible to them, but they proceeded, as far as they had the means and the time, to inquire into them. I refer those who may be disposed to receive the statement of my colleage as true, to the files of papers in your clerk's office, to refute it. The Committee on Indian Affairs, it is true, did not devote their whole time to this business during that session. It will be remembered that various questions of great public interest and importance were pending before Congress during that session. The members of the committee did not think proper to neglect those questions, and therefore they devoted such portions of their time only as they could, when the House was not in session, to the prosecution of the business before the committee. I trust that I have answered this part of my colleague's attack fully and satisfactorily.

My colleague next proceeded to notice what had been said by me about the political engineering of the late Administration, at a time when their attention should have been fixed on the war then brewing in the Creek country, and the one which was raging in Florida. I stated that those wars grew out of the neglect and bad management of the Executive chiefs; that when our Indian relations demanded their serious and unremitted attention, the far greater portion of the care and solicitude of the President was devoted to the bringing in of a successor, and so of most of his lieutenants. My colleague undertook to show that my statement upon this subject was without foundation, and that I had done great injustice to the late President. My colleague went so far as to say that he knew of no other interference of the late President with the late election than the famous Gwin letter. My colleague must know very little of the course of the late President in relation to that election, if he supposes that this is the only evidence that exists of his interference. (2)

My colleague cannot have forgotten that the late President paid a visit to his State in the summer of 1836. My colleague, who sits on my left, [Mr. CARTER,] has a lively impression of that visit; for the President threaded his district, and caused him no little trouble and annoyance thereby. But, sir, the President did not seek to disguise the object of his visit, so far, at least, as a free expression of his views and opinions of the parties to the then existing contest was calculated to disclose his intentions. He not only expressed his views verbally upon the subject of the election, but he did not hesitate to put them down upon paper, so that there can be no denial or cavil on the subject. To a committee, appointed by a public meeting to invite him to partake of the hospitality of the citizens of Shelbyville and Bedford county, he denounced those who supported the election of Judge White for seeking to undermine our free institutions, and declared that their object was to deliver the State into the arms of the Federalists, Nullifiers, and new-born Whigs. To this statement he subscribed his name, and it was soon afterwards published to the world in all the newspapers in that interest in the State. I quote from memory, but I am certain that I am not mistaken in the substance of the charge. Many other declarations, of the same nature and equally unequivocal, might be referred to. But it was not in 1836 only that the late President employed himself in advancing the cause of the present incumbent of the Executive chair. He was devotedly and industriously occupied in the same manner in 1835. I hold in my hand a specimen of one mode of electioneering in 1835, which is singular enough to deserve the attention of the committee. It is a copy of a letter written to the late William Blount, ex-Governor of Tennessee, and a man of great respectability and influence in that State.

Extract from General JACKSON'S letter to Gov. BLOUNT, of Tennessee, dated May 10, 1835.

"I would to God that our old friend Judge White would soon disentangle himself from the false position that he has been placed in by Bell, Crockett, and Co. If he does not, he will be politically lost, since John Bell has turned a good Whig, and put him up as the candidate of the Opposition. I wish he had said to the Opposition, when they proposed to make him their candidate, what the old Trojan said to the Greeks when they offered him the present of the wooden horse—I know the Greeks, and despise their gifts; then the Baltimore Convention would consider his claims.

"The Baltimore Convention will be the largest and most respectable deliberative assembly convened in America for a great while. Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Kentucky, will send delegates.

"What a spectacle will Tennessee cut—old Republican Tennessee alone with the Nullifiers of South Carolina! How I am humbled at the thought; and, if I know the Tennesseeans, so soon as they recover from their delusion, they will hurl all from them that have had any agency in bringing them into this situation."

The original of this letter was put into the hands of a late member of this House, [Cave Johnson,] and he did not scruple to read it frequently to large assemblies of the people, while canvassing for a seat in this House, as an evidence of the wishes of the President in relation to the pending Presidential election, and of his own orthodox principles. (3) But, besides writing numerous letters of this description, of which I had a knowledge, the late President must have consumed a considerable portion of the time which would have been more constitutionally employed in guarding the public interests in Florida and the Creek nation, in distributing newspapers and speeches under his frank. Of this fact I have a personal knowledge. All the vile calumnies which appeared during that year in the columns of a certain prostituted press, in relation to the origin, motives, and intention of the movement in favor of Judge White, and more especially in relation to my own course, and which, until now, have been confined to the columns of kindred papers, were distributed and propagated under the frank of a President of the United States! There can be no mistake upon this subject. His own sign manual appeared upon the envelope of a great number of such enclosures, forwarded to me from various quarters of the State. Of the nature of these calumnies, I forbear to speak. It will be sufficient to say, that human malignity could scarce do more in the work of detraction and slander. (4) Yet, with such vile and pestilent matter was not only my district, but the whole State of Tennessee, flooded, under the sanction of the President's name. Not only in my own district, but in every part of the State with which I communicated, every man of supposed influence and intelligence appeared to have been supplied with newspapers containing these slanders.

Such were the means, such was a part of the machinery, employed to blight the prospects of Judge White and his supporters every where, and to elevate the present tenant of the Executive mansion; such was the nature of the plan adopted by unprincipled party adherents, to fulfil the prophecy which foretold that General Jackson would be able to crush me and the other leaders of the rising opposition to Mr. Van Buren, in Tennessee, as with the foot of an elephant; such was one of the devices by which my opponents sought to blast my character, and with which I was distinctly menaced before I took my position in opposition to the favorite candidate of the Executive. I thank God that those efforts to deprive me of the confidence of my fellow citizens signally failed in my own district, and in the State generally. But still, with such industry had these calumnies been circulated, (having been sent, by one hand or another, to every sequestered spot, as well as to every village and cross-road,) that they had, in some small districts, so complete a possession of the public mind, that, happening to pass through some of them, it has been my lot to find myself reputed, by many, as a profligate and abandoned wretch, equally undeserving of private and public confidence. But it was not in Tennessee alone that the effects of this system of calumny and detraction have been felt. In sections of the country, where no refutation of mine could ever penetrate, my humble name has been traduced and calumniated by a great central organ established in this place, under Executive direction and control, and always at the service of my most malignant personal as well as political enemies. Whatever their malice suggests there finds a safe and ready admittance. It has frequently been my lot to sit in this House, morning after morning, and see members, in adjoining seats, carefully fold up, and send abroad, under the sanction of their franks, a newspaper, (the Globe,) containing the most scurrilous and unprincipled imputations upon my motives and conduct—often grossly misrepresenting and perverting my course in the House. What may have been, or what may be, the effect of a great central organ in this city, acting under the direction and control of the Executive, patronized by a great party, and often directed by personal malignity, and what may have been my feelings under the circumstances I have described, every man of natural sensibilities may infer. Yet, sir, I did not treasure up any bad feelings against those who thus, in my presence, have contributed to defame me; nor have I indulged the slightest feelings of resentment against the thousand instruments of personal hatred or party opposition which have been employed in assailing me out of this House. There are, I can say with truth, scarcely half a dozen men in existence towards whom I am constrained, by a sense of personal injury, to indulge in feelings of personal resentment. There are but few persons, in my case as in all others of a like kind, who are or ought to be accounted responsible. If of them I have, upon some occasions, spoken with acrimony in this House, I trust the impartial and considerate will duly appreciate the circumstances under which I have done so. If, in speaking of the late and present Administrations, (and they are one in many respects,) I have manifested a deeper feeling of opposition, and have expessed myself in stronger terms than is agreeable to the taste of moderate gentlemen of either side, I trust these gentlemen will be disposed to concede something to the sense of personal wrong and injury which must, sometimes, operate upon my temper, and give a coloring to my expressions—something to injured feelings. I have never troubled this House with details of my private griefs; and I beg pardon for having done so now. And the generous and liberal, whether they belong to one side or the other in politics, will, I trust, see some ground of indulgence for the allusions I have just made. I feel a consoling consciousness that no gentleman will think that I have trespassed, who bears in his own bosom the sensibilities that belong to an honest man. I feel a happy assurance that the peculiar circumstances of the occasion will, with every liberal mind, be an ample apology for saying all that I have said on so poor a topic as myself.

The next subject which my colleague referred to in the course of his remarks, was one of a very delicate and important nature, and one about which we are seldom permitted to say a word in this House. I mean the subject of Abolition.

[The CHAIRMAN here interrupted Mr. BELL, and said that he had declared that it was not in order to debate that question, when his colleague alluded to it.]

(1) My colleague discreetly omits, in his printed speech, the charge distinctly made in the House, that the Committee on Indian Affairs, although they had power to examine into the imputed frauds as early as January, 1836, failed to take the first step in the examination until the close of the session.

(2) My colleague has thought proper to suppress, in his printed speech, his denial in the House that General Jackson had electioneered, or otherwise interfered in the late election. I suppose he means to include this ground of objection, often urged by me against the late President, under the head of "foul charges," which, in his printed speech, he alleges I made against him.

(3) The above may not be entirely accurate in the language and arrangement, as the copy I used was taken down by a gentleman who heard it read frequently by Mr. Johnson. A copy was refused, though repeatedly requested from Mr. Johnson, as I am informed.

(4) A particular notice and refutation of these calumnies are already before the public.

Mr. BELL resumed, and said, that is true, sir; but it is also true that my colleague was permitted to go on with his remarks, until he said all he desired to say upon that subject. I do not intend to discuss the merits of this subject. I have no desire to do so now, nor is it important to my purpose. I only desire to expose the attempt which has been, and will continue to be, made to identify me with the designs of the Abolitionists. My colleague says that it is not the fanatics of the North alone who are to be feared! Who else; or what else, does my colleague mean to say is to be feared? There are, he says, certain other interests and feelings connected and allied with this incendiary feeling at the North, which are as much, or more, to be dreaded than the machinations of the Abolitionists. This is what my colleague means to affirm. Well, what are these other interests? My colleague means to assert that there are persons in the Southwest, in the South, in the State of Tennessee, for that is the point aimed at, who, in order to promote their own political interests and designs, co-operate with, and are become, the allies of the fanatics of the North. Yes, sir, this is what my colleague is striking at; and he, and those with whom he acts, mean, at a proper time and place, to include me in this denunciation. The ground upon which he proposes to make out this charge against me is, that I did not vote for or approve the resolution of Mr. Patton. I did not vote against that resolution, because it appeared to have the concurrence of most of my colleagues and friends, and my vote could not change the result. My mind, enlightened by the experience of two years upon that point, led me to the conclusion that it was only strengthening the cause of Abolition to the North, to furnish them with the popular and plausible ground of complaint against Congress, that, in refusing to consider their memorials, they violated the right of petition. I believed that their cause would be strengthened by making this false issue with them. I therefore did not concur in the wisdom of that resolution. Some of my colleagues differed with me upon this question; yet, it being an honest difference of opinion, as I knew, so far as my friends were concerned, I neither found fault with, nor complained of, their course. Yet I was denounced in letters written from this place, and every newspaper in the interests of the Administration in Tennessee, for having united with the fanatics of the North; or, in other words, I was denounced as an abolitionist.

The vote upon Mr. Patton's resolution was insisted upon as a test vote by those whose purposes were answered by such a course. But see the absurdity and insincerity of those who find fault with me. The resolution of Mr. Patton was adopted to put down the discussion and agitation in Congress of a question so inflammatory in its nature and tendency; but no sooner was what was called a test vote procured in the House, and all discussion stopped here, than it became perfectly safe and allowable, in the opinions of the same persons, that as much discussion should take place in the Senate as any member of that body desired. If it was not proper to discuss that subject in this Hall of the Representatives of the people, surely it was quite as improper to discuss it in the Senate. But, sir, to put down the discussion of abolition in this House was not so much the object of the prime movers and managers in getting a vote upon that resolution as to procure the materials of political agitation in the slaveholding States. It was known how the vote would be upon such a resolution. It was no doubt well understood that the supporters of the Administration to the North, generally, would vote for the resolution, and it was supposed their opponents would not. My colleague said, and he repeated the statement, that every member of what he calls the Whig party in this House voted against that resolution. That may be, and probably is, true. But my colleague means to infer that, therefore, the Whigs of the North are all imbued with the spirit of the fanatics of the North, or, in other words, that they favor the cause of abolition. I am well aware that my colleague means also to use the argument, that all those of the South and Southwest who act in this House with the Whig members of the North must also have like feelings and objects with them, and that, in fact, to gratify their political ambition, they are ready to sacrifice not only the general interests of the South and Southwest, but likewise their own property, and that of all their dearest friends. Could a more unreasonable or absurd supposition enter the head of man? Yet, I have been held up, on no other ground, in my own State, as an abolitionist. Could a more striking evidence be offered of the gross injustice attending the adoption of Mr. Patton's resolution than is presented in my own case? That resolution was adopted under the gag of the previous question. Those who voted against it had no power to assign a reason for their course; their lips were sealed; but the moment their vote was recorded, they were denounced as abolitionists, together with all those who act with them politically in this House.

With the Whigs of this House it is my pleasure and my pride to act, especially in the great design of overthrowing, by all honorable and constitutional means, the present most unprincipled and mischievous Administration. In this greatest measure of reform I heartily concur with them, though upon some other questions I differ from them. But, sir, I have not the slightest reason to believe that I am acting with fanatics or Abolitionists. Some there may be of that description; but the great body of the Whig party in this House, I am well satisfied, do not favor or concur in the designs of the Abolitionists, whatever they may think of the institution of slavery as an abstract question. Instead of looking to the vote on Mr. Patton's resolution as a test of the sentiments of members of this House upon that question, and as furnishing any ground of belief that the Whigs of the North are advocates of Abolition, I see in their votes upon that question the evidence only of their greater good sense and wisdom. I see even greater wisdom in their course than the gentlemen of the South have manifested upon the same question. As for the votes given in favor of the resolution by the supporters of the Administration to the North, I regard it as a mere device to persuade the South that they are their best friends. I regard such a testimony of the sentiment of a portion of the North as of no value to the South whatever. The moment it shall appear to be the interest of that party to change their position upon this question, they will have no scruple in doing so. They will change in a single day. I have, upon another occasion, adverted to the attempt which was made by the same party a few years ago to convince Southern members that they were opposed to a system of internal improvements by the Federal Government. I will not now enter into the details of that movement. It will be sufficient to remind gentlemen that it was entirely delusive; that the test furnished upon that occasion was withdrawn the moment it was ascertained that those who had voted against the policy of internal improvements would endanger their party ascendancy at home. My colleague has read an extract from a speech made by me in the spring of 1835, at Nashville, to show that, according to my own mode of reasoning upon the subject, the Whigs of the North and their allies in the South are Abolitionists. I will read it again:

"A proscribed and disregarded minority, respectable for its numbers, its talents, and even for the virtues of many of its members—for virtue is never the exclusive attribute of any one party—such a minority is always tempted, in resentment of its real or imaginary wrongs, in redress of its violated privileges as American citizens, in being deprived of all actual participation in the Government of the country—compelled to obey laws and to be the subjects of a policy prescribed and directed exclusively by their opponents. Such a minority, I repeat, is constantly tempted to seize upon every vexed and irritating question, to make common cause with the spirit of fanaticism itself, in an effort to right, or, at all events, to avenge, their injuries. This is the danger of our system. It is still party."

The view presented in this passage, of the evil consequences of the proscriptive and intolerant policy pursued by the party in power, and the general bad tendency of such a course, in fomenting bad passions, and a desperate policy on the part of a denounced and proscribed and oppressed minority, express my opinions still. There is nothing in it which I wish to explain or retract. But does not my colleague see that I might wish to add something to the views then presented? The opposition to the Administration is no longer a minority among the people, as in 1835, though they may be in a minority in both Houses of Congress; though they may be excluded from public office, and denied virtually any participation in the Government of the country of which they are citizens. The aspect of things is greatly changed within a few years. The Opposition are no longer tempted, no matter how grievous their wrongs, to avail themselves of forbidden and dangerous expedients to right them, or to be restored to an equal participation in the Government. They are sweeping onward to all that a virtuous ambition can desire. But how stands the case with the party in power? They have complete and entire possession of power; they fill all the high offices; they have all the gratification of present and absolute control, it is true, but they are conscious that they are now in a decided minority among the people; they see a furious tide setting in against them, which must, if not checked, soon overtake and overwhelm them; they are just in a position which engenders recklessness, and prompts a ready resort to any desperate chance of escape which presents itself. The temptation to seize upon and make a profit out of this spirit of fanaticism which prevails to the North, now lies in their path, and it is no matter of surprise to me that some of them are eager to avail themselves of it. It is the last desperate effort of a sinking party in the South and the Southwest, to excite the people of those sections against the whole North, but especially against the Whigs of the North, as all, all, champions of abolition! But they do not stop there. In their despair, they seek to connect and identify all the public men of the South and Southwest who act with the Whigs in Congress in opposition to the Administration, as infected with the spirit of abolition—its friends and patrons. Can a course be conceived more unwise and impolitic than such a denunciation of Southern men? If the danger be real—if the alarm is unaffected, which is professed in the South and Southwest, upon this subject—if the motives of those who are engaged in getting up this excitement are patriotic, what can be more inconsistent, absurd, and mischievous than to attempt to create divisions in the slave States themselves; and to proclaim to the abolitionists of the North that they have advocates and allies of great respectability and influence in the bosom of the South, who are ready and willing to co-operate with them? I leave it to the good sense of every real friend of Southern interests if this is not holding out encouragement to the spirit of infatuation which pervades the North upon this subject; whether the abolitionists could desire any surer guaranty of their ultimate success, than to be persuaded that what the partisans of the Administration in the South and Southwest say upon this subject is true? I have said thus much upon this subject, Mr. Chairman, in vindication of my own course in relation to it, against the numerous misrepresentations which have been industriously propagated respecting it; and I am rather pleased than offended that my colleague introduced this topic into the debate.

My colleague next proceeded to review and criticise various passages of a speech which he alleges I made at Hartford last fall. The first passage which he takes exception to is that in which I am made to say of the Florida war, that it is "an inglorious war;" and he seems to think that I would not venture to utter such a sentiment here or in Tennessee. My colleague mistakes me altogether. I have no fears which would restrain me from uttering any sentiment on this floor or before the people of Tennessee, which I think true, and proper to be spoken here. Of the Florida war I have often spoken on this floor, and, although I have always given due credit to the personal gallantry of our officers and soldiers, both regular and volunteer, yet I have ever considered the war an "inglorious" one. What have our arms achieved in that ill-fated war that can be denominated glorious? What have they done, more than to save their honor? We have had, at different periods of the war, as many as three Major Generals upon the field of operations; and of each of them may it not with some truth be said that, like a distinguished hero of the Revolution, under circumstances not quite similar, "he has exchanged his Northern laurels for Southern willows?" I know how delicate and sensitive a thing a soldier's honor is, therefore I will not say that our generals have not accomplished all that could be accomplished, under the circumstances. I know that as gallant a band of men as ever met in martial array submitted to all the sacrifices, privations and perils, not only of savage war, but of a country and climate more deadly than the enemy himself, from my native State; and I would not undervalue their services, nor those of any other section or State. But, after all, I put it to the candor of every gentleman present to say, whether a war which has already cost so much precious blood and fifteen millions of treasure—a war waged through three campaigns against some twelve or fifteen hundred half-starved Indians and negroes, at the most, by well-supplied armies, from two to more than eight times their number—a war so uncqual in numbers, yet successful only, if successful at all, rather by cutting off the supplies of the enemy than by conquest in battle, can be called glorious in any sense which can cause an American heart to dilate, or feel proud that he is an American? I repeat here, in my place, and upon this floor, that the Florida war is an inglorious one; and made so chiefly by the neglect and mismanagement of the Executive heads of the Government, not from any deficiency of courage and enterprise in our regular or citizen soldiers.

My colleague next quotes a passage from the same speech, in which I am represented as having spoken of the majority in this House as a "passive, timid, and time-serving majority." My colleague can have had no other object in bringing this statement to the notice of the committee but the benevolent one of bringing me into personal collision with the gentlemen who compose the majority of this body. He, no doubt, supposes that I will be embarrassed and confounded by having this part of my speech thus brought to the notice of the gentlemen who were the subjects of the remark. My colleague, I trust, will find that he misapprehends me. Such a sentiment I would not utter; such a character of the members of this House I certainly would not attempt to draw, when speaking in the House, because it would not be admissible or quite parliamentary to do so. Of the influence of the Executive, and of the power of party discipline in this House, I have often spoken in the most decided language on this floor. So far I might properly go here. As to whether I uttered the sentiment in the precise terms imputed to me in the passage quoted by my colleague from the Hartford speech, I can neither admit nor deny. The printed speech from which my colleague quotes, I never saw or read, except such extracts from it as filled the columns of the Administration press in Tennessee during the winter. I never saw the manuscript from which it was printed, nor did I know that it would be published. It must have been published by some person who took notes of it in the usual way, when it was delivered; but, in justice to the reporter, whoever he was, I must say that I found all the extracts alluded to, although selected, no doubt, on the ground that they were the most objectionable parts of the speech, substantially correct, and I wondered how so much general accuracy could have been attained, under the circumstances. I may, in the excitement of the moment, have used the precise form of expression in speaking of the majority in Congress imputed to me; but I beg leave to say that the terms there used would not express my deliberate sentiments in relation to the majority of this House. I have too much respect for a large portion of the gentlemen of this House, composing the majority, to use that language as descriptive of them. The terms employed are liable to two exceptions. They are too harsh, and imply more censure than I would deliberately bestow in speaking of a large number of the members in the majority; but, on the other hand, they fall far short of the severity with which I would be compelled to speak, if it should be made my duty to express my opinion of another and smaller portion of them.

The next ground of charge alleged against me by my colleague is another passage of the speech at Hartford, in which he says I charged the late President of the United States with having violated and trampled upon the Constitution. My colleague wishes to know, if I really entertained such opinions of the conduct of the late President, why I did not move an impeachment against him in this House. As I did not do so, my colleague infers that I am in the habit of making unfounded charges against the late President and his administration.(5) I can inform my colleague that I made no charge in my speech at Hartford which I have not often made upon this floor, and during the most palmy days of the power and popularity of the late Executive Chief. It has been my opinion, and I have not yet parted from it, that the late President did trample upon some of the most important and vital principles of the Constitution. That no impeachment was actually moved against him, was not because there was any doubt that the Constitution was invaded and trampled upon, nor because the subject escaped attention at the time; for, sir, I, for one, did call the attention of this House to the subject, and declared my solemn conviction to be, that until a great example should be exhibited of the power and justice of this House by impeachment, the evils of which we most complained would be progressive. And I questioned whether any other adequate remedy could be applied under the Constitution. But, sir, I did not think of moving an impeachment against the late President, because, considering his great popularity and influence with the people—that, during the last years of his administration, and which were clearly the worst, he was sustained in all his conduct by a great majority in this House and in the Senate—I held that to provoke, without the power to restrain, would only aggravate the evils of the times, and bring additional injury upon the country and its institutions. An impeachment under such circumstances was not to be thought of by a prudent statesman. But, it is not the late President only that I am of the opinion has transgressed and trampled upon the Constitution. The present Executive Chief holds principles of administration, nay, more, he openly sanctions them in his practice, which, in my opinion, are clearly subversive of the very foundation on which the Constitution reposes; and it is further my opinion that the President himself, together with several of the Chiefs of Departments, has been guilty of such high misdemeanors—of such acts, both of omission and commission, in the conduct and management of various branches of the public service—such abuses of power and violations of duty—as make them justly liable to impeachment. And that my colleague, who has introduced this subject, may see how gravely I have viewed it, and how much attention I have bestowed upon it, I will inform him that I now hold in my hand eleven articles of charge against them, upon every one of which it is my deliberate and solemn conviction they could be properly impeached and convicted, according to the soundest principles applicable to such a proceeding and such a responsibility. These charges I have, months ago, well considered, thrown into form, and laid by for use at the proper time. That time is not now. Whether the time will come at all, when it will be proper to move a question upon them in this House, may be regarded as uncertain; for it is not public sentiment alone that I would consider in such a case—it is not a change of majority that ought to weigh in coming to the conclusion that such a movement would be proper; all the circumstances of the times must be weighed; but, above all, when every other circumstance is favorable, it will remain to be considered what the effect of such a proceeding, supposing it to be prosecuted successfully, would have upon the future action of our political system. Still I incline to the opinion that this great constitutional remedy will have to be exercised against some one or more of the great functionaries of the Government, before we can ever effect a radical cure of some of the most dangerous and growing vices of administration. The remedy by the ballot-box has heretofore failed to produce any effect upon what I consider far the worst and most threatening feature developed in the progress of the great experiment we are making in government. Violations of the principles and maxims which, I maintain, are entitled to be held in the first rank of importance in a Republican Government, are becoming so common as no longer to excite public attention.

(5) I believe the remarks made in the House by my colleague, upon the duty of moving an impeachment, are omitted in his printed speech.

But, sir, if our institutions stand, the attention of the people must be roused to the point of resentment and correction. One of the abuses, and the greatest of all, in my opinion, that prevails in the practice of the Government, though I know it does not so strike many of those whom I now address, is the assumption on the part of the Executive of the right to convert all the public offices and employments under the Constitution and laws into the wages of partisan servive. The practice of putting men into places of high and important trusts, rather that the offices may afford them the means of making their fortunes, than with any view to the public interest; the practice of removing or dispensing with faithful public officers merely because they will not consent to sacrifice their political integrity and independence of character—this I consider the foundation of all the abuses that have of late prevailed in the various branches of the public service. It was the principle that lay at the bottom of this practice—I mean the principle of converting every thing that partakes of the character of Executive patronage into productive political capital—that was the prime cause of the derangement of the currency, and all the accumulated evils which flowed from that source. Sir, all the world, I mean this little world of ours, the people of the United States, appear now to be exclusively absorbed and occupied with this question of the currency. The great, and, it is said, only issue which is now pending between the two great political parties in the country is a bank, or the Sub-Treasury, or No Bank. However important that issue may be, Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to express the opinion that it is still a subordinate issue. It possesses only a fleeting and temporary importance when contrasted with the real issue formed between the party in power and the Opposition. Sir, there is a prior issue, and one of far greater importance. Whatever may be the decision at this time upon the question of a Bank, or of the Sub-Treasury; whatever may be the character of the plan for the future management of the finances of the country, or for the regulation of the currency, which may be adopted by this Congress or the next, the whole subject is connected with interests so active and powerful, so vital to the pursuits of trade and accumulation, that nothing we may do will stand longer than a few years, if it shall not be found expedient and advantageous to those interests, unless, indeed, the adoption of the Sub-Treasury shall so increase the already swollen tide of Executive influence and power as to bear down and quite overwhelm all obstructions. Sir, I repeat, that the true issue is, whether all political power and control in this country are to be concentered in but one department of the Government. And I cannot cease to remember, and to urge upon the attention of the people, that the man who now enjoys the highest honor, and fills the highest station under the Constitution and laws, was the first, of any high pretensions to character and influence, who openly avowed and inculcated the fatal doctrine that public offices and employments are the proper objects of political strife, and the just rewards of party service. His correspondence with President Monroe, in 1823, upon the subject of the appointment of a postmaster at Albany will confirm all I say upon this subject. There, too, it will be found that he was the first to desire to taint the Post Office Department with this foul blot, and to insist that the power of appointment in that, as in all the other branches of the public service, should be exercised with a view to political and party results.

My colleague has quoted another part of the speech at Hartford, in which I am represented as having stated that I knew members of Congress who had sat in this House and voted for the Administration under a promise of office, and as a reward therefor. And my colleague thought proper to state that he could see no difference between a member who would sit by, having such a knowledge, and not disclose it, and a member who would thus sell himself to the party in power. Sir, I am sure that I could not have used the language imputed to me in this instance. I would not have used such language without a personal knowledge of the fact stated, and that is one which rarely or scarcely ever admits of such knowledge.

[Mr. TURNEY here said that the statement was, "that members were known" to have so acted.]

That would still be too strong a mode of expression to convey my meaning. I must have intended to say that members of this House were understood or believed to have voted for the Administration, from day to day, and month to month, under a promise of office; that their objects were so apparent as to cause them to be pointed at, and that they actually received office afterwards. Such must have been the substance of what I stated in the speech referred to; and I could appeal to many gentlemen upon this floor for the truth of the charge. I did not refer to members of the present Congress, for there had been no such test furnished of their motives or objects. But during the late Congress, especially, and the preceding one, I now reaffirm that there were several striking instances of the kind—instances in which the course of certain members was marked, and remarked upon—instances in which it was said among many of the more observant members of the Opposition, when speaking of some particular member, "there is a man who has got his assurances," and in due time will be translated from this House; and in every instance of this kind, which fell under my notice, except one, these suspicions were duly confirmed, and the honorable member placed in a haven of rest, secure from the storms and strife of Congressional service. I can state, for the information of my colleague, a still stronger case of the wonderful fulfilment of a prophecy in our day. In making certain party arrangements, the conduct of one gentleman was so remarkable, that another predicted, at the time, that he had made his bargain; that in due time he would expect to be placed in one of the highest stations under the Government, and the station was named. Those to whom the remark was made were incredulous to the existence of such profligacy; but, behold, after the lapse of a decent interval of time, the prophecy was miraculously fulfilled to the letter? But my colleague thinks that, in such a case, I ought to have given information to the House, or to the late committee of investigation, and to have named the individuals. This would not only be a very invidious task, but it might also be productive of great injustice to the individuals suspected. The circumstances upon which conclusions are drawn against the motives of members in this respect, are often of such a nature as to make but little impression upon the careless observer, and prove sometimes deceptive to the most watchful. In scarcely any case of the kind could positive evidence be adduced. It is, generally, only after the consummation of the arrangement, by the acceptance of office, that suspicion becomes stubborn fact; and then there is seldom any adequate inducement to prosecute an inquiry in this House. That the frequent appointment of members of Congress is a great abuse, and to show the true nature and consequences of such a practice, I will read, for the edification of my colleague, an authority which I know he will respect. I allude to the celebrated letter of the late President to the Tennessee Legislature, in which, after strongly recommending an amendment of the Constitution prohibiting the appointment of members of Congress to office, he draws the following picture of the consequences of a continuance of so dangerous a practice:

"But if this change in the Constitution should not be obtained, and important appointments continue to devolve on the representatives in Congress, it requires no depth of thought to be convinced that corruption will be the order of the day; and that, under the garb of conscientious sacrifice, to establish precedents for the public good, evils of serious importance to the freedom and prosperity of the Republic may arise. It is through this channel that the people may expect to be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty, and where tyranny may be well apprehended to spring up in some favorable emergency."

Yet, in the face of this solemn denunciation of the corrupt and fatal consequences of appointing members of Congress to office, General Jackson appointed between forty and fifty members of Congress to office during his single Administration!!! A greater number, I believe, than was appointed by all preceding administrations! If I am not mistaken, there have been nearly, if not quite, sixty appointments of members of Congress to office since the dominant party came into power; for, sir, this practice has not ceased since the present incumbent of the white house assumed the control of public affairs. Have we not lately seen one of the members of this House suddenly taken from among us and transferred to a distinguished station, under circumstances, when considered in connection with certain official changes and arrangements which grew out of it, which stamp it one of the grossest and most scandalous transactions of the kind ever perpetrated in the face of any public? I regarded these official arrangements at the time as an offence against public decency; and if they can be renewed at pleasure, without exciting the indignation of the country, I shall consider that there is no hope remaining for the preservation of this Government in any tolerable purity. So open, so shameless a defiance of all sense of shame and decency was never attempted, even in the days of Walpole, palpable and monstrous as were the corruptions of his administration. Yet, sir, I would not be thought illiberal upon this subject. I know the apology that is made for Gen. Jackson's violation of his own avowed principles upon this subject; and I think that, since there was no amendment of the Constitution, he might be excused for appointing a few members of Congress to office. It often happens that the ablest men, and those best qualified to promote the public service in particular branches of it, are members of Congress. But, sir, this can be no justification of the abuse of this privilege which has been practised of late. Nor, when I speak of the acceptance of office by members, after a term of unscrupulous party service here, do I mean to say that all who accept office are of this class. I have too high a respect for the general character of the House, I have too high an estimate of human nature, to make such a charge. On the contrary, members of both Houses of Congress, without doubt, are sometimes brought to accept particular employments, or to take charge of particular departments of the public service, contrary to their own wishes, or because they believe they can thereby render important service to their country or their party. To maintain the character of this House especially, and to preserve the confidence of the people in its general integrity and respectability, I regard as one of the first duties of a patriot and statesman in this country. If any thing I have said here or elsewhere may be thought to have a contrary bearing—if at any time I am supposed to have spoken in disparagement of it, let it be borne in mind that, to insure the public respect, it is necessary to point out and, if possible, to remedy imperfections which would soon destroy its authority and respectability. And I also ask gentlemen to remember who commenced this war upon the character of this House and of the representatives of the people. Who are they who for years, in the official organ of the Administration, in the public journals, generally, in its interest, and sometimes in this House, have held them up as unfaithful and unworthy of any great public trust? that they were Bank-bought, and that the Executive alone could be relied upon to maintain the rights and interests of the people? Sir, in the whole history of party warfare, there is not, in my opinion, a parallel to be found for the system of unqualified abuse and detraction which was for years pursued by the press in the service of the Administration, against the character, motives, and conduct of the representatives of the people in this House. But, sir, the moment a majority was secured in both Houses, who favored the views of the Executive, the tone of the partisans of power is suddenly changed; the Senate and House are filled with true patriots, worthy of the high trust with which the people have clothed them! And it is now only members of the minority who are faithless. It is now a high offence to impugn the motives and conduct of the Senate or House of Representatives—the constitutional guardians of the interests and liberties of the country!

But my colleague says that if I had any knowledge of such improper and corrupt conduct on the part of members of Congress as I alleged in my speech at Hartford, I was bound to have disclosed it to the committee of investigation, when called as a witness before it. My colleague, in another part of his remarks, took the same ground in relation to the frauds alleged to exist in the execution of the Creek treaty of 1832; and he in both cases strongly insinuated that, either way, I had been guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. His argument was, in substance, that if I had no knowledge of a corrupt motive in the appointment of members of Congress, or of actual frauds in the execution of the Creek treaty, I had made unfounded charges; or, if I had such knowledge, I ought to have made the disclosure before the committee of investigation, when I was sworn to tell the whole truth, in relation to any abuses or corruption of the Administration, within my knowledge. (6.)

My colleague, in connection with this part of the subject stated that I had not, after all, pointed out the existence of any fraud in the execution of the Creek treaty committed by the Government agents. My charge was, that the frauds commited on the Creek nation were the result either of the incompetency or bad faith of the agents of the Government, and that the Executive was responsible for having committed such important duties to such improper hands; and as to the question whether any frauds had been actually committed, I read from the communication of one of the agents concerned in the execution of the treaty to the Secretary of War, stating that he had good reason to believe that nineteen out of twenty of all the contracts certified by himself for the sale and transfer of Indian titles were fraudulent! Stronger proof of the truth of a charge I do not think can be adduced. If the agent had been both competent and faithful, frauds to such an extent would certainly never have been perpetrated, especially when we remember that it was the express duty of the agent to see that the Indians were not cheated.

Now, sir, I will answer the charge of dereliction of duty before the committee of investigation. It is true that I was summoned before that committee—a committee packed, and composed of a majority of thorough-paced partisans of power—to make good all the charges of abuse and corruption which I had ever in debate in this House alleged to exist in the administration of the Government. And I was summoned to do this by the committee at the express suggestion, or, rather, dictation of the President of the United States. Yes, sir, the President of the United States, in effect, ordered me to be summoned to give the sanction of my oath to all the charges I had ever made against his Administration on this floor, under penalty, upon failure thereof, to stand before the American people "a convicted calumniator." A grosser violation of the essential and fundamental privileges of this House never was perpetrated; and yet the House stood by a passive observer, and took no order upon the subject. If the true spirit of constitutional liberty had pervaded this House at that time; if that watchful jealousy of every approach of arbitrary power, so necessary to guard the public liberty, had then any abiding place here, such a proceeding would never have transpired in this Capitol.

Sir, the majority, the supporters of the party in power, slept over their own violated rights, and the rights of all the people of this country, when they permitted a member of this House, for words spoken in debate, to be subjected to such an inquisition by order of the President. Why I waived my privilege upon that occasion, how far I did so, for what reasons I thought proper to answer upon oath before that committee, the manner in which I was interrogated, the protest which I submitted, will show more fully and satisfactorily than any thing further I can say now, and I beg here indulgence of the committee to have it read.

[The CLERK of the House read the protest filed with the evidence given by Mr. BELL on oath before the committee of investigation in 1837.]

Mr. BELL resumed and said: To show my colleague that the Creek frauds did not escape my notice in the evidence I gave before the committee, I beg leave to read that part of it which relates to this subject, and I think my colleague will find that he has fallen into an error in supposing that I had failed to disclose what I knew of that branch of the abuses of the Government.

[Here Mr. BELL read that part of the testimony given before the committee of investigation which relates to frauds in the Creek nation.]

Mr. BELL resumed and said: I trust my colleague is now fully satisfied upon this point.

My colleague next read another passage from the speech delivered before a portion of my constituents, at Nashville, in 1835, in which I stated that I had never failed in showing a proper respect for General Jackson, and that I had faithfully supported his Administration, "and in every instance with that degree of zeal which could consistently and reasonably be expected."

My colleague refers to this declaration of mine, in 1835, as a proof of insincerity on my part, and to show that my conduct since that time has been at variance with my professions. My colleague also has asserted that I have changed my principles—asks what new lights have flashed upon me—complains, not that I have changed, but that I should abuse my old political associates, whose principles I have deserted, and he could assign no other than a corrupt motive for the change of my politics. It may surprise other gentlemen as well as my colleague to hear that, up to this day, I have never failed in personal respect to Gen. Jackson. There are some members of this House who can never discriminate between personal abuse or invective and the fair and proper use of that essential privilege in a free country—the privilege of indulging in free and open discussion, and in severe and pointed denunciation of public character and conduct. While I have often spoken of General Jackson's public conduct in such terms as I thought they merited, I repeat that I have never said a word which was intended to be, or can be properly considered, personally offensive to him. In speaking of his public life and conduct, I have forborne many expressions which a parliamentary license might justify. For example, I have never said that General Jackson was a usurper, a tyrant, a despot, or a dictator, though I believe he has assumed powers not vested in him by the Constitution and laws, and that he has, in many instances, acted in a manner arbitrary, despotic, and

(6) My colleague, in his printed speech, has enlarged upon his remarks in the House upon this topic. What he then only insinuated, and urged by way of argument and inference in the House, he now charges directly, and is, besides, more specific. Near the conclusion of his printed speech will be found the following statement: "I would next use his [my] evidence, given on oath before a celebrated select committee of the House, when and where he was, after being first sworn to tell the whole truth, minutely interrogated as to his knowledge of Executive frauds, corruptions, or usurpations, and, in answer thereto, fully acquitted, not only the Executive himself, but all the heads of Departments, of any charge or imputation."

If any one shall feel either interest or curiosity enough to form a correct estimate of the character of the assailants habitually employed against me, and also to form some idea of the atrocious calumnies which find countenance among the leaders of the party in power, he need trouble himself no further than to consider well the import of the statement above quoted from the printed speech of my colleague, and then to turn to the extracts from my protest and the evidence given by me before the select committee. It will be seen that, in the single short sentence quoted, there are at least four distinct and palpable misrepresentations of grave matters of fact, all of which are of record, and these misrepresentations, therefore, admit no defensive cavil or palliation. 1. A single question was propounded to me in committee, and no more, which I submitted to answer only in a qualified manner. 2. That question was limited to any act within my knowledge of either of the heads of Departments which was either corrupt, or a violation of official duty. 3. I did not, in my answer, acquit any of the Executive chiefs of any charge. 4. Nor did I acquit them of any imputation.

dictatorial; nor have I ever attributed to him private motives or interests as the reasons for his public conduct; and I appeal to all those with whom I am in habits of intimate friendship to say whether I am in the habit of indulging, even in private conversation, in personal invective against him.

Now, sir, as to the charge that I have changed my principles. This has been the standing theme of my opponents ever since I declared against the candidate of the Baltimore Convention; but I defy my colleague, or any other member of this House, or any man in the whole country, to point to any act, or vote, or speech of mine, in the course of ten years' service in this House, in which I have manifested a change of principle. Sir, this declaration does not depend on my personal asseveration. The journals of this House contain the record of my votes, and numerous printed speeches may be referred to to contradict or confirm what I assert. I can confidently point to the record, and defy the severest scrutiny of my enemies to produce the evidence of any change of those political principles which I avowed and acted upon from the first moment I had the honor of a seat in this House to this good day. The subject we are now discussing is directly connected with one of the most exciting, and, in a political point of view, most perilous measures of policy adopted in the early part of General Jackson's administration: I mean the policy of Indian removal. I gave my zealous and hearty support to it in its origin, and at a time when there was a bare majority in this House in its favor. When have I, in any instance, failed still to give it my zealous and faithful support in the seven or eight years of its operation? I am at this moment giving it my support as zealously as in 1830.

The next great question which arose under General Jackson's administration, was presented distinctly by the celebrated veto of the Maysville road bill. The expediency and policy of adopting a system of internal improvements by the Federal Government was then one of the most prominent and important questions of the day. I had made up my mind upon that question before General Jackson came into power. I opposed the system with zeal and industry, and I have continued to oppose it up to this time. I have even gone beyond General Jackson in my opposition to this system; I have kept the faith upon this point of his early creed even better than himself and most of his followers. The journals of this House shall be my witness.

The next great question which arose in the early part of Gen. Jackson's administration, was the tariff. Here again I concurred with the Administration in its views and measures in relation to that subject. With General Jackson, I was opposed to excessive or prohibitory duties for any purpose, while I neither denied the power nor the expediency of affording incidental protection to domestic manufactures; and wherein have I departed from my principles in relation to this great question of national policy? I deny that I have given the slightest evidence of such change. With the late Administration, I was opposed to nullification. I am still opposed to nullification. The only remaining subject of great interest and importance, which agitated and divided the country during Gen. Jackson's administration, and which was held up as a test of political principle, was the bank question. My course in relation to this subject, it has suited the purposes of my enemies to pervert and misrepresent in every form, and by the propagation of the most infamous calumnies. This question was not even thought of, or, if thought of, was never mentioned, or heeded, before General Jackson was actually installed in power; at all events, it was not agitated in Tennessee before that time; and, in the spring of 1832, a short time before the question of the recharter of the late United States Bank was decided in this House, the principal citizens of Nashville, the merchants and other business-men, who were the intimate associates and neighbors of Gen. Jackson, did not know his opinions upon this subject. A few months before that time, in the fall of 1831, at a public meeting called to express the sentiments of the inhabitants of Nashville upon the subject of the recharter of that institution, one of the present Senators from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] actually attended the meeting, and by his address defeated the expression of the sentiment of the meeting, by alleging that it might embarrass General Jackson's administration, or do an injury to the objects they had in view, by expressing their opinions, inasmuch as it would be presumed every where that their opinion would reflect the opinion of General Jackson himself. I refer to this anecdote to show how carefully General Jackson disguised his own opinions upon this question. All that was said in his early message continued to be regarded as equivocal, and by no means decisive of his course. When the question was presented in this House in 1832, I expressed my opinion upon the subject in debate upon this floor, and I then only expressed the opinion which I had entertained before; and I take this occasion, in this place, and in the most solemn manner, to declare that the man does not live who can truly say that I have changed any opinion or mine connected with this whole subject, from the time I took my seat in this House, now more than ten years ago. I defy the utmost malice of my enemies to point to the slightest evidence of a change of sentiment upon this subject, either in the journals of this House, or in any speech of mine either written or unwritten. I have, ever since I came into Congress, admitted admitted the expediency of a National Bank, and at the same time held that the question of constitutional power must be regarded as settled by the long practice and acquiescence of the country; (7) but still, sir, when, by means of the power and popularity of General Jackson, concurring with the interests of party, both the late Bank and the idea of any Bank of the United States had been successfully assailed and brought into great odium with the people, I took the ground that I would not be instrumental in chartering any Bank of the United States until the people were convinced of their error, and were ready to acquiesce in the necessity of such an institution. So strong and lively has been my sense of the mischiefs to the country which have, and must ever, spring from the connection of such a subject with the conflicts of party, that I have long since made up my mind never to agree to a measure of the kind in opposition to a powerful minority. However strange it may appear to some gentlemen, I will state this further fact, that even during the canvass of last summer, and after the sentiment had become almost universal in a large portion of my district, that nothing but a Bank of the United States could remedy the disorders of the currency and exchanges, and restore the prosperity of the country, I repeatedly and openly declared to my constituents that I would not, during the present Congress, or at any future time, give my vote in favor of a Bank of the United States as long as a charter could only be carried by a mere majority in Congress, unless I should be imperatively instructed by them; and when I declared the certain evils of such a course, and pointed out the fatal consequences of the protracted party warfare which might be expected to grow out of it, and the uncertain issue of it, they had confidence enough in my judgment, and in the honesty of my intentions, to acquiesce in my course.

I have now enumerated all the great and leading questions which marked the early part of General Jackson's administration. In which of them have I faltered? Where is the evidence of the change of which my colleague speaks? But my colleague is not the only organ of this charge against me. I observe that in a late biographical sketch of a distinguished individual, [Mr. POLK,] published in one of the periodicals of the day, which aspires to respectability, (the Democratic Review,) the same base calumny is propagated in the most offensive connection.(8)

But my colleague inquires how it happened that I continued to give my support to General Jackson's administration during so many years, when the same abuses existed of which I now complain; the same violations of the Constitution; the same extravagance in the national expenditures. My colleague spoke particularly of the increase in the expenditures, and affirmed that I was a party to it, and responsible for it, by my votes. I can inform my colleague that he does me gross injustice in this statement, and that he will find, by referring to the journals of this House, that I voted against a large portion of the expenditures of each year of General Jackson's administration, which, in my opinion, were not sanctioned by any sound policy or principle. I therefore deny the responsibility attempted to be thrown upon me. But upon this question of expenditure, as well as in regard to various other abuses of power during the late Administration, I will inform my colleague it was within the last three years only that they were alarmingly developed. The annual expenditures in 1829, exclusive of the public debt, were $12,659,490; in 1830, $13,229,533; in 1831, $13,864,067; in 1832, $16,516,388. By the pension act of 1832, and some other extraordinary demands upon the Treasury, the expenditures of 1833 rose to the sum of $22,713,755, exclusive of the public debt; but in 1834, they were reduced to $18,495,417, and in 1835 to $17,573,141. There is, as my colleague will see, a vast disproportion between these sums and the $30,000,000 and upwards to which the annual expenditures of the Government have lately risen, and which, I fear, we are never to see reduced. The annual expenditures prior to 1836 do not much exceed an average increase over the expenditures of the former administration, of which I would complain. They come within the limit which I have often said in this House I regarded as not going beyond a just proportion to the increased population, resources, and necessary public establishments of the country. As to the other abuses of which I complain, it is true that some of them existed in every period of General Jackson's administration; but I deny that they ever had my sanction for one moment. Besides the great and leading questions which arose in the early part of General Jackson's administration, of which I have already spoken, there were certain other important principles and measures of Government which he came into power pledged to carry out; and before he actually assumed the Government, they were regarded as the peculiar and distinguishing principles of his party. Among these may be enumerated the limitation of Executive patronage, and a thorough reform of all the abuses which had brought the patronage of the Government into conflict with the freedom of elections. Under this head, all interference of public officers in elections, and all removals from office for opinion's sake, were denounced as corrupting in their tendency, and dangerous, to the last degree, to the purity and stability of our free institutions. Sir, these important principles were disregarded in the early part of the late Administration, and before the close of it they were openly violated, and in practice utterly repudiated. But, sir, I then opposed and protested against these abuses, and I defy mortal man to show any case in which they had my approval. Upon all these questions, and many more, it will be found, upon a proper scrutiny, that General Jackson never did have my support. Yet, sir, I am denounced and calumniated for having changed my principles, when I have stood fast by them during my whole public life, by the very men and their instruments who have themselves violated and treated with indifference or contempt nearly every principle to which they stood pledged when they first came into power.

My colleague suppose that he finds in another passage of my speech at Nashville, in the spring of 1835, conclusive evidence of the inconsistency and insincerity of my public course and professions. In that speech I referred to the efforts which the enemies of Judge White were making to seduce the people into the belief that he and his friends in Tennessee were the opponents of General Jackson and his administration; and I expressed the opinion that the friends of Judge White would "adhere to the administration of General Jackson, from consistency and respect for their own character, and because they would be supporting their own principles." Well, sir, such were the views and intentions of the leading friends of Judge White in Tennessee at the period of the speech quoted by my colleague. They had supported certain leading principles of General Jackson's administration up to that time, in which they had differed from the Opposition, as well as from a considerable portion of the supporters of the same Administration. They did not intend to desert their principles by supporting Judge White. They neither intended to desert nor defeat their party, but to regenerate it: to rescue it, if possible, from the guidance of bad men, and to restore it to its original principles. They could not foresee that, by uniting with the Opposition, they could effect any great or patriotic purpose; while, on the other hand, it was held to be their true policy, and it was clearly their wisest course, to preserve their former relations with General Jackson, and to preserve the confidence and respect of the mass of the people, his ardent supporters. General Jackson's popularity and influence were then in their meridian height; his name alone was a tower of strength; he was in his last term. He could not be removed from power; and two years would close his political career. It was regarded as worse than idle to attempt to overthrow his power in the short term that remained of his administration. How well the friends of Judge White understood the power of General Jackson's name and influence was soon fully and fatally demonstrated. When the name of Judge White was first presented as a candidate, nearly the whole Southwest hailed the announciation with joy and satisfaction; but I wish, for the sake of our free institutions, that the sequel had never been revealed to the world. The moment General Jackson was understand to disapprove, hundreds, nay, sir, thousands, instantly turned about and condemned and opposed the movement in favor of Judge White with the same zeal with which they had so recently applauded and supported it.

But my colleague again asks if the same abuses, which I have denounced in such strong terms, did not exist at that time; and why I did not then proclaim them to the country; and how I could continue the support of an Administration which practised them.

It is true, sir, as I have already stated, that many of these abuses did exist—they were known to exist, as well as to many others, leading friends of Judge White. I allude particularly to the great abuse of the appointing power—proscription for opinion's sake—the irregularities and abuses which were suffered in some branches of the public service. In the Land Office, in the Post Office Department, in the Indian service, these were known to exist—they were protested against—and all the influences we could bring to bear were employed through every channel which was believed to hold out any hope of success, in order to correct them.(9) These things the friends of Judge White, in Tennessee, saw and deplored. But still, all the while, there were other questions which were continually agitating and absorbing public attention; and upon these other questions the friends of Judge White generally acted with the Administration. What were they to do under such circumstances? The course which wisdom and patriotism and sound principle, in their opinion, dictated, they endeavored to pursue. To make ineffectual war upon General Jackson's administration, to denounce it for errors and abuses, while it had the support of the people upon other great and absorbing questions of the day, would not only have been inconsistent with their own course, so far as those questions were concerned, but every prospect of future relief and reform would have been blasted. The friends of Judge White saw the full extent of the evils of the Administration; they saw that many of the cardinal principles upon which the late Administration came into power were trampled upon. They saw and knew the interests and passions that were at work to uphold all the abuses and irregularities which were known to exist. They knew the guiding spirits of late, and who were sure to control the ensuing Administration if their plans should succeed. They knew that a successor had already been agreed upon by those who had exercised a fatal influence upon General Jackson's administration from the commencement. And they resolved, in the only way which was open to them, by every constitutional and honorable means, to oppose and, if possible, to break down a system and order of things which they believed, ere long, would afflict the country with the greatest calamities. But, sir, the adherents of power, and the supporters of the candidate of the party, as he was called, were not content with the course which Judge White and his friends were disposed to pursue. They calculated well the influence of General Jackson's popularity. They provoked, denounced, and insulted the friends of Judge White in every form and manner known in the practice of the worst faction that ever afflicted a free country, with a determination to drive them into opposition to General Jackson's Administration. General Jackson himself finally denounced them as his enemies, as deserters from their principles, and as foes to Republican institutions; and thus most of the leading friends of Judge White, while they continued faithfully to support all the measures of the late Administration, which they had ever approved, and to sustain the great and leading principles upon which they had originally given him their support, were driven, by the violence and intolerance of their opponents, to resort to the natural and just law of retaliation for their own protection. They found, in the sequel, that they had no choice between absolute submission, not only to the undisturbed rule of General Jackson while he continued President, which they were well disposed to do, but also to his attempts to dictate a successor, on the one hand, and a bold and determined opposition, on the other.

My colleague next recurred, for a few moments, to the subject under debate. He noticed what I had previously said of the disposition of the people of Tennessee to acquiesce in the permanent residence of the Cherokees in that portion of their ancient possessions which lies within the limits of that State. My colleague thinks I am mistaken, and that the State would not submit to any course of policy which would allow them to remain where they are. When I spoke of the just and benevolent sentiments which actuated the people of Tennessee upon this subject, I expressly referred to a period antecedent to the late treaty stipulations, and to the Georgia movement against the policy pursued by the Federal Government; a period antecedent to the efforts made by Ross and the other principal chiefs of the Cherokees to establish an Indian State upon such a basis as would, in my opinion, have been utterly inconsistent with the rights, interests, and sovereignty of several of the States of this Union. But for these high pretensions, set up by the Indians themselves, and the opposition of Georgia, I shall believe and reaffirm that the citizens of Tennessee never would have sought to possess their lands, or to trench upon any of their ancient privileges.

My colleague also claims to be the advocate of the rights and interests of the poor. He, for one, would not be willing to tax the poor man in order to conciliate "lazy and thieving Indians," or to buy their friendship; and he is, therefore, opposed to the amendment offered by me to the bill under discussion. Now, sir, I beg leave to say that I am as much in favor of protecting

(7) I voted against the bill to recharter the United States Bank in 1832, for the reasons stated in the speech I made upon it at the time, and which did not deny either the expediency or constitutionality of a bank. It is proper, also, to add, that I protested against the removal of the deposites; but when they were removed, although I did not defend that measure, I refused, under the circumstances, to vote for their restoration.

(8) It can scarcely have happened that the distinguished subject of the memoir, alluded to in my speech, did not give his deliberate sanction to all the material statements in it; and I therefore hazard nothing in regarding him as the responsible author.

(9) In confirmation of this statement, I could refer to several gentlemen who yet adhere to the party in power, but who concurred fully with me, as often as I conferred with them in the opinions expressed as to the existence of abuses in the late Administration; and some of whom united with me in several efforts to remedy them. The time may come when these gentlemen may be at liberty to speak upon this subject. I flattered myself that some of them were prepared to brave with me the storm which was inevitable in pursuing the only course which remained to effect the desired reform; but they consulted, perhaps, a sounder discretion.

the rights of the industrious and poor as my colleague can be, or any one else. I would be as much opposed to taking the bread from the mouth of labor as any member of this House; and it is precisely upon this ground that I moved the proposition to apply two millions of the money which it may be necessary to expend in driving the Indians beyond the Mississippi, at the point of the bayonet, to the purpose of conciliation, and to induce them to remove voluntarily. But it is not the expense of a forcible removal by the military that I propose to avoid by the policy I recommend. Though the Indians may remove without raising a tomahawk, or levelling a rifle, at a white man, when he sees assembled around him an array of five thousand men, yet he goes with revenge in his heart, and a concealed resolution to seize the first opportunity to wreak it upon the frontier settlements. And it is the tens of millions of dollars which will probably have to be annually drawn from the industry of the poor, as well as from the pockets of the rich, in supporting a large standing army, for the protection of the frontier, that I propose to save by the amendment I have offered. It is offered upon a principle of economy, as well as humanity.

Before he concluded his remarks, my colleague spoke of the "eulogies and encomiums" I was once in the habit of pronouncing on Gen. Jackson. He said, if he had time, he could read other extracts from my Nashville speech, to show how I then eulogized his conduct and character. My colleague alluded to my former course in this respect to demonstrate how strangely it contrasts with my present mode of speaking of that distinguished individual. Now, sir, I deny that my colleague can read any such extracts as he describes from my Nashville speech, or from any other speech I ever made, in this House or out of it. I defy him, or any other member, to show that it has ever been my habit in my speeches, whether printed or existing only in memory, to speak of Gen. Jackson in the fulsome strain of adulation and eulogy which is so common with those who have no other merit to recommend them to public favor. I never was a dependant or hanger-on of that distinguished man, though for years I supported the leading measures of his Administration faithfully, and even zealously. I have always spoken of Gen Jackson and his services as I thought they deserved. I have always conceded to him the due meed of applause and gratitute for his military services; and when he first came into power as the political chief of the country, I was prepared to hail him first in civil renown in our day, had he carried out all the principles he avowed before his elevation; but, sir, a blight soon came over that dream; and it is some consolation to me now that I never, even when I had high expectations of the success of Gen. Jackson's administration, descended to court either his favor or the public applause, by pronouncing unmerited eulogies upon his character and services.

I have now answered all the material points of the speech of my colleague, I hope, in a manner satisfactory to all who have heard me; and I will, therefore, trespass no longer upon the attention of the committee.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,
OF KENTUCKY,

In Senate, April 11, 1838—On the bill to reduce the price of certain of the public lands.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

I have so often, Mr. President, presented my views to the Senate on the subject of the public domain, that I would willingly avoid troubling it on this occasion. But so many changes have taken place in this body since I last addressed it, and I consider this bill of such vast importance, that I cannot reconcile it to a sense of duty to remain silent. The proper administration of our immense public domain forms one of the highest duties of Congress. It is a sacred trust, from the faithful discharge of which no partial, party, or temporary considerations should induce Congress to swerve. A character of stability ought to be impressed on whatever system may be adopted. Fluctuations in the policy of the Government are not only injurious to the subject of the trust itself, but exercise a pernicious influence upon real estate throughout the United States.

Before I proceed to a more particular examination of the bill, I will endeavor to describe its true nature and purport It proposes—

1st. That, after the end of the present year, all the public lands of the United States, which had remained unsold for a term of five years, shall be reduced from $1 25 per acre to $1 per acre.

2d. That all lands which had remained unsold for a term of ten years shall be reduced to $1 per acre during the next year, and after that time to 75 cents per acre.

And, 3d. That all lands which had remained unsold for fifteen years shall be reduced, during the next year, to 75 cents per acre, and after that time to 50 cents per acre.

Thus it is seen that the project is not to graduate the public lands, and to affix a price upon them according to their respective values, but it is to reduce the price of the whole of the public lands which have been in the market during the periods specified in the bill. A plan of graduation, according to value, would have a good deal to recommend it, if it were not so difficult, not to say impracticable, in its execution. The principle of such a plan would require that the value should govern in affixing the price, whether it was above or below the minimum of $1 25 per acre, now established by law. But to graduate according to value would require a multitude of prices, since no two tracts of land are exactly alike, and possess precisely the same value. To avoid such various prices, in devising the present land system of the United States, its founders thought it best to direct the public lands, when first brought into market, to be exposed by auction, at public sale, to the highest bidder; and, after the termination of the public sales, to allow the lands to be purchased, by private entry, at a fixed rate. That rate is now $1 25 per acre—so low, so moderate, often so far below the actual value of the land, that every industrious man, however poor, may acquire a permanent home, and thousands are enriching themselves by purchasing from the public, and subsequently selling to individuals. This bill is not framed in conformity to the opinion of the President, in his message at the opening of this session. After bestowing merited commendation upon the salutary operation of the existing land system, he recommends a graduation, founded upon a previous valuation. He supposes that it is wisest to know what the subject is actually worth, and, after having ascertained that, to affix the price or prices accordingly. But this bill, without the advantage of that information, proceeds at once arbitrarily to reduce the price of the public lands, and, for that purpose, to throw them into three classes, not upon the basis of value, but upon that of time.

The bill will operate immediately upon 71,000,000 acres of public lands. The amount in value, which the bill will reduce on that quantity of the public domain, is $88,988,090. It is equivalent to a grant of that sum, belonging to the people of the United States. If the principle of reduction contained in the bill be adopted, it will be practically carried out, no doubt, hereafter; and consequently, as each class of land, by the lapse of time, falls into the other, it must become subject to the price of the class in which it is merged. In the space, therefore, of ten years, this whole quantity of 71,000,000 acres must be reduced to the low price of 50 cents per acre. The total amount, therefore, of the loss, which the people of the United States must bear by the adoption of this measure, in its direct application to the land on which it immediately operates, will be $53,243,051, subject, however, to a deduction for intermediate sales. These, for a few years to come, are not likely to be very large, owing to the great quantity of public land which has been sold during the last two or three years.

But this is a very limited view of the extent of the whole loss which the people of the United States will be subject to, by the adoption of this measure of reduction. If it is now sanctioned, it will become the settled policy of the country, and must be applied to all the countless millions of waste land as they are hereafter surveyed and successively brought into market. There are in the States and Territories of the United States about 240,000,000 acres of public land yet to be brought into market. These will all become subject to the principle of reduction. Estimating at $1 25 per acre, which I have no doubt, under a fair administration of the land system, they would ultimately produce, the total amount they would yield would be $300,000,000. If reduced to 50 cents per acre, the price which, according to the policy of this bill, they must finally reach, the loss would be $180 000,000, subject to a deduction of the amount which might be sold before they arrived at that low rate. But this is not the whole extent of the influence of the policy now attempted to be introduced of reducing the price of the public lands, after they have been exhibited for short periods of time in the market. The quantity of the public domain, exterior to the limits of the present States and Territories of the United States, has been estimated at 750,000,000 acres, all of which would fall, beyond all doubt, within the scope of that policy. The loss which the people of the United States would sustain by reducing the price of that whole quantity of land from $1 25 to 50 cents per acre may be easily calculated.

But the injurious effect of the measure under consideration is not yet all told. To bring into market, at a reduced rate, 71,000,000 acres of land—a quantity equal to the formation of two large States—would necessarily affect the value of real estate throughout the whole Union. We might not be able to distinctly trace the operation of such a measure, but no considerate man can hesitate to believe that it would exercise an influence upon real property every where in the United States. If there were no public lands for sale, land would rise in value, because, whilst the quantity remains stationary, there would be a constantly increasing demand for it, arising out of the continual growth of population. The law which regulates prices according to supply and demand, governs real estate as well as it does commercial commodities; and if the supply exceed the demand, the price must necessarily fall. It cannot, therefore, be doubted that if the United States, the greatest landholder in the country, throw into the market 71,000,000 acres, at a greatly reduced rate, the effect must reach every landholder in the United States, affecting most sensibly lands in States contiguous to those which include the public lands.

This, Mr. President, is a fair description of the nature and consequences of the proposed measure. Why are we called upon at this moment to adopt it? The currency is disordered, the people are in debt; and yet, at such a period as this, we are asked to sanction a bill, which shall throw into the market an immense quantity of the common property of the people of the United States, and which must inevitably cripple their means, to disembarrass themselves from existing difficulties.

The bill proceeds upon the erroneous assumption that the lands in market have not been sold, because they were not worth the price demanded by Government. That conclusion might not be altogether unreasonable, if the supply had been exactly proportioned to the annual demand. But let us see how the fact is. Taking a period of nearly eighteen years, beginning with the year 1820, and ending the 30th of September, 1837, there has been a quantity of land brought into market of 122,512,384 acres. This was what had been, prior to the year 1820, brought into the market, and remained unsold. During the first nine years of that term, there was not on an average a million of acres per annum sold, whilst there were nearly 60,000,000 brought into market. In the year 1820 there were 8,388,675 acres brought into the market, and only 303,404 acres sold. During the year 1821 there were 10,919 480 acres exhibited to sale, and but 751,215 acres sold. During the whole term of eighteen years, there were less than three and a half millions per annum, on an average, sold, whilst there was double that quantity thrown into the market. Deducting the quantity of upwards of 32,000,000 acres, which were sold during the extraordinary years of 1835 and 1836, the average quantity sold each year of the term would fall below 2,000,000 acres. This view, of the subject, derived from official documents now before us demonstrates that the cause of so much land remaining on hand unsold has been, not that it is not worth the small minimum price demanded by Government, but that a supply has been thrown into the market far exceeding the necessary wants of our growing population. This inordinate supply has proceeded from the urgent demands upon the General Government, made by the new States, to bring more and more fresh lands into the market. The power of absorption has been wholly inadequate to take up the immense quantity of the public domain which has been exhibited to sale. If the Federal Government had gradually fed the public demand, proportioning the supply to the annual wants of the community, we should not have seen such a quantity remaining unsold. The new States are not justly liable to reproach for having forced the General Government to bring so much land into market: but if, after having yielded to their wishes, that Government should now be urged to sacrifice the surplus which remains undisposed of, there would be just cause of complaint on the part of the people of the United States.

It is not true that the 71,000,000 acres, on which this bill would operate, have not been sold, because they are not worth the minimum price of Government. Time is wanted to effect the sale. Time is wanted to enable the demand, by the progress of population, and the course of emigration, to come up to the superabundant supply which has been put in the market, in conformity with the urgent entreaties of the new States. We must exercise patience, and we are urged by the highest and most patriotic considerations to practise that admirable virtue in relation to the public domain. Next to our invaluable free institutions, no single circumstance illustrates the happy condition of the people of the United States more strikingly than the possession of that public domain. Prudently and properly administered, it is destined to enrich the present generation, and posterity for countless ages to come. And it is a sure resource against all the evils of pauperism, so afflicting to many of the nations of the Old World. The example of Ohio affords the most encouraging evidence of the value of that virtue to which I have adverted. There was in that State upwards of sixteen and a half millions of acres of public land. It has been all disposed of except a quantity not exceeding 2,000,000. And notwithstanding the reduced quantity, sales have been more active in Ohio, within a few years past, than in most of the new States. In the State of Indiana, where the Government owned about twenty and a half millions of acres, all has been disposed of but a quantity less than four and a half millions. And I have no doubt that if we will only wait patiently for the operation of natural causes, most of the public lands in the States northwest of the Ohio river will produce to Government the very moderate price of $1 25 per acre, which is now demanded. In the State of Illinois, I am assured, from information derived from the most credible and satisfactory sources, that there is scarcely one acre in fifty that is not good arable, farming land. And a vast proportion of all the lands in the Northwestern States are among the finest and fattest soils in the world.

It has been contended that, in the Southwestern States, there are vast quantities of pine lands barren and unproductive, and not worth even the 50 cents per acre. It has been, indeed, asserted that large portions of them are absolutely worthless. If this representation of them be true, they will not sell under the operation of this bill. Why, then, make a reduction in the price of these lands, when a sale of them cannot be forced, even at the reduced rate? Why reduce the price of all the lands in the United States, good and bad, to bring it to a standard which will not adapt it to the condition of the very lands which form the pretext for reduction? The effect of such a reduction will be to bring down the good lands worth now the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, whilst it will have no influence upon those which, it is asserted, are not worth even 50 cents per acre. Had we not better leave the system in undisturbed operation, until a sale shall be effected of that part of the public domain which is really worth the Government price? Is it not best to profit by the experience which we have derived from the examples of Ohio and Indiana, which assure us that, with reasonable patience, we shall in time be able to sell all the lands in the Northwestern region? If these poor pine barren lands be really as worthless as they are represented to be, no one is injured by their remaining where they are, undisposed of. The Government would, indeed, do an injury, if it were to tempt any poor man to purchase and settle himself upon these unproductive lands by reducing their price to the low rate which is proposed. Such a man had better give $1 25 or even $10 per acre for really fertile land, than settle himself and his family upon barren and unproductive lands, if they were given to him.

We are bound, Mr. President, by the nature of the trust confided to our care, to administer this public property as we would similar property if it belonged to us individually. If any private man owned a large body of land, the greater portion of which was worth $1 25 per acre, and the residue worth not more than fifty cents per acre, would he commit the folly of reducing the price to the lowest standard? Would he sacrifice the good land in order to make the impracticable attempt of selling the bad? Would he not first sell the good, and reserve the bad to be disposed of in future, according to circumstances? And do not gentlemen perceive that the effect of this bill will be to stimulate again that spirit of speculation which has recently been so powerfully active, and which has led to such disastrous consequences? If you throw into the market 71,000,000 acres of the public land, at the reduced rates provided for in this bill, will not speculators engross all the good portions of them, and subsequently sell them at increased prices? At the present rate at which the public lands are sold, vast numbers of individuals are amassing large fortunes by purchasing from the Government, and subsequently selling at advanced prices. I have heard of many instances of such purchases at $1 25 per acre, and of the same land being sold, in the short circle of a year, at five, ten, fifteen, and twenty dollars per acre. If we are admonished by the state of the times to avoid throwing out any new incentives to speculation, we are equally dissuaded, by the disordered state of the currency, from touching the price of the public lands until that shall again become sound.

Nor can we find, in the progress of the population of the new States, any motive for quickening it by reducing the price of the public lands. If the new States were settling slowly, if emigration to them were tardy and reluctant, it might be necessary to throw out fresh stimulants and new incentives, by reducing the price of the public lands. The very reverse, however, of all this is the fact. The new States are increasing with unexampled rapidity. This is demonstrated by the results of the last census, and is substantiated by indisputable information since received. But if there were any doubt upon this subject, as we are now within two years of the time when we shall have to make a periodical enumeration of the people of the United States, we ought to wait until that operation is accomplished. Whevever it is, extraordinary as the growth of many of the new States had been prior to the year 1830, it will, I think, be discovered that Mississippi, Michigan, and Wisconsin, have outstripped them all in rapid growth. Without, however, waiting for the returns of the next census, let us revert to those of that of 1830, to see if they are such as to require of us to stimulate the growth of the new States.

It may be recollected by some of the members of the Senate that this interesting subject of the public lands was thrown upon the Committee on Manufactures, some years ago, for motives not of the most friendly nature, as I had reason to suppose, towards me personally. On that occasion I presented to the Senate a report, accompanied by a table, exhibiting various comparative views of the progress of population in the United States, derived from the census of 1820 and that of 1830. At the time of making that report, the Union was composed of twenty-four States, seventeen old ones and seven new ones, Arkansas and Michigan being since admitted. The increase of the population of the whole twenty-four States, during the period of ten years, from 1820 to 1830, was 32.74, or a little less than 33 per cent. The increase of the seven new States, during the same term, was 85.43 per cent. The increase of the seventeen old States, during the same term, was 25.14. Thirteen of the seventeen States increased in that term only 17.28. The annual average increase of the seven new States was 5¾ per cent. The annual average increase of the seventeen old States, during the term, was a little more than 2½ per cent. The increase of Illinois, the most rapidly growing State during that term, averaged annually 13½ per cent.; thus duplicating its numbers in a little more than the short term of five years. From that table, which presents various other interesting views with which I will not now trouble the Senate, it results, first: That the increase of population in the seven new States, during the term referred to, averaged nearly four times the increase in the population of the seven old States during the same term. Secondly: That it was nearly five times as great as that of thirteen of seventeen of the old States. Thirdly: That the population of Illinois increased upwards of ten times as fast, on the average, during the same term. Such, Mr. President, are the astonishing results in the progress of population in the seven new States, during the ten years which elapsed from 1820 to 1830. And I venture the confident prediction that those which will be disclosed by the census of 1840, will be found to be not less surprising.

In view of such results, can any one, the most ardent friend of the new States, (and I yield to none in fervent wishes for their prosperity) impartially believe or justly contend that fresh stimulus is wanted to emigration? No one derives more pleasure than I do in witnessing the rapid growth and unexampled prosperity of the new States. They are gratifying triumphs of our system, and attest the wisdom of that plan for the administration of the public lands, under the operation of which they have been achieved, and which is now sought to be essentially disturbed. The principal accession of population in the new States is derived from the old States. Their gain is our loss. Among the old States which contribute mostly by emigration to the growth of the new States, Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee may be placed at the head. They have no just cause to complain, and do not complain, at the loss of population which they sustain. But if undue stimulus and inordinate encouragement were given to emigration by sacrificing or unnecessarily reducing the price of the public lands, the old States would have just cause to complain. Such an unnecessary reduction would be attended with a triple injury to them of reducing the value of lands within their respective limits; of diminishing their interest in the public domain, the common property of the people of the United States; and of offering a bounty to their citizens to remove from their limits, and to settle themselves in the new States. Is this right or reasonable? If it were necessary to the well-being of the new States, the sacrifice would be cheerfully borne by the old. But it has been seen that their growth is quite fast enough for their welfare and happiness. The new States are supplied with population from all the States, bringing together their customs, laws, prejudices, and habits. Time is necessary to harmonise these various elements, and to amalgamate and consolidate them. If they were to populate faster than they now do, the elements of discord would be disseminated, and the period of their becoming homogeneous would be postponed.

We have heard, upon this and upon other occasions, our system of distributing the public lands reproached for illiberality, and as deviating from the practice of other nations. But is there any justice in this reproach? Our system proceeds upon the principle that the public lands are the properiy of the whole people of the United States, to be disposed of for the common benefit, and not to be wasted on favorites and parasites. The most liberal grants have been, and continue to be, made to the new States for purposes of education and improvement. The Government price is fixed at so low a rate that every poor man, with moderate industry, may readily acquire a home. And what are the systems of other countries which are held up to admiration, and which we are called upon to imitate? Provinces and principalities are granted by them to court favorites, and to speculating adventurers. Look at the practice of Spain. Louisiana and Arkansas are now suffering from the enormous grants lavished on two noblemen, the Marquis de Maison Rouge and the Baron Bastrop. And Florida was, at one time, covered with similar grants made to favorites about the Court of Madrid. Under the British colonial system, vast grants of land were often made to favored companies, courtiers, and favorite individuals, retarding settlement, and to the prejudice of the nation. The superiority of our own system is illustrated by the fruits it has produced, and gentlemen would have as much cause to reproach us for the existence of our free institutions, (quite as peculiar as our land system,) and to call upon us to adopt the monarchical forms of other countries, as to arraign the policy by which the Government has been hitherto guided in the disposal of the public lands. Ours is the Government of the States and the people. The public domain is the property of the States and the people. The proper administration of it (it cannot be too often repeated) is a sacred trust, which imposes on the trustee the obligation of advancing the common interest of all the States, and all the people; and there is no one quality more desirable to be infused into the administration of that trust than that of stability. Whatever concerns the whole real estate of the country should be guardedly and cautiously touched, and yet we are perpetually called upon to alter and vary the existing system of distributing the public lands. Are the sales rapid, fearfully rapid? Gentlemen call out for a reduction of the price. Are they slow? Gentlemen still call out for reduction of the price. Is speculation wild and reckless and romantic? Reduction of price is the remedy of our doctors. Is it quiet? Reduction is still their nostrum. Reduction, reduction, reduction, is the theme upon which they eternally dwell. And that very subject, which above all others should be fixed and permanent and stable, is most of all others exposed to perpetual change and fluctuation. I had hoped, during the reading of the President's message at the opening of the session, that our new Chief Magistrate justly appreciated the value of our land system, and that he meant to stand fast and firm by it. He does pronounce a merited eulogium upon its successful and salutary operation; but I regretted to perceive that he, too, had become infected with the spirit of innovation, and joined in the cry for reduction and graduation. But there is some plausibility, if not much practicability, in the plan which he suggests. He proposes a previous valuation; in other words, that we should ascertain what the thing is worth before we fix a price upon it. But this bill, discarding all such idle and unnecessary knowledge, proposes arbitrarily and blindly to reduce prices without any sort of reference to values.

We glut the market by throwing into it vast quantities of fresh land of unsurpassed fertility. The powers of population and gemigration, great and surprising as they are, we find incompetent to absorb the superabundant quantity. We violate or disregard all the laws of supply and demand; and, without waiting for the operation of natural causes; without stopping until the demands of our growing population shall ease the burdened market, we are called upon to reduce the price of what it was impossible to have sold, on the mere presumption, contrary to known facts, that it is not worth the extremely moderate price which the Governments demands. And, if we enter on this career of reduction, on the false premises assumed, when and where are we to pause? I have shown you that you cannot stop with the 71 millions of acres on which the bill will quickly operate; that you must advance to the 240 millions, not yet prepared for the market, situated within the existing States and Territories; that you must finally apply the principle of reduction to the 750 millions of acres which lie outside of their limits; and that ultimately all this immense public domain must be brought down to the low rate of fifty cents per acre, proposed in the bill. But this is not yet all. Once establish this principle of reduction, and who is to prescribe, or to see, the limits of its operation? Further and further, and lower and lower, reductions will be proposed. Politics—party politics—will mix themselves up in the question. In some of the new States, candidates for public office will present themselves upon the ground of securing other reductions in the price of the public lands, and will appeal to the popular suffrage. Other candidates will come out espousing still lower rates. It will become the leading and controlling object, until, in the end, the very purpose which, in the early stage of our progress, some gentlemen are bold enough now to avow is accomplished; that is, that the common prosperity of all the States and the whole People shall be sacrificed at nominal prices, or be appropriated to a few, or be engrossed by speculators. Mr. President, is there sufficient respect paid to this public property? Is there not a loose morality too prevalent in regard to it? Is there not a spirit abroad which prompts and justifies individual seizure, no matter how, or under what circumstances, of a common inheritance which all ought to unite in protecting and defending? I think it safest to stand by and uphold that land system which has produced such auspicious results. And, for one, I shall place myself, and oppose all experiments upon it, with the same determined resolution which has impelled me to resist those, not mere disastrous, which have been made upon the currency, commerce, and business of the country.

SPEECH OF MR. LEGARE,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, Monday, June 4, 1838—On the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

Mr. LEGARE rose to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] He regretted that he should be compelled to do so under all the disadvantages of a surprise, for, at that advanced stage of a very protracted discussion, he did not expect to see it take, for the first time, the turn which that gentleman had given to it. The House must perceive, from the nature of the objections made to the policy of the Administration in the conduct of the Florida war, that no answer to them could be completely satisfactory, which did not go very considerably into detail. The gentleman had presented an ingenious and elaborate view of some rather minute circumstances attending that war. The issues he had made up involved a critical examination of the history of the late campaign, as well as of the topographical features of the seat of hostilities. He, for instance, who puts you upon your trial for the upsetting of a piece of field-ordnance, as the gentleman had done, supposes you to know precisely the nature of the ground over which it was attempted to be drawn. It was so with regard to all the other objections that had been made. Mr. L. had no pretensions whatever to play the "military critic," and was, he confessed, very inadequately prepared, by any special inquiry into the facts, to explain whatever difficulties might present themselves on a superficial glance at them. But he felt no doubt at all that, if called upon to do so, the Secretary of War would be able to account satisfactorily for whatever had been thought objectionable in his plans or his conduct. He had the utmost confidence in the character and abilities of that gentleman. He did not allude to those high social qualities which made him, by the confession of all men, one of the most accomplished gentlemen of whom the country had to boast; he meant precisely those characteristics which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had denied him. Mr. L. spoke, he was persuaded, the opinions of all who knew Mr. Poinsett intimately, when he declared that he thought him pre-eminently distinguished for all those attributes which enabled persons in authority to command and control mankind. They had seen him tried by peril and difficulty, and had seen him every where display great fertility of resources, the most elevated spirit, a sagacity seldom at fault, above all, a firmness and courage which nothing could shake. He had exhibited those qualities at home and abroad; they had acquired for him, under very painful circumstances, to which Mr. L. would not allude but to do justice, the confidence of a great party in South Carolina, and it was because he partook of that confidence, confirmed as it had been by what he had seen and knew of the conduct of the Secretary of War in his present station, that he made bold to affirm that if there existed in any branch of the service a tendency to insubordination and abuse, which he (Mr. P.) did not detect or could not control, there were but small hopes of amendment from any change of men. The disease lay deeper in the body politic.

But this confidence, Mr. L. said, was confirmed by what had fallen from the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. DOWNING.] That gentleman, who spoke of the facts from his own personal knowledge of them, and with great accuracy, and who, besides, was, he believed, rather an unwilling witness, (for Mr. L. did not understand him to be a friend of the Administration) had told the Committee of the Whole, on that very subject, that, whatever exceptions he might take to the policy of the Department in relation to the proposition then before the House, he highly approved the course which it had hitherto pursued in the conduct of the war. That was high authority for him, [Mr. L.] as one of the uninitiated in such matters. But there was still another presumption in favor of the Secretary. It arose out of the nature of the objections themselves of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That gentleman had looked into the whole case with his characteristic sharp-sightedness, and certainly without any disinclination to find a flaw; and yet, what had he made of it? Mr. L. appealed with confidence to the House, whether the topics by which he had supported the charge of imbecility and mismanagement were such as ought to be made the ground of so grave a censure. What did they amount to? Some grumblings of General Jesup, eked out by the gentleman with most latitudinarian inuendoes; some Indian poneys offered as rewards to stimulate the enterprise of the bold and adventurous; a difference of opinion as to a plan of operations in a country covered with swamp and forest, of which no survey had ever been made, &c. These, and a very few other trifling objections, were made the foundation of an inference that the Secretary of War was destitute of all administrative talent, and that the whole affairs of his Department were in a state of utter insubordination, imbecility, and disorder.

As to the argumentum ad hominem in reference to the Indian poneys, addressed to those who were supposed to be for stinting every branch of the public service, on narrow and sordid ideas of retrenchment, Mr. L. did not acknowledge it as applying to himself. He had never confounded parsimony with economy. He was not for hoarding cheese-parings and candle-ends. True economy consists in laying out money to the greatest advantage; and he was ready to furnish, nay, to lavish it, if need were, for any really important public service—but, most of all, for the defence of the country in war.

With regard to General Jesup's language, which had been treated as almost mutinous, Mr. L. said that, for any thing he knew of the articles of war, it might be so; it might be a violation of that severe discipline, even in a country where scarcely any other is observed; it might be that, in becoming a soldier, that officer had ceased to be a citizen. This might all be so; though he must say it struck him as a little singular, amidst the wild licentiousness of speech to which this House, in spite of all its boasted privileges, had been compelled quietly to accommodate itself. He was not the champion of General Jesup; he wished not to be considered as defending the conduct of that gentleman, in or out of Florida, further than might be necessary for doing him the justice to which every officer of the Government is entitled at the hands of the representatives of the people. But that justice did require him to declare that, in saying, as he had said, that Congress was responsible for the disasters of the Florida war, he had told the truth.

[Mr. WISE. How can that be?]

Sir, (said Mr. LEGARE,) I repeat it. I solemnly declare, in the face of the country, that upon the heads of this Congress, of this House, rests the heavy responsibility of having exposed the nation to the wasteful expenditure of its treasures, to the loss of life, the destruction of property, and the desolation of the country in Florida, by its absurd reduction of the army in 1821—a reduction not only far below what would be requisite to meet any extraordinary emergencies, not only below the exigencies of a state of war, but far below what was indispensable in such a country for an adequate peace establishment. The disasters they were now deploring were only a fulfilment of the predictions of one of the most distinguished of his predecessors,* who was here for the first time in 1821, in the ardor of youth, and who opposed that measure with all the vigor and the eloquence which have since rendered him so conspicuous in the country. But the army was sacrificed to what was called economy, and we have already paid upwards of eleven millions in a contest which the early presence of an adequate regular force would have effectually prevented, or instantly suppressed.

But, [said Mr. LEGARE,] the brave men engaged in that war seem to me to have been most hardly dealt with in this House. We heard the other day of "Northern laurels" turned into "Southern willows",—[Mr. BELL]—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just told you that we have taught the Indians that the white man is "formidable only by his treachery." Now, sir, I put it to the candor of the gentleman, is this language warranted by facts? Is the bare fact that the Indians have not not been subdued in forests where it is so difficult to find out their hiding places enough to justify it? Is it a new thing under the sun that a handful of barbarians, in fastnesses which Nature seems to have every where provided for the preservation of her ancient races, should hold at bay the forces of the most powerful and civilized nations? Why, Mr. Speaker, it has occurred over and over again in the history of the past. You have only to cast your eyes over the map of the Roman empire to see it every where dotted with spots, which the foot of conquest, during the whole course of five hundred years, could never invade—the Grampian Hills, Wales, Brittany, the Basque country, &c. Even while I am speaking, the very same scene is acting in the Eastern hemisphere. The barbarians of Caucasus have, for years, defended, are now defending, and are likely still to defend with success, the passes of those mountains—the Thermopylæ of Asia, and perhaps, by no remote consequence, of Europe—against all the resources of the Russian empire. The attention of the Western Powers of that continent has been awakened to the great importance of the events which are passing in Circassia; the exploits of that remarkable people have been spoken of with the admiration they deserve; but no one, so far as I have heard, regards this failure to subdue them as a stain upon the Russian arms. And why should the courage or conduct of our gallant little army be sneered at because they have not, in three campaigns, found their way through the almost impenetrable fastnesses of the Seminole? Sir, from the bottom of my heart I disavow these unjust and inconsiderate censures. In my opinion, these brave men have behaved nobly, and deserve the thanks of their country. Sent upon an ungrateful and inglorious service, in an obscure corner of the country, to execute a stern law, with no motive but a sense of duty to reconcile them to the hardships of their situation in a savage wilderness, and a sickly climate, they have done all that men could do to overcome the difficulties of all sorts with which they have been surrounded.

And this brought him, he said, to the consideration of the question, what was that law? He said he had not listened unmoved to that debate. He was sure he might claim to have as much sensibility upon the subject before the House as those who affected most. He regarded the condition of these people with the deepest commiseration, and felt how easy it was to excite sympathies of mankind by an appeal to the topics that had been dwelt upon by gentlemen. Certainly, the history of our Indian relations, from the first settlement of the colonies, is not the brightest page in our annals; but, after all, no one could seriously argue that this magnificent continent, with all its boundless capacities of improvement, was to be left a waste to furnish hunting-grounds for a few savage tribes. This, however, was not the question before the House. The present generation found the law ascertained and established by their predecessors. Georgia held her rights by virtue of maxims and principles universally recognised by civilized nations, at the time her charter was granted to her, a hundred years ago, and for two centuries before. They were just as sacred (these rights) as any title to land in the country. It might as well be objected to an estate which had been three hundred years in a family, that it was originally acquired by fraud or violence. It is quite too late now to look into the abstract equity of those principles; they were settled beyond controversy; they were among the "canon laws of our foundation;" they imposed upon the statesmen of this country, at least, an overruling moral necessity. They would be found, not in "musty tomes," as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, now near him, [Mr. NAYLOR,] had contemptuously expressed it, but in all the monuments of our jurisprudence, old and new. They had been, not many years ago, expounded by Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Johnson and McIntosh, in an opinion which reviewed the whole subject, and which he recommended to the special attention of that gentleman before he ventured to repeat such language. Mr. L. could add nothing to the force and fulness of that luminous disquisition, as far as it went, if he spoke forever. But there was still one point which it left in what seemed to him to be a state of most distressing uncertainty, and that was, what was the present state of the Indian title? Mr. L. remembered that, when he was more in the habit of looking into such things than he had been for several years past, that appeared to him to be one of the most puzzling problems of the law. It was easy to say what it was not. It was not territorial jurisdiction that was in the State, and there could not be two jurisdictions of that kind within the same limits. It was not fee-simple: the fee-simple, too, as had been decided by the Supreme Court, resided in the State, and might be conveyed, notwithstanding this occupancy of the aborigines. What then, he asked again, did that occupancy amount to? It appeared to him to be a thing sui generis. He could not agree with his friends from Georgia, that these tribes were mere tenants at will of the States in which they resided. Whatever, in strict theory, might be the correctness of that position, the uniform, universal practice of the Government, acquiesced in by the whole country, including the State of Georgia, had been different. The common sense and common feeling of the American people had been to them as a law upon that subject. These tribes, as tribes, had been considered as standing towards the Federal Government in a sort of undefined personal relation, independent of the States in whose territory they resided. They have always been treated with as having a right to reside upon the soil which they occupied, until their consent to abandon it could be obtained; and the obtaining of this consent had, by the common voice of the country, been devolved upon the Federal Government. It was quite natural it should be so. They were the common enemy, tribes of warriors ever ready to take up arms to resist the progress of the white settlements, or to destroy those already made; many of them formidable enough to inspire Congress, no longer ago than the last generation, with anxiety and alarm.

This Government, therefore, entrusted with the common defence, and the power of making war and peace, was of course charged with the duty of removing these tribes as the white population approached them. This it had uniformly endeavored to effect, agreeably to the common feelings of the people, peacefully, and in the most merciful and indulgent manner. It had regarded them as under its protection—in wardship. It had certainly been in the habit, from the necessity of the case, of restraining the territorial jurisdiction of the States, with their implicit acquiescence. But, beyond all doubt, this Indian occupancy was understood not to be perpetual. The idea, indeed, involved a contradiction. The tribes, as tribes, composing a sort of body politic, and treated with as such, could not exist forever upon a soil within the jurisdiction of a State. This imperium in imperio could not be tolerated by any statesman. No difficulty had ever occurred in consequence of this uncertainty of their tenure in former times. Tribe after tribe had emigrated to the wilderness, or disappeared from the face of the earth, without exciting any sensibility, or even attention. So long as the Indian was a mere savage, a dumb creature, whose despair or whose revenge could be expressed only by sallies of irregular hostility, it was all very well. We went on enforcing our law of nature and nations, without the least remorse or hesitation. But times are now changed; the day is come when those poor people, under our guardian care and the influences that surround them, are become civilized and christianized. They have learned the use of letters; nay, the wonders of antiquity—that which made Cadmus a god, the invention of an alphabet—have been renewed in our own times by some self-taught genius whose name is hardly known among us. They belong to the same religious communion, they refer to the same standards of morality; and, appealing to the principles of eternal justice, they demand of you, in the presence of the world, by what right you imposed it on them as law, that the lands of their inheritance, the hunting grounds of their fathers, whose bones lie buried in them, belong to you? Sir, said Mr. LEGARE, I perfectly appreciate the feelings of these poor people. They are the instincts of insulted nature, in every part of the world. I understand how they should madden a brave warrior, brooding over what he must think the wrongs of his race; and how, in wild defiance of the authority you affect to exercise over him, and have from the first exercised over him without his consent, he should, to use the language of another, "throw down his tomahawk upon the ground, and raise the war-whoop of his nation." But yet, what are we to do? I mean, sir, here, in this legislative hall, as statesmen, bound by the fundamental laws and the settled policy of a nation—not a school of theorists, dreaming of perfect commonwealths—not irresponsible makers of sentimental books to draw tears from the eyes of young ladies, or even to awaken the generous sensibilities of men. That, and that alone, is the question which I consider myself called upon to decide; and whatever my private feelings or opinions may be, the laws of our ancestors bind me absolutely; I must enforce them, but I will do so in mercy. I will do whatever I can consistionally do to reconcile these people to their fate, and to justify our policy to the civilized world.

Mr. L. then went on to say that whatever differences of opinion had been expressed as to the rights of the Indians and the conduct of the Government, it seemed agreed on all hands that the treaty must be executed. The unanimous sentence had gone forth, delenda est. The gentleman from Virginia, for instance, who sat before him, [Mr. WISE,] had displayed his usual zeal in favor of these people, and inveighed with eloquent earnestness against what he considered as the "oppressor's wrong" in regard to them; he had denounced the treaty as "conceived in fraud, carried on in fraud, consummated in fraud;" yea, sir, ratified and in fraud, without any imputation upon the integrity of the Senate, be it said; and yet, when the gentleman came to the practical question, what was to be done? His sensibilities had shown themselves as illogical as passion usually is. Mr. L. understood both the gentleman from Virginia, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NAYLOR,] to agree that the treaty must, at all events, be executed.

[Here Mr. WISE explained. He meant that he saw it would be unavailing to contend that the treaty ought not to be executed, a decided majority having declared itself unalterably bent on doing so. But for his single self, he thought it ought not to be enforced, and was ready so to vote.]

Mr. L. admitted that he might have misunderstood the gentleman, and done injustice to his logic. But at any rate the gentleman from Tennessee, whom he did not then see in his place, [Mr. BELL,] and who had delivered in the Committee of the Whole a very able and statesmanlike speech upon the subject, had expressly avowed the necessity of effecting the removal, and pointed out the terms on which it should be done. And, sir, said Mr. L. policy, justice, yea, and mercy, require that this measure should be accomplished. I say mercy, in the only acceptation of the term which makes it a virtue; that which has been well described by a great man as "a long-sighted and strong nerved humanity," which looks beyond the present moment with all that is distressing in its circumstances—for if you dwell too much on such things, when there is no remedy for them, they will drive you "mad," as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] had confessed in regard to himself—to the prospects of the future which your policy opens upon this noble tribe. Sir, it is kindness to them to remove them. They cannot exist in the midst of the white race. Our experience is uniform and conclusive upon the subject." You may depend upon it that, what with war, disease, and vice, extermination will be their fate where they are. It is inevitable, and if Ross deserves a tithe of what has been said of his ability, he will perceive it, and set himself zealously about the great work of establishing and civilizing his tribe in the pleasant land which has been assigned them, aloof from those contaminating and destructive influences with which they will soon be environed here.

He would then proceed to inquire how far it was competent for the House to interfere with what had been done by the treaty-making power. He could not agree to the rigid proposition that it was absolutely bound, neither did he concur with those who thought it in no degree bound, by a treaty. During the discussion in the French Chamber of Deputies, on the subject of the late treaty with the United States, a discussion in which he had naturally felt a very deep interest, it had, indeed, been assumed in that assembly, and he must confess that it appeared to be conceded on all hands, that whenever an appropriation of money, or any other act of legislation, was required to fulfil the condition of a treaty, the Chamber of Deputies was as free to refuse its concurrence in it as to any bill in the ordinary course of legislation. Mr. LEGARE said he did by no means assent to that doctrine; it was a licentious one; the distinction appeared to him to be a very simple one. Undoubtedly that House might at any time take the responsibility of setting aside a treaty, just as it might do any thing else that amounted to declaring war. It had the strict legal competence to do so; but he denied its moral competence to interfere with a treaty, unless it could clearly show fraud, mistake, or some other defect which vitiated it as a contract. It was not enough to say, we do not see why this treaty was made; convince us that it is as it ought to be, or we vote against it. This would be to render every negotiation that had not been ratified by the House merely nugatory, and to require a renewal of it there, contrary to the express words of the Constitution. The onus probandi was clearly upon the House. Before it assumed the responsibility of refusing its acquiescence in what bound the courts of the country, it must be able to point out, with precision, some radical moral defect, or some irresistible State necessity. Now, he must say, that although he was free to own the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in the course of this debate, had thrown grave doubt upon the regularity of the negotiation carried on with those people, he did not see his way clearly enough in the business to pronounce the solemn act of the President and Senate a mere nullity. But he readily admitted that those doubts disposed him the more to adopt the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. For this reason he could not agree with his friends from Georgia, who seemed to disapprove what the Secretary had done. He confessed, for his own part, that he had heard the message of the President on the subject with the liveliest satisfaction, he might almost say with rapture. He rejoiced that an act of signal liberality, intended to obviate every plausible reproach, or even suspicion of injustice or oppression upon the weak and the ignorant, had come to the House with the sanction of that department of the Government. He, for one, had not been patient under those imputations, and he felt relieved at the idea that there was now a reasonable hope of reconciling those people to their inevitable destiny. He would not only vote for the appropriation called for by the Executive; he would, if it were necessary, go beyond it; but he could not consent to do so on the terms of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL.] He would not interfere with the service. We must not disarm. We must be ready to take the field at any moment. We must extend every possible indulgence to the Cherokees, but we must speak the language of a grave and stern authority, determined in all events to execute the law laid down by the European race.

As to the objections made to the policy of the Secretary of War, in the step which he had taken in that matter, Mr. L. confessed that he did not feel the force of them. That minister had not agreed with Ross to allow them to protract their residence for two years more; not at all. All that he had done was to undertake to use his good offices with the proper authorities of the States concerned, to suffer the removal to be made in such a manner as might be as little vexatious as possible to these poor people. And was it too much to expect that our fellow-citizens of those States would, as far as they might feel themselves free to do so, most cheerfully acquiesce in a slight extension of the time allowed for the emigration; nay, as he had said before, not even an absolute extension of it? Gentlemen had assumed that the Cherokees were to be allowed, at all events, to reside two years longer in Georgia, etc.; but it was by no means so. The Secretary meant that the removal was to begin immediately, and be completed in two years. Now, can any one doubt that, if serious opposition were made by these people, it would require much time to overcome it? He did not speak of war; it was obvious enough that so strong a tribe, defending itself with the resolution of despair, in the fastnesses of a mountainous region, might cost us infinite trouble. It would require scarcely less time to take them up bodily and remove them, though unresisting, as he had heard it intimated we should be constrained to do. But laying such considerations out of the question, he could not persuade himself that the people of Georgia would not do all they could to soften the severity of the law which had been imposed upon this tribe, in common with the rest of the aborigines. He would not believe that they thought and felt differently from the rest of the country upon this subject, or that they were under the influence of motives which could lead them to disregard or violate the rights of humanity, further than an inevitable necessity, legal or political, might compel them to do so. From what he had understood, he had been led to hope some amicable arrangement might be effected.

Then, as to the amount of compensation, it seems to be admitted, on all hands, that, had the other conditions he proposed been complied with, Ross would have accepted the $5,000,000 as a full price for the lands.

[Here Mr. WISE rose, and denied this. Ross, he said, had begun by demanding $20,000,000, &c.]

Mr. LEGARE. Yes; but that was not his ultimatum. The proposal was manifestly extravagant, and he abandoned it. Mr. L. said he had been assured by Senators, free from all party, or, indeed, any other bias, men of the highest honor, and the most liberal feelings, that the Senate had acted with the single view of making the largest compensation that could be demanded by a reasonable man. They did not, in the least, higgle about the matter. With a most liberal allowance of money, they had given to this tribe a fertile and healthy country; and he was sure that an equal number of our own fellow-citizens, in any State in the Union, such were their migratory habits, would have abandoned homes more comfortable and fields better cultivated on a far less tempting offer. As to the additional appropriation called for by the Secretary of War, he thought the gentleman from Vermont, over the way, [Mr. EVERETT,] who had manifested such a benevolent solicitude about the fate of the Cherokees, had made out a very strong case in favor of his idea that the $5,000,000 was not, according to a fair interpretation of Ross's proposals, meant to include the objects of expenditure for which the additional appropriation was now asked by the Executive. That gentleman seemed to lay great stress on having this considered as matter of contract, and not of beneficence. To him (Mr. L.) it was immaterial whether it were bounty or obligation: he was, he repeated, ready to vote for it in either case, for reasons he had fully explained.

Another change which the Secretary had agreed to also met his fullest approbation. It related to the provision of the treaty which seemed to have given particular offence to the leading men of the Cherokee tribe; he meant the payment of the money, not to those entitled to receive it, under what might be called the Constitution of this quasi nation, but to the individuals that composed it. What justice had actuated the last Administration in adopting, for the first time, in the case before it, that peculiar policy, he had not the honor to know, and would not undertake to divine. But he thought the present Administration perfectly right in abandoning it to effect so desirable an object as the pacifying the great majority of the tribe. He could readily conceive that this money, if paid to individuals, might be unprofitably thrown away, or render them a prey to the frauds of unprincipled men. He trusted they would be pacified—that they would go in peace to the land which had been provided for their future residence, and in which, if they have the capacities of improvement ascribed to them by their patrons here, they may be developed under the most favorable circumstances. Resistance was vain; he did not mean that a battle might not be lost, or a campaign frustrated. He spoke of the inevitable result, in the long run, of a contest between this tribe and the Anglo-American race. A morass might be impracticable, a forest might cover the retreat of a frightened foe. The savage warrior might fancy himself a hero, because he avoided defeat by avoiding a combat in the open battle field. But the day would come when the most formidable of all races, in its career of irresistible aggrandizement, would sweep away every remnant of the aborigines which affected to withstand its progress within its own borders. Let them go not only in peace, but in amity, assured that many and many of those who felt themselves constrained, by a stern law, to impose upon them what appeared to be a hard condition, felt the deepest sympathy with them, and cherished the warmest good wishes for their future happiness and improvement.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

SPEECH OF MR. CUSHING,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, May 17 and 22, 1838.—The President of the United States having communicated to the House, on the 3d of May, 1838, a message on the subject of the territory of the United States beyond the Rocky mountains,

Mr. CUSHING moved that said message, and the report of the Secretary of State accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post on the river Columbia, for the defence and occupation of the territory of the United States, watered by said river, and also to consider the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent the intermeddling of the officers or subjects of foreign powers with the Indians of the United States. Which motion coming up for consideration on the 17th of May, 1838,

Mr. CUSHING spoke in support of the same, as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: I rise to call the attention of the House to a subject very different from what has for some time past occupied its time; neither a party nor a personal question, but one greatly concerning the national honor and the rights and peace of the country; a question of deep interest between the United States and a foreign power. In discussing it, I shall have to go over many dry details of treaties and facts, to the consideration of which it may be difficult to gain the ear of the House. But impressed as I am with the importance of the question to the whole nation, I shall proceed to speak, addressing myself to the country as much as to the House. The great sea of public opinion—that public opinion which, in all civilized communities of our day, and more especially among us, governs the Government—is composed of drops, and every particle infused into the general mass modifies the composition. I may, therefore, without presumption, hope to be of some service in reviving, at least, an important question which has already slumbered too long, and the continued neglect of which would be most prejudicial to the interests of the United States.

My proposition has, for its main object, to assert the rights of the United States to the country watered by the river Columbia, which will require of me to speak with freedom and plainness of the conduct of Great Britain, who alone disputes the title of the United States. I shall do this in no unfriendly feeling towards Great Britain, but, on the contrary, with entire respect for her, and in the conviction that now is the time, of all others, when the conflicting rights of the two countries may be debated without the least hazard of disturbing their amicable relations. If any such hazard existed, it would become us to encounter it manfully, rather than to abandon the rights and sacrifice the honor of the country; but no such hazard does in fact exist, nor any cause whatever to deter the House from probing the matter to the very bottom. Great Britain is at this moment under large obligations to the United States for the forbearance manifested by our Government during the late troubles in her American colonies. She knows, and feels, and avows it. And, having approved ourselves just, nay, generous, towards her in the hour of her need, we may well demand of her to be just towards us, and to abstain from those persevering encroachments on our rights by land and sea, which have in all past times characterized her foreign policy. Now is the accepted time to adjust especially our respective territorial pretensions upon this continent.

In the first place, I shall endeavor to exhibit a summary view of the title of the United States to the Oregon Territory; after which, I shall state the considerations which, in my judgment, render it an imperative duty to take immediate measures for the occupation of that Territory.

It is a principle, adopted by European nations in their settlements on this continent, that priority of discovery, followed in a reasonable time by actual occupation, confers exclusive territorial jurisdiction and sovereignty. It is also held that an establishment, once made, extends by contiguity into the neighboring regions. If the discovery be of an island, it has, in most cases, been regarded as giving a title to the whole island; if on the coast of the continent, then as reaching indefinitely along the coast and into the interior, with limits to be decided by actual occupation, by compact between conflicting claimants, or by force. Whether this be just or not, as regards the Indians inhabiting America, is another question. I speak of it only as the conventional rule, recognised in the negotiations, and practised upon in the colonial enterprises, of the chief nations of Europe; and thus constituting a part of that somewhat uncertain mixture of conventions and of national equity, which is called the Law of Nations.

This general principle, which enters into the present question in all its parts, includes a particular principle, which is still more specifically applicable to it. The discovery of the mouth of a great river, or the exploration of it, followed in a reasonable time by the actual assertion of territorial sovereignty, gives an exclusive right to all the country watered by that river. Without referring to various foreign cases of the application of this doctrine, it will be sufficient for the satisfaction of the House, to show how it has been treated by the United States.

In the letter of Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to Don Pedro Cevallos, April 21, 1805, it is said.

"When any European nation takes possession of any extent of seacoast, that possession is understood as extending into the interior country to the sources of the rivers emptying within that coast, to all their branches, and the country they cover, and to give it a right, in exclusion of all other nations, to the same."

This position is adopted by Mr. Adams in his letter to Don Luis de Onis, March 12, 1818, and by Mr. Gallatin, in his discussion of the present question. (Executive Docs. 20th Con. 1st Ses. No. 199, p. 61.)

Now, whatever rights, more or less, are derivable from discovery, belong to the United States alone.

The river Columbia was first discovered in 1792, (excepting whether it may have been previously discovered by the old Spanish navigators,) by Captain Robert Gray, of the American ship Columbia, fitted out in Boston, and received from him the name of the ship he commanded. In the same year, but confessedly subsequent to this, and upon information derived from Captain Gray, it was visited by Vancouver, in behalf of Great Britain. Priority of discovery, therefore, is clearly with the United States, as against Great Britain. Indeed, Gray had previously, in 1788, explored the strait of Juan de Fuca, north of the Columbia. So that, leaving out of view the rights of Spain by discovery, and of Spain and France by contiguity and extension, the United States claim the Oregon Territory by right of discovery.

By cession from France, in 1803, the United States acquired Louisiana, and all the rights of France in that direction. What are the northwestern limits of Louisiana? Extension by contiguity would carry the pretensions of France to the Pacific. By Great Britain herself, the possession of the body of the continent was always treated as stretching across the entire breadth of the continent. Her grants to Massachusetts and to other colonies reach to the Pacific. Conflicts of pretension thus grew up between France and Great Britain, which were adjusted, in 1763, by the treaty of Versailles, by which Great Britain ceded to France all claims to land west of the Mississippi. Prior to which, by the treaty of Utrecht, concluded in 1713, France and Great Britain agreed to appoint commissioners to describe and settle the boundaries between the French and English colonies in North America; which resulted in the establishment of the parallel of 49 degrees north as the northern limit of Louisiana. As between Great Britain and France, then, Louisiana was bounded east by the Mississippi, north by latitude 49 deg. N. and westward by the Pacific; and by the Louisiana treaty, the United States added to her own rights of discovery the pre-existing rights of France.

In this state of the case, Mr. Jefferson devised and authorized, in 1805, the celebrated expedition of Lewis and Clark, who ascended the Missouri, crossed the Rocky mountains, reached the head-waters of the Columbia, descended the river, erected the works called Fort Clatsop, and in the most formal and authentic manner asserted the rights of the United States in and to the whole country. No establishment of any other power existed at that time on the waters of the Columbia.

But the enterprise of colonizing that country was undertaken in 1811 by John Jacob Astor, of New York; one of those truly noble merchants "who, by their great commercial enterprise, have enriched nations, peopled wildernesses, and extended the bounds of empire;" a man of far-seeing mind, with plans covering the globe, and with results as grand as the plans; a merchant, in wealth and greatness of design equalling the Medici of Florence, the Dorias of Genoa, and the Foscari of Venice, without the political ambition which rendered their wealth a curse to their country. The narrative, by Washington Irving, of that magnificent undertaking, belongs to the classic literature of the world, combining the truth of history with the stirring interest of romance. Mr. Astor's establishment at Astoria, having for its immediate object the prosecution of the fur-trade, was anterior to any establishment on the Columbia by any power other than the United States. It was broken up by the war of 1812, and taken possession of by Great Britain in the course of her belligerent operations; but again formally surrendered to us in 1818, in express obedience to the treaty of Ghent.—(Doc. 17th Con. 1st Ses. Exec. No. 328.) What was the character of this transaction clearly appears from the explanations on the subject exchanged by Mr. Rush and Lord Castlereagh. Mr. Rush says:

"I told him, &c. * * Granting that she (England) had a claim, was the lawfulness of the step taken by the United States (that is, resuming the possession of Astoria) to be questioned? That the post was in their possession before the war of 1812, was admitted; and, also, that it had fallen, by capture, into the hands of Britain during the war. How, then, under a treaty of peace, the first article of which stipulated the mutual restitution of all places reduced by the arms of either party, was our right to restitution to be impeached? * * His lordship admitted our right to restitution, and our claim to be in possession, when negotiations for the title were going on."—(Rush's London, p. 74.)

Or, as stated in Mr. Rush's official despatch:

"Lord Castlereigh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title."—Letter Feb. 1818.)

Here, then, we have the original title of the United States by discovery, fortified by the rights of France, continued by the exploration of Lewis and Clark, by the formal taking of possession, and by regular occupation, and completed by the recognition of Great Britain.

Nor is this the whole strength of our case. By the Florida treaty, concluded in 1819, Spain ceded to the United States all her claims on this continent north of latitude 42 degrees north. And this was a most important cession. Indeed that treaty was rather a convention of mutual cessions than of pecuniary indemnities merely. Mr. Adams, who, in all cases where in the course of a long life of public service he has been called to maintain the rights of his country, has done it ably and thoroughly, and who negotiated that treaty, deserves universal credit for its favorable conditions in this respect. In consideration of the cession to Spain, made under the positive instructions of President Monroe, of our claims to the Rio del Norte, which claims Mr. Adams defended strenuously to the last, the United States obtained, in addition to East and West Florida, a cession of all the rights of Spain in the valley and coast of the Oregon; rights which alone could seriously conflict with our own pretensions on the Pacific.

Spain, prior to 1819, claimed that whole country to Prince William's sound, in the 60th parallel of latitude. She did this, in right of the extension of her Mexican possessions by contiguity, and in right of early discovery and repeated explorations and acts of occupation. Hernan Cortes, the great conqueror himself, in the prosecution of his own splendid designs, explored, in 1526, the northwestern coast of America to the northern limits of Caliafornia. The Spaniards, also, point to various other expeditions fitted out from Acapulco or San Blas in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; as that of Gali in 1582 to latitude 57 degrees north; Juan de Fuca in 1592, who is said to have discovered, and certainly gave his name to, the bay and strait still bearing it, and the account of whose voyage in the trust-worthy Purchas, though formerly disputed, seems now to be admitted, (Murray's N. Am. Dis. vol. 2, p. 80;) Vizcaino, in 1602, who is believed by some of the Spanish writers o have discovered the Oregon;* De Fonte, who is said to have reached the latitude 54 degrees in 1640. Why these accounts, or any of them, should be disputed, I know not. Some of them, it is perfectly certain, rest upon the most ample evidence Instead of being intrinsically improbable, it would, on the contrary, have been strange indeed if Spain, being in tranquil possession of New California, had never extended her voyages a few degrees to the north of that province along the same coast.

However this may be, no English navigator, prior to Cook, has any pretension to antiquity of discovery in that quarter, except Sir Francis Drake. He was a pirate, cruising along the coast and in the seas of Spanish America as a bucaneer and a plunderer, making private war, and capturing prizes on his own responsibility, landing to ravage and burn the towns, and hold the peaceful people to ransom; a gallant pirate, to be sure, brave and enterprising; but still a pirate, and knighted as such for the mischief he had thus done to Spain. Whether the cruises of a bucaneer can confer any title of discovery I will not stop to inquire; it is unnecessary; for no creditable account of his voyage carries it beyond latitude 42 or 43; and the landing that he made in order to claim title was in latitude 38 degrees 30 minutes—within the acknowledged limits of the Spanish province of Caliafornia.

And without dwelling upon these old voyages in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, we have that of Perez in 1774 to latitude 54 degrees, and of Quadra in 1775 to latitude 57 degrees—both anterior to that of Cook; followed by Arteaga in 1779, Martinez in 1788, Elisa in 1790, and Malaspina in 1791, carrying up the Spanish discoveries to the strait of Juan de Fuca, and even to Prince William's Sound, all of them preceding Vancouver. All the title of Spain, acquired in the various modes usual in such cases, is now vested in the United States by the Florida treaty; and, united with the other sources of titles possessed by us, constitutes a right of dominion not to be shaken by any European Power.

*Torquemada, in the authentic account of Vizcaino's expedition, given by him in the Monarquia Indiana, says that Martin de Aguila, who commanded one of the vessels of the fleet, having passed northward of Cape Blanco, se hallo un rio muy caudaloso y hondable * * * Queriendo entrar por el, hos corrientes no dio lugar a ello.—(Lib. v. c. 55.) Humboldt, however, does not consider this to have been the Columbia; but thinks the Columbia was first visited by the Spaniards in 1775, its bay having been entered by the expedition of Heceta and Quadra, and called by them Entrada de Heceta.—(Humboldt's New Spain, v. iii, c. 8, s. 15.)

In addition to, and independent of all which, the natural progress of population westward by extension, on the ground of contiguity, would give us a claim of title superior to that of any other nation, we occupying and settling indisputably to the very heart of the continent.

In fact, our title south of latitude 54 degrees is practically admitted by all the rest of the world, except Great Britain. An old agreement existed between Russia and Spain, by which the former was left undisturbed in the extreme northern latitudes of Alaska. [N. Amer. Review, No. 61, p. 506.] After the conclusion of the Florida treaty, a convention was entered into between the United States and Russia, whose deportment towards this country has always been distinguished by dignity and liberality—the convention of the 17th April, 1824, which closed the door against any difference between us in that quarter, by an agreement that Russia would make no settlement on the northwest coast of America south of latitude 54 degrees, and the United States none to the north of it; thus fixing that parallel as the line betwixt our respective pretensions. But the conduct of Great Britain has, I am compelled to say, been marked by rapacity, illiberality, and gross disregard of our just rights, strikingly contrasted with the honorable procedure of Russia.

Desirous of settling this matter fairly and liberally with Great Britain, the United States, in 1823, under the authority of President Monroe, and in 1826, under that of President Adams, while justly entitled to claim, by virtue of its own title, and that of Spain and France, to latitude 54 degrees, offered to Great Britain to compromise the question by extending the northern line of Louisiana—that is to say, the parallel of 49 degrees—to the Pacific, thus conceding to great Britain five degrees of latitude on the Pacific, and enabling her to accomplish her desire to extend her possessions across the continent from sea to sea. In so doing, we should, in fact, cede a portion of our just rights, which cover the whole of the valley of the Columbia; but the love of peace, and the consideration that Louisiana was bounded by latitude 49 degrees, would have justified such an arrangement. To this Great Britain obstinately refused to accede. And I must now ask the attention of the House to the nature and extent of her pretensions.

I assume, as the result of the arguments which I have thus cursorily presented to the House, that the United States have a clear title to the Oregon Territory, as against any and every European Power, extending from latitude 42 degrees, the line of the Mexican Republic, to latitude 54 degrees, the line adjusted with Russia. I admit, in pursuance of the negotiations of 1823 and 1826, that it may be wise to settle the matter, as between us and Great Britain, at latitude 49 degrees, striking the Pacific in the strait of Juan de Fuca. And I hold that the United States cannot, in safety or in honor, concede any thing more than this.

Between these limits Great Britain is unable to claim any territory, by merely sailing along the coast and touching here and there, because preceded in that by navigators in the service of Spain; all whose right is vested in the United States by the Florida treaty.

Great Britain cannot claim it as a dependency of the river Columbia, because anticipated in the navigation of that river by Gray; in the exploration of it by Lewis and Clark; in the occupation of it by Lewis and Clark and by Mr. Astor.

Great Britain is precluded from claiming it as residuary territory of hers, under the title by which she formerly held this country, because prevented by the treaty of 1763 between her and France, in which she disclaims irrevocably beyond the Mississippi; the seventh article being in these words:

"The confines between the British and French possessions in North America shall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the Mississippi from its source to the river Iberville, and from thence, by the middle of the river Iberville and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea."—(Chalmer's Tr. vol. 1, 473.)

Great Britain is forbidden to claim it as parcel of the old North American possessions still retained by her in virtue of the treaty of Paris, because the decision of the commissioners under the treaty of Utrecht establishes the line of 49 degrees westward of the Lake of the Woods. The rule of extension by contiguity would, to be sure, if no other considerations intervened, carry her possessions to the Pacific; but it would be along the parallel of 49 degrees, because the same rule of extension would carry us to the Pacific.

That is to say, Great Britain is, upon all principles of international law, and by her own solemn contracts, debarred and estopped from any and every species of exclusive right or claim whatsoever, south of latitude 49 degrees, and west of the Lake of the Woods, to the Pacific.

Accordingly, conscious of the utter futility of any such claim, Great Britain makes no claim to sovereignty over any part of the territory in question. Her pretension extend to the whole of the territory, but is preferred by her in the shape of a pretended right of joint occupancy of every part of it in common with other powers, leaving suspended in abeyance the right of exclusive dominion as to any part of it.

This extraordinary pretension of hers is grounded on the Nootka Convention as it is commonly called—a treaty extorted by her from Spain in 1790, under circumstances of passionate injustice, which, even at that stormy period, when the Powers of Europe were accustomed to fly to violence upon the smallest real or imaginary injury, was barely tolerated by the world, and which, in the present more enlightened times of general aversion to war, could not escape the severest reprobation. This convention confers a claim as against Spain only, and so much of our right as we derive from Spain. The substance of it is, that subjects of either of the two parties, Great Britain and Spain, are not to be disturbed by the other, whether in navigating or fishing in the Pacific ocean, or in landing on the coast, in places not already occupied, for the purpose of carrying on commerce with the natives, or of making settlements there. I shall not trouble the House with the multiplied details of this question, as between Great Britain and Spain. Independently of the force and effect of it in that relation, there are several answers to it on the part of the United States. It settles no definite limits of territorial jurisdiction. It leaves the question of sovereignty upon the titles of Spain or France. Being a convention of usufruct only, and not of territorial jurisdiction or of sovereignty, it might be obligatory on Spain so long as she retained the jurisdiction, but not upon her successor in sovereignty. Beyond which the United States hold under France as well as Spain; and still more by discoveries of their own, followed by actual occupation, that occupation having been recognised by the authorities of Great Britain.

It only remains, for the disposal of this part of the diplomatic question, that I should state the actual position of it upon the treaties between the United States and Great Britain.

By the treaty of Paris, September 3, 1783, our boundary is, beginning at the Lake of the Woods; "thence through the said lake to the most northwestern point thereof, and from thence on a due west course to the river Mississippi; thence, by a' line to be drawn along the middle of the said river Mississippi," in conformity with the provisions of the treaty of Versailles before cited, and so proceeding down the river to the bounds of Louisiana and Florida in that direction.

The annexation of Louisiana to the United States changed, of course, our northwestern frontier. But no new convention was immediately concluded, defining this on the side of Great Britain. The treaty of Ghent, December 24, 1814, proceeds on the assumption of limits according to the status ante bellum. It provides for ascertaining the northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods; but it goes no farther westward. In that direction the line is continued by the convention of October 20, 1818, "from the Lake of the Woods to the Stony Mountains, along the parallel of 49 degrees, in just application of the treaty of Utrecht. By the same convention, it is agreed, that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; this agreement not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the parties may have to any part of the said country. Which agreement, by the convention of August 6, 1837, was continued indefinitely, subject to be terminated by either party on twelve months' notice.

I desire to see this agreement terminated as soon as possible. It gives nothing to the United States; for we have no occasion to ask the consent of Great Britain to use the harbors, bays, creeks, and rivers of our own territory. It gives every thing to Great Britain; because without it her vessels and subjects would be mere intruders and interlopers in a country which belongs to us. I desire to see the treaty notice given by the United States, and provision made by law for the occupation of the country by its rightful sovereign. The notice, we may rest assured, will never be given by Great Britain. Her policy is procrastination, in this case, as in that of our northeastern frontier; and for precisely the same reason. In both cases she has, under guise of temporary agreements, availed herself of our neglect, or at least of our unsuspecting good faith, to insinuate herself into actual possession of the territory in dispute. To settle the question, is to oust the intruder. To be sure, there is a stipulation that the agreement shall not prejudice the rights of either party; but it does prejudice our rights, deeply, fatally, as I will prove to this House by the most authentic facts.

Before I enter upon this, the more important and interesting part of this subject, I have a concluding suggestion to make on the question of title. I derive my knowledge of this from books; especially the negotiations of 1823 and 1826, (Doc. 19th Congress, 1st session, Exec. No. 65; and Doc. 20th Cong. 1st sess. Exec. No. 199,) and the reports of Mr. Baylies, of Mass. who, with Mr. Floyd, of Va. was instrumental in bringing this topic before a former Congress (Rep. 19th Cong. 1st ses. Nos. 35 and 213.) But there is an individual present [Mr. ADAMS] who is a living record of the diplomatic history of the country, and who was personally conversant with some of the most material of these negotiations. With permission of the House, I would respectfully appeal to my colleague to state whether I have properly represented the facts and treaties bearing upon our rights in this matter; since, if I have erred in any essential point, I wish to be corrected on the spot, by one to whose ampler knowledge of the subject I shall cheerfully defer.

After Mr. ADAMS's remarks, Mr. CUSHING resumed and continued his speech as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I feel under great obligations to my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] for his prompt compliance with my request, and for the information he has communicated to the House. His opinion of the validity of our title to the country beyond the Rocky Mountains will deservedly have great weight in the public estimation. And I do not perceive that he and I differ materially in regard to the sources of that title: for, if he understood me as maintaining the abstract justice of the right of discovery, assumed by European powers to justify their conquests and acquisitions in the New World as against the aboriginal inhabitants, it must have been because I did not express myself with sufficient fullness on that head. What I meant and mean to advance in this respect is, only, that as a conventional rule, by which to adjust claims of territory on this continent among themselves, the right of discovery, when followed up in a reasonable time by actual occupation, is generally received and admitted, with more or less flexibility of application to given cases, by the civilized nations of Europe.

And considering, therefore, that on this, and the various other grounds adduced, our title to the Oregon Territory is a good one, sufficiently so, as my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] observes, to be justly maintained, if necessary, by force, I proceed to state the facts and considerations which seem to me to demand that the present ambiguous condition of things in relation to the Territory should be ended, and our sovereignty therein reaffirmed and established. Having done which, I shall confidently hope for the aid and support of my colleague in the defence of the rights and interest of the United States.

Throughout the vast interior regions of North America, to the West and Northwest, with its noble rivers, continuous lakes, extensive prairies, and lofty mountain ranges, the chief object of commercial pursuit, it is familiarly known to us all, is the fur of the wild animals with which the country abounds; constituting almost the sole marketable wealth of the numerous tribes of Indians scattered over those parts of the continent. While the French held Canada, down to 1763, the trade with the Indians, and the collection of peltries, in the immense countries beyond the great lakes, was carried on partly by the French Canadians themselves, and partly by their northern neighbors, the English Hudson's Bay Company; all which invaluable trade, on the acquisition of Canada, fell into the hands of Great Britain. The Hudson's Bay Company was not long without a competitor in the Northwest Company of Montreal, formed in 1787. Their competition of trade induced deadly feuds, fatal to their own peace and prosperity, while they distracted and corrupted the Indians. A new turn was given to the course of events by the travels of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and the effects of his counsels after his return to England. A brief extract from his book, published in 1801, will explain this:

"Experience has proved that this trade, from its very nature, cannot be carried on by individuals. A very large capital, or credit, or indeed both, is necessary; and, consequently, an association of men of wealth to direct, with men of enterprise to act, in one common interest, must be formed on such principles as that, in due time, the latter may succeed the former, in continual and progressive succession. The junction of such a commercial association with the Hudson's Bay Company is the important measure which I would propose; and the trade might be carried on with a very superior degree of advantage, both public and private, under the privilege of their charter. By enjoying the privilege of the company's charter, though but for a limited period, there are adventurers who would be willing, as they are able, to engage in and carry on the proposed commercial undertaking, as well as to give the most complete and satisfactory security to Government for the fulfilment of its contract with the company. It would, at the same time, be equally necessary to add a similar privilege of trade on the Columbia river, and its tributary waters."

"By the waters that discharge themselves into Hudson's Bay, at Fort Nelson, it is proposed to carry on the trade to their source at the head of the Saskatchewine river, which rises in the Rocky Mountains, not eight degrees of lounitude from the Pacific ocean. The Columbia flows also from the same mountains, and discharges itself in the Pacific, in latitude 46 degrees 20 min. Both of them are capable of receiving ships at their mouths, and are navigable throughout for boats."

"But, whatever course may be taken from the Atlantic, the Columbia is the line of communication from the Pacific ocean pointed out by nature, as it is the only navigable river in the whole extent of Vancouver's minute survey of that coast. Its banks, also, form the first level country in all the southern extent of continental coast from Cook's entry, and, consequently, the most northern situation fit for colonization, and suitable for the residence of a civilized people. By opening this intercourse between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and forming regular establishments through the interior, and at both extremes, as well as along the coasts and islands, the entire command of the fur trade of North America might be obtained from latitude 48 deg. north, to the pole, except that portion of it which the Russians have in the Pacific. To this may be added the fishery in both seas, and the markets of the four quarters of the globe. Such would be the field for commercial enterprise: and incalculable would be the produce of it, when supported by the operations of that credit and capital which Great Britain so pre-eminently possesses. Then would this country begin to be remunerated for the expenses it has sustained in discovering and surveying the coast of the Pacific ocean, which is at present left to American adventurers, who, without regularity or capital, or the desire of conciliating future confidence, look altogether to the interest of the moment. Such adventurers—and many of them, as I have been informed, have been very successful—would instanly disappear before a well-regulated trade."

"Many political reasons, which it is not necessary to enumerate here, must present themselves to the mind of every man acquainted with the enlarged system and capacities of British commerce, in support of the measure which I have very briefly suggested, as promising the most important advantages to the trade of the United Kingdoms."—(Mackenzie's Trav. vol. 2, pages 388–92.)

Meanwhile the United States acquired the country beyond the Rocky Mountains, by discovery, purchase, exploration, and the formalities of occupation. Mr. Astor, himself extensively engaged in the fur trade south and west of the lakes, became fully aware of the great value of the Oregon country, and the importance of a line of trade to be carried across the continent, by ascending the river Missouri, and descending the Columbia to the Pacific, and thence communicating directly with China; and, in the promotion at the same time of his own interests and those of the United States, organized the establishment of Astoria. The Northwest Company took the alarm. They foresaw what would be the effect of this enterprise, if successfully prosecuted. They despatched emissaries of theirs to the Columbia, who, availing themselves of the war between Great Britain and the United States, which followed in the year after the foundation of Astoria, induced McDougall, one of the agents of Mr. Astor, to make a fraudulent sale of his factory, furs, and other property, to the Northwest Company; and the sloop of war Racoon came and took formal possession of Astoria in the name of Great Britain, and changed the name of the post to St. George. This formal possession, however, was an act of war, and was annulled, as I have before stated, by the restoration of the post to Mr. Prevost and to Commodore Biddle, in the Ontario, after the conclusion of peace. But still the Northwest Company retained the actual possession of the country, under the purchase from McDougall; and in 1821, the Northwest Company and the Hudson's Bay Company, having compromised their differences, were united, the operations of the new association being continued down to this time under the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company.

This purchase from McDougall, and the possession under it, could, it is evident, confer no sovereignty on Great Britain as against the United States. But the continued tolerance of the presence of the Northwest Company there, after the conclusion of the war, was a capital error, imputable to the supineness and culpable neglect of our Government. Mr. Astor offered to renew his enterprises on the Columbia, provided the Government would establish a military post there, with the most trifling force, even a lieutenant's command; needing only the countenance and the flag of the United States. If his advice had been adopted, the question would have been settled then, before the Hudson's Bay Company had struck root in the Territory. What the actual result has been, I will state in the words of Major Pilcher, (Sen. Doc 1830, '1, No. 39.] It has been to realize, in all respects, the plan marked out by Sir Alexander Mackenzie in 1801, for undermining our influence and our trade in and beyond the Rocky Mountains.

"1. The Hudson's Bay and Northwest Companies have been united, and are now trading under the name and charter of the former. 2. The trade has been extended to the Columbia river. 3. A colony of civilized people is forming on that river. 4. A line of forts and posts is established across the continent. 5. The mouth of the Columbia is occupied, ships enter it, boats ascend it, the mountains are crossed, and the communication is regular, from the Pacific to the Atlantic. 6. American adventurers have almost disappeared, and the British have the command of the fur trade north of 49 degrees, and the chief enjoyment of it for some degrees south.

"The political advantages of all these events are considerable (to Great Britain) in time of peace, and must become infinitely more so in time of war, when the command of all the Northern Indians may harrass the settlements on the Upper Mississippi; and the possession of a naval and military station and a colony on the estuary of the Columbia river may lead to the annihilation of our ships and commerce on the Pacific ocean."

The Hudson's Bay Company, as now organized, I present to the notice of the people of the United States, as being in itself a great foreign power, most injurious and hostile to their rights and interests. It is to America what the East India Company is to Asia. Dean Tucker describes it as one of the corrupt monopolies of the reign of Charles II. (Tucker on Trade, p. 68.) And it is natural enough that a corporation, born of corruption, should subsist by usurpation. Though chartered for a limited time, which has long since expired, and though never confirmed by Parliament, (Chitty on Com. vol. 1, p. 679,) and so existing only as a corporation, by sufferance, it claims a more than imperial sway as appurtenant to the grant of the trade of Hudson's bay, commencing midway in the Northeastern coast of the continent, reaching from Labrador down to near the shores of Lake Superior, thence along the highlands which divide the waters of the Mississippi and Missouri from those of Lake Winnipeg, and so sweeping around by the easterly side of the Rocky mountains to the Slave Lake, and back to the shores of the Atlantic—(Bouchette's Brit. Dom. vol. 1, p. 32, et seq.) This enormous territory, indeed, encroaches directly on the United States, for the company undertook to sell to the Earl of Selkirk a large tract of more than one hundred thousand square miles, the country of the Red river of Lake Winnipeg, which is found to be cut off by our boundary. Not content with which, the company has even seated itself down as the mistress of the great valley of the Columbia. Yet its rights are limited to the power which its establishments give it, and the monopoly which it usurps of the trade of the interior, overbearing the competition of private enterprise.

I have English authority to attest the general character of the dominion exercised by these mercantile sovereigns, the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Companies. There is a work published by a servant of the Hudson's Bay Company, in 1770, who styles it "a baneful monopoly," who details what he plainly calls its tyranny and its frauds, and who says the associates "have undoubtedly forfeited every just pretension" to continue a corporation, "by the ill use they have made of this royal favor."—(Umfreville's Hud. B. Com. p. 98.) And what the Northwest Company has been, we learn from the friends of the Hudson's Bay Company; for (the late) Lord Selkirk says that, in the wide range of country occupied by their forts and trading posts, they "established a mere despotic rule than could be found to exist even in any Asiatic Government," (Claims of the Hud. Bay Com. p. 32;) and we are further advised that "the intercourse of the Northwest Company with the Indians, * * under the semblance and disguise of commerce, is an organized system of rapine." And these are the companies we suffer to remain in the intrusive occupation of the Oregon, most injuriously to us!

For I have abundant proofs of the incompatibility of their conduct with the rights and peace of the United States.

In the Executive Message of the 23d December it is told us, in addition to some other facts:

"The Hudson's Bay Company have also several depots, situated on watercourses, in the interior of the country; the principal one is at Fort Vancouver, on the northern bank of the Columbia river, about eighty or one hundred miles from its mouth. It is known, by information recently obtained, that the English company have a steamboat on this river, and that they have a saw-mill, and are cutting timber on the territory claimed by the United States, and are shipping it in considerable quantities to the Sandwich Islands."

The President did not see fit to communicate the particulars of the "information recently obtained;" but we reach these by the memorial from Mr. William A. Slacum, the agent employed by the Government to obtain information concerning the settlements in the Oregon, which memorial was presented to the Senate on the 18th December, 1837, in aid of a claim preferred by Mr. Slacum. This document exhibits in detail the facts that the Hudson's Bay Company have a military post on the Columbia; that they supply munitions of war to the Indians; that they seek to alienate the Indians from us; and that they occupy the country as if it were theirs: illustrating, also, the great value and importance of that country, as well for itself, as for its uses in the trade of the Pacific seas. It exhibits a fact, also, which I commend to the notice of Mr. O'Connell, who heaps such unmeasured invective on the people of this country because of the existence of slavery in a portion of the United States; namely, that, while Great Britain is applauding herself on the emuncipation of the African race in her West India Colonies, the Hudson's Bay Company is introducing a new form of slavery in the Northwest, by applying it extensively to the American Indians. That this abuse is practised by the Hudson's Bay Company cannot excuse the British Government, any more than the perpetration of similar and worse abuses in Asia by the East India Company.

There is, in the document before me, (Sen. Doc. 1828–'9, No. 67) a great body of evidence similar to that of Major Pilcher, which I have quoted, consisting of letters of Gen. Ashley, W. L. Sublette, Mr. Astor, Gen William Clark, Gen. Cass, &c. showing how fatal the influence of the Hudson's Bay Company is to our own free trade. I will read an extract from one of these letters, (that of Mr. Cambreleng) with his consent. This letter, addressed to Mr. Benton, and dated January 12, 1829, says:

"I have in my possession the actual returns of the furs collected by the Hudson's Bay Company for the year 1828, which, according to a valuation made by one who has a thorough knowledge of the trade, amount to $894,879 85. The shares of that company have increased from £60, or 40 per cent. below par, to £240 sterling, or 140 per cent. above par. The business of the company has continued to increase at the rate of from 60 to $100,000 annually. The prosperous condition of the Hudson's Bay Company may be attributed, in some measure, to the advantages enjoyed by the British traders, who procure their manufactures without duty, while the American traders pay 40 per cent. and upwards; and who can send their furs to the American market, while our traders pay a duty in the British market. But the most important advantage enjoyed by the Hudson's Bay Company is the admirable harbor at the mouth of the Columbia, which we virtually and unfortunately granted them by our treaty of 1818. That settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river is now the centre of an immense trade in furs; and, unless we take some step to place our traders on an equal footing with the British, and secure to the former the privilege of trading in safety within our own dominions at least, our Indian trade must decline, and we must make up our minds to surrender the whole Indian country to Great Britain."

This grievance, the injurious influence of the Hudson's Bay

Company upon our fur trade in and about the Rocky mountains, on both sides of them, has been earnestly represented to Congress by the Legislature of Missouri, as well as in the communications of the individuals above mentioned. It is fully presented, also, in Washington Irving's Astoria. He says, with particular reference to the Oregon Territory:

"In our hands, beside the roving bands of trappers and traders, the country would have been explored and settled by industrious husbandmen; and the fertile valleys bordering its rivers, and shut up among its mountains, would have been made to pour forth their agricultural treasures to contribute to the general wealth.

"In respect to commerce, we should have had a line of trading posts from the Mississippi and the Missouri across the Rocky mountains, forming a high road from the great regions of the West to the shore of the Pacific. We should have had a fortified post and port at the mouth of the Columbia, commanding the trade of that river and its tributaries, and of a wide extent of country and seacoast, carrying on an active and profitable commerce with the Sandwich Islands, and a direct and frequent communication with China."—Astoria, vol. 2.

Mr. Irving also justly condemns the conduct of our Government in leaving this matter so long unsettled, and says:

"Every year this litigated claim is growing into importance. There is no pride so jealous and irritable as the pride of territory. As one wave of emigration after another rolls into the vast region of the West, and our settlements stretch towards the Rocky mountains, the eager eyes of our pioneers will pry beyond, and they will become impatient of any barrier or impediment in the way of what they consider a grand outlet of our empire. Should any circumstance, therefore, unfortunately occur to disturb the present harmony of the two nations, this ill adjusted question, which now lies dormant, may suddenly start up into one of billigerant import, and Florida become the watchword in a contest for dominion on the shores of the Pacific."—Astoria, vol, 2.

Mr. Irving recurs to the subject in a later work of his, (the narrative of Captain Bonneville's Expedition,) in which he exhibits the value of the fur trade and fisheries, and the agricultural capabilities of the Oregon Territory; and upon the political question says:

"Though the [Hudson's Bay] Company, by treaty, have a right to a participation only in the trade of these regions, [beyond the Rocky mountains,] and are, in fact, but tenants in sufferance; yet have they quietly availed themselves of the original oversight, and subsequent supineness of the American Government to establish a monopoly of the trade of the river [Columbia] and its dependencies; and are adroitly proceeding to fortify themselves in their usurpation, by securing all the strong points of the country.

"Nor is it likely the latter [the American traders] will ever be able to maintain any footing in the land, until the question of territorial right is adjusted between the two countries. The sooner that takes place the better. It is a question too serious to national pride, if not to national interest, to be slurred over; and every year is adding to the difficulties which environ it.

"The resources of the country * * in the hands of America, enjoying a direct trade with the East Indies, would be brought into quickening activity, and might soon realize the dream of Mr. Astor, in giving rise to a flourishing commercial empire."—Rocky Mountains, vol. 2.

The Convention of 1818 is any thing but reciprocal in its actual operations. Not only did it give the use of the river Columbia to Great Britain, we getting nothing in return; not only did it enable the British traders to introduce goods into the interior of the continent free of duty, those of our traders having paid duty, and so to undersell us in all trade with the Indians, but, in addition to all this, under cover of the Convention, the British flag deminates over the whole country; and at Fort Vancouver, about one hundred miles up the river, is a regular military post, a fixed establishment of 750 to 800 persons. Can the United States send and establish a military post on the Columbia, without giving notice of the termination of the Convention? I suppose there may be gentlemen who will say we cannot. And yet Great Britain has done this, without giving notice to us. Am I to be told that the Hudson's Bay Company has done this, and not the Government? I reply, that the British Government cannot and shall not separate itself from the acts of this Company. That game England played long ago in the East Indies, conquering millions after millions there, and throwing all the blame of the fraud and violence by which the conquests were gained upon the servants of the East India Company, and even impeaching them for the plunder of empires, while she condescended to retain the empires they had plundered. It is a stale device. It will no longer pass current. Whatever these great empire-seeking corporations do, they do, or profess to do, under their charters; that is, by the special authorization of the Government of which they are the creatures. The Hudson's Bay Company is rich, strong and rapacious, with immense territories, and numerous tribes of Indians subject to its power; being analogous in all these respects to the East India Company, and second only to that in power; and, like that, it must, for all political purposes, be considered as Great Britain.

If the United States would retain the independence they have achieved, they must look well to the commercial enterprises of Great Britain. Other nations have pursued a career of conquest in the undisguised aim of military ambition: with her, it is commercial ambition supported by associated arts and arms. This very question illustrates the necessity of watchfulness on our part. The British Isles may be assimilated to great citadels and workshops on the coast of Europe. The ships of her navy are floating fortresses, with military stations dotting all over the globe in every sea. She has Gibraltar, Malta, and the Ionian Islands for the Mediterranean; Sierra Leone, St. Helena, and the Cape, for Africa. With Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Bermuda, she menaces the Atlantic coast of the United States; with Jamaica, she flanks the Gulf of Mexico; and by the St. Lawrence and the lakes, she penetrates into the innermost recesses of North America. Hindostan and Ceylon give to her the control of southern and central Asia. She possesses the antarctic world of Australia. At Singapore, she overlooks the Indo-Chinese waters. Lately, she has leaped across to the Benin Islands, west of Japan. She seeks the dominion of the Sandwich Islands, as exemplified in the doings of Lord Byron in the Blonde, and the more recent visit of Lord Edward Russell. If rumor do not err, she entertains the thought, at least, of obtaining, through the shareholders of Mexican stock, the Bay of San Francisco, the noblest bay and harbor on the Pacific coast of America; near at hand to the region, where, in defiance of our rights, she has already planted herself on the waters of the Oregon. What effect is all this to have on our all-important whale fisheries and other commerce in the Pacific? What effect on the business and the tranquillity of our settlements on the Missouri and the Arkansas? Does not our indifference stimulate her cupidity? Our neglect enable her to magnify claims into rights, and to convert intrusion into title?

Sir, I honor the Anglo-Norman race; its energy, perseverance, love of liberty, courage, and civilization; its vigor and steadiness of mind, its masculineness of moral and physical organization. We are of the same stock. Its eminent traits are developed in our own growth and prosperity as colonies and as independent States. Let England carry her commerce into every sea, and push forward her power, if she will, in "the gorgeous Orient." Civilization accompanies her progress from conquest to conquest; and her triumphs are the triumphs of our father land and our kindred. But on us she must not encroach. Whilst our territorial expansion is restricted to this continent, hers must be excluded from it. There can be no other conditions of harmony between her and us. We are not suns that may culminate together in the same sky.

Mr. Speaker, thus far I have discussed this as a question of commerce, and a question of territorial rights. But it has other relations not less, perhaps more, important. The operations of the Hudson's Bay Company are not confined within the Oregon Territory. Extending their trapping and trading expeditions as they do, far eastward, into, if not across, the mountain, they may continue, as they have done, to furnish arms and hostile passions to the Indians of the far West Remember, that when the emigrated Indians shall be added to the Pawnees, and other wild tribes of that region, there will be 60,000 fighting men accumulated together on the frontiers of Arkansas and Missouri; too many of them with no friendly feelings for the Government of the United States. Will it be useful and convenient to us to have them backed by the power and influence of Great Britain? To answer this question, I must entreat the House to consider how that power and that influence affect, and have affected, our Indian relations, as proved by the records of the country.

From the last message of the President relative to the Oregon Territory, (that which is now before us,) we learn that "no recent communication on this subject has passed between this Government and any foreign Power;" that is to say, none since 1827. For more than ten years the question has been allowed to slumber. I shall not indulge in any party reflections on this. I wish to discuss the subject as between Great Britain and the United States; not as a topic for censure of the Administration, unless provoked to do it. But if any reasons, and whatever reasons, have seemed to the Administration to justify this long silence in the matter, the crisis to which our Indian policy has now arrived would, if nothing else, demand of the United States instantly to resume the negotiations, and bring them to a just conclusion.

Sir, the facts to which I am about to allude are discreditable to Great Britain. If my public duty did not require me to bring them before the House—if the great interests of the country did not require them to be recalled to memory now—I would willingly pass them by untouched. But the use of the past is to guide the present and warn the future. "History," it has been justly said, in reference to this subject, "history, and even modern history, is already sufficiently fabulous, without a suppressio veri, which will leave to posterity little more than a knowledge that battles were fought, and kingdoms won." It would be absurd to shut our eyes upon things affecting so closely our future peace. And a time of profound peace, of all others, is the true one to discuss the sore points in the foreign relations of the country.

In the wars of this continent, anterior to the Revolution, the Indians were freely employed as auxiliaries by Great Britain and by France. When the colonies revolted, our fathers were anxious to have the Indians continue neutral; but Great Britain willed otherwise, though the walls of St. Stephens rang with the eloquent denunciations of Lord Chatham, appealing to the laws of morality and humanity in reprobation of the policy of his Government. Still, those were belligerant acts; and let them pass for such. But how was it after the solemn conclusion of the treaty of peace? Did Great Britain adopt a policy of peace? It is written in letters of blood and fire upon every page of the annals of the country, that Great Britain did not cease to nurture and keep alive the hostile spirit of the Indians towards us. She continued, in violation of the treaty, to hold the military posts along the northern line of the United States, from Lake Champlain to Lake Michigan, for years. The most important, those of Oswego, Niagara, Detroit, Michilimackinac, and Fort Miami, were not delivered until 1796, thirteen years after the treaty of peace; and this only by virtue of an express article of the new treaty of 19th November, 1794. (Jay's.) Doubtless, England looked still to the recovery of the Colonies, or a part of them, anticipating, perhaps, civil war among ourselves, or some other contingency favorable to her views. In pursuance of which, availing herself of her posts in the Indian country, and through the instrumentality of traders and others, she instigated the Indians of the Northwest to make war against us, and to demand the river Ohio as a perpetual boundary to divide the United States from the Northwestern Indians. Hence, from the close of the Revolutionary war to the signal defeat of the Indians by Gen. Wayne, there was perpetual hostility between them and the United States, checkered by all the usual incidents of savage warfare, as the burning of houses, and the massacre of women and children, not forgetting the defeat of Harmar and of St. Clair. The state of things is described in a work of authority before me:

"From 1783 to 1790, not less than three thousand persons were murdered or dragged into captivity from the frontiers of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Kentucky. The scalps and the prisoners travelled the old war-paths. The British Indian Department was numerous and active. A personal inspection was made by Lieutenant Governor Hunter, and a fort was commenced on the Miami. The hopes of the Indians were elated by the celebrated war-talk of Lord Dorchester. Profuse issues of clothing, provisions, and ammunition were made to them. Several intercepted letters of British officers were published, which leave no doubt of the influence exerted upon the Indians. Gen. Wayne, in his official report, states that 'he had obtained a victory over the combined force of the hostile Indians and a considerable number of volunteers and militia of Detroit,' (then occupied and held by Canadians.) And this, too, in a time of profound peace between the American and British Governments."—N. A. Rev. vol. 24, p. 380.

Nay, so flagrant was the conduct of Great Britain, that Wayne's victory, and nothing else, it would seem, preserved us from war with her; for immediately upon the news of that victory reaching London, and not before, was Jay's treaty signed.

Eighteen years of nominal peace followed; during which time Great Britain continued to keep the Indians of the Northwest under war-pay. The fact is referred to by Mackenzie, in 1801, as if it were in the ordinary course of things. Speaking of the British post on the island of St. Joseph, he says:

"It is a place of no trade, and the greater part, if not the whole, of the Indians, come here for no other purpose but to receive the presents which our [the British] Government allows them. They are from the American territory," &c.—His. Fur Trade, p. 45.

Complaints, however, of the interference of England continually occurred in the United States, particularly in 1804 and 1807; occasioned by the conduct of British traders and emissaries on the Lakes, the Miami, the Illinois, the Wisconsin, and the Upper Mississippi. This conduct had reference partly to trade, and partly to war. To secure a monopoly of the Indian trade, the British traders spared no pains to embitter the minds of the Indians against the United States. And in long anticipation of hostilities, the Indians were bribed with presents, and supplied with arms and munitions of war, to have them in readiness to strike our frontier settlements at a moment's warning. Hence the Tecumseh war of 1811, instigated by Great Britain, in which the gallant Gen. Harrison, in command of the militia and other forces of the United States, and Col. Johnson, with the mounted troops of Kentucky, gained their laurels. All the histories of that period, McAffee, Dawson, and the rest, are full of the subject. And, in the years that followed, the barbarities perpetrated in the Northwest by the Indian allies of Great Britain, under the immediate eye of her officers, will tarnish the honor of the British name indelibly and for ever.

When the commissioners of Great Britain and the United States assembled at Ghent to negotiate a treaty of peace, at the very first interview, the British commissioner brought forward as a sine qua non, that the Indian allies of Great Britain, who had deserved so well of her, should be included in the pacification, and that a boundary be settled between the territory occupied by the Indians and the United States. Who were these Indian allies of Great Britain? They were tribes within the limits of the United States, as defined by the treaty of Paris. What would have been the effect of a boundary for them, stipulated in the proposed treaty of peace? To place, within the limits of the United States, a body of Indians, having determinate possessions, open to Great Britain, and held under her guarantee and protection; that is, to cede, for all practical purposes, to Great Britain, the whole of the United States north and west of the Ohio and Missouri. That such was the object of Great Britain at that time, though not openly professed by the commissioners, is proved by Mr. Atcheson's Compressed View of the Points to be discussed in treating with the United States; suggestions derived from which work came up constantly in various branches of the negotiation of Ghent.

"The next important point to be attended to in a treaty of peace with the United States is a new boundary for the Indians.

"The boundary line which appears best for the protection of Indian rights, and which would add to the security of Canada, would be to run a line from Sandusky, on Lake Erie, to the nearest waters falling into the Ohio; then down that river, and up the Mississippi, to the mouth of the Missouri; thence up the Missouri to its principal source, confining the United States to the Rocky Mountains, as their western boundary, and excluding them from all the country to the northward and westward of the lines here designated, which, from those lines to that which should be agreed on as the British boundary of Canada, should remain wholly for the Indians as their hunting grounds. The boundary between the United States and the Indians, as fixed by the treaty of Greenville, before alluded to, would perhaps answer as the new boundary line for the protection of the Indians, if extended so as to run up the Missouri and to the Rocky Mountains, provided that all the reservations and conditions in that treaty relative to the various tracts of ground within that line, for the advantage of the United States, and all the other conditions attached to them by it, be wholly done away, and the American Government (and probably also reciprocally the British) excluded from having any forts, military posts, territorial jurisdiction, or public property of any kind, within the Indian line; but the bona fide property of white people, in lands within that boundary, where the Indian titles shall have been fairly extinguished previous to a new treaty with America, might perhaps be safely allowed under the territorial juisdiction of Great Britain.

"This would of course obviate the necessity of any reservation as to the right of the British to carry on trade with the Indians, whose independence being thus established, they would have the right to admit or interdict whom they please; and we well know to whom they would, both from inclination and interest, give the preference. This is the more desirable, as the intercourse with the Indians of that quarter by the British, being carried on by permission, as it were, of a jealous and hostile nation, has been the fruitful source of innumerable exactions, continued disputes, and incessant broils.

"For men whose friendship has been recently shown to be of such great importance to us, we cannot do too much. We should see all their wrongs redressed, their territory restored to them, and themselves rendered forever secure from American encroachment. But the independence of the Indians cannot be effectually preserved by the articles of any treaty which shall provide security for Indian territory or Indian rights, unless, what is indispensable for their due execution, Great Britain become the avowed guarantee and protector of those rights and that territory, so as to have both the right and the power of instant interference, in case of any encroachment or violation, and not, as hitherto, be a silent spectator of wrongs and injustice, more immediately injurious to the aborigines, but eventually as ruinous to the security of the Canadas."

Such was the plan, in execution of which the British commissioners proposed to give a fixed boundary to the Indians, with a guaranty in effect of their independence of the United States, and even a stipulation forbidding us to treat for their lands; a plan, as developed by Mr. Atcheson, covering a large part of Ohio and Missouri, and the whole of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa, as well as Oregon.

These propositions of the British commissioners were steadily and unanimously resisted by the American commissioners, from whose communications I transcribe the following passages, for consideration hereafter:

"No maxim of public law has hitherto been more universally established among the powers of Europe possessing territories in America, and there is none to which Great Britain has more uniformly and inflexibly adhered, than that of suffering no interposition of a foreign power in the relations between the acknowledged sovereign of the territory and the Indians situated upon it. Without the admission of this principle, there would be no intelligible meaning attached to stipulations establishing boundaries between the dominions in America of civilized nations, possessing territories inhabited by Indian tribes."

* * "The Indians residing within the limits of the United States * * are so far dependent, as not to have the right to dispose of their lands to any private persons, nor to any power other than the United States, and to be under their protection alone, and not under that of any other power. Whether called subjects, or by whatever name designated, such is the relation between them and the United States. * * These principles have been uniformly recognised by the Indians themselves * * in all the * * treaties between them and the United States.

"The United States cannot consent that Indians residing within their boundaries as acknowledged by Great Britain shall be included in the treaty of peace in any manner which will recognise them as independent nations, whom Great Britain, having obtained this recognition, would hereafter have the right to consider, in every respect, as such. Thus to recognise those Indians as independent and sovereign nations, would take from the United States, and transfer to those Indians, all the rights of soil and sovereignty over the territory which they inhabit; and this, being accomplished through the agency of Great Britain, would place them effectually and exclusively under her protection, instead of being, as heretofore, under that of the United States.

"The United States claim, of right, with respect to all European nations, and particularly with respect to Great Britain, the entire sovereignty over the whole territory, and all the persons embraced within the boundaries of their dominions. Great Britain has no right to take cognizance of the relation subsisting between the several communities or persons living therein; they form, as to her, only parts of the dominion of the United States; and it is altogether immaterial whether, or how far, under their political institutions or policy, these communities or persons are independent States, allies, or subjects. With respect to her, and all other foreign nations, they are parts of a whole, of which the United States are sole and absolute sovereigns."

Such arguments were unanswered and unanswerable. The British commissioners were obliged to give up their sine qua non, and content themselves with a stipulation that each party would restore peace among the Indians within its jurisdiction. This, of course, was an agreement which the United States willingly entered into. In addition to which, our commissioners proposed the following article:

"His Britannic Majesty and the United States shall, by all the means in their power, restrain the Indians living within their respective dominions from committing hostilities against the territory, citizens, or subjects of the other party; and both powers also agree, and mutually pledge themselves, if at any time war should unhappily break out between them, not to employ any Indians, nor to admit of their aid and co-operation, in the prosecution of the war against the other party."

Noble, admirable proposition! Which the British commissioners, without venturing to discuss it, rejected by writing against the article in the projet of treaty presented by our commissioners the word "inadmissible." We must in charity suppose that hostility to the United States has blinded the eyes of Great Britain, from that time to this, to the gross inconsistency of her conduct in this matter. She has gained just applause in Europe by her exertions to suppress the slave trade, through her own laws and through negotiations with foreign powers. Did not the same principles of humanity require of her to relinquish the right, if right it can be, to hound on the savages of America against its Christian and civilized inhabitants? It is imputed to the Government of the United States as a breach of neutrality, if we do not, of our own motion, by voluntary law, and without any express treaty stipulation requiring it of us, restrain our people from crossing the frontier, and bearing arms into Canada. And yet Great Britain refused, in treating, to promise, and, by implication, may, if she please, decline to restrain the Indians living within her dominions from invading, tomahawk in hand, the territory or citizens of the United States!

Why did Great Britain repudiate an agreement so equitable as between the two nations, so philanthropic in principle, so truly benevolent towards the Indians themselves? The history of her conduct towards us during and after the close of the war of 1776, and from that time down to the end of the war of 1812, furnishes the answer. And what has transpired since the peace of 1814, corresponds to what happened after the peace of 1783. To refuse expressly, as Great Britain did at Ghent, to agree mutually to restrain the Indians, was, in spirit, a thing essentially unfriendly to us. And though she did not succeed in expressly withdrawing from our sovereignty the Indians of the United States, and placing them under the guaranty and protection of herself, yet she has in part attained the same object, by indirect means, through the negligence of the United States.

During the several years immediately consequent on the war, we trace the hand of British traders and agents on various occasions among the Indians of the South. The Creeks made a formal claim of her protection. She had easy access to the Southern tribes through Florida. (Am. St. Pap. For. Rel. vol. 4 p. 552; Ind. Aff. vol. 2, p. 156.) In explaining to Lord Castlereagh the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, Mr. Rush said, with unanswerable truth:

"My Government, resting upon sufficient proofs, was satisfied that our Indian wars generally, with the massacres on the frontier, always their preludes, had originated in one and the same cause. That they had been produced by British traders intruding themselves, with evil intentions, among the Indians."—Rush's London, p. 104.

Happily the acquisition of Florida by the United States shut out the influence of Great Britain as well as Spain from those Indians. Suppose it had been otherwise; suppose the English trader to have had free access to the Southern Indians during the last ten or fifteen years; suppose her to have held possession of Florida, so as to be at the very back of the Indians, supplying them with arms and ammunition, and with incentives of ill will towards us, would not the presence and intrigues of her traders there have been fatally injurious to the peace and welfare of the United States on that side?

Well, the same influences which we have rid ourselves of in that quarter by the acquisition of Florida, and the sealing up of the Indian country of the South hermetically against foreign powers, those very same prejudicial influences are to this day exerted against us in the Northwest.

To prove this, I have a great mass of evidence, from which I select, in the first place, a joint letter of General William Clark and General Cass, who, after describing the untiring efforts of British traders near to and even within our limits, to maintain and acquire influence over the Indians of the United States, proceed thus:

"It is certainly not uncharitable to suppose that the preservation of this influence is important to the British Canadian authorities. No other motive can be rationally assigned for the large distribution of goods which is annually made at Amherstburgh and Drummond's Island to the Indians living within our jurisdiction. We have not the means of ascertaining the number of Indians who visit these places, nor the value of the goods which are given to them; but we believe that a large proportion of the Indians east of the Mississippi annually resort there for presents; and about sixteen months since, one of us actually saw 160 canoes at one time crossing the western extremity of Lake Huron to Drummond's Island. Each man receives a blanket, shirt, leggins, and breech-cloth, and each woman a blanket, stroud, and leggins. To the children similar articles are given; and ammunition, guns, and kettles, and other things, are freely distributed. The tribes who principally make this annual pilgrimage are the Ottawas, Pottawatamies, Chippewas, Wyandots, Shawnees, Miamies, Menominies, Winnebagoes, Sacs and Foxes. Of these the four last tribes reside west of Lake Michigan, and extend to the Mississippi and beyond it.

* * It is no part of our duty to investigate the right which a foreign power has of thus subsidizing, in effect, a body of men living within our territories, but we have no hesitation in saying that its practical operation is seriously injurious. * * The Indians are kept in a state of excitement; they are taught to look to a foreign Government for advice and protection; and, above all, they believe that present benefits on the one side must be repaid by future services on the other." (Sen. Doc. 1828-9, No. 67.)

These views are confirmed by the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, in 1829, (Senate Doc. 1828-9, No. 52;) by a report on it, made in the Senate the same year, (ibid. No 67,) and by a variety of specific facts which appear in the documents appended thereto. Among these, are the supply of arms and ammunition, by the Hudson's Bay Company, to the Blackfoot and other predatory tribes; and the attack on the Santa Fe caravan by Indians armed from the same source; it being stated, also, in the report, that "the loss of lives by Indian hostility, believed to be instigated by British traders, is computed at five hundred men, for the last twenty years, on the upper waters of the Missouri, and in or beyond the Rocky mountains." And the report indicates, as the primary remedy for these evils, "the exclusion of all British from our [Indian] territories;" and "that the project of a joint occupancy by the British and Americans, of the country west of the Rocky mountains, ought to be abandoned, and a line of demarcation amicably established, with as little delay as possible;" which is the very point to which I arrive.

And these evils are not confined to the western frontier of Arkansas and Missouri, though rendered particularly serious in that quarter at present, by the location of the emigrated Indians there. The injurious influence of the Hudson's Bay Company pervades the entire Northwest. In a letter of Mr. Schoolcraft to the Indian Department, of 13th February, 1832, written from the Upper Mississippi, I find it stated that the control of the company over the Indians is "irrespective of an imaginary territorial line." And so it has continued down to the present time. I had occasion to cite the proofs of this, in remarks, made some time since in this House, on another question; and that the view of the subject which I now present may be complete in itself, I must repeat the citations I then made from the public documents. (Exec. Doc. 1837-8, No. 2.)

Mr. Schoolcraft, superintendent of the Indians of Michigan, reports:

"10. Visits of the lake tribes to the Canadas.—In closing this report, I take the liberty of calling the attention of the department to this subject. Not only are time and health wasted by numbers of the tribes, in performing these annual visits to the principal summer stations of the Indian Department of a foreign Government, but the visits and circumstances attending them are calculated to foster sentiments of hostility to the United States in the Indian mind. The generation is yet living who opposed our arms, as allies of the Canadian forces during the late war; and the very reason for assembling them, and issuing presents as an annual stipend, is based on a remuneration for service and losses incurred by them during the war. But is such a course compatible with the principles of amity existing between the two Governments?"

Mr. Fulkerson, sub-agent of the Upper Missouri, says:

"The Assinaboines, Crees, and the Gros Ventres of the Prairie, roam in pursuit of game over the vast plains extending from the mouth of the Yellowstone to Lake Winnipeg, and the sources of the Mississippi. A portion of their trade is carried on with the traders at Fort Union, at the mouth of the Yellowstone; but much the greater part of their trade is done with the British traders on north Red river, which empties into Lake Winnipeg. Many presents are given them by the British traders and Government, and much pains taken to conciliate their friendship, and to secure a monopoly of their trade. The consequence is, that they consider themselves much more closely allied to the British traders and Government than to the American. This operates powerfully to the disadvantage of the American traders at the present time, whom it ought to be the policy of Government to foster and protect, and may, in some future wars, be attended with the most fatal and disastrous consequences."

Lord Glenelg, in a despatch addressed to the Earl of Gosford and Sir F. Head, of 14th January, 1836, says:

"The annual expenditure incurred by this country [Great Britain] on account of Indians in Upper and Lower Canada has been limited since the year 1830, to £20,000; of this sum, £15,870 has been considered applicable to the purchase of presents, and £4,150 to the pay and pensions of the Indian Department.

"Deferring, for the present, any observation on this latter branch of expenditure, I feel bound, after much consideration, to express my opinion, that the time has not yet arrived, at which it would be possible, consistently with good faith, altogether to discontinue the annual presents to the Indians. It appears that, although no formal obligations can be cited for such issues, there is yet ample evidence that on every occasion when this country has been engaged in war on the North American continent, the co operation of the Indian tribes has been anxiously sought, and has been obtained. This was particularly the case in the years 1777 and 1812; and I am inclined to believe that it is from these periods respectively that the present annual supplies date their commencement. * * *

"Of the sum expended in presents there is, however, a portion which would appear to be placed under peculiar circumstances. It has often been represented, and lately on official authority, that, of the Indians who receive presents from the British Government, a considerable number reside within the United States, and only resort to Canada at the periods of issue."—(Parliamentary Accounts and Papers, 1836, vol. 14, No. 212, Colonies.)

For so much of this distribution of annuities or presents, as takes place under the authority of the British Government, and by treaty with the Indians, it is a manifest and palpable violation of the sovereignty of the United States, and of our neutral rights, according to the principles laid down and successfully maintained by our commissioners at Ghent. To have two opinions on this point is impossible. It is a question with but one side. And for so much of the disribution of presents, as goes on by enticing our Indians within the British lines for that purpose, as also the other doings of the Hudson's Bay Company exposed by me, they are a violation of the spirit, if not the letter of our treaties, just rights, and laws, regarding the Indians. Jay's treaty contained the following article:

"Art. 3. It shall at all times be free to subjects of Great Britain, and to the citizens of the United States, and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of the said boundary line, freely to pass and repass, by land, or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the two parties on the continent of America, (the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted,) and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other."

This was a most unequal and inconvenient provision. It is unequal in regard to space, because it excepted the extensive country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company. It was still further unequal by reason of the duties paid by our traders on the importation of their goods. But the main objection to it was the facilities it afforded to British officers and traders for tampering with the allegiance of the Indians subject to the United States. The traders have paramount influence over the Indians; and it was unsparingly used by the British agents against us. In consequence of the prosperity of the Northwest Company, there grew up another on the same plan, called the Mackinaw Company, which established its head-quarters at Michilimackinac, and trapped and traded in the great region west and southwest of that point, in Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, and on the waters of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas, all within the acknowledged limits of the United States. (Irving's Astoria, vol. 1, p. 26, 136.) Prior to Jay's treaty the laws of Indian intercourse do not appear to have had much, if any, political bearing; but, after the conclusion of that treaty, there is a visible change in the policy of our Indian intercourse. The early acts, as that of 22d July, 1790, seem not to have looked beyond the questions of trade and police. But, on comparing the acts of 18th April, and 19th May, 1796, we shall discern political objects in their provisions, and especially the strong desire to counteract the influence of British traders in the Indian country by establishing posts of our own there, and promoting the trade of Americans. Actuated by these inducements, our Government encouraged Mr. Astor in the prosecution of the fur-trade by him along the lakes and the Mississippi, because it tended to the substitution of an American influence among the Indians in place of a British.

The war of 1812 changed materially the relations of the parties. By the annexation of Louisiana to the United States the English line was removed from the Mississippi. The United States was relieved from the troublesome clauses of Jay's treaty. In the negotiations for the commercial intercourse between the two countries, which produced the successive conventions of 1815, 1818, and 1827, the United States refused to renew the stipulations of the third article of Jay's treaty. Since the war, therefore, Great Britain has enjoyed no peculiar treaty privilege, or intercourse with the Indians of the United States, as she did before; and it is left to stand upon general principles. We had purchased wisdom by dear experience. Hence the act of 27th April, 1816, based upon the principles assumed at Ghent, by which foreigners were prohibited from trading with our Indians, their goods being subjected to forfeiture, and their persons (unless fortified with a passport) to a fine and imprisonment; and the President being authorized to employ the military force to carry the law into effect.

These provisions, needful as they are to the peace of the United States, are evaded, by the Indians being inveigled into Canada to receive stipulated war subsidies or annual presents, as proved by the evidence of Mackenzie, of Generals Clark and Cass, of Mr. Schoolcraft, of Mr. Fulkerson, and the avowal of Lord Glenelg; they are evaded by the disregard of the boundary, so easy in those vast regions, extending from the Lakes to the Rocky mountains, where the line, though designated by treaty, has not been run or marked; and they are nullified, and utterly set at naught, by the intrusions of the Hudson's Bay Company into the country of the Columbia river, debauching, corrupting and arming against us, the numerous tribes inhabiting the immense country between the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean. It is impossible to reconcile these things with the neutral obligations of Great Britain. Her practices with our Indians are a greater breach of neutrality than any thing which our citizens have done on the Canada frontier; the latter being a transient popular outbreak, the former an organized system; our Government having withstood and suppressed this, while the British Government officially and publicly participates in that. Whatever we, the Congress of the United States, can do, by authorizing the establishment of a post on the Columbia, or otherwise, to put a stop to these abuses, should be done, while the Executive should be invoked to exert to the same end the peculiar powers conferred on him by the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I hasten to bring these protracted remarks to a conclusion. I feel sensible of the difficulties I am liable to meet in bringing before the House a subject which, though much and ably discussed in former Congresses, has been thrust aside by more engrossing domestic questions, until it is, to many intents, and especially in its present relations, a new one. I have now done my duty. I have exposed facts which seem to me important to be understood; and to give due effect to which, I have deemed it necessary they should go forth to the country from the Halls of the Capitol. The whole of our fur trade; our whole fisheries; our intercourse with Asia, giving profitable employment to so many millions of our capital, and to the population of all parts of the country, are at stake in this question. Our Indian relations are involved in it. Upon its issue depends the fate of a noble domain, the seat, in no distant time, of prosperity and of power. It is important in all points of view. That wide region, the interior plateau of the continent, with its wild mountains and its romantic scenes of chase and war; that ocean of the prairies, with its peril, its adventure, its hardihood of life, so analogous to the sublimity of spectacle, and the stirring vicissitudes of the sea itself; those rich valleys of the Oregon, through which the same bright banner which sparkles on the Atlantic may carry the stars of our civilization westward to the Pacific—all this will be possessed or peopled ere long, either by England or by us. Which shall it be? Can the sense of our true interest, can the honor and pride of the nation hesitate? It is a country ours by right; ours by the necessities of geographical position; ours by every consideration of national safety; and ours it will be it tranquil possession, if we temperately but firmly assert our rights. The world is wide enough for England and for us. We have much to gain by a cordial intercourse, conducted as becomes nations of the same blood, and the same tongue, each at the head of civilization in its proper hemisphere; much to hazard, by either practising or suffering encroachments on either side. Off-shoots of that dominant race, which, starting from the mountains of Caucasus, has proceeded in opposite directions, east and west, encircling the globe, if we are to confront each other on the shores of Asia and of America, there let us meet in confident good will, imbued with that just consciousness of each other's power, and that mutual respect for each other's rights, which are the only sure foundation of stable peace.

Mr. HOWARD (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs) asked that the proposed instructions might be read; they were accordingly read, as follows:

"To inquire into the expediency of establishing a post on the river Columbia for the defence and occupation of the Territory of the United States watered by said river, and also to consider the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent the intermeddling of the officers or subjects of foreign Powers with the Indians of the United States."

Mr. HOWARD said that he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the passage of the proposed instructions, as they only directed the committee to inquire into the expediency of adopting the measure which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had so elaborately argued before the House. Indeed, he was not aware that any person intended to object to the adoption of the instructions. If the gentleman who proposed them had thought proper to have ascertained this point, he might have saved himself much labor and the House much time by permitting them to pass sub silentio. As they were to go to a committee of which both the gentleman from Massachusetts and himself were members, and the rest of the committee had not probably listened to the speech of that gentleman with the same attention which he [Mr. H.] had bestowed upon it, it might become necessary for that gentleman to recapitulate in committee the substance of what he had said in the House, when the subject should be taken up, and thus the gentleman from Massachusetts would have to perform a double labor. It was often necessary for a member of the House, when sending a subject to the consideration of a committee, to explain the views by which he was actuated, if it should so happen that he was not a member of that committee; and he should have deemed the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts in this case entirely unnecessary, if it were not for one consideration suggested by that gentleman, in the correctness of which he [Mr. H.] entirely concurred. It was, that the debates which took place in this House were of themselves important, whether any legislative result followed or not. This was true. Second only to what was done was what was said in the House. Sometimes debates there produced consequences of great magnitude. They affected both the foreign and domestic policy of the Government; and it was always a matter of great consequence that the public mind should be furnished with the materials proper for the formation of a correct judgment upon every topic of deep interest. With the view of stating to the House some few suggestions which had occurred to his mind upon the very important subject brought before the House and the nation by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he had risen to throw them out for consideration; and he felt the more inclined to do this, because he feared that, when the subject came to be calmly weighed, some difficulties would be found to exist in the prosecution of the proposed measure, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts had not adverted in his speech. The committee were to be instructed to inquire into the expediency of doing two things, entirely distinct in their character, viz: of establishing a military post on the Columbia river, and of regulating, by law, the commercial intercourse with the Indians beyond the Rocky mountains. He doubted whether we were at liberty, under existing treaties with Great Britain, to pass a law for the attainment of either of these two objects.

The third article of the convention concluded with the British Government by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, on the 20th Oct. 1818, was as follows:

"It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the Northwest coast of America, westward of the Stoney Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers with the same, be free and open for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens and subjects of the two powers, it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

On the 6th of August, 1827, another convention was made with the British Government, by Mr. Gallatin, at London, the 1st and 2d articles of which are as follows:

"Article 1st. All the provisions of the third article of the convention concluded between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, on the 20th of October, 1818, shall be, and they are hereby, further indefinitely extended and continued in force in the same manner as if all the provisions of the said article were herein specifically recited.

"Art. 2. It shall be competent, however, to either of the contracting parties, in case either should think fit, at any time after the 20th October, 1828, on giving due notice of twelve months to the other contracting party, to annul and abrogate this convention; and it shall, in such case, be accordingly entirely annulled and abrogated, after the expiration of the said term of notice."

As no notice has been given by either party, under this last clause, the obligation of the convention of 1818 remains, of course, in full force at this day. Of the wisdom or policy of these two conventions, Mr. H. said he did not mean to speak. He did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) as calling either in question, and the point was not before the House. The entire country to the west of the Rocky Mountains was agreed to be left "free and open to the citizens and subjects of the two powers." Now, it seemed to him [Mr. H.] that the establishment of a military post there, which would be garrisoned by a part of the army of the United States, and held, necessarily, under the exclusive jurisdiction of our Government, would be an infringement of the treaty into which we had entered; and the passage of a law to regulate intercourse with the Indians in that quarter would be still more so, because the operation of such a law would not only be an exercise of exclusive jurisdiction, but must spread over a large extent of territory. How could it be said that the country was "free and open" to the subjects of Great Britain, after we had erected a fort in a part of it, with sentinels at its gates, into which those subjects were forbidden to enter, and after we had undertaken to restrain their intercourse with the native tribes for hundreds of miles in every direction? It seemed to him that the two things were irreconcilable.

Nor could we justify such a proceeding upon the ground that the British traders were occupying the country. It was, unfortunately, true that the Hudson's Bay Company, with its gigantic establishment, had spread itself over the whole of the northern part of the continent. Their trading houses reached from York House, on Hudson's Bay, to the mouth of Columbia river, and along the shore of the ocean, both in a north and south direction from that point. The commerce in furs was almost engrossed by this vast corporation, and it was true that the people of the United States were often supplied from England with the very furs which had been carried from their own continent to England, and were thence brought back to be consumed in this country. This was a circuitous, expensive, and unnatural channel of trade; and he was very strongly inclined to concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts in adopting such steps as we could take with propriety to put an end to it, and restore to our own people the advantages of their natural position. But, still, in prosecuting their industry, the Hudson's Bay Company had done nothing more than to avail themselves of the right which we had yielded up to all British subjects in the treaty of 1818. The British Government had not interfered in any way. The trading houses and vessels employed in this vast commerce were owned by this company, and all the persons engaged in it were directly under their control and in their pay. Even Fort Vancouver belonged to them, and was held by no other right than that of mere occupancy, the same right which would entitle any one of our traders to a hut which he might choose to erect for his temporary accommodation. If the British Government owned any property, or exercised any jurisdiction in any portion of the country on the other side of the Rocky Mountains, it had escaped his notice, and he did not believe that such a fact existed. The operation of the treaty was undisturbed on their part, and we could find in their conduct no reason, on our side, for departing from its stipulations. If the Hudson's Bay Company, from its antiquity, its capital, and its acquired influence with the Indians, possessed superior advantages to our traders, it was owing to the existence of the treaty, and not to its violation.

That there existed sufficient enterprise and skill amongst our hardy sons of the West to contend against these advantages, he did not doubt; but instead of being assisted, they had hitherto been retarded by our own Government. The goods with which the Indians are supplied in exchange for their furs are, in a great measure, manufactured in England; and amongst these items the article of coarse blankets is one of the greatest importance, being demanded by the rigor of their northern winters. How are the traders from the United States to supply the Indians with this indispensable article of traffic? They have no other mode than to import it from England. When introduced into our ports, a heavy duty is laid upon it, and Congress has been from time to time invoked in vain to return the duty by way of drawback, when these goods are carried across the frontiers into the Indian country. The gentleman from Massachusetts may perhaps remember by whom this proposition has been repeatedly made, and by whom refused. The policy of such a measure, as far as it affects our commerce with the Indians of the Northwest, is clear and almost indisputable. Vessels go from England to Canada, or to Columbia river, laden with articles from her workshops, which pay no duty in the latter place, and next to nothing in the former, and are thence transported directly and cheaply to the trading houses, where the Indians meet them. And yet we burden our traders with a duty of fifty per cent. and then complain that the British company has the advantage. How was it possible, Mr. H. asked, to reconcile such a course of policy with a desire to extend our Indian commerce?

The convention of 1828 pointed out a mode of terminating the treaty, and the House might, if it thought proper, express an opinion that the President ought to give the requisite notice for its termination. Mr. H. did not think this the proper occasion to say whether, in his judgment, the President ought or ought not to give this notice; the point had not been brought into discussion, and it might be very properly considered by the committee under the proposed instructions. But there was another point which could not escape the observation of the committee in their examination of the subject. It was this: How far the House of Representatives, to whom the Constitution had confided no share of the treaty-making power, could feel itself justified in advising the President to terminate a treaty, or in expressing an opinion that he ought to do so, would be a matter of some delicacy to determine. As the House had no participation in forming a treaty, it ought to be very cautious in assuming the responsibility of declaring that one which was already formed should be destroyed.

There was still another view of this subject, [Mr. H. said,] which he was desirous to glance at in the cursory remarks which he was now making. If it was the intention of the House that a military post should be established on the Columbia river, either now or at some future and not far distant period, it would furnish another incentive to the passage of a bill now upon our tables for the increase of the army. To think of detaching any portion of that army from its duty nearer home, when it was already too small to garrison our fortresses and protect the South and Southwest from the dangers of Indian hostilities, would be almost preposterous. That bill ought to be passed during this session, at all events; and he would be willing to remain here during the whole summer, if it should be necessary, to pass it. No one could view the situation of our country, and consider the probable demands which might be made upon the services of the army, without perceiving the propriety of increasing its force. It was needless, if not improper, now to look at the various subjects to which the attention of the army might be called. The condition of the Indians on the other side of the Mississippi was, of itself, a fruitful source of anxiety; and he felt convinced that, instead of sparing any portion of our small but gallant army for the distant duty of the Columbia river, it was highly expedient to augment it, even for other purposes.

Mr. H. said he had risen only for the purpose of bringing these few points before the notice of the House, and not to discuss any of them. The instructions looked only to an inquiry, which would be more properly made by the committee. If, when the subject should be referred to them, they should deem it expedient, an opportunity would be afforded both to the gentleman from Massachusetts and himself, as well as to the other members of the committee, to give it a fuller consideration.

After Mr. HOWARD had concluded,

Mr. ELMORE, of South Carolina, expressing a wish to extend the scope of Mr. CUSHING's resolution, moved as a substitute the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the extent of the country claimed by the United States west of the Rocky Mountains, on the northwest coast of the Pacific Ocean; the title under which it is claimed, and the evidence of the correctness of the title; the extent of sea coast, and the number and description of its harbors; the nature of the climate, soil, productions, and trade; and, also, whether it is expedient to establish a Territorial Government, or one or more military posts, as possession for the same or any part thereof; and what will be the expense necessary to establish the same, and the annual expenses for its support; what fortifications and ships will be required for said Territory, and what number of soldiers and sailors will be necessary for its protection, both in time of peace and in case of a war with any foreign power; and that the committee report thereon to this House."

Mr. CUSHING objected to Mr. ELMORE's proposition as a substitute for his own, because it omitted any reference to the Indian relations of the subject; but expressed his willingness to see it adopted in amendment of, and as an addition to, the original instructions; and in that form it was adopted by the House.

Mr. ELMORE then signified his desire to speak on the general subject; and, at his motion, the House adjourned. But the next day he waived his right to the floor, and the resolution of instructions, as amended, was adopted by the House without a division.

SPEECH OF MR. GARLAND, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, April 20, 1838—On Mr. HOPKINS's resolution to divorce the Government from the press.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not intend to have participated in the debate upon the resolution offered by my colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS.] My design was simply to have given a silent vote for the adoption of that resolution, and await the report of the committee to determine my final action. The amendment proposed by my honorable colleague, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] containing, as it does, although not so designed, a direct reflection upon the committees referred to, and having been a member and chairman of one of those committees, a sense of duty to that committee, and to myself, demands that I should obtrude upon the time and patience of the House so far as to offer a few defensive remarks, which I can assure the House shall be very brief.

Before entering into the merits of the proposed amendment, I will remark that I think my colleague must have mistaken the character and import of the original resolution offered by my colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS.] That resolution proposes an entire separation of the public printing from all political journals, and the supervisorship of the Clerk is confined entirely to the execution of the printing ordered by the House. Surely my colleague cannot suppose that, in any sense of the term, this would be a censorship of the press.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said: Does my colleague mean to assert that I charged the resolution of my colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] as a censorship of the press?

I so inferred from a very hasty perusal of the remarks of my colleague, published in last evening's Globe.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. My remarks upon that subject referred entirely to the resolution of the Library Committee, reported by my colleague, [Mr. PATTON,] to subscribe for Niles's Register.

I take pleasure in standing corrected.

The amendment of my honorable colleague [Mr. DROMGOOLE] proposes, among other things, to inquire into the expenditures incurred by three investigating committees of the last session of the last Congress. The first was a select committee of which I had the honor to be chairman; the second was a select committee of which my colleague [Mr. WISE] was chairman; and the third was a standing committee who were charged with an inquiry into charges preferred by several citizens of this District against one of its judges. What relation an inquiry into the expenditures of these committees in discharging the duties confided to them by the House can have to the inquiry proposed by my honorable colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] I cannot divine; it can neither give promptitude, facility, nor effect to that inquiry, but, on the contrary, is well calculated to delay, hinder, and embarrass it. If my colleague had no other object in view than merely to ascertain the expenses of these committees, he might have done so without the necessity of incurring the expense of an investigating committee to do so; he had only to turn to the reports of the Committee of Accounts, and he would have found every item, without incurring the expense of a committee. A standing committee having already reported these expenditures, there can be no earthly necessity of embarrassing a committee raised for another and distinct purpose, with doing that which has already been done. But to relieve all difficulty upon this subject, and to disabuse the public mind, as to the cost of the committee of which I was chairman, I have obtained a statement of the expenses incurred by that committee. And what, Mr. Speaker, do you suppose the amount is? Not $50,000, as prophesied by some—not $20,000, as predicted by others—but $3,903 92, as follows:

For summoning witnesses by Sergeant-at arms	-	$1,756 40
Pay of witnesses in Washington	- -	740 60
Clerk to the committee - - -	-	280 00
Commissioners at Philadelphia -	-	384 00
Do New York - - -	-	305 70
Do Baltimore - - -	-	200 00
Do Cincinnati - - -	-	151 00
Do Indianapolis - -	-	85 12
		$3,903 02

This is independent of the cost of printing; that was an act of the House. Such was the interest felt by the House and the whole community in the result of the investigation, affecting, as it did, a most important branch of the Executive department of the Government, and the management of the finances of the nation, that the House, by unanimous vote, adopted a resolution to print 5,000 extra copies of both the majority and minority report, so that the whole case might be fairly placed in possession of the American people. But, to prevent all cavil, I here present a statement of the expenses of printing the reports. They are as follows:

Usual number - - - - -		$1,852 60
5,000 extra - - - - -		4,666 40
		$6,519 00
Which, added to the other expenses, makes in the whole - - - - - -		$10,442 02

But suppose, Mr. Speaker, the expenses of this investigating committee had been five, ten, or even twenty times the actual amount, what of that? Would you judge the necessity or propriety of investigating into any alleged fraud or corruption in any department of the Government by the dollars and cents which it would cost? Surely, surely not. I am confident my colleague would repudiate with scorn and indignation such an idea. Yet such would be the effect of his amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I did not originate the investigation charged upon that committee. At the preceding session, my honorable colleague [Mr. WISE] had thrice offered a resolution proposing this investigation. When I offered the resolution which was adopted, it was forced upon me by circumstances. I had offered a resolution calling upon the Treasury Department for information upon a subject of a totally different character; pending that resolution, a gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] offered an amendment, calling upon the Department for information upon the identical subject referred to the committee. Failing to disembarrass my resolution from this amendment, and feeling well satisfied that any answer from the Department, however correct, would not be satisfactory, the Department being itself implicated, I determined to propose an inquiry in a form which would be at once effective and satisfactory; and with that view I proposed to Mr. HARLAN to withdraw his amendment, which he did, and offered the resolution organizing the committee, which was unanimously adopted. For this act, forced upon me as it was by circumstances, and for the course which I felt it my duty to pursue upon that committee, I am informed by a letter now in my possession, from a highly creditable source, that a newspaper correspondent was called upon and earnestly urged to denounce me through the columns of the "Albany Argus." Notwithstanding the resolution was unanimously adopted, and that the resolution which organized the committee of which my colleague [Mr. WISE] was chairman, embracing a much more general and extended scope of inquiry, was offered, and its adoption earnestly pressed, by Mr. Vanderpoel, a decided friend of the Administration, and adopted with but seventeen dissentients, it seems I was the only victim—I was to be destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, I never discharged any duty, either public or private, committed to my charge, more faithfully, more honestly, or more conscientiously, in my life, than I did upon that occasion. When resolutions of the same character were previously offered by my colleague, [Mr. WISE,] I uniformly voted for their adoption, because I thought if the charges which had been made, and that too from such high and respectable sources, were true, it was due to the nation that they should be detected and exposed; if not, that it was due to the Administration and the head of the Treasury Department, that the false impressions which existed should be removed, and entire confidence restored. When I offered the resolution which was adopted, I stated most distinctly and unequivocally, that I did not think the charges were true, but, if they were, that every friend of the Administration, and of the purity of our Government, should desire to know it, if not, that then the responsibility would fall on those who had made the accusation.

Highly distinguished representatives of the people upon this floor, men in whose honor and sincerity I had entire confidence, asserted upon the authority of information which they had received, their belief in the existence of the illicit connection which was charged to exist between an individual and the Treasury Department. This I thought sufficient, not only to justify, but imperiously to require the investigation. In the progress of the investigation I was delicately situated; I was a friend of the Administration; I was the mover of the resolution organizing the committee; I was its chairman, and, if I had been controlled by policy alone, it would have been suicidal in me to have opposed the most latitudinous inquiry of which the subject was susceptible; but I was not controlled by policy; I was controlled by a sense of duty to the country, as well as to the parties implicated, and by this rule shaped my course. The differences of opinion which arose as to the admissibility of testimony were natural and to be expected. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House that General Jackson himself desired these investigations; and, although I did not know it until after I had taken my course, yet I am informed, on indubitable authority, that he had prepared a paragraph in his annual Message, inviting Congress to institute investigation into these very subjects; but, upon reflection, determined to express his confidence in the ability and integrity with which the Executive Departments had been administered, and leave Congress to adopt that course which it might deem most expedient.

Mr. Speaker, the report of that committee, and the result of its investigation, are before the country for its unbiassed and impartial judgment. I will express no opinion concerning it; only that its labors were arduous and incessant, not surpassed by those of any committee which was ever organized by this House; and that the information which the report imparts to the country, whether as affecting the management of the Treasury Department, or the operations of the State bank deposite system, is worth infinitely beyond the paltry sum which it cost the nation.

Mr. WISE. I call upon my colleague, in sincerity and candor, to say whether the production of the "wool clip" letter is not of itself worth the whole cost.

I do not now recollect with sufficient accuracy the contents of the "wool clip" letter, to answer my colleague satisfactorily. I recollect that that letter made a very strong impression upon my mind.

I have no inclination, Mr. Speaker, to assume responsibility that does not belong to me. I certainly am not entitled to the credit of originating that investigation; but, if it suits the views of any to place the responsibility of either the paternity or the expense of that committee on my shoulders, for good or for evil, for weal or for wo, I am willing to take it to the utmost extent, and when called to account, will discharge that responsibility most amply, by pointing to the contents of the report itself. I will only say, that that document will disclose the fact, that the Secretary of the Treasury was giving that identical organization to the State Bank Deposite system, which now, when offered by another, is called a league of banks, dangerous to the liberties of the country.

The SPEAKER here interposed, and said Mr. G. was out of order, and he desisted.

My honorable colleague, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] in the remarks which he submitted to the House in favor of his amendment, on yesterday, stated that, in submitting that amendment, he had other and more important objects in view than to ascertain the mere expenses of these committees. He contended that these committees, under the authority to send for persons and papers, had exercised powers in issuing subpœnas for witnesses which did not necessarily or properly grow out of that authority, and that his amendment would bring that subject to the view of the House. How, under the authority to ascertain the expenses of these investigating committees, the committee proposed to be charged with the inquiry can enter into the investigation of the powers of this House, or of investigating committees to issue subpœnas and summon witnesses, I cannot, for the life of me, perceive; the one has reference merely to the addition of dollars and cents; the other to most important powers necessary to the effective exercise of the right of investigation. I differ with my honorable colleague totally and essentially upon this question of power. I regard the power of this House, either by itself or through its committees, to investigate corruption and abuses in its own members, or in the executive and judicial branches of the Government, as absolutely and essentially necessary to the preservation of the purity of the Government and the stability of our institutions—strike it down or render it ineffective, and corruption, brazen faced, unchecked and uncontrolled, will stalk through the land in the face of day. The Constitution has wisely armed the representatives of the people with this power, to check and control those who are more distantly removed from responsibility to them. I would ask my honorable colleague how this power could be exercised with any effect unless this House had the power to bring before them and compel to testify the individuals who had knowledge of the facts or documents which would prove the corruption or abuse, or vindicate the innocence of the accused; it would be a power without the means of execution, which, like a body without a soul, would be inanimate and useless. The very object of instituting such inquiries and making such investigations is to ascertain facts; and there are no means by which to ascertain facts unless the production of documents or the testification of witnesses can be enforced. The power of Congress to investigate is commensurate with the jurisdiction of the Government, and necessarily carries with it the power to give effect to it, by sending for persons and papers. The truth of this position is daily illustrated by the jurisdiction and constant practice of the courts who have the power upon all questions of litigation before them to send for persons and papers. If Congress has the power to send for persons and papers, does it not necessarily follow that it has the power to compel the attendance of the one and enforce the production of the other? It certainly does; for I know of no other means by which the attendance of witnesses or the production of papers can be enforced, except by subpœna. This is the instrumentality through which the courts work, and is the only effective means by which Congress can work, unless Congress or its committee goes to the witnesses in succession, and to the holders of material papers, which none would dream of. We see that the courts have the power to punish by fine and imprisonment, all who refuse obedience to their process: yet, in the more important matters of State concern, the power is denied to this House. If this House has not the power to issue subpœnas, of course it cannot confer it upon a committee. My honorable colleague contends that subpœnas could only be issued by the House on ascertaining the names of the witnesses, which might be furnished by the committees, and cites as authority the practice of the British Parliament. I do not know what rule the British Parliament has prescribed to itself in conducting these investigations, but that would be no precedent for our guide. This House can investigate for itself, without the agency of a committee; committees are only the instruments of its rules, and may be created or dispensed with at pleasure.

If, then, the House, in conducting an investigation before itself, could not issue a subpœna without the naming of a witness by a committee, then this House would have a power without the means of carrying it into effect; one totally inoperative. If it has the power, it may confer it upon its committee, always subject, of course, to its own supervision and control, and I believe such has been the constant and uniform practice. I think every one must be satisfied that this power is absolutely necessary, and does exist. The power is one thing, the abuse of it another; and if my colleague will specify any abuse of the power, the committee will stand responsible to the House and to the nation.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment of my honorable colleague, although I am entirely confident he does not design it, is calculated to lay the foundation of a system of things which will not only render ineffectual this great corrective and purifying power of this House, but bring it into utter contempt and disgrace. Sir, without specifying the slightest imputation upon the committee as a body, or either of its members, acknowledging in his remarks that the powers exercised by the committee were warranted by the judgment of the House, he proposes to arm a committee with the power to investigate and report upon the expenses and course of other committees. What is to be the consequence? Why, when this new committee has reported, another may be raised to investigate its conduct and expenses, and thus the House may go on piling committee upon committee, and report upon report, to infinity. I entreat my colleague to pause and reflect a little. I beseech him too look at the ground upon which he stands. I implore him to reflect upon the consequences which are to grow out of this movement. Sir, if my colleague is desirous to settle and define the powers of this House, and those which it may confer upon its committees, let him offer a separate and distinct resolution, embracing this identical inquiry. It is the most direct and parliamentary course, and will be the most satisfactory.

My honorable colleague seems to complain of the power which these committees exercised in summoning witnesses from any place they pleased, without regard to distance, as well as their having issued commissions to take the testimony of witnesses whose attendance could not be procured. As to the first, so far as regards the committee over which I preside, I can only say that their discretion was not limited to this District, nor by specified distances. Whenever it had reason to believe there was a witness who had knowledge of any fact which would have a material bearing upon the subject under investigation, he was either ordered to be summoned, or authority given to take his testimony. The committee did not perceive that, if they had power to summon at all, the authority was limited by any other boundary than that of the United States itself. If there was any other limitation or restriction, they were not aware of it. They regarded it their right, as well as their duty, when they ascertained that any individual would disclose important facts, whether he resided in Boston, New York, New Orleans, or Charleston, to summon him. I should be under obligations to my colleague if he would point out the restriction as to distance, if the power exists at all. To have harassed our citizens thus, was an extremely unpleasant duty; yet it was necessary. These are duties which our citizens owe one to another, and which all owe to the Government; and which, however unpleasant and harassing, must be performed, or the very existence of society itself jeoparded. As to the second complaint, I have only to say that, if I do not misrecollect, this power is conferred by act of Congress; but whether it be or not, the exercise of this power is sustained by the repeated practices of the Government, and I shall not detain the House by discussing it. The exercise of the summoning discretion was uniformly exercised upon the statement of some member of the committee, that he believed the testimony of the witness proposed to be examined was material or necessary. It was not usual, nor was it proper, to require members of the committee to be sworn as to the materiality of witnesses they desired to be examined. They had no personal interest in the result of the investigation; they were members of the investigating body, acting upon their obligations of duty, and their responsibility to the House and to the country, and could not, with any decent propriety, have been required to be sworn. I do not remember a solitary example of the kind, in any investigation which has ever taken place.

The resolution of my honorable colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] proposed an inquiry into a subject of grave and serious import. It proposes to inquire into the propriety of so disconnecting the public printing of all the branches of this Government from the political press of the country, as to prevent the effect of that deleterious influence which the dispensation of such an immense mass of patronage to the political press is calculated to produce. It cannot be doubted that the principle asserted by this resolution is sound and salutary, and the object proposed to be attained valuable. Yet I confess I have some doubts whether, in the present state of the press, and the long and intimate connection which has existed, and from the failure of every attempt heretofore, such an attainment is practicable. Entertaining these doubts, I shall come to no conclusion as to what will be my final vote, until I can see the plan by which it is proposed to effect this object, that I may be the better enabled to judge of its practicability.

Mr. Speaker, a pure press, and a free press, is one of the greatest blessings which we can enjoy; it is a tower of strength to the people against the usurpations and corruptions of Government, and the palladium of their liberty. With a free press, and a pure press, virtue and morality will be preserved, and general intelligence so diffused, as to bid defiance to all the assaults, however potent, of tyranny and despotism upon the rights of the people; and, notwithstanding that much of licentiousness has crept into the press of the present day, I am, even for this, not prepared to do any single act which would tend to shackle its perfect freedom; when I do that, I should blow out the light which exhibits virtue and morality in their most endearing and beautiful forms, and directs the wandering footsteps of the pilgrim of liberty to the temple in which it is enshrined. I should break down the strongest barrier between liberty and slavery—between free and despotic Governments. It cannot, I think, be doubted, that the purity of the press can be best preserved, and its licentiousness most effectually restrained, by placing it as far as practicable upon its responsibility to an enlightened and virtuous public opinion. If it can alone look to that for countenance and support, it will feel its responsibility, conform its matter to that standard of morality, virtue, and decency, which prevail within the boundary of its circulation, and, according as that is elevated, will be the restraint upon licentiousness. A sound and healthy state of public opinion is the greatest security which we have for the decency and purity of the press, and the only restraint upon its licentiousness which can be successfully interposed. The influence of the press upon public opinion has been so completely tested by experience, that it would be but an idle expenditure of words and useless waste of time to attempt to prove it. We see it every where, we feel it in every situation; but it is only by an abuse of that influence, that morality, virtue and liberty can be impaired or hazarded; it is only when the press descends from its truly political into a purely partisan engine, that public opinion becomes vicious and depraved; it is only when it is wielded by factionists and aspirants for power that, from a shield of liberty, it becomes the sword of despotism. Not to travel beyond the boundary of our own country, the freest and most prosperous on earth, what do we see in the present day? The great mass of the press on one side offering unqualified and undeviating opposition, and that on the other affording unqualified and undeviating support to all the measures of the men in power. That such a state of things, if not checked, will ultimately degenerate into faction, and produce results too appalling even to contemplate, all must acknowledge. It is time, then, that some check should be prepared, some remedy applied, to heal this distempered condition of the press, and restore it to soundness.

The resolution of my honorable colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] proposes to withdraw from the hands of the Government one of its means of corrupting the public press, by securing it against the use of this source of patronage. We all know the selfishness of human nature, and the predominance of interest in the passions of the heart. It is reasonable to suppose that men will feel strong sympathies for those who minister to their wants or supply their necessities, and that a press deriving its material support from the hands of the Government will be very apt to enlist under its banner, and give to its measures an unqualified and undeviating support, without due regard to their principles or expediency. This arises from the imperfections of nature, and the predominance of selfishness. That these influences have existed, do now exist, and will always exist, none acquainted with the human character, or who has read with profit the history of man, none will be disposed to deny. If this source of patronage can be cut off, and the public press disentangled from any Government alliance, controlling its freedom, or poisoning its purity, a great achievement for virtue, morality, liberty, and free institutions, will have been accomplished. It is an experiment well worth making, and to the accomplishment of which I will readily aid.

My honorable colleague says that he will not, unless for very strong and urgent reasons, proscribe any class of our citizens. This is right, Mr. Speaker; I am pleased to hear it avowed by my colleague. I hope that it will not only be avowed, but that all will practice it; that to example will be added precept, and that my colleague, extending the principle to all its legitimate lengths, will rebuke, not only the press, but all who undertake to proscribe individuals for their opinions. If this precept had been followed by example, I, humble I, would have escaped some severe blows—some hard rubs for my obstinacy in acting and speaking according to the honest dictates of my conscience. My colleague says, if it be right to make the separation, let it be done by the votes of the House. I cannot, Mr. Speaker, see the propriety of the distinction which my colleague takes. If the principle be sound, I cannot perceive the difference in asserting by law or by vote; in either case the effect will be precisely the same. But I am far from acknowledging that the resolution, if carried out, will have this effect. It proscribes none; it leaves the editors of political journals to pursue their labors in their own way; it proscribes no printer or no press; it only seeks to prevent an alliance of a corrupting and dangerous character—an alliance between the Government and political journals, which would be dangerous to both.

My honorable colleague, in the course of his remarks, referred to the report of the Committee on the Library, reported by my late colleague, [Mr. PATTON,] its chairman, proposing to subscribe for ten copies of Niles's National Register during each session of Congress, for the use of the members of this House, in a way which was well calculated, although I am sure not designed, to do injustice to that gentlemen. I voted against laying that resolution on the table, and should have voted for its adoption. The editor of that work had agreed, if the resolution was adopted, to publish all the laws passed at each session of Congress, a complete journal of its proceedings, all the public documents of general utility, and the ayes and noes on every question on which they were taken. These numbers were designed to be placed in the hands of the members, to be deposited at some convenient points in each county of their districts, for the inspection and use of the people. Sir, I shall vote for any proposition which will carry the members of this body home to the people, naked and unmasked, and present in full and complete view all their actions, in order that they may be held to a strict accountability. The people ought to have, and their money cannot be more profitably expended than in transmitting to them, constant and accurate information of the course and proceedings of their representatives. The character of "Niles's Register," which is more a historical register than a political journal, its extensive circulation, and the great mass of public documents which it embodies, render it very valuable for such a purpose. My colleague urges two objections to this proposition: 1st. Its political character; 2d. Its cost. That to some extent it is a political journal, I do not deny; but whether it is a partisan journal, I will not undertake to decide; but I will test it by proof which my colleague himself will be disposed to respect. And, first, I quote the Richmond Enquirer. It says:

"Niles's Register.—We perceive from the last number of 'Niles's Weekly Register,' that this celebrated periodical is about to be transferred from Baltimore to Washington. After the first of September, it will be published in that city. The Register is now conducted by William Ogden Niles, and has been enlarged under his auspices. It is the best general collection of historical facts and references that is published in the United States with a table of contents."

2d. I quote from the New Hampshire Patriot, a journal, the orthodoxy of which I do not doubt my honorable friend over the way [Mr. CUSHMAN] will vouch. It says:

"Niles's Register.—It appears from an article in the last number, that this paper is to be removed to Washington city, as affording better facilities for facts and public documents, than its present location. As a record of facts, notwithstanding a slight tinge of Whig coloring is generally apparent, the Register stands among the first publications in the country."

This journal says it is a little Whigism—"a little tinge of Whig color"—that's all.

The Baltimore Republican. It says:

"Niles's Register.—From a notice which will be found in another column of our paper, it will be seen that the proprietor of Niles's Register is about removing to Washington city, where his well known and valuable journal will hereafter be published. The seat of the General Government, it is supposed, will afford greater facilites for obtaining documents and the kind of information which it supplies than any other place. We have no doubt that the change of location will be productive of the beneficial consequences which are anticipated, and we hope it may."

The New York Evening Post. It says:

"Niles's Register.—The publication of this paper will be transferred from Baltimore to Washington, on the first of September next. In his notice of the change, the editor, Mr. Niles, states that there will be no alteration in the principles of the paper, but that it will pursue the course hitherto laid down by him in its columns. As a record of facts and documents, and of the news of the day, this journal stands among the foremost, and some improvements in contemplation will still further enhance its value to its subscribers."

And the Charleston (S. C.) Mercury. It says:

"Niles's Register.—This valuable publication is to be transferred from Baltimore to Washington on the 1st of September next.

"We take this opportunity of saying something of the character of this publication, and its claims to the patronage of the community. As a political journal, the Register stands quite alone; it has no partisan character; its object is not to propagate the opinions of one man, or advocate the advancement of any one party, but to present, from week to week, a judicious collection of facts and documents connected with, and tending to elucidate the political history and condition of the country. Too much praise cannot be given to the uniform judgment and good sense which have governed the conduct of the Register in the selection of its articles. The citizen will find in it every thing necessary to give him a complete acquaintance with the spirit of the political world, and to the future historian, the Register will be an inestimable treasury of the most authentic and ample materials for the history of this country. The great popularity, and, indeed, authority which it has attained, both in this country and in Europe, attest that this is no exaggerated praise, and the unobtrusive character of its conductor is another proof, if any other were needed, that its reputation depends exclusively upon its merits. We sincerely wish it, both for the benefit of the editor and the community, a universal circulation."

With the evidence of these presses, exclusive of many others of a different political complexion, I think that all party objections, at least, will be removed, and that no such considerations could have prevailed with the committee. My friend from New York, [Mr. PARKER,] in his remarks upon this resolution, said that he was opposed to the principle of the resolution entirely; but if he were to vote for it, he would move to amend by striking out "Niles's National Register," and inserting "The Democratic Review." I suppose this preference would have been given by the gentleman because the "Review" was a little tinged with Democratic color. Well, sir, I should not have quarrelled with him about that: I wanted the thing, not because of the channel through which it was to be conveyed, but for its own sake. But, sir, my honorable colleague has fallen into an error in relation to the cost of the proposed work. He estimates it at least $12,000, when the proprietor himself proposed to furnish it at $4,900, which would have been greatly less than our subscriptions to political newspapers, which might well be dispensed with for such an object. And now, sir, I leave my colleague and the people to determine whether the immense mass of information which would in this work have been diffused through the nation, would not be of infinitely more value than the little sum of $4,900. Sir, we should, through this medium, save, in extra printing, with which we could dispense, three times this amount of the proposed subscription. The supervision over the publication by the Clerk of the House, proposed in the resolution, my honorable colleague seems to think squints at a censorship of the press. Not so, sir: the only supervision which the Clerk is required to exercise, is as to the mere accuracy of the publication of the journal, the laws, and the official documents. It confers on him no power over the press whatever; he has only to do what he now does—see that these things are accurately done. I don't think, Mr. Speaker, that this squinting can be seen with the naked eye.

In addition to the inquiries to which I have adverted, my honorable colleague [Mr. DROMGOOLE] proposes, in his amendment, to inquire whether the present printer to the House executes the public printing under his own supervision, by his own hands, in his own office, and with his own type, or whether it is done in the office under the supervision and management of the editors of another political journal. My honorable colleague, in commenting upon this branch of his amendment, intimated that probably my colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] was induced to offer his resolutions on account of what transpired previous to, or pending the election of public printer at the extra session, and referred to various rumors which he had heard, of a coalition between Thomas Allen and Gales and Seaton, and a publication in the Intelligencer that the printing was to be done in that office. From the part which I acted upon that occasion, and the degree of responsibility which I feel, it is incumbent on me to advert briefly to that subject. When I first cast my vote for Thomas Allen, I had never seen him to know him. I acted upon the high character which was given him by those who knew him. If he had entered into any arrangement, bargain or contract with Gales and Seaton, or others had done it for him, I knew nothing of it, nor had I heard of it. I entered into no arrangements, was privy to none, or knew of none. My vote against the late incumbents was determined before I knew or heard any thing about the Madisonian. An article which appeared in the Globe on the 21st of July last, which, while I had no idea was aimed at me personally, but which was the most effective blow which could have been struck at me, determined my course. This determination I communicated to my friend from North Carolina, [Mr McKAY,] who sits near me, on my way here at the extra session. I did not, and could not, blame the editors of the Globe for the expression of their own opinions. Yet the expression and the mode were calculated seriously to affect me, and demanded of me, from considerations of self-defence, to take the course I did. In doing so, I acted upon the same principles that my colleague did in casting his vote, and cannot be rebuked by him. But suppose, Mr. Speaker, that it turns out to be true, as I do not doubt it is, that the most material part of the printing is done at the office, by the hands, and with the type, of Gales and Seaton. Is that any breach of duty, or of the conditions of his obligation? Will my colleague refer to Mr. Allen's official bond, and point out any part of its condition which requires him to have the work executed in his own office, with his own types, and with his own hands? I think it will puzzle him to find it. The only condition is, that the printing shall be executed with fidelity, neatness and despatch, and all this has been done. The appointment is given to the man, not to the office, to the types, or to the hands. It is Mr. Allen's duty to comply with the conditions of his official bond. For that he has given the most ample and satisfactory security from among those who know him well; the conditions of the bond must be complied with, or he is responsible: so long as they are complied with, it is not material in what house, with what type, or with what hands, it is done.

But, Mr. Speaker, if my honorable colleague thinks these rumors are sufficiently authentic, and the facts which they charge sufficiently criminal to institute an inquiry on the part of this House, I would call his attention to rumors of an arrangement to assign over a part of the Executive printing to some other editors in anticipation of the printing of the House. I never thought it either criminal or worth an inquiry myself, nor shall I propose it. But, sir, I shall, from my peculiar position in reference to this vote for the inquiry. If Allen has entered into any arrangement, bargain, or contract of an immoral or corrupt character, let it be ascertained, and let him be exposed. Let it be rung upon the house-tops, and from one extremity of the nation to the other: I will not try to shield him. I do not believe that from his hitherto high character, he has done any thing which could dishonor him or make his friends blush, but I will throw no obstacle in the way of a free and full inquiry. Let us have the truth, and the whole truth. I here take occasion, Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House, to correct a misstatement in relation to my course upon this subject. It was in a letter written from this place to the Mississippi "Columbus Democrat," among a great many other things of somewhat a humorous character, that I came here in July last to try and get some of my poor kin quartered upon the Government, but failing, I became dissatisfied, met with Thomas Allen, who was on a like errand, and had met with a like disappointment, and entered into an arrangement with him to set up the Madisonian in opposition to the Administration. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is literally untrue. I was not here in July, or at any time between the 4th of March and the opening of the extra session. I made no such application, and had about as much to do with the establishment of the "Madisonian" as you had. I should not have noticed this part of that letter had I not understood from a friend that this statement had been credited, and did me injury.

My honorable colleague has referred to the opinions of Virginia. He says, and, to prevent mistake, I will give the remark in the words as published in the Globe: "He believed it to be according to the settled purpose and design of the institutions of Virginia that the business and operations of each Government, State and Federal, should be kept separate and distinct, and that that great State rights principle was violated by their connection." Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot accord with my honorable colleague in the extent of the principle which he here asserts. It would place this Government beyond all responsibility, and separate it from the interests of the States and the people. Sir, our Federal and State Governments are the Governments of the same people. The State Governments and the people are represented in the legislative body. The electoral college for President and Vice President votes by States, in all this there is identity and connection of interest. But, sir, how the business and operations of this Government can be separate and distinct from those of the States I am at a loss to perceive, when both operate upon and affect the same people. It cannot be, for it would be utterly destructive of every principle upon which our system is founded, and would destroy that harmony and co-operation in the conduct of both so necessary to the success of both. This Government, in the exercise of any of its powers, cannot be obstructed by the States, yet all its acts are upon its responsibility to the States and the people, and affect their business and interest. The States, in the exercise of their reserved rights, are independent of and beyond the control of this Government, and owe it no responsibility; but this Government, constructed by the States, holding its very existence at their will, cannot be separate and distinct from them in its operations or business. I cannot yield assent to any doctrine which shall make this Government so independent of the States or the people as to be beyond the reach of that sure and decided responsibility which is so necessary to check its abuses and resist usurpations. Such, I think, is the tendency of the principle asserted by my colleague in the form of expression which he has used.

My honorable colleague, in replying to a remark of another colleague, [Mr. WISE,] took occasion to say that he was one of what was called the Divorce party, that is, that he was friendly to the "Independent Treasury bill," that he should take occasion to present his reasons for that opinion when the question came up, and that he did not doubt he should be able to satisfy his constituents. I differ radically and essentially with my colleague upon that question, and, like him, I shall take occasion, when it comes up for consideration, to express my views; in doing so, I will say to many of my friends, in perfect good humor, and with feelings of entire kindness, that I shall present them a mirror, in which they may see the reflection of themselves as they were; and, if they will look at themselves as they were, they will find that, as they were in every doctrine and sentiment which I have uttered upon this question, they were like what I am now. I do not doubt that I shall satisfy my constituents that in defending the position in which General Jackson's administration placed me, a position from which I shall not retreat, I am defending truth and the best interests of the people.

The SPEAKER interposed, and said it was not in order, on this amendment, to discuss the divorce question.

I am only replying to remarks made by my colleague, without the interposition of the Chair.

The SPEAKER said it was difficult to arrest such remarks, as the Chair could not well perceive the connection in which they might be placed.

I desist, sir, and conclude by saying that I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague, not because it is properly connected with the original resolution, or the necessity of much of it, but because the inquiry involves matters which may bear upon me personally, and I am willing all should be known.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, Tuesday, May 29, 1838.—The resolution respecting the collection of the revenue was read a third time. It was in the following words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues accruing to the United States, may be paid."

And the question being on its passage—

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said: Mr. President, it has been my earnest desire to propose some measure of a useful character, in which it was probable both Houses of Congress might concur. With this view, I moved the amendment to the Sub Treasury bill, when that bill was before us some weeks ago; and it is with the same object that I have now brought forward precisely the same proposition. I have looked to see what could be accomplished, as well as what would be beneficial; I have considered what was practicable, as well as what was proper; and I have believed, and now believe, that the measure, in its present form, will meet the prompt and decided approbation of both branches of the Legislature. The majority which here showed itself in favor of the resolution yesterday, on the question of engrossment, as well as the decisive vote of the Senate upon the same proposition, when submitted by me as an amendment to the Sub Treasury bill, leaves no doubt of the opinion of the Senate, and I believe the sentiment of the other House will be found not less decisive.

On the present occasion, sir, I do not intend to detain you by protracted discussion, as the success of the measure in this body cannot now be doubtful; but I wish, nevertheless, to say a few words.

The measure, as I propose it, interferes with no existing act of Congress. It leaves all statute laws as it finds them, and acts only, and acts directly, on the Treasury circular of July, 1836, and on the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue any such orders in future. This is its single object. When it shall have passed, distinctions and discriminations between different branches of the revenue will be abolished. If nothing but specie will pass at the land offices, then nothing but specie will pass at the custom-houses. There will no longer be one law for a merchant in New York, and another law for a settler in the West. The rights of all will be equal; and equality, in this respect, is justice.

Sir, I doubt not the measure will effectually answer the end designed by it. It has been suggested that possibly the Secretary of the Treasury might fulfil the injunctions of this resolution, and abolish all distinctions, by requiring specie at the custom-house, and continuing to require it at the land offices. There is no danger, sir, of that. In the known state of opinion, in Congress, and the country, no Secretary can be supposed capable of pursuing such a course. No, sir; when this resolution is passed, the Treasury order soon breathes its last breath. It will not live a day; and no Administration will hereafter venture on another like it. Such unjust, invidious, and injurious distinctions in the collection of the revenue will not be heard of again, in our day and generation. They will be suppressed, indeed, by the force of positive law.

Mr. President, I do not mean to discuss the character or operation of this celebrated Treasury order at any length. I must say, however, that, for one, I never regarded it as defensible in principle, even if the Secretary could lawfully have issued it; because it was unequal and unjust. It created distinctions and gave preferences which no man can justify. It was unjust to the whole West. It was unjust to every man who wished to buy an acre of the public land; because it withheld from him facilities in making payment to Government, which other persons, having payments to make at the same time, were allowed to enjoy. And if the order could have been defended, in principle, I still never doubted its injurious effects on the currency and business of the whole country. It was a disturbing cause of great power. It deranged and embarrassed commerce, exchanges, and intercourse. It drew away silver and gold to unnecessary uses, and seriously affected confidence and credit, by its apparent hostility to the banking institutions. It wore a warlike aspect, and its whole operation was unfriendly and annoying.

Its abrogation will produce good in various ways. In the first place, it will do justice, by restoring equality. This of itself is a good. In the second place, it will be of much importance in aiding the resumption of specie payments. The abrogation in this respect will be felt every where. It will benefit the East as well as the West. It will quiet fears, inspire confidence, encourage the banks on both sides of the mountains in the efforts to resume. They will look on Government with less of apprehension and fear. They will regard this measure as a proclamation of peace, and will trust that they are no longer to be pursued with hostile intentions and hostile acts. And, lastly, sir, the passage of this resolution will make a favorable change in the state of trade and business all over the country; and it will particularly relieve the West. Notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, I am confident the whole West will hail it with gladness of heart. The people of the West will regard the repeal of the specie order not only as a proof of the justice of Congress, but also as a welcome harbinger of better times. They will view it as the first step in the return of former prosperity.

There are other things, sir, which ought to be done, doubtless, and which might be done, by way of following up this measure. To these, or some of them, I intend to call the attention of the Senate in a few days. In the mean time, I hope to see this resolution become a law, without delay.

Mr. President, if this measure shall succeed, we shall be brought back upon the resolution of 1816, with the modification which this will produce.

Now, sir, there has been so much misconception in regard to the object, character and history of the resolution of 1816, that I must ask the indulgence of the Senate while I make some observations on those points.

Sir, there would seem no necessity for mistake in these particulars. The state of things which led to the adoption of that resolution must be well remembered by all, and here are six or seven of us, I think, now in the Senate, who were members of Congress at the time when that resolution was adopted, and bore a part in the transaction. Its history is this:

When Congress assembled in December, 1815, the President, Mr. Madison, drew our attention to the state of the currency by those passages of his message which I have so often quoted and referred to, during the last session and the present, as well as on many previous occasions. Following the President's recommendation, Congress set itself vigorously at work for the reformation of the currency, then in a most deplorable state. But before describing the state of the currency, as it then existed, allow me, Mr. President, to go back still a little farther, and trace the previous history of this branch of our public affairs. That history requires, and will well repay, attention.

The present Government, sir, went into operation in 1789, and the first act regulating the collection of duties was passed on the 31st day of July, in that year. That act declared that the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of its provisions should be paid in gold and silver coin only; and fixed the rates at which the respective foreign coins should be received. Here was a direct requisition for gold and silver exclusively. Well now, sir, how was this understood by the Government and the country? There were then a few State banks in existence, issuing bills, and redeeming them on demand in specie; and it is beyond all doubt that, in the neighborhood where these banks existed, or where their bills circulated, those bills, being thus bills of specie paying banks, were received for duties as fulfilling the demands of the statute. The number of banks soon increased, and went on increasing, and the bills of all were received if they were in good credit, and paid specie for their paper on sight. All this, sir, was done with the full knowledge and approbation of the Government; and it was done on the plain and simple ground, and could be authorized or justified on no other, that bank notes, for which specie could be had on demand, are the representatives of specie, and are its equivalents; that they are, indeed, but so many orders to go and take the specie when you wish it; that they are the instruments with which you take hold of it when you need it. And as Government must keep its money somewhere, and naturally would use safe banks for the purpose of keeping it, whenever such banks could be found, it seemed absurd and ridiculous to compel the merchant to bring his hard dollars from the bank to the custom-house to pay his bond, for no purpose but that they might be sent back again from the custom-house to the bank. Whatever the collector received, he credited to the Government as cash. It might be gold and silver, it might be a merchant's check on a bank, it might be bank bills—all went into one and the same account as cash

In 1791 the first bank was established, and its bills were made receivable, in payments to Government, by a positive provision in its charter. But even this, so far as I know, did not prevent the receipt of the bills of other specie-paying banks in places where such institutions existed. Thus things went on during the continuance of the charter of the first bank. That charter expired in 1811, and from that time, therefore, there was no paper in circulation but that of State banks; and this paper was every where received, if the bank was in credit, and paid specie; and allow me to repeat, sir, that it was received, as being a substantial compliance with the act of the 31st of July, 1789. It was received as cash, and credited as cash. This state of affairs continued until after the declaration of war against England, in 1812. So that you perceive, sir, that for five and twenty years the officers of Government every where received, when offered, the notes of specie-paying banks as specie, and that this was done without complaint by any body.

But now, Mr. President, a great and important change took place. Within a year or two after the commencement of the war, all the banks south of New England suspended specie payments. Their bills and notes were therefore no longer equivalent to gold and silver, and a general crush of the currency ensued. Bank paper immediately became depreciated, and this depreciation increased more and more as we went from North to South. The exchange between Washington and Boston was, at one period, as high as twenty or twenty-five per cent. Nevertheless, sir, even in this lamentable state of things, the Government continued to receive bank notes, depreciated as they were, for duties and taxes. It also contracted heavy loans, and in many instances received the proceeds of its sales of the stock of such loans in this same bank paper at par. All this was justified on the ground of the absolute necessity of the case. War, pressing on the country with all its demands and all its evils, created an exigency, in which there seemed no option, since there was no national institution, but to receive the paper of State banks, although those banks had ceased to redeem their bills by the payment of gold and silver, and their paper, therefore, was enormously depreciated.

Well, sir, peace came in the early part of 1815; but still the banks did not resume. When Congress assembled, in the fall of 1815, the suspension still continued, the depreciation was not remedied, and the Treasury was still receiving the degraded paper of State banks. Now, sir, as the war had ceased, it was obvious that this mode of collecting revenue ought to be no longer tolerated. Several enormous evils flowed from it. The first was, that Government was not sure, and could not be sure, of any fixed revenue or income. It laid taxes and duties; but what then? For those taxes and duties it got nothing but irredeemable and debased paper money; and the fate of the old Government under the Confederation, in continental paper money times, was already staring Congress full in the face. So much for the distress caused to Government.

The other intolerable evil was the inequality which was produced between citizens in different places. At Baltimore duties on goods imported were received in notes of the Baltimore banks, although those notes were ten or fifteen per cent. below the value of gold and silver, while at Boston, at the same time, nothing but gold and silver, or their equivalent, specie bills, would be taken at all. In the mean time, the general mischief, the great and overwhelming evil of a depreciated and discredited currency, was afflicting the whole country. Every interest felt its baneful effects. Commerce stagnated, manufactures could not revive, and business of all kinds was embarrassed and distressed.

This, sir, was that deplorable state of the currency which I have already said existed at the close of 1815—a state of the currency which had called forth so earnest a recommendation to Congress from the President, and which Congress set itself at work, with so much zeal and resolution, to reform.

As I have observed on former occasions, sir, Mr. Madison's message, so far as it related to the subject of the currency, was referred to a select committee in the House of Representatives, and the honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] was made chairman of that committee. His first measure was to establish a bank; and in that measure he succeeded. The law creating the late Bank of the United States was approved and signed by the President on the 10th of April, 1816.

But the establishment of a bank was not supposed to be all that the condition of the country required. Something further, it was thought, was indispensable to the restoration of the currency. Accordingly, the honorable gentleman brought forward a bill "for the more effectual collection of the public revenue in the lawful money of the United States." To some of the provisions of this bill I alluded on a recent occasion. The bill was much discussed, and much opposed. Various amendments were made to it, and others proposed, in the course of its progress. In the shape which it finally assumed, I supported it, cheerfully, because I thought it would answer the substantial purpose designed by it, that of aiding essentially in the restoration of the currency. It passed to be engrossed on a very close vote, but the next day it was rejected, on the third reading, by a majority of one. This, sir, took place on the 25th of April, and Congress had already agreed to adjourn on the 30th of the same month. Here we were, then, within five days of the end of the session, and we had done nothing at all to correct the enormous evils of a paper money currency, except to charter a bank. It was quite uncertain when this new bank would go into operation, and still more uncertain whether its influences, unaided by any other measure, would be able to compel the State banks to resume specie payments, and so make a reform in the currency. It appeared to me that we were about to break up, leaving one most important object unattained. I felt that a crisis of a very delicate character existed. In this state of things, divided as opinions were, and embarrassed as the country was in all its interests and pursuits, I felt it to be my duty to attempt something, which might probably be carried, and which, if it prevailed, should rescue the country from the evils which oppressed it; and I lost no time in making the effort. The day following that on which the bill which I have mentioned was lost on its third reading, that is to say, on Friday, the 26th of April, I introduced my RESOLUTIONS, for there were originally three of them, the first two, however, being merely declaratory, and in the nature of a preamble. These two I withdrew, and the third and main resolution received its three readings in one day, passed, and was sent to the Senate. The Senate acted upon it on Monday, the 29th, amended it, and returned it to the House. On Tuesday, the 30th, the House concurred in the Senate's amendment, on the same day the President approved the resolution, and on the same day, also, Congress adjourned.

But now, sir, let me be a little more particular. The resolution, as I introduced it, made no provision for the receipt of any bank bills whatever. It said nothing of the notes of specie paying banks. I did not suppose that any provision was necessary on that subject, as such bills had always been received under the existing law. Nobody had objected to receiving them, and I took it for granted that the collectors would continue to go on as they had gone on; that they would receive, as matter of course, the bills of specie-paying banks, as being equivalent to specie itself, and credit their amount to Government as cash. The honorable member from South Carolina, however, or rather some friends of his, suggested that there might be doubts about this; and that, unless the reception of the bills of specie-paying banks should be provided for, the collectors might perhaps feel themselves bound to reject such bills. I stated my opinion, that no such thing was likely to happen, and that the amendment, therefore, was not necessary. The honorable member said his own opinion rather was, that the amendment was not strictly necessary; that he had moved it in order to satisfy the doubts of friends, and, as others seemed not to think it necessary, he would withdraw it; and he did withdraw it. The resolution passed the House, therefore, with no provision whatever respecting the receipt of bills of specie-paying banks.

When the resolution was taken up in the Senate, the same doubt was suggested which had been stated by the gentleman in the House; and one of the members from Tennessee [Mr. CAMPBELL,] moved an amendment similar to that which had been moved in the House by the honorable member from South Carolina; that is to say, he moved to insert the notes and bills of specie-paying banks among the things which might be received in payment of debts and dues to Government. The Senate adopted this amendment, sent the resolution, thus amended, back to the House, and the House concurred.

This, Mr. President, is, I believe, a true and exact history of the resolution of the 30th of April, 1816. And, sir, the great and main object of the resolution cannot be doubted. It must be obvious to every body, that its chief purpose was to put an end to the reception of paper money in payment of debts to Government. It meant to reject all bank notes which were not payable and paid in specie on demand. The reception of such notes, and the fact that they constituted the currency of the country, were the great evils then existing; and the correction of these evils was the distinct and paramount object of the resolution. The consequence of such rejection, it was expected, would be, that the banks would make a strenuous effort to resume payment by the 20th of February then next, that being the day after which no bills of non-specie-paying banks were to be received. For the accomplishment of this great object, much was hoped for certainly from the bank, then recently established; but, as I have already said, it was impossible, at the time, to foresee how far any efforts of the Bank might prove effectual. Sir, we were not disappointed. The resolution did its work. Under a wise and prudent administration of the Treasury Department, the great end of resumption was accomplished, the currency of the country was restored to a sound state, and it continued in that state, and no man found just reason to complain of it, on the whole and as a general system, until the removal of the deposites in 1833.

Mr. President, this recital of unquestionable fact shows that public officers, with the approbation of the Government, have received the notes of specie-paying banks as money; that they did this, habitually, as well before the passage of the resolution of 1816 as afterwards; in short, that debtors to Government paid their debts as individual debtors paid their debts to other individuals, that is to say, by specie, by checks, or drafts on banks, such as are used by merchants, or by the notes and bills of sound specie paying banks, at the pleasure of the payer. Nor do I remember, sir, that, until the late general suspension, any loss has occurred to Government from the receipt of such bills. If any instances of loss have happened, they are not within my recollection.

Mr. President, on this, as on former occasions, gentlemen have referred to remarks of mine, made in the House of Representatives, on the passage of my resolution. They say those remarks prove me to have been a staunch friend to a sound currency, a hard-money man an inflexible and uncompromising enemy to paper money. I hope, sir, that all this is true. Indeed, I know all this to be true. It is the character which I desire to sustain, and have always labored to sustain. I maintain it still, and shall never surrender it while I retain my understanding. But, though a friend to sound currency, though a hard-money man, though an implacable enemy of paper money, I did not, either at that time, or ever, feel bound to reject all use of bank circulation. I supposed, of course, that the bills of specie paying banks were still to be regarded as the representatives of hard money, more convenient for general use than the thing itself, and that, in this respect, there was to be no departure from our established practice. In all this, I thought and spoke then just as I think and speak now. The sternest hard-money man in Congress, if there was one sterner than myself, which I do not believe, did not propose the entire disuse of bank circulation. Nobody thought of such a thing. Sir, the paper money which I so much reprobated was irredeemable paper, paper not payable in specie on demand; whether it were Government paper, or the bills of banks which did not pay specie, or whatever else it were, I held it then, and hold it now, to be mere, sheer paper money, dangerous, worthless, and abominable, both as a medium of payment to Government and as a currency. As I though in 1816, so I think now. The most rigid opinions which I then advanced, I still adhere to. I am against paper money in all forms, and I am in favor of nothing but gold and silver, and such bank bills as may be converted into gold and silver at the will of the holder. When we speak of the legal currency of the country, we mean gold and silver, because gold and silver constitute the only legal tender, and are the only lawful standard of value. But when we speak of money, in the general sense, we mean gold and silver, or that which represents them, and is equivalent to them. Bank notes are regarded as money, not only in the general understanding of the community, but in many instances also by the law. In cases of bankruptcy, in cases of legacies, and in many other cases, the judicial tribunals hold such bills to be comprehended in the general denomination of money. What foundation is there, therefore, for denouncing any one as an enemy to a sound currency, who thinks it proper and convenient for Government, as well as individuals, to make the ordinary use of bank circulation? With how much truth can it be said that he is a paper money man, who only wishes that a practice should be continued which began at the beginning, and has lasted through our whole history—a practice from which the people have derived much benefit and advantage, and in consequence of which, so far as I know, Government has sustained no loss nor injury, except what has arisen from the events of last year?

The true legal construction of the resolution of 1816 is a question which I shall not now discuss at any length. My opinion on that point differs from that entertained by the Senate. As the bills of specie-paying banks stand in the resolution with the legal currency of the country, Treasury notes, and bills of the Bank of the United States, and as all are under the influence of the very same words, I cannot but think that it is the duty of collectors to receive either, when offered. It is said, however, that the resolution only permits the receipt of these bills, and that public officers may still refuse them, if they see fit. But it is to be remembered that the receipt of these bills is authorized by the very same words which reject the receipt of the bills of non-specie-paying banks. How, then, is the injunction to be regarded as imperative for one purpose, and permissive only as to the other?

No doubt, sir, there are certain limitations and qualifications imposed by the very nature of the case, and which must be respected. The bills, to be receivable, must be bills of specie-paying banks, and the collector must of course know them to be such. He must be acquainted with the general character of the institution from which the bills issue; and, perhaps, it would not be reasonable to expect him to possess this knowledge in relation to any other banks than such as were in his immediate neighborhood, with whose character and daily operations he was conversant. Certainly he would not be bound to act upon vague and general information respecting distant institutions which were unknown to him. With these necessary limitations, I cannot but think the resolution imperative. The decision, however, has been the other way, and I acquiesce in it. Both houses of Congress have acted upon the supposition that there still exists a discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury. My present purpose is, therefore, to restrain and control that discretion, and to put an end to it in one important particular.

The constitutionality of the resolution of 1816 has been denied; but I cannot doubt that Congress may authorize the reception of bank bills, if it chooses. To be sure, all taxes and duties must be uniform, and therefore must every where be paid in a currency of uniform value. But the value of convertible bank notes is just as uniform as the value of specie itself. It appears to me, sir, that on these subjects we surround ourselves with ideal difficulties, and embarrass ourselves by reasoning upon facts which, practically, have seldom any existence. A better knowledge of actual transactions, and of the usual modes of business, would often very much improve our judgments.

On all these subjects, we are to remember that, ordinarily, the Government has in its own hands neither specie nor bills; that its funds are in the keeping of somebody; that, after all, they are but credits in account; that they exist, not in specific masses of gold and silver, nor in specific parcels of bank bills, but in balances due from collectors and receivers; that successive collections are carried as new credits to these accounts; that, as drafts are received, they are paid in any manner that suits the holder, and charged in the account. All persons acquainted with such affairs know that, of the whole amount received at the custom-house, very little is paid otherwise than by merchants' checks, by means of which the proper amount is transferred from the account of the person paying to that of the collector, either in the same bank or some other. Ordinarily there arise but three occasions for the direct use of specie in large amounts: one is, to adjust balances between different cities; another occurs when the state of foreign trade requires an exportation of specie to adjust national balances; and the third is, a demand for gold and silver for carrying on some particular branches of commerce, such as the China trade formerly was. These uses of specie do not, of course, include that portion of gold and silver which is intended to pass from hand to hand, and to form part of the general circulation. I speak only of the occasions in which specie may be called for in masses, for the purpose of showing that occasions for such calls are not frequent. Thus we have seen that, in the four or five months that we have been debating here, upon theories and abstractions, upon schemes and projects, several of the States have negotiated large loans, realized the proceeds in specie or its equivalent, conducting all their operations successfully through the agency of skilful men, and making no commotion by violent movings of the precious metals. I really wish, sir, that we had a little more of this quiet and practical wisdom. We might well exchange for it some part of our elaborate and long continued theoretic reasoning on general principles.

Mr. President, it is the fashion now-a-days to denounce all banking institutions, to call them little aristocracies and odious monopolies, and to find in them causes sufficient for the overthrow of the Government, and the destruction of popular liberty. It is the temper of the times to indulge in the ebullition of this spirit. Banks are separated from the people; they are supposed to have been created for their own benefit only; to have been, from the first, enemies of the public good, and to be nuisances which the people should get rid of as soon as possible. Now, sir, all this is very unlike the feeling which prevailed in 1816. At that time banks were regarded as institutions which the people of the States had established for their own convenience. We intended, indeed, that they should perform their duty, but we meant, at the same time, to aid them in the performance of it, as far as was in our power. The whole temper and tone of Government towards the banks were then wholly unlike what now prevail. Look to the history of the administration of the Treasury Department, recur to Mr. Crawford's correspondence, you will see a disposition every where to encourage the State banks, to give them assistance, and to inspire the community with confidence in them. There was, indeed, sir, one proposition made to Congress at that period, which contrasts strikingly with opinions and sentiments now ardently supported. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina himself brought forward a measure for an issue of Treasury notes to the amount of fifteen millions of dollars, to be loaned to the banks, on such security as the Secretary of the Treasury might approve, reimbursable in annual instalments. This was done on the avowed principle of lending to these institutions the support and credit of Government, in order to enable them to resume payments and restore the currency. The proposition did not succeed, but it met with considerable favor. It was supported on the ground that the banks were but institutions created for the benefit of the people, and that, in the existing state of things, the community would be benefited by whatever should enable them to redeem their depreciated paper, and thus restore the currency of the country. How different, sir, how widely different, is all this from those loud and vehement tones of rebuke, reproach, and denunciation which have filled, and almost shaken, the walls of these chambers for months past!

I conclude, Mr. President, by repeating the expression of my perfect conviction that the passage of this resolution will be productive of much good; that it will act powerfully on the great object of resumption; and that we shall see its effects immediately. So soon, sir, as it shall have passed, I shall invite the attention of the Senate to other measures which will be necessary, as I think, in order to give it full effect.

SPEECH OF MR. CUSHING,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, December 19, 1837—The House being in committee of the Whole on the President's Message, [Mr. ADAMS in the Chair,] and the question being upon the motion of Mr. HAYNES to refer so much of the message as relates to the finances and every thing connected therewith, and to the safe-keeping of the public money and every thing connected therewith, to the Committee of Ways and Means—

Mr. CUSHING spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman: I felt it to be my duty; at the late extraordinary session of Congress, and under the peculiar circumstances in which the country was then placed, to mingle in the discussion of questions of party politics more than had previously been my wont, and more than I intend or desire to do hereafter. The aspect of public affairs has undergone a material change since that time.

The twenty-fifth Congress has reassembled, and is engaged in the consideration of another Message of the President of the United States; but under auspices how different from those which attended the opening and the progress of the extraordinary session!

When, at that session, the President, aided by his supporters in Congress, was urging forward the new scheme of power, to place the pecuniary interests of the whole at the mercy of the Federal Executive, I myself, in common with others entertaining the same political opinions, declared to the House, that, "If the assembled representatives of the nation did nothing else for the public good in that emergency; if all the power and influence of the Executive were to be exerted as a drag on the wheels of legislation, to preclude the adoption of measures of general relief—this at least they might and would do—they might and would enter up an APPEAL to the people against the conduct and the purposes of the Administration."

From the odious rescript of the Chief Magistrate; from the assentation of a supple Senate, prompt to register his will; it was the custom of the representatives of the people of Rome to appeal to the people of Rome. We imitated their illustrious example. And generously, nobly, gloriously have the people judged the appeal of their representatives. They have pronounced, at the polls, sentence of condemnation on the mad projects of the Administration. They have condemned it in their primary assemblies; they have condemned it by their votes; they have condemned it in the triumphant rejoicings over success, which re-echo from the east to west, through the wide expanse of the Union.

And how does the President receive the declared will of the people? What says he, the chief, the elect, the one representative of those claiming to be the exclusive Democracy of the Union? Does he bow in ready, in respectful, in humble submission to the decision of the supreme power of the Republic, the people, pronouncing judgment in the majesty of their sovereignty, against the favorite measure of the Administration? No: but he descends from his high estate to look into the elections in the several States, and to criticise and impugn the decision of the people, which it was his duty, without cavil, to obey. He adheres to his own particular plan of adjusting the financial question of the day, rejected and condemned as that plan is by the decree of the sovereign people!

This new and remarkable contingency of public affairs calls on us, the people's representatives, to see to their welfare; to take care that the Republic receive no detriment. It points to the weak side in our Constitution, and the danger which threatens it at the present crisis. And on this topic I propose to address the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to wake up the slumbering spirit of the Constitution. The questions I mean to discuss are dry, rigid principles of constitutional right. They do not well admit, nor shall I attempt to give to them, any rhetorical embellishment. It may be unwelcome to the members of the House—I fear the Constitution, in its text and its letter, is not the chosen study of all of us—that we do not, as we should, according to the classic injunction, turn over its leaves with nightly and daily handling—that we do not sufficiently cherish, in our every thought, this New Testament of our political faith; and it is under the impulse of strong conviction of solemn, but not grateful, public duty, that I proceed to press the subject upon the attention of the House.

Some preliminary explanations are needful to the right understanding of my views.

In the first place, I desire to banish from my mind all feelings of mere party prejudice, which is too prone to color the judgment, even as to constitutional points arising in the discussion of great measures of public policy. I disclaim, therefore, in the remarks I shall make, all imputation upon the motives of men. I perceive gentlemen all around me, whom, in the relations of ordinary life, I know to be honorable and just; and I do not, I will not, I cannot deny to them, that, widely as we differ in opinion on the important questions which surround us, they act from sincere belief in the wisdom and honesty of the public measures they defend. And in return I claim at their hands the same candid construction of my own opinions.

In the second place, I admit, and emphatically maintain, the excellence of our peculiar institutions of Government—their superiority, theoretically and practically, to those of any other country on earth, be that other which it may. I devoutly believe this. I inculcate this, at all times and places. I denounce and repudiate, here and every where, that extravagance of opposition to the particular administration of the Federal Government, which degenerates occasionally into weak doubt, or stupid unconsciousness, of the admirable and excellent qualities of the Federal Government itself.

There is not, in my opinion, a single one of the principal Governments of Europe, so stable in itself, or so fruitful of peace and prosperity to the subjects of it, as that of the United States. There is not one which, in the last fifty years, has undergone so little change of organization as that of the United States. There is not one which has experienced less of civil commotion or of national war. During the fifty years that this Government has subsisted under the Federal constitution, what agitation, what disasters, what sanguinary wars, domestic and foreign, have not the great powers of Europe gone through! I will not dwell on cases like that of France, where, during that period, one constitution of Government has chased after another, shifting, in troubled succession, like the images of a phantasmagoria; nor of Spain, at this moment ravaged, torn asunder, by a deadly civil war, in which, it is said, some hundred thousand souls have been cut off in the brief space of three or four years; nor of the continent of Europe generally, overrun, once and again, by foreign armies, and the theatre of almost perpetual revolution. Take, instead, the case of our father-land—of Great Britain—the freest and at the same time the peacefullest (internally) of the Powers of Europe—that which, in the nature of its institutions, is the nearest analogy to ourselves; and I say of Great Britain, that the single measure of the Reform Bill is a greater change in its constitution, and the discussions and plans connected with and consequent upon that measure, indicate greater instability in the institutions of that country, than any thing whatever which has, in the same period, transpired in the United States. I believe this. I know it. And I maintain that it is the mere exaggeration of morbid discontent to compare any of the evils—trivial in themselves, but serious in relation to our keen sense of maladministration arising from the superlative goodness of our institutions—it is mere extravagance to compare any of these evils to these which befall others of the chief States of Christendom.

At the same time, defects, abuses, errors of administration, corruptions, are incident to our Government, or to every thing human; and it is our duty to investigate these, to endeavor to remove and guard against them, and, by continual vigilance, to maintain the purity and integrity of the Constitution. Actuated by these sentiments in the remarks I am about to make, I affirm I concede nothing to the discredit of the Federal Government, as a Government.

These things being premised, I proceed to the main subject which I have to submit to the consideration of the House.

To begin, let me recur to the fundamental principles of the Government. It is a Government of consent—of consent of the whole constituent People—and a Government framed in the aim to secure to all the component parts a perfect equality of rights and privileges. It was constituted to secure and guard the rights of the members of it, not to create or confer those rights, which rights are altogether antecedent in point of existence, and superior in point of sanctity, to the Constitution, which is but the social compact of the sovereign constituent People, and subject to be modified or annulled by them as such. They, the constituent People, are the sovereigns, not in name or the letter of the text only, but in practical fact. The individuals actually engaged in the administration, and to the eye constituting the Government, are but the temporary elected agents of the People, exercising specific functions, lawfully conferred on them by the People, and responsible to the People for the faithful discharge of a solemn trust confided to them for the general good. In short, the Government is a representative Democracy—Democratic in its basis, representative in its forms of action.

These general principles are manifestly the very elements of the Constitution, the opening sentence of which sets forth the right upon which it stands: "We, the People of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States of America." Words, full of that pure and simple dignity which characterizes the whole instrument! And although in the original Constitution of the United States itself, there is no specification of the abstract principles on which it is founded—the absence of which was one of the objections urged at the time against it, and which were in part supplied in the amendments thereof subsequently adopted—yet those principles were not the less distinctly recognised and established by the Constitution, inasmuch as the constituent People, who framed and sanctioned it, were already associated in political communities, as citizens of the several States composing the Union, and associated by forms of government, which, either expressly or by necessary implication, admitted and asserted the rights of self-government, and of revolution as the means of obtaining or exercising self-government, solemnly claimed by the thirteen Colonies in the Declaration of Independence.

These being the views which I entertain of the nature of the Government of the United States, I concur with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] in reprobating, as he has this morning done, the opinions put forth in some quarters, in reference to the revolutionary movements which are agitating at this time the remaining British Colonies in North America. I hold that the people of Canada have a right to be free and independent of Great Britain, if they choose it; and this not merely because Canada is a conquered country, acquired and held by force, but, in addition thereto, because of that identical right of self-government, in virtue of which the old thirteen Colonies challenged and secured their separation from the mother country. I hold that you cannot discriminate between the two cases by any distinction of principle whatever. And I have been vexed, shocked, alarmed, to perceive that some few accredited and respectable presses in certain parts of the United States, not content with having the Federal Government abstain as a Government from any breach of its neutrality on this occasion, and the citizens individually from any violation of the laws enforcing that neutrality, have endeavored to discourage and repress the spontaneous, just, lawful, and honorable sympathies of this nation in behalf of men emulating the illustrious example of our own forefathers, by the promulgation of sentiments which impliedly deny and repudiate the very elemental doctrines of the Constitution of the United States, and of every one of the individual States.

As a man, I feel such sentiments to be wrong, subversive of the dearest human rights, and prejudicial to the cause of truth and civilization.

As an American, I know them to be in diminution of the text and the spirit of our laws, both fundamental and municipal, and counter to the established theory of the American Republic.

As a Whig, I believe that it is precisely such sentiments—a tendency in some quarters to distrust Republican institutions—to uphold the anti-reform party of other nations—to assume anti-democratic ground upon questions of foreign politics—to be drawn too much, in practical questions of domestic politics, into an obscure under-current of unrepublican opinions and feelings—that this it is, beyond and above all other things, which has given to the Administration whatever hold it has on the attachment of the popular masses, and to the same degree constitutes the weakness of the Opposition.

Our Government is fundamentally Democratic; I use the word in its philosophic, not in its party meaning, resting upon the sovereignty of the people. We cannot change this. If we could, we ought not. It is right. And, right or wrong, it is the existing fact to which Government must conform itself just as inevitably as agriculture to the natural qualities of soil and climate. You may modify, you may correct evil tendencies, you may improve good ones, but the basis remains unchangeably the same; and there is no sense in reasoning, nor use in acting, against irreversible facts in the very constitution of things. We lay lose the confidence of the people by thinking or speaking distrustfully of them; but, in proceeding thus, we establish no truth, we promote no good end; we simply throw away our means of usefulness, and we do not deserve to possess the confidence of the people, unless we legally entertain, and cordially act upon, the popular principles which are the very life-blood and spiritual essence of the Constitution.

Whether this be Federalism or Democracy is immaterial to me; it is my political creed, by whatever name of party it be called. Like the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS] I desire to be guided by principles, not by names.

We may discern, I think, among the opinions current in the United States, two extremes of conclusion, each of them alike exceptionable and dangerous to the liberties of the people. One is the disposition indicated by some persons to draw back, to shrink from trusting themselves frankly to the Democratic spirit of our institutions, to maintain a sort of ultra conservatism, which is a policy unphilosophical, because impracticable, and injurious, because adverse to the organic structure of the Federal Government. The other is the extreme of ultra-radicalism, which, in its eagerness to maintain the rights of the many, disregards those of the few; and which, as it can act only by delegated power, seeks to concentrate its force in the person of a popular chief, the hand to wield the despotic will of the mass, as in the dictatorship of the Roman Republic.

Supposing these opposite tendencies to exist in the community, what has been their influence upon the action of the Federal Government? Practically, how has the Constitution worked? Have abuses crept into the administration of the Government? And, if so, what, and how?

In the first place, as to the sources of abuse, it is evident these are various, according to the various elements or parts of the Government.

The whole Federal Government might (theoretically speaking,) conspire to injure a State, or the people of a State, or some of them, by the exercise of some power not granted by the Constitution; as, if Congress should pass, the Judiciary sustain, and the Executive, through the public functionaries subordinate to him, undertake to carry into effect a law to abolish personal servitude in Virginia or South Carolina.

The President: as if he should, of his mere motion, without the authority of an act of Congress, proclaim war against a foreign power, and, being in command of the military forces of the nation, proceed to make war.

Congress, that is, the Senate and House: as if they claim to enact a law, the veto to the contrary notwithstanding, and without a vote of two-thirds thereupon.

The Senate: as if it originate revenue bills, or appoint ambassadors without nomination from the Executive.

The House: as if it assume to exercise a concurrent voice in the confirmation of appointments made by the President.

The judiciary: as if it should take upon itself any of the executive functions of the Government.

Officers, civil or military, either in the familiar forms of malversation in office, or as the instruments of the Executive, in particular acts, or in a system of usurpation.

In the second place, as to the modes of corruption, these also may be various, according to the objects. Either directly in the people, that is, the person of the citizen, as if this House should refuse to receive petitions setting forth grievances of which they complain, or if the President should undertake to impress men for the naval service, as practised in England; or, indirectly, by one branch or department of the Government drawing to itself the exercise of powers belonging to another, and thus violating the order prescribed by the people in their Constitution.

Upon the Constitution of the United States, then, in which of these various quarters, and in what form of action, lies the danger? From which department of the Federal Government is corruption, encroachment, or usurpation to be most apprehended.

Usurpation by the whole Federal Government, in all its branches, combined to that end, is a question between the United States and individual States, or the people, or a portion of them. That I do not now discuss. But, as between different departments of the Federal Government, I repeat the question, which is the most dangerous to the integrity of the Constitution.

We may dismiss all serious fear from public functionaries in the civil service of the country, as Judges, Secretaries of State, and the like, because of the nature of their functions, their want of pecuniary resources and physical power, their amenability to the law, and (in regard to all but judges) their dependence on the Executive.

So, also, as the men holding command in the naval or military service of the country; in addition to which, if usurpation comes from that quarter, we may rest assured it will clothe itself in the forms of legality. For example, the Roman Cesars, who overthrow the liberties of the Republic in the forms of law, by causing themselves to be continuously invested with legal functions, and thus rendering themselves practically and exclusively supreme, whilst all institutions of the Republic remained seemingly in full vigor: the word emperor, it is notorious signifying originally nothing but Commander-in-Chief. Another example, the dukes and counts of modern Europe; men, who, in name, as in fact, originally were the holders of a legal function merely, which, by usurpation, they transformed into a personal right or fixed rank in the State. And, intensely devoted, as the people of the United States are, to Republican institutions, it is by misuse, probably, of the form of the Constitution, if ever at all, that usurpation or corruption will find its way into the Federal Government.

We may, I think, narrow down the consideration, for present practical purposes, to the two prominent departments of the Government, the Legislative and the Executive, the relative capacity of which to encroach on the rights of the other, or of the people, can be appreciated only by means of a proper analysis of the Constitution.

In the description of the powers of the Federal Government, and the definition of the powers of the several component parts of it, which the Constitution gives, the Congress stands forth eminently from the face of the instrument. It occupies the first place in the Constitution.

And the enumeration of powers granted to Congress, covers, in part or in whole, the grants of power parted with by the respective States to the Federal Government in the aggregate.

These powers are specific, and therefore, in themselves, less liable to abuse by implication; that is, when "legislative powers" are spoken of in the Constitution, they are expressly declared to be those "herein granted," (Art. I, sec. 1,) referring, of course, to the subsequent enumeration of powers.

And the powers of Congress are legislative powers; that is, powers in which, for their effectual exercise, the three subdivisions of the Legislature; that is, the President, as well as the Senate and House of Representatives, concur.

The House of Representatives possesses no particular powers, except such as relate, 1st, to its organization and rules of proceeding; 2d, the origination of money bills; and, 3d, of impeachments; and of these, the first, a power comparatively unharmful, is the only power which is complete as well as particular.

The Senate possesses no particular powers, except such as relate to, 1st, its own organization; 2d, the trial of impeachments; 3d, the advisement of the Executive in foreign negotiations; and 4th, the rejection of nominations; and, of these, the first only is complete.

Of checks to usurpation, on the part of the Senate and House, either conjointly or separately, as against the Executive, there are many. Look at the House, for example: its proceedings are public, by debate, in this hall, before the presence of the whole community—in the face of the world—seen, understood, scrutinized, at every stage, by an ever-vigilant people; while the deliberations of the Executive are confined to his own breast, or to the privacy of Cabinet councils. The responsibility of this House is more direct and tangible, being distributed into separate constituencies of States and of parts of States, before which individual members are subject to be held to account, personally, for the discharge of their trust; while the President is withdrawn from contact with the different parts of the country, and placed in the remote dignity of the White House. We possess no patronage of any consequence; while that of the President pervades the Union. We have no public money in our custody, no munitions of war, no fleets, no forts or arsenals, no physical force by land or sea, neither the sinews nor other instruments of corruption or usurpation, all which are in the hands of the Executive. Our councils are interrupted by adjournment, while those of the Executive have unbroken continuousness of purpose and perpetuity of execution; ours are disturbed by numerousness of persons, his have the decision and concentration of individual intellect. The members of the Senate and House are not elected for identical periods; and this House for half the term of the President. Finally, the action of Congress, in all things, except its own organization and the preferment or trial of impeachments, is subject either to the previous action of the President, or to his veto, conferred upon him as well to guard his own independence as to maintain the integrity of the Constitution.

From this inspection of the Constitution, I infer that the powers of the two Houses are not of themselves particularly capable of abuse. I am not aware that any facts exist in the history of Congress contradictory to the inferences deduced by me from the text of the Constitution. And I proceed next to consider how it is, in this respect, with the powers conferred on the Executive.

Foremost among them is the provision (Art. 1. sec. 7) which makes his approbation—except as against a subsequent vote of two-thirds of each House—essential to the enactment of a law. Couple this with a power given to him in another place, (Art. II. sec. 3,) to recommend measures to Congress, and you see that he is a component branch of the Legislature of the country, originating and rejecting measures equally with either House. Is not this—I speak now of the veto—a great power to be placed in the hands of one man? and a power subject to abuse?

It is the notorious fact that, in the course of the late Administration, the veto was exercised more times than in the whole previous history of the Government. Exercised not only in the direct mode of an express refusal to approve, leaving to Congress the option to insist or not by a vote of two-thirds, but in the more objectionable mode of the suppression of bills. Grant this, in the cases referred to, to have been a constitutional power constitutionally exerted, still the fact itself, the frequent repetition of the veto in the last few years, is indicative at least of a great advance in the practical power and in the influence of the Executive.

But this is one of the concurrent powers of the Executive, a function in the discharge of which the President acts in association with Congress. Let us look farther into the Constitution.

When that instrument comes to speak of the President particularly, it says: "The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States."—(Art. II. sec. 1.) What is meant by this? Does the word "Executive," in this phrase, confer any substantive powers on the President?

I hold that when it said, "The Executive power is vested in a President," the expression is intended only as a description of the person who is to exercise the Executive functions, otherwise described in the Constitution, or to be reposed in the President for the execution of acts of Congress. And I adopt, in this connection, the construction suggested at the last session by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr WISE] In the President are vested the "Executive" powers. True; but what are these powers? Part of them are afterwards expressly enumerated; and the rest are such as Congress may see fit to entrust to the President, either under the several specific powers granted to Congress, or under the general power, which closes the enumeration, and is suppletory of all the rest—"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any Department or officer thereof."—(Art. I, sec. 8.) Here is the life giving clause, the grant to Congress of the power to infuse vitality into the undefined powers of the Executive; which idea is confirmed by the fact that, when this word is used by the Constitution in another place, it is in association with the word Department; "Executive Departments" is the expression, (Art. II, sec. 2.) And these Executive Departments, we all know, were among the earliest things to be constituted, defined, and limited, by acts of the first Congress which assembled under the Constitution. And this in point of fact it is—I mean by acts of Congress, that the President has charge of the Post Office, the Treasury Department, and the Land Office.

And yet, for the defence of doubtful acts of authority, the late administration had recourse to the old prerogative doctrine of "an original Executive power," said to be "LEFT" in the hands of the President, "unchecked by the Constitution."

If the word "Executive" confers substantive powers on the President—powers deducible from the intrinsic meaning of the word—how is that meaning to be measured? How defined and limited? Is it a British Executive, or a French Executive, or a Russian Executive; or, peradventure, a Turkish Executive?

If the President possesses any substantive powers in virtue of this word, it is a power vast, immense, incalculable, immeasurable. There will be no limitation to the acts of authority which may shelter themselves under its ample folds. But I utterly deny this monstrous doctrine; and I mark it, and the act performed under it, as innovations in favor of the Executive and encroachments, deep and dangerous, on the powers of Congress.

For, while the Administration was profuse in the profession of a desire to confine the Federal Government within its appropriate functions, it is to be remarked that, in the actual practice of that Administration, new limitations were applied only to those of the powers of the Government in which Congress must participate; that is to say, the enactment of laws; the scope of things to be done by the Houses of Congress was lessened, while that of things to be done by the Executive, independently of Congress, was extended.

But to proceed. We come now to the Executive powers expressly granted to the Executive in and by the Constitution; and of these I mean to select the more important only, in illustration of the views I entertain.

"The President shall be Commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States."—(Art. II, sec. 2.) A power how vast! Conferring immense patronage, and controlling the entire physical force of the country! A power, this alone, greater, in its practical exercise and immediate effects, than all the powers whatsoever, which are conferred on Congress. Giving to the President himself, nay, to a single officer of the army or navy acting on a hint from him, the discretion of peace or war in a thousand critical contingencies. For example, it has repeatedly, three signal times at least, in the history of the Federal Government, happened, that the Executive, or an officer under him, has invaded the territory of a friendly power in time of peace. Is not this a power somewhat capable of abuse?

"He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments."—(Art. II, sec. 2.) It does not say control the action of those principal officers, but require their opinion; which supposes, of necessity, that they have opinions of their own. Moreover, if the President may absolutely prescribe the conduct of these officers, if there is any thing in the Constitution which confers on him such power, why be at the pains of giving to him the much less power, to require their opinions? The infinite greater power would of course comprehend the finite less one. Couple this clause of "Executive Departments" with that of "Executive power," and apply to both the clause that Congress may make laws for carrying into execution ALL powers vested in any department or officer of the Federal Government, and the conclusion is manifest, as I have stated before, that the vitality of the functions of the Executive is, under the Constitution, to be infused into them by the legislation of Congress.

Yet, we have, in late times, seen "the principal officers of the Executive Departments" treated as the mere servants of the President, the humble instruments of his supreme will, instead of, what the Constitution supposes, the agents of the law of the land, and the instruments of Congress as well as of the President, which I mark as another dangerous innovation.

"He shall have power to make treaties." Here is an immense power, a power of peace or war, a power larger than any which is exercised by law; for though it be provided that the treaty shall be made "by and with the consent of the Senate," yet, according to the established construction of the Constitution, the negotiations are actually conducted throughout by the President.

Look at the compass of this treaty power. For example, the President may, of his own simple discretion, unsubjected to the control or advice of any other department of the Government, so word a despatch, or other public document, as of necessity in time of war to effect peace, or in time of peace to produce war; frequent cases of which could be given from the history of our relations with Great Britain and with France.

For another example, the President may, of his own mere motion, double the territory of the United States by a treaty of acquisition; and though the treaty must of course be submitted to one, or it may be both, of the Houses of Congress, yet the question will then be, not whether Congress will make the acquisition of a territory, but whether it will reject a territory already acquired. This was the case of Louisiana.

It may be—I do not know but that, in the predestined march of empire, the United States will cover this continent. But if it is to be so, it will hapen, I do believe, not from any previous resolution of the people of the United States, or of Congress, to enter upon a grand career of conquest or aggrandizement, but rather in future times as in past, through the exercise, on the part of the President of the practical discretion over the question of war and of territorial acquisition, which the treaty-power confers on the Executive.

"He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, other ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States," &c. Here is the patronage-power of the Executive—a power, which, even though regularly exercised, and without removals for opinion, is yet a tremendous engine of influence.

Here is the patronage-power of the Executive—a power, which, even though regularly exercised, and without removals for opinion, is yet a tremendous engine of influence and authority, because it renders the President the great fountain of honor and profit.

In reference to this power, as exercised under the late Administration, I make no question of constitutional right. I concede, in deference to the Constitution, long settled, and perhaps the true one, that the power of removal is correlative to the power of nomination, and vested in the President alone. Be it so. It is, under any view of that question, a most enormous power; and under the latter construction, and as practically used by the late Administration, it is a power utterly subversive in its tendencies of the constitutional rights of Congress.

This topic is a trite one. It is the ordinary theme of declamation, in the mouth of men opposed to the Administration. But I am not declaiming. On the contrary, like the adventurer in the Arabian tales, transported by genii into the crystal caverns of the interior earth in quest of Nature's inexhaustible store-house of the diamond and the emerald, I am calmly seeking, guided only by the spirit of liberty, to explore the foundations of eternal truth. And I do solemnly believe, that the patronage of the Executive, as it has been and is exercised, by men who claim that the official functions of the Government are spoils due to the party-victor—patronage applied directly to the interest of individuals possessing or seeking office, and indirectly through them in all the ramifications of social relationship—patronage applied to the great fountain of popular opinions, the Press—patronage applied to members of Congress and other elective agents of the People, that the appointing power, so exercised and applied, is one of the weak points of the Constitution.

Nor am I singular in coming to this conclusion as the result of the experimental working of the Federal Government. You, Mr. Chairman, can bear witness to the opinions expressed by Mr. Benton, in his report on Executive patronage, (United States Senate, May 4, 1826.) I adopt his position that the exercise of this power has "a constant tendency to sully the purity of our institutions, and to endanger the liberties of the country;" that, to prevent abuses in this direction, "much remains for us to do, and much will still remain for posterity to do—for unborn generations, on whom will devolve the sacred task of guarding the temple of the Constitution, and of keeping alive the vestal flame of liberty;" and that in "the theatre of real life" around us, "we behold the working of patronage, and discover the reason why so many stand ready, in any country, and in all ages, to flock to the standard of power, wheresoever and by whomsoever it may be raised." To all this I say ditto. And I add further, that, true as it was then, it is a hundred fold true since the recourse had by the late Administration to the unsparing use of what Mr. Benton, in the same State paper, justly called "the kingly prerogative of dismissing officers without the formality of trial," and handing over their places to new aspirants as the reward of more zealous partizanship. To confirm which, I cite the comparatively recent report on the same subject, made by that statesman, who, if I "know" his "position," stands now in the attitude of the very pillar of the present Administration in the South, I mean Mr. Calhoun, (United States Senate, February 9, 1835;) and I adopt, also, his language, that the patronage of the Executive is becoming a danger most "formidable, which threatens, if not arrested, to subvert the Constitution;" that "the disease is daily becoming more aggravated and dangerous; and, if it be permitted to progress for a few years longer, with the rapidity with which it has of late advanced, it will soon pass beyond the reach of remedy;" that it is no party question; and that "every lover of his country and of its institutions, be his party what it may, must see and deplore the rapid growth of patronage, with all its attending evils, and the certain catastrophe which awaits its further progress, if not timely arrested." And I appeal to every man who hears me, I demand of this House, whether there be one member, who can stand up here, and, in his conscience and upon honor, deny the progressive increase, the alarming increase, of the influence of the Executive, through the exercise of this mighty power?

"He shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." (Art. II, sec. 3.) This power is a very general, and seemingly a vague one; but, on examination, it will be found a most important one, and very capable of abuse.

What is the true meaning of this clause? May the President dictate measures to Congress? No; this, it will be admitted on all hands, cannot be the true import of the Constitution. It was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, undoubtedly, to give to each of the great departments of the Government a theoretical independence of the others. This independence is very emphatically asserted in the Constitution of some of the States. That it is implied in the Constitution of the United States is fully argued and established in the numbers of the Federalist. The doctrine, as understood and asserted in England of the Constitution (so called) of that country, is stated in the nervous language of Lord Bolingbroke, thus:

"The constitutional independency of each part of the Legislature (the King included) arises from hence; that distinct rights, powers, and privileges, are assigned to it by the Constitution. * * It consists properly and truly in the free, unbiassed, uninfluenced, and independent exercise of these rights, powers, and privileges, by each part, in as ample an extent as the Constitution allows; or, in other words, as far as that point, where the Constitution stops this free exercise, and submits the proceedings of one part, not to the private influence, but to the public control, of the other parts. Before this point, the independency of each part is meant by the Constitution to be absolute; from this point, the constitutional dependency of each part on the others commences."

And to the same effect is the language of Mr. Benton, who, in another report of the same period with that which I have cited already, lays it down as "the ruling principle in the organization of the Federal Government," that the three great branches of it, "the Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary, should be separate and distinct from each other, not only in contemplation of law, but in point of fact; and for this end, that each should not only have its independent organization, but that the individuals administering each should be wholly free from the control and influence of the individuals who administer the others." In accordance with which, as I understand the Constitution, though the President may recommend measures, yet Congress is to exercise an unbiassed and independent judgment upon the question of adopting or rejecting such recommendation. It is a recommendation simply.

But again. Assuming these premises to be sound, what is the exact force of the expression "recommmend measures," according to the true spirit of the Constitution? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOLSEY,] in his remarks this morning, by way of reply to my colleague [Mr. Reed,] who objected to a usage, said to exist in the practice of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, to receive bills ready drawn from the Executive Departments—defends the practice under this clause of the Constitution; and he distinctly speaks of it as a power "to propose laws to Congress;" and he contrasts our institutions in this particular with those of England, in which, he says, "the proposing power is denied to the King, whilst in ours it is vested in the President."

Can this be? Does the President of the United States possess the iniative in legislation, as well as the veto? It may be so; but I do not remember to have remarked this heretofore, in any of the discussions touching the Constitution. I cannot assent to it. If it be so, it is the exact case of the French charter.

And, in regard to the case of England, the intelligent gentleman from Georgia knows full well, that the King of Great Britain possesses, practically, the power of initiating laws, by reason of the fact that among the Secretaries of State there are always members of the House of Lords, and that commoners, holding office under the Crown, are eligible to the House of Commons, and are in truth the leaders in that body, and the proposers of all important measures. Conformable to which is the fact that, in France, the King's Ministers have the right to sit and debate in either Chamber. The framers of the Constitution of the United States indicated their sense of this, by expressly excluding from Congress all persons holding offices under the Federal Government. (Art. 1, sec. 6.) Whether this exclusion has, indeed, operated to the advantage of the public liberties, may be doubted. Certain it is that if the principal officers of the Departments were by their duty required to attend and debate in this House or in the Senate, the measures they recommend, and the views they entertain or express, could be subjected to a severity and strictness of scrutiny, which is quite unattainable as the Constitution stands.

But, continues the gentleman from Georgia: "The power to recommend is general. It includes all the particulars." And by inference, "draughts of bills." If such be the force of the Constitution, then I say that bills, like other communications from the Executive, ought to come to the House directly, and in a public form. If there be any usage to the contrary of this, I contend that it is a bad one—a departure from the spirit of the Constitution. Such a usage would open the door to clandestine arrangements between the Executive and the Committees of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, here rose and said: Does the gentleman from Massachusetts mean to insinuate that there had been any clandestine arrangement between the late Committee of Ways and Means, of which I was a member, and the Executive or the heads of any of the Departments?

Mr. CUSHING. I will answer the gentleman's question by restating my proposition: that if bills may come here, not in the shape of a public communication from the President, or Secretary of the Treasury, or any other Department—but, instead of that, through a committee only, or the chairman of a committee, then I say that, if such be the reading of this clause of the Constitution, it involves in itself a tendency to clandestine arrangement between the Executive and the committees of this House.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has not answered my question. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts mean to insinuate that there was any such clandestine arrangement between the Committee of Ways and Means of the last session and the head of either of the Departments?

Mr. CUSHING. Well, then, I can only repeat what I have before said. I insist that recommendations from the Executive to this House, which come not in the shape of direct and public communications, involve an unavoidable tendency to clandestine arrangements. Whether, in the particular case referred to, there was or was not any such arrangement, is a fact as to which I have no knowledge, and make no charge.

Mr. WISE rose and said, he was prepared to assert that, in relation to the fortification bill, on the last night of the second session of the Twenty-third Congress, there was a clandestine arrangement between the Executive and a member of a committee of this House.

Mr. JONES. Of that I know nothing. Has my colleague any charge to make against the committee of which I was a member? If so, I desire to hear it.

Mr. WISE. As to the committee of which my colleague was a member, that is a matter concerning which, having no personal knowledge, I make no assertion. I repeat that there was a clandestine arrangement in the transaction to which I allude.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I can only say that I deny it flatly.

Mr. CUSHING. Well, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] wishes for a renewal of the debate of the last Congress on this vexed subject, I have no doubt the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will be ready at all times to meet him upon it. I am arguing a constitutional point, the consideration of which I will not mix up with any controverted questions of fact.

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. A power, this also, broad, comprehensive, implying a general supervision of the affairs of the United States, and of inestimable capacity for good or evil.

Is it not so? Look at it, in purely domestic questions, as in the case of a controversy between the Federal Government and one of the States, of which the proclamation of the late President of the United States on the Nullification Question is a cogent example.

Another example of still wider efficiency, Washington's celebrated proclamation of neutrality. Whether this measure was a judicious one or not, whether constitutional or not, are questions much debated at the time, but not necessary to be discussed in this connection. I concede the lawfulness of the act; that is, considering it, what it really purports to be, simply as a State paper, declaratory of the fact that the United States was at peace with all the belligerant powers, and enjoining upon the citizens of the United States to abstain from the performance of any acts inconsistent with peace. I concede this, and I refer to it only to illustrate the consequential greatness of the power Reflect on the situation of the United States at that time. Bound to France by the treaties of amity and of commerce of 1778, which, on our part, guarantied the integrity of the French possessions in America, and gave to her the most important belligereant rights with regard to commerce, and also in the ports and seas of the United States. Called upon, nevertheless, by considerations of good faith towards other nations, and the duty of maintaining the peace of the country, to abstain from all acts inconsistent with strict neutrality. And yet this momentous question—one side of which might perhaps, if taken, be deemed by France an abrogation of our treaties with her, and the other side, if taken, be deemed by England adequate cause of war, with a long train of consequences on either side—was decided by the separate and independent will of the Executive.

Each of these distinct heads of the power of the Executive, as expressly defined in the Constitution, is, it seems to me, greatly susceptible of abuse. These powers are distinguished, as already intimated, by the generality, the comprehensiveness of the terms of grant. They are, for the most part, independent and complete in themselves, in so many words; and where they are not expressly so, they are practically so. Thus the rejection of nominations is, in comparison with the whole number of appointments, a rare thing; and so is the refusal to ratify treaties. They are continuous powers, powers characterized by perpetuity (for a given time) of actual exercise. Secrecy, individuality of conception, oneness of counsel, belongs to them, as it does to the functions of royalty. In all these, and many other particulars of the same nature, the Executive evidently possesses great facilities for the abuse of power.

But I may be reminded of that which constitutes, in theory, the guaranty and safeguard of Congress, namely, the right of the two Houses, or either of them, to refuse supplies to the Executive, and so to encroach on his functions; and it is proper I should anticipate this consideration.

The Houses may withhold supplies from the President. Granted; and so may he, by the exercise of the veto, withhold supplies from the two Houses.

But the Houses may, by a concurrent vote of two-thirds on the back of a veto, obtain supplies in spite of the President. Granted; that is a possible contingency in some future competition of power between the Executive and legislative departments of the Federal Government. It is the ONE disadvantage to which the Executive is subject; and let us look at the many advantages wherewithal he may balance this one disadvantage.

To begin, he is the single Executive chief of the nation; and while, as a general truth, in a monarchy or an aristocracy, the danger of innovation is from the popular assemblies, if there be any in a democracy, the danger is from the popular chieftain, for the time being, into whose hands all the power of State tends to concentrate itself, as the ready means of giving despotic efficiency to the supreme will of the Democracy. Thus, in Rome monarchical, the popular assemblies innovated, until they had obtained a due share of liberty; in Rome republican, the chiefs innovated, until that liberty was all gone. Thus, again, in modern Europe, after the establishment of the various feudal monarchies, we have seen the popular assemblies encroach to obtain or recover liberty, and that liberty, when obtained, fell into the clutches of civil or military dictators. In a Republic, watch well the popular Chief Magistrate.

But again, supposing a career of usurpation is to be undertaken, let us look at the relative advantages of the President and of Congress, as deducible from the structure of the Constitution.

The President, we have seen, has a voice in all acts of Congress, except impeachments, either originally, as in the recommendation of measures, the nomination to Executive offices, the proposition of treaties, or, finally, by the veto. The Senate checks the Executive directly, only by its rejection of treaties and nominations; and indirectly, in common with the House, by the vote of either upon money bills.

Congress can influence the President only by debate, opinions, or by refusing supplies; but the President has the same extent of power in each of these respects, and, in addition thereto, the vast patronage of the Government.

Congress influences the people, only by acting upon opinion. The President has the same means of influence; and the frequent exercise of it by the late Administration, in the unexampled number of Conciones ad Populum which it sent forth in various forms, indicates how efficiently it may be used. Add to which, he may act on the people by the power of appointment, by the activity of public officers in elections, by the instrumentality of the press, and, if need be, by the physical force of the Government, which he wields.

Congress has no direct control over the President, except by impeachment; a remedy which, whatever force it might once have been supposed to have, is now pretty generally admitted to be nugatory, because it is most powerless just precisely where it is most needed, that of a President, who, besides the enormous patronage attached to the office, and the physical power legally at his command, is fenced around with the immunities and the means of indirect action, which, in every Republic, belong to a chief of party.

Nor is this all. The House may think I have gone through the Constitution very imperfectly, and slurred over many of the functions of the Executive, or at least of which the Executive is in the habitual exercise. What has become of the money power of the Executive? What of the Land Office? What of the Post Office? What of the Indian Department? Are these not somewhat extensive fields of influence, of power, and of usurpation?

To begin with the Indians. For two years past nearly the whole army of the United States, and large bodies of militia and volunteers, and vast amounts of treasure, have been employed in a war with the Seminoles. Did Congress declare it? Chiefs of the remote tribes of the West are seen collected in the Federal City, summoned hither by the President, to submit themselves to his mediation in their quarrels, and to cede their lands to the United States. Does the Constitution give him this power? He is the great father of the aboriginal inhabitants of North America. Who made him to be all this? What provision of the Constitution makes him the head and ruler of all their tribes and nations? I would like to have the advocates of a strict construction of the Constitution look a little into this matter.

The Constitution authorizes Congress to regulate commerce "with the Indian tribes;" but I do not remember that it gives to the President any jurisdiction over them. Practically, by a striking fiction of law, but which is not all a fiction, the affairs of the Indians are conducted in the War Department, as if there was perpetual war betwixt them and us. Doubtless many of the acts performed by the Executive in relation to the Indians are to be classed under his constitutional power to make treaties. But not all, nor the half. Can a treaty, of itself, authorize the President to be the great father of the Indians? Or can their assent? No more than a treaty can make him to be, at the same time, President of the United States and King of Great Britain. No; the jurisdiction which the President exercises over the Indians, except in so far as it may be justified by the treaty-making power, can stand only upon acts of Congress; and where it is not so derived, it is usurpation.

And see how it works. What great power it confers on the President—as patronage, acquisition of territory, peace and war, more largely even than in the case of our relations with independent foreign powers; because the dependent relation of the Indians, as regards the United States, makes him, in effect, their master. Reflect on the great masses of territory acquired by, or opened to, the people of the United States, by treaties with the Indians, as in the case of the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Creeks, and the Cherokees.

And see how it works with reference to the Indians themselves. Take the case of the Cherokee treaty of New Echota. Some hundred persons, out of a tribe of near twenty thousand, make a treaty in behalf of the tribe, who, by their written remonstrance, protest against and deny the validity of the transaction. Still the Executive brings it here as a treaty; it is confirmed as such by the Senate, and this House appropriates six or seven millions to carry it into effect, and does it almost without debate; no, not without debate, for I recall to mind the zeal with which you, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman from Virginia before me [Mr. WISE] plead for the rights of the Cherokees.

In proportion as the pacific relations of the United States with the Indians have extended themselves, and especially under the system of removing them to the west of the Mississippi, adopted by the last Administration, in the same proportion has the power of the Executive, under this head, continued to increase.

The Post Office Department, with its ten or twelve thousand subordinate officers; its host of clerks, deputies, and contractors; its millions of annual receipts and expenditure; with its hands every day reaching wider and deeper into every part of the country, and acting upon manuscript correspondence and the communication of ideas all over the nation; is not that a visible monument of the increasing authority and influence of the Executive? The Constitution seems hardly to have conceived of the magnitude of the power which was destined to grow up in this unconsidered quarter.

But it is when we come to inspect the relations of the Executive to the property of the United States, the national treasure, the public lands, the edifices and other public works of commerce and internal communication, that we enter a field of usurpation, by construction, of incalculable dimensions and capacity.

The abuses of which this, the money power of the Executive, is susceptible, are fearfully shown by that long series of agitation, which commenced with the Bank question, and has brought us to the present deplorable state of public affairs. It is a topic too extensive to be fully discussed by me on this occasion. I shall only touch on some of the leading points of it.

It embraces the collection of the customs, and all the train of public officers connected therewith; the custody of the public treasure, and the question of the relation of the Government to banks; the disbursement of the public treasure, and the abuses admissible therein; the public lands, and the influence of the Government in the receipt and disbursement of the money they yield, and as the greatest landed proprietor, as well as the greatest moneyed capitalist in the country; the patronage and incidental power of the Government in the construction and management of light houses, harbor improvements, roads, custom-houses, mints, arsenals, and numerous other public works; all which things must be considered, if we desire to comprehend the full extent of the power of the Executive, as connected with the moveable and fixed property of the Federal Government.

If there were no question as to the mode in which the late Administration has wielded this tremendous engine of power, the mere fact of the augmentation of the amount of public property would clearly exhibit the dangerous increase of Executive influence within a few years. When Mr. Benton presented so strongly the perils which threaten us from this quarter, the whole amount of public expenditures, except for the national debt, which involved but little patronage, was about twelve millions annually. That, Mr. Chairman, was when you administered the affairs of the United States; and when the patronage of twelve million dollars was so dangerous that the House of Representatives ordered an elaborate investigation of all the departments to be made, in order to RETRENCH the unbearable extravagance of your administration. Extravagance, indeed! When the expenditures of the Government have gone on increasing ever since, until they have become double, ay, treble, what they were then; and when, I doubt not, if my friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE,] could have had the same free scope that Mr Hamilton had, abuses would be seen to have increased in a far greater ratio.

Mr. WISE here rose, and said, that he had compared his report with that of the former member from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMILTON,] and had found that where Mr. Hamilton had exposed one abuse in Mr Adam's administration, he [Mr. WISE] had exposed five in General Jackson's.

Mr. CUSHING resumed: The abuses of this power have been more signal in the mode of its exercise of late years, than in the amount of objects which it covers. Consider the war, in all its parts and incidents, of the late and of the present administration against the United States Bank; the onsets of the Federal Government upon bank paper and banks generally; all the strange details of the removal of the public deposites from the Bank of the United States; the organization of a great system of State banks, to be the political handmaidens of the Executive; and the newest new expedient of Executive Sub-Treasuries; and the all penetrating operation of this pertinacious schemefulness of the Executive upon the currency and the business interes s of the entire people of the United States. Bear in mind that this turbid torrent of baneful experiments and expedients has been poured in upon the country out of the single great fountain head of the will of the Executive; that Congress, the law-making department of the Government, has originated none of these things; nay, it has held back, refused, rejected, assented reluctantly where it has assented at all, and is yet struggling as it may to withstand the approaches, half seduction and half force, of the stubborn unappativeness of the Administration. Consider, I say, all this, and then tell me, if you can, by what clause of the Constitution it is that the President of the United States wields this stupendous power over the public property of the Government, and through that, over the private property of all the people of all the United States.

Strict constructionists, I beseech you to open this Constitution and point me to the words of grant, which place at the discretion of the Executive the collection of customs—the management of the public domain—the receipts therefrom—the conduct of the mails—the disbursements in every branch of the public service—association with, control over, or denomination of, banks—custody of the edifices and other fixed property of the nation, and of its moveable treasure. If it be not expressly given, is it a resulting power? If so, from which of the powers expressly given does it result?

Lax constructionists, do you undertake to raise this power by implication? To imply a power far greater than most of the expressed ones, and quite equal to any of them? Will you build up this lofty superstructure of power upon the word "Executive" in the Constitution? It cannot be. You might as well think to reverse the position of the pyramids, and plant them on the apex instead of the base. Grant that the "Executive power" is vested in the President; grant that he is to nominate and commission, and may remove public officers; still, the details of that Executive power; the acts to be performed in virtue of it; the officers by and through whom the power is to be executed, and the distribution and limitation of the functions among them respectively, are to be prescribed by act of the Congress, in the forms of law; otherwise the President of the United States is but another name for a despot, an autocrat, acting by some limitless motu proprio, and able, when he will, to absorb into his own person all the effective powers of the Federal Government.

I denounce these acts of the Administration, and the pretences of power by which they are sought to be defended, as the crowning evidence of the means of corruption, and the scope for usurpation which the functions of the Executive afford. This, the relation of the Executive to the public property and the private property of the nation, is the great question of the day. And it brings me to the general conclusions which I deduce from all I have said, and the practical result which I desire to reach.

First, I conclude, as the general inference, that the powers of the Executive are, as compared with those of Congress, or any other department of the Government, particularly susceptible of abuse; that they have been abused, and that they have a persevering tendency continuously to increase.

This, I am well aware, was not the opinion of the Federalist, at a time when the practical working of the Constitution was a matter of speculation merely; nor was it, I may add, of the Federalists, or, at any rate, the ultra Federalists, if we take Alexander Hamilton, one of the greatest men of his time, as the exponent of their opinions. He, we all know, proposed, in the convention which framed the Constitution, to confer on the Executive powers much greater than the convention was willing to sanction. But the conclusions to which, by careful analysis of the Constitution, and study of its actual working, I have arrived—and I put this to the consideration of those gentlemen who claim to be the Democracy of the country—was the sentiment, also, of the original Democracy of the early years of the Constitution.

In the second place, I conclude, as the other general inference, that the remedy for the abuses to which I have referred, is to diminish the power and influence of the Executive. The salvation of the Government depends upon it. There is over-action in the head. If we do not speedily restore the equilibrium of the system, the body politic will, sooner or later, be prostrated by a fatal apoplexy. With might and main we must strive to bring back the administration of the Government to the standard, original, unadulterated, unsophisticated purity of the Constitution.

We have, in my judgment, erred on all sides. The interests of money are too much thought of. I scorn to stand upon any such narrow question as banks, currency, trade. These are important objects in their place; but freedom is dearer than all considerations of advancement in wealth or temporal prosperity. Worthily to discharge our duties to the Constitution and the country, it becomes us to consider the temporary and evanescent business-relation of the present subject, as secondary only to the great and eternal interests of the constitutional liberties of the land. It is a question of Democratic right—the maintenance of the franchises of the people. It is a question of constitutional power—one department of the Government invading, by gradual and insidious progress, the other, and through that undermining the Democratic guaranties of the Constitution. One of the old writers relates of the Capadocians, I think, Libertatem repudiaverunt, ut quam sibi dicerent intolerabilem—they repudiated liberty as a thing which they said was intolerable to them. I do not fear this of my countrymen. A wise and brave people, it has been well said, will neither be cheated nor bullied out of liberty. But such a people may cease to be vigilantly wise, to be unshakenly brave, by resigning themselves to the treacherous and corrupt influences of power. Would to God that some divine afflatus might descend upon the Constitution, to resuscitate and reanimate its enfeebled energies; that the voice of the Almighty, from the empyreal height where He sits enthroned, penetrating the clouds which surround us, would say even to those dry bones of the Constitution, "Live! Be thou once more a creature of strength and of health, to go forth in the majesty of thy beauty, a ministering angel, on a mission of blessings to the world!"

Mr. CUSHING then submitted the following resolution, as an amendment of that of Mr. HAYNES:

Whereas the influence of the Executive Department of the Federal Government has, for some time past, in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, continued to increase, and ought to be diminished—

Resolved, therefore, That, in order to correct the said abuse, so much of the President's Message as relates to the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money, be referred to with instructions to report—

First, such method of keeping the public treasure, effects, and other property, as in the judgment of said committee shall most conduce to promote the welfare and to secure the liberties of the people; and,

Secondly, such other reforms in the practices of the Government as in their opinion shall tend to bring back the administration thereof to the standard of the original purity of the Constitution.

SPEECH OF MR THOMPSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

n the House of Representatives, Friday, May 11, 1838—

On the Treasury Note Bill.

MR. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Although, sir, I regard the present as an occasion when, if ever in the history of this country, it would be justifiable to resort to the great conservative principle of English liberty, to withhold supplies until there was a change of measures and a redress of grievances, I am, nevertheless, willing to vote the necessary supplies to the Government. I must, however, be allowed to choose the mode of raising the funds. I cannot vote for a measure like that proposed, which is, in my deliberate judgment, a violation of the Constitution, and of evil and dangerous tendency. Howsoever and by whomsoever administered, I cannot forget that it is still the Government of my country, and entitled to all just aids from me of money, and of every thing else. But I will not allow any exigency, however great, any pressure, however severe, to induce me, in the slightest particular, to violate the Constitution. The section from which I come is the weaker interest in the Confederacy; the Constitution is therefore to us literally the "ark of our covenant," and should be as sacredly kept. Every consideration of interest is superadded to the highest sanctions under which men can act, so to watch over and protect it. As a matter of conscience, and of sworn duty, I cannot; as one of prudence and of policy, I would not, if I could, in the slightest particular, violate that sacred instrument.

He looks but narrowly at this measure who regards it simply as a question of raising money for a present emergency. No, sir, it is a part, a most important part—the very foundation—of a new fiscal, financial, and commercial system, which it is intended to erect upon the ruins of all the salutary usages to which we have been accustomed, of the Constitution itself, and of the property, prosperity and happiness of the people; a purpose, now no longer doubtful, to suppress bank notes as a currency, and to substitute in their place this Government currency. We have been told from a high quarter, one entitled to all consideration, that "a mortal conflict was now waging between bank paper and metallic currency, and that one or the other must perish;" that the business of discount and issuing currency are incompatible, and explicitly that banks ought not to issue their paper as currency. These annunciations are distinct enough; and I trust that it will not again be denied that the purpose (no doubt most honestly and patriotically entertained) is gradually to suppress bank notes as a currency; yet we are told at the same time that it is not contemplated to bring the country to a currency exclusively metallic. The currency, then, is to be in no part bank paper, and not entirely metallic. What then? Nothing has been proposed but this Government currency. I am no indiscriminate advocate of the banking system: I know the faults and vices of that system, and would rejoice to see them reformed; yet I prefer it with all these faults to the terrible agony and suffering of passing through the transition from that system to a metallic currency. I also prefer bank currency to this Goverement currency which you now propose to issue;

1. Because I think the issue of such a paper clearly unconstitutional.
2. It is not so good a currency as convertible bank paper.
3. Its tendency to excess (the great fault of the banking system) is greater.
4. It is more expensive.
5. Its political tendencies are more dangerous.
6. Its effects will be unequal and sectional, and specially injurious to the section from which I come.

I submit, sir, that these Treasury notes are bills of credit, and that this Government has no right to issue bills of credit. What is a bill of credit? In its largest sense it means almost any evidence of debt. But, in the sense in which it is used in the Constitution, it means such issues of paper, upon the credit of the public faith, as were then in existence, and by which the country had been so severely scourged, now generally denominated continental money. That, and nothing else, was intended by the general designation, bills of credit. We find the term frequently used at that period in acts of ordinary legislation; and why should we attach a different meaning to it when found in the Constitution? One act directs that "bills of credit" be received for postage; other acts forbid the receiving of "bills of credit" for public dues. What bills of credit? The only bills of credit then in existence in the country were those paper issues of the Federal and State Governments. That was what was meant by bills of credit, and nothing else. The Constitution was framed about the same time as these acts of ordinary legislation, and by the same men: and there can be no pretence for saying that one thing was meant in these acts of Congress by the term bills of credit, and another and a different thing by the same words when used in the Constitution. It was such a currency that had caused so much ruin in the country, and such a currency which it was intended to prohibit.

Is, then, the paper now proposed to be issued the same as the continental money? I answer, yes, in every particular, important and unimportant. It is a paper issued on the public credit, and intended to circulate as money. I can see no single point of difference, but in the paper on which the two are printed. The frugal habits of our fathers made them use ordinary paper; we use silk paper. It is said that these bills drew interest, and that the continental money did not. This, as is usual with these ardent theorists, is a mistake in point of fact. Much of the currency issued by the States, and denominated "bills of credit," did bear interest—that of New York, for example. But suppose it had not, are gentlemen, who profess themselves on all occasions the exclusive friends of a strict construction, prepared to palter with their consciences, to evade, to cheat, the Constitution, by such a contemptible fraud as making these notes draw one mill interest on a hundred dollars? The enlightened framers of the Constitution, say they, foresaw the evils of a Government paper, and forbade us to issue such, and made us swear that we would not do that or any other act in violation of the Constitution; but, by this paltry trick, we will evade it, and thus, in effect, do the very thing which we were sworn not to do. Shame! shame!

It has been suggested that such a paper may be issued in another form, so as to avoid the constitutional difficulty; certificates receivable in payment of public dues, and not promises to pay. This, like the other, is an unworthy evasion of the highest obligations which can be imposed upon men, and equally baseless. A large portion of the bills of credit of the Revolution were these receivable certificates. But in a case, long since the Revolution, the case of Craig vs. Missouri, it has been decided, and the decision sustained by unanswerable argument, that such certificates, receivable for public dues, are bills of credit, and therefore unconstitutional.

The State of Missouri had issued certificates receivable in payment of public dues, and without any promise whatever to pay. They were decided to be bills of credit, and unconstitutional. Chief Justice Marshall defines a bill of credit to be "a paper issued by the sovereign authority, and intended to circulate as money." Can any objection be made to the definition, or any other be given? Are these not issued by the sovereign authority, and are they not intended to circulate as money?

Let any man answer the question, and put his vote upon the answer. Judge Thompson says, there being no means of enforcing payment, their credit depends solely upon the faith and voluntary will of the State, and are therefore bills of credit. Is there any means of enforcing payment of Treasury notes? or have they any basis of credit but the public faith? Judge Marshall says, that the great question is, are they intended to circulate as money? and that this is to be ascertained by the face of the act and the face of the paper. Are these notes intended to circulate as money? Who will have the hardihood to deny it? They are intended to circulate as money, an issue of Government paper intended as money, and actually used as money, and in no other way. One of my colleagues tells us that this a loan, and is constitutional under the power to borrow money. Is it, sir, really and bona fide a loan—a loan at one mill per cent. per annum? Is it by such tricks on the Constitution that he and I have been accustomed to construe it? We, sir, who have, in time past, staked our all of life, honor, and character, in resisting a similar and less flagrant violation of the Constitution—"a violation by perversion," which we were taught and believed was the most dangerous of all violations. No one denied the power to lay duties on imports; but we did deny the right to pervert a power intended only to raise revenue, to a power to protect manufactures. Which perversion is the grossest, that, or the perversion of the power to borrow money into one to issue a currency? If this is honestly intended as a loan, and not as an issue of currency, why are not the certificates of stock made transferrable at the Treasury, as heretofore, before the commissioner of loans, and not, as is now proposed, by the simple act of delivery?

Is it, in the common transactions of life, regarded as a loan when one man gives to another his note in payment of an account? Is the act of making money borrowing it? The Government has a right to borrow, but that right is restricted by the condition that it shall not borrow by issuing bills of credit—bills intended to circulate as money.

Could a State, without a violation of the Constitution, issue such a paper? No one will say so who admits the correctness of the decision in the case referred to. If not, why not? No answer can be given, but because they are bills of credit; for, if they are not, the States may issue them. If these notes are not bills of credit, I demand to know what are. Give me a definition which will not include these. Draw a form of a bill of credit which the States may not issue. That clause of the Constitution must have meant something. What manner of thing was meant by bills of credit, if these are not bills of credit? I do not think that the argument can be answered. If, then, they are bills of credit, has Congress power to issue them? It is enough for me and the school of politicians to which I belong, that the power is not to be found in the Constitution. I am accustomed to look there for the grant, not for the prohibition of powers. But this case is infinitely stronger. The power was inserted in the Constitution, and was stricken out by the Convention, and under circumstances expressly refusing the specific power itself. On the 5th of August, the committee which had been charged with the duty of preparing a constitution submitted their draught to the Convention. In that draught was the following clause, taken verbatim from a like clause in the articles of confederation: "Congress shall have power to borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States." On the 16th of August, a motion is made to strike out the words "and emit bills of credit," and carried, nine States to two. I repeat that it is enough for me that the power is not enumerated in the Constitution, nor necessary (not convenient) to any power that is granted.

But how infinitely is this ground strengthened when the power is not only not found in the Constitution as adopted, but was actually proposed and inserted, and afterwards stricken out on motion and debate. By an opposite rule of construction, I demand to know what power it is, that is not expressly prohibited, that may not be arrogated? The constitutionality of a Bank has been well questioned on grounds infinitely less strong, as I will proceed to show. A proposition to give Congress power to grant charters of incorporation generally, was referred to a committee, and never afterwards acted on. The power to grant a charter of a bank was never proposed.

Now it may with much plausibility be said that the Convention refused to give the general and dangerous power to grant charters as an independent power, at the same time believing that they had given the power to charter a Bank as an implied power, and as an auxiliary to granted powers. But in the case of bills of credit the very power is specially proposed and rejected. The power to grant charters of incorporation was not acted on by the Convention, and the power is now denied with great reason from the non-action of the Convention. But in the case of bills of credit the question was distinctly acted on, the power was inserted, and was stricken out on motion. How infinitely stronger is the one case than the other. Why was the power in either case refused? There is no evidence in the case of a Bank, that it was refused with an intent to deny the power. But in the case of Treasury notes there is. Luther Martin, a distinguished member of the Convention, immediately after its adjournment, when all the facts were fresh in his memory, tells the Legislature of Maryland that the words emit bills of credit were stricken out with the view of denying the power, and not because it was given, if it became necessary as an auxiliary power. He says in his letter to the Legislature of Maryland: "By our original articles of confederation, the Congress have power to borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States; agreeably to which was the report on this system as made by the committee of detail. When we came to this part of the report, a motion was made to strike out the words 'to emit bills of credit;' against the motion we urged that it would be improper to deprive Congress of that power; that it would be a novelty unprecedented to establish a Government which should not have such authority. That it was impossible to look forward into futurity, so far as to decide that events might not happen that should render the exercise of such a power absolutely necessary, and that we doubted whether, if a war should take place, it would be possible for this country to defend itself without having recourse to paper credit, in which case there would be a necessity of becoming a prey to our enemies, or violating the Constitution of our Government; and that, considering the administration of the Government would be principally in the hands of the wealthy, there could be little reason to fear an abuse of the power by an unnecessary or injurious exercise of it. But, sir, a majority of the Convention, being wise beyond every event, and being willing to risk any political evil rather than admit the idea of a paper emission, in any possible case, refused to trust this authority to a Government to which they were lavishing the most unlimited powers of taxation, and to the mercy of which they were willing blindly to trust the liberty and property of the citizens of every State in the Union, and they erased that clause from the system."

Now, sir, here is the contemporaneous testimony of an illustrious member of the convention, that it was intended in "no possible emergency" that the Government should have power to make a paper emission. This statement was uncontradicted at the time, and is as authoritative as if the debates in full were published, and it should be found that it was put by all the speakers on the subject on the ground that it would be dangerous to grant such a power, and by no single one on the ground that the power might be exerted as an implied power. If such rules of construction are adopted, to what point will it not carry us? The sum of the argument is—a power not granted, but specifically proposed and rejected, is to be assumed, although demonstrably not necessary; and I would here remark, that the only instance in which it has heretofore been exercised was in a period of war, when money could not be borrowed, and when it was the only resources left; not only then convenient, but absolutely necessary to the very existence of the Government.

I trust that it will not be contended, at least that it will not by any State rights man, that the power is prohibited to the States, but not to this Government, and that therefore it may be exerted; that the dangerous doctrine will not be avowed, that this Government may do whatever is not prohibited. By such construction, what may it not do? Is a bank prohibited? Is internal improvement, or a protective tariff? None of them. How few powers are prohibited? Not a dozen. It was necessary to prohibit this power to the States, because without such prohibition they possessed it. It was not necessary expressly to prohibit it to the General Government, because they could not exercise it unless granted by the Constitution.

2d. It is not so good a currency as bank paper. It is the currency of revolutionary Governments, and never has maintained a par value, and never will, except in periods of great pressure, and in small amounts. It is even now below par, when every circumstance of the condition of the country is most auspicious to it; and when, added to its quality of currency, it has that of stock bearing interest. But it is said that if it does depreciate, the loss falls on the Government, not on the people. Mr. Chairman, where are we, and on what times have we fallen? Is it in this Republican land, where the Government is the mere trust, the mere agency of the people, that we are told that the loss of the Government is not the loss of the people? Suppose one hundred millions in your Treasury, and uses and demands for it, and it is consumed by fire. This, too, I suppose, would be the loss of Government, not of the people; no concern whatever of theirs.

3d. That its tendency to excess will be greater than bank currency, I do not doubt; and that is the great vice of the banking system. Can there be a more striking proof of this than the present state of things? With an exhausted Treasury, an emaciated and suffering people, the Government alone is unaffected by the universal pressure, and is seen careering along in a course of unexampled extravagance. Yes, sir, an Administration which came into power with the watchwords retrenchment and economy eternally on their lips, proposing to expend in the present year more than forty millions; thirteen millions being the highest amount expended under the Administration which they denounced as ruining the country by its extravagance. How, and why, is all this? Why, sir, for the simple reason that the more money that is appropriated, the more Treasury notes will be issued, and the greater the present relief to the country. No such currency ever has been resorted to, which has not run into wild excess.

4th. It is more expensive. Bank currency costs the country nothing; nothing at all, sir; and, until recently, no such idea has ever been advanced. This Government currency costs directly six per cent. upon the whole amount in circulation.

5th. As to its political tendencies. I, sir, am a Republican of the State Rights school; not of some ten or twelve years' standing: I have always been so: I was born one: I was born in the midst of the black-cockade contest, and have no drop of blood that flows from any one who ever wore one; and I confess that I am amazed, I am almost disposed to doubt my own identity, when I hear gentlemen of the strictest sect declaring that this power of making currency is too important a power to trust to poor, miserable, cowardly corporations, (as they have shown themselves to be,) corporations which are State institutions, drawing the breath of their nostrils from the States, receiving from and giving strength to the States, indissolubly united in their destinies with the States, and having no other powers but this. But that it is perfectly safe to add this power, great as it confessedly is, to the vast mass of power already possessed by this Government—this raw-head-and-bloody-bones accumulation of power in the Federal Government, which we have been denouncing and warring against—because it is said the power must abide somewhere, and it is too dangerous a power to trust to State corporations, which have neither motive, courage, nor ability, to abuse it. And, sir, has it come to this? Is this the boasted separation of the Government from the money power? A most notable separation! A separation by a direct and entire union! A separation by granting the unlimited power to make and issue money; a power too dangerous to give to State corporations, lest, peradventure, they may combine with the Government; but perfectly safe to grant the whole power, without restriction, to this Government. And this is State rights!

6th. It will operate unequally. These notes, by laws of trade and commerce, invariable and unchangeable, will accumulate in large cities where they are needed, under the universal law of demand and supply, and will afford no relief to the interior, to the farmers and the country merchants. Such was the experience of Mr. Dallas in 1816. He says, "that the Treasury notes afforded no general relief; that they had accumulated, and would continue to accumulate, in the large commercial cities where they were needed, and rarely found their way into the interior; and that the currency of the local banks was all that the farmer could obtain." Mr. Crawford says the same thing, and adds, "they gave relief only to the section east of this city, where Government disbursements were chiefly made." Where is now the largest amount of these notes? Where it always will be—in New York—where they are most wanted. Below par in New York; five per cent. above par in Charleston; and yet I am asked to believe that to have a peculiar currency for the Government, when that currency accumulates in such abundance in New York as to be below par, and is so scarce in Charleston as to command five per cent. premium, is to facilitate the payment of duties in Charleston. Am I forever to be asked to assent to these novelties, unsupported by argument, and opposed by all experience and facts? It is said the importations of Charleston have increased of late, and hence this policy is favorable to the South. So, in a much greater degree, have those of Philadelphia. Is Philadelphia a Southern city? Why have they increased? For the simple reason, that in the present derangement of the currency funds cannot be placed in New York; and from the greater suffering of New York than any other point by the late universal crash—one of those tornadoes in which the tallest trees are the first to fall, when time must be allowed for those to straighten which have been bent, and for a new growth.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us that it was not anticipated that these notes would have so soon returned to the Treasury. I suppose it was not. But it might have been foreseen, and would have been, by a financier of ordinary sagacity, or even by the present Secretary, if he had consulted the history of former issues of the same kind of paper. The report of Mr. Dallas would have informed him that, when tried in 1816, "the revenues had been collected almost exclusively in Treasury notes, and would continue to be so collected, as long as they are issued by the Government." Mr. Crawford says the same thing, and in the opinions of those able men, such must always be the case. That, if any revenue was collected, it must be in these notes, and that, of consequence, they would return to the Treasury in the payment of public dues as rapidly as they were paid out to the public creditors, like Penelope's web, undoing in the night the work of the day. But I suppose that the brilliant genius of Mr. Woodbury scorns all aid from the lights of experience, or the suggestions of such plodding fellows as Dallas, Crawford, and Gallatin; and that, if he looks at all into the history of these times, it is as he would into the history of the Persian monarchy, as a matter of curious reading, not for information and practical instruction. But, sir, is it really necessary that the Government should resort to this dangerous power? It is not. There are other and in every way better modes of raising money, by which the necessary supplies may be raised, and most beneficent effects produced upon the prostrate energies and interests of the country. Make a loan in the regular and proper form of a loan, receive it in specie, or the bills of specie-paying banks, and in sixty days you will see the prosperity of the country revive; its powerful energies, now paralyzed by unwise legislation, will raise it up again like a giant aroused from his slumbers. You can sell your stock thus raised at a premium, whilst you must dispose of the Treasury notes at a discount. Both plans create a debt: neither creates a permanent and funded debt; for whenever you are in funds, you can redeem such stock. You will save at least half a million, and, what is of infinitely greater consequence, you will save the Constitution. It need not be said that the stock thus created will not be more valuable than Treasury notes. Mr. Crawford tells us that exactly such a stock, bearing six per cent. interest, and redeemable at the will of the Government, sold in 1822, 1823, and 1824, at a premium of two per cent. Why it is so, I shall not stop to show. So it always has been, and so, I am informed, on the highest authority, it will be now. I will not propose such a loan, because I will not relieve the Government from the just odium of bringing the country into such a condition. Let the Administration openly and aboveboard go to the people, tell them there is no money in the Treasury, that they are forced to borrow, my life upon it, that, if it is no fault of theirs, they will not be held answerable; if it is their fault, they ought not to be allowed to escape the responsibility. Ask for a loan, I say, openly, and do not wrap it up in the delusive pretext of issuing Treasury notes. What individual, if he wished to borrow ten millions, and by issuing his notes in large sums to a few individuals, could raise upon them two hundred thousand dollars more than their face, would choose to issue them in small sums, easily negotiable, to a multitude of creditors, and at a loss of three hundred thousand dollars; in all, half a million? That precisely is the difference between the two plans, and we are about to do for the country what no sane man would do for himself.

I would receive payment for the stock in the bills of specie-paying banks, or in specie. Let a portion of the stock be sold in Europe, and serve as a conduit to bring into this country (not by a forcing and artificial process) a portion of that specie which the natural condition of our country and of Europe, and the wise policy of that enlightened nation upon whose commerce we have been waging a barbaric war, is disposed to send here.

These Treasury notes give no permanent relief unless reissuable.

They are paid in as fast as they are paid out; and if reissuable, you convert your Treasury Department into a Government bank of issue and deposite, and, in the transfer of its funds, necessarily of discount to.

These advantages, great as I regard them, sink in comparison with the benign and and all-blessing influence of an announciation by the Government, in a manner formal and authoritative, that the bills of specie-paying banks will be received by it. The disease has always been more one of credit than of currency. The banks never have been in as sound a condition as at present; never have they had so large a basis of specie as now. Confidence, and confidence alone, is wanting to give us a sound bank currency, and to carry once more prosperity and happiness in broad streams through the land. Without it the banks never can permanently resume. Confidence is their vital air; without it they can no more live, than can a fly in an exhausted receiver. It may be easily demonstrated that, in a period of doubt and distrust, a bank with a million of specie, and never more than fifty thousand dollars of notes in circulation, may be forced to suspend.

There can be no more striking illustration of this than the suspension in 1797 by the Bank of England. It had, at the period of its suspension, only ten millions of notes in circulation, and thirty millions of specie. But the directors distinctly foresaw that, with the demands occasioned by foreign wars and subsidies, the large importation of foreign corn, and the panic and apprehension of an invasion from France, their specie would be exhausted, and they determined to suspend; and by doing so, sustained the industry and business of the country, and carried England triumphantly through a long and perilous conflict, in a manner that is absolutely a miracle, and under trials and difficulties which I hesitate not to say no nation ever could have borne, if unsustained by this much-abused banking system. Bonaparte, the wisest man of his time, knew that the great basis of the banking system was confidence; and when he was about organizing the Bank of France, and selecting its president, he said, I have no confidence in Portalis, but France has; therefore let Portalis be president. I am well satisfied that the true and only issue before the country is between the State banks and a National Bank. No people, not held down by an iron despotism, will submit to the terrible agony and bloody sweat of coming to a metallic currency. Nor will one so intelligent as ours adopt the dangerous expedient of a Government paper; and my life on the issue, if the State banks fail, the result will be a Government bank, or a United States Bank. It is because I think so, that I am disposed to take from the State banks all improper weights and hindrances to aid them by all proper means in resuming specie payments; without doing which, they cannot, and ought not, to be tolerated.

Such, sir, was the course of the able and patriotic men who presided over the Treasury at the close of the war. They addressed all their efforts and powers to aiding the banks to resume and furnish a sound currency. Mr. Dallas even took the responsibility of receiving the bills of non-specie paying banks, without the authority of law, and he was sustained in it by the whole country. He says in his report to Congress in 1816:

"The consequence of rejecting bank notes which were not paid on demand in coin, must have been to put to hazard the collection of the revenue in point of time and in point of product, to deteriorate (if not to destroy the only adequate medium of exchange adopted by the common consent of the nation) in a case of extreme necessity, and to shake the foundations of private property.

"The restoration must be the work of the State institutions. But the interposition of Government will still be required to secure a successful result.

"To appeal to their fears by refusing to take their bills in payments to the Government, would be to visit the sins of the banks upon the great mass of unoffending citizens, unless the Government was prepared to furnish a sufficient legal currency to meet the demands of the community."

Mr. Crawford, in 1817, refused to deposite the public funds in the United States Bank, where it was provided by law that they should be kept, and deposited them in State institutions, expressly and avowedly for the purpose of aiding the banks to resume; not only not taking it from them in their moment of severest trial, but actually giving it to them; taking, in some instances, with a care, wise, practical, and paternal, from the strong banks, and giving it to the feeble and tottering, to enable all to stand; and he succeeded, and in this rendered the most important of all his services to his country in a long life of distinguished public usefulness. Hear what he says upon the subject, and in circumstances identical with the present:

"In order to induce the banks in the District to resume specie payments simultaneously with the banks already enumerated, it became necessary for the Treasury Department to give them assurances of support during the first months succeeding such resumption. In consequence of this assurance, a considerable portion of the deposites in the banks of Washington and Georgetown was permitted to remain until the 1st of July."

It is cheering, it is delightful, to turn from the uncertain and dangerous theories of the present day, from the eternal experiments that are made upon the happiness, the very means of subsistence of the people, as a philosopher would test the power of prussic acid on a mouse, to the practical suggestions of these calm, quiet, and able minds My business is with the things of this world as I find them, not as I would have them. I leave the higher walks of divine philosophy to others. I have only the very poor ambition of being a practical man: and I prefer to follow the steady light of experience, taper thought it be, to the dazzling, but too often dangerous and delusive, light of a priori theory, whether it be the ever-blazing torch of a brilliant genius, or the farthing candles which are lighted at it. In my judgment, the greatest good now to be attained is a resumption of specie payments; and to that end, I would have the Government not only not obstruct it, by throwing its powerful influence over public opinion against the banks, but aid them by all proper means. This Government, and this Government alone, has prostrated the banks, and with them the whole industry of the country, with muscles yet quivering from the blow; but, with powerful energies, they are struggling to rise again. Is it wise or just still to keep your paralyzing hand upon them?

But it is said you will do this to enable the banks to pay their debts. It would be a much more true statement of the case to say that it is to be done to enable the people to pay their debts to the banks. Gentlemen, who talk thus, must surely forget that the banks maintain to the people the double relation of debtor and of creditor, and that the creditor relation is the largest. The banks owe the people about two hundred millions; the people owe them five hundred millions. Now, sir, this game of demanding specie is one at which both the people and the banks can play, and the banks, if forced to pay all their debts, notes, and deposites in specie, cannot choose; they have no alternative; they must collect their debts in specie. What, then, must be the result? The banks have thirty-five millions of specie; the people have the same amount. Force the banks into a position where they must collect, as far as their two hundred millions of debts go, they can be paid in their own debts; after that is all called in, there are three hundred millions of debt due to the banks, and thirty-five millions of currency to pay it with. Let the banks collect that in payment, and what then is the condition of the country? More than two hundred and fifty millions due to the banks, and no currency at all to pay it with. For although, in the ordinary transactions of commerce, one dollar will pay one hundred, not so in this case. Every consideration of interest and self-preservation will concur to make the banks keep every dollar they receive, and the gates of death will be shut upon it. Will not this state of things place the whole property of bank debtors at the mercy of the banks? and, by being in possession of all the currency, all the saleable property of the country also? That such a state of things is likely to occur, I do not believe; it would be arrested, if in no other way, by popular commotion, or by the substitution of some other currency.

Would you do this to enable the banks to pay their debts? I answer yes, I would. The bank capital of the country is a portion, a large portion, of its wealth and power, and I would do all that I rightfully can to save it from ruin, if nothing else were involved. I would not lightly strike down four hundred millions of the capital of the country, a larger portion of which, than of any other equal amount, is owned by widows and orphans, and which, when it does topple in ruins, will crush the hopes and the hapiness of thousands. Especially do I feel bound to do it when their present condition has been brought about by no act of theirs, of omission or commission, but solely and exclusively by the action of this Government. No man of any party has attributed it to any cause which is not the result of the action of the Government.

To what causes is the present state of things attributed? Variously, and with much truth, to the following: 1st. To a large accumulation of public funds. That is not the work of the banks, nor could they have prevented it. 2d. To overtrading from excessive bank discounts. This they were expressly ordered to do, for General Jackson's requests were orders. 3d. To the distribution act, and the pitiable folly and stupidity with which it was executed. In transferring, in the first six months, funds to places where they were not needed for distribution in eighteen months; thus making that sudden and harsh which was intended to be easy and gradual. And 4th. To the specie circular. I do not doubt that all these causes, jointly and separately, produced the present calamitous condition of the country. Is any one of them the act of the banks, or could they have controlled them? Have I not shown that the suspension was unavoidable, and that it was more a measure of mercy to the country than of interest to the banks? Since the suspension, what fault have they committed? We were told, at the extra session, that they must curtail their issues. This could only be done by calling in their debts. I said then that it would not alleviate, but increase, the disease. I knew the ground I stood on in saying so, and that such was the uninterrupted current of English authorities. I am not now wholly unsupported in this opinion. Is it not the interest of the banks, specially and obviously their interest, to resume? No one will deny that it is. Here, then, stands the case. You found these corporations created by law in a state of sound credit and profitable business; you have destroyed both: and we are to be told you must not adopt measures of the most salutary and beneficial character, because an incidental effect will be to reinstate the banks in the condition in which you found them. Sir, such a course would be insufficiently illustrated by the conduct of the captain and crew of a vessel who, in defiance of the warnings and entreaties of their passengers, should run upon shoals and quicksands, and, in the moment of peril, should take to their longboat, disregarding the despairing shrieks of the passengers, when there was room enough in the boat for all.

It is said that to refuse to receive the bills of banks is the best means of preventing excessive issues. I believe exactly the reverse; that you cannot hold out to them so powerful an inducement to prudence and to caution as to say to them, so long as you continue to pay specie the powerful aid of the countenance of the Government shall be extended to you. We will give you the authority and influence of our opinion of your solvency by receiving your bills; but the moment you refuse to pay, we will withdraw that confidence, and dishonor you by a refusal to receive your paper, and shake your credit to its deepest foundations. It is literally putting them upon their good behavior, by addressing their interest.

It is also urged that to receive their bills is to place the Government in the power of the banks: to have them in our debt, and dependent upon our confidence, is to place us in their power. The old idea was, that the debtor was slave to the creditor; but now it is that the creditor is slave of the debtor. Verily this is an era of new lights. What are the great objects of this great change which we are asked to venture on? 1st. To pay the Government officers and employees in gold and silver; and, 2d, By creating a constant demand upon the banks for specie, to prevent excessive issues. To the first, I reply that there is no officer in the public service who expected, at the time he entered into office, to receive any thing else than convertible bank notes, and that he has no right, nor do I believe that any of them have the disposition, to ask any thing else. If bank paper, convertible at will into specie, is to be the currency of the people and of the States, I can see no reason for giving to Federal officers any thing better. Their salaries are already large enough to seduce from their allegiance to the States all with whom a love of money is stronger than the love of country. I can see no reason for paying your clerks in the Departments two thousand dollars in gold and silver when the Governors, or supreme judges, in but few States in the Union, receive that amount in bank notes. Now, sir, if this is the true policy—if it is wrong to pay Federal officers in bank notes, it is equally so to pay our State officers in them. If the demand of Federal dues will create a demand for specie that will be salutary, so will the same demand be created by collecting State dues in specie. Why has no gentleman yet proposed to collect State taxes in gold and silver? Why is it that, whilst they object to receiving Federal dues in the bills of specie-paying banks, they are in favor of receiving State dues in the bills of banks that do not pay specie? I will tell you, sir; it is because, in the one case, the tax is collected under the tariff secretly. The people pay it in the increased price of the articles they buy, without knowing it. In the other, the tax is collected directly and openly. The boldest of the advocates of this hard money policy will not do this. If they will, sir, go directly to the people and demand specie for taxes, and refuse bank notes, if I am not mistaken, they will pull down a house about their ears, and we shall hear no more for a century, at least, of collecting taxes in specie; and why not do it? If it is right, the people will sustain you. Make the issue, if you dare, and show at once the confidence you profess in your theories, and in the judgment and patriotism of the people—that people whom you are eternally slavering with your praises, "as a man pats a wild horse that he may ride him." Bank rags, irredeemable bank rags, for the people, and for State officers. Nothing but gold and silver for Federal officers; and this is State rights.

But you are to control the banks, and prevent excessive issues by refusing their bills. Has this Government any legitimate power to control or to check those corporations? Gentlemen flout, with scorn, the idea of a bankrupt law. The States say they have the power to create these corporations. The General Government has no power to destroy them. They mean no direct, no honest, no fair power. But if it can get the power by cheating the Constitution, it is perfectly fair to do so. If they can pervert a power given for another purpose, it is right, fair, and perfectly constitutional to do so. Even in this fraudulent and stealthy way, can you do it? I do not believe that it is possible so to frame your laws as to secure the collection of Government dues in specie. They will be collected, as I am informed they now are in a certain importing city in the South, in bank notes, under an understanding that if specie is called for, (as it never is called for,) the banks will pay it. Such was the universal practice of evasion in the land offices under the operation of the Treasury circular. But suppose the revenue collected in specie, what will be the effect? Gentlemen say, to restrain bank issues. To what extent? Three for one, two for one, or one for one, as never did the Bank of Amsterdam. The measure will either do no such thing, or it will do too much. The whole amount of the receipts of the Government, on any just and economical principles, will be twenty-five millions. The daily payments in the city of New York alone are estimated at eight millions, or twenty-eight hundred millions in the year. The whole transactions of the United States may be assumed, at least, at ten thousand millions: as twenty-five is to ten thousand, is your power by this measure of reforming the currency. No, sir, suo proprio vigore, the measure of a demand of specie is powerless, and it can only be by its influence on the public mind, by a moral, not pecuniary power, that any such effect can be produced. And are gentlemen prepared to venture on the use of so tremendous an engine as an excited popular opinion against banks? Can they control it when once put in motion? Can they say, we will use this tremendous power to restrict the banks to three for one, two for one, or one for one, and at that point stop it? It would be enacting over again the impotent attempt of saying to the swelling and advancing tide, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." You might as well say that you would take off the wing of a fly with a steam engine, and not otherwise injure it. No mortal has a right to resort to the use of an instrument which he cannot control when once put in motion. Nothing is easier than to destroy bank credit. It is as frail and delicate as female reputation, which never entirely recovers, even from groundless imputation.

Can you restrict banks to the issue of dollar for dollar; or is it desirable to do so? Those who think that the Bank of Amsterdam, for any time worth regarding, had dollar for dollar of its issues, have paid as little attention to the history of that bank, in this particular, as in that of the date of its institution. It is spoken of as the beginning of the banking system. I suppose the first bank is meant. Now it is much nearer the last bank than the first. It is 230 years since the establishment of this Bank of Amsterdam, and it was just 450 years after the Bank of Venice, and 200 years after the Bank of Genoa. Every body knows, who knows any thing about it, that very shortly after its institution the directors found that the certificates of deposite were not called for in coin, and that the issues of such certificates were infinitely multiplied. Such will ever be the case. It is no more practicable to restrain excessive issues of certificates of deposite than of promises to pay specie. Suppose you could. Is it not in effect bringing the country to a metallic currency? Of what importance is it whether the coin itself circulates, or a paper certificate of a deposite of that coin? Suppose 70 millions of coin in the country. What is the difference between that coin being the sole currency, and that very coin being deposited in banks, and an equal quantity, dollar for dollar, of paper certificates issued? Is it not still the 70 millions, neither more nor less, of currency; and is not he a ruined man who contracted debts, when there was three times that amount of currency in the country? What I am afraid of in this thing is, the great political and moral influence of the action of the Government upon this most delicate of all questions. Is there a county in the United States where any large merchant might not affect the credit of bank paper by refusing to receive it? Would not all the farmers do the same? Would any such merchant be tolerated in demanding his debts in gold and silver? Shall we, sir, be asked to do that which no private individual dare do, and no honorable man would do?

But it is argued that we have no constitutional right to receive any thing but gold and silver. Why not? Because no such power is given. Is any power given to issue Treasury notes? But this power is given, expressly given, in the power to collect taxes; and never has been doubted for the half century that the Government has existed. As a question of authority, I think that of Washington, one of the wisest men, and of the most unbending integrity that ever lived, and the President of the convention that formed the Constitution, of Madison, and of every statesman from that day to this, is strong enough. In 1791, a few years after the adoption of the Constitution, such currency was not only received, but a bank charter granted, mainly for the reason that such a currency might be created for the use of the Government. But where is the prohibition to receive taxes in any thing? In kind, if necessary? Suppose in a state of war, and the Government wanting gunpowder, why may it not receive the duty in kind? Does any one deny the right to give credit for duties on imports? Suppose Mr. Biddle chooses to import goods for his corporation, will not the bond of that corporation be taken for the duties? If his bond, why not its notes? Is it not the daily habit to substitute new bonds with other securities for old ones? A merchant may then substitute one bond for another—may he not substitute a bond of a corporation? Would the bond of a merchant be rejected if he offered as security the Bank of the United States? If its bond may be taken, why may not its notes? Does the seal make it constitutional, and why?

If this great change is to be brought about, leave it to individual sagacity, interest, and capital. Let it be the work of time, gradual, silent, and salutary—like the changes in our language, not seen at the time it is going on, but only after the lapse of years, when it is accomplished. We have no right to force it by legislation. I have shown how small is the amount of our money transactions to those of the whole country: not less striking is the aggregate intelligence of the country compared to ours: and of all bodies of the same number, we are the least qualified to judge rightly upon it. I feel myself that I am not free from political bias, nor do I believe others are. I will only add, in conclusion, that I am thoroughly satisfied that although the Government may, at the cost of infinite suffering to the people, collect and keep its revenue in gold and silver, it is absolutely impossible to transfer and disburse it without the agency of banks, and that the inevitable effect of such a system will be to make every disbursing officer a dealer in exchange on the Government funds, and at the risk of the Government, but for his own profit. Take a single case for illustration. Fifty thousand dollars are required to pay troops in Arkansas, or in Maine. How is the money to be transferred there? By a draft, most probably, on New York, where the public funds most accumulate. The draft will be at a premium. The paymaster sells it, say at ten per cent. Who has the benefit of this premium? The officer is protected by his receipts from the soldiers for the $50,000; and has pocketed $5,000, as it is said has actually been done. If you exact of him the premium, he may charge himself with a less amount; and detection is impossible. Such temptations ought not to be offered, for they will not, they cannot, be resisted. In other cases the only modes of transfer must be bills of exchange. Your officers must buy them from merchants or banks at a premium or discount, as the case may be. Suppose the drawer and drawee fail, who bears the loss? If due care has been exercised, the Government ought; and whether there has or not, the Government will bear it, as the celebrated Parvin claim proves.

I am satisfied, thoroughly satisfied, that the public funds cannot be transferred and disbursed without the agency of banks; and when another measure comes up, I will propose, if no one else does, a plan of special deposites, which will place the money in the custody of the banks, but without their having the power to use one dollar of it. I am, and always have been, opposed to the pet bank system, as dangerous and corrupting; and I am prepared to show that the plan of special deposites diminishes patronage to absolutely nothing, and has advantage over any other proposed, in every point of view; and that it would be adopted, I do not doubt, if it were not for the extreme zeal of ultras on both sides—on the side of a United States Bank, and of the Sub-Treasury; for neither of which will I vote.

There is another branch of this subject, and to me by far the most important, which I now approach. It is said that this hard money policy will benefit the South, and relieve it from its commercial thraldom to the North. This is said on high authority, and is vouched by names in which the South reposes a well-earned confidence. I do not doubt their sincerity; I just as little doubt the error of these opinions; I have heard no argument, from any quarter, in support of them. When I ask for argument, I am answered by declamation, or some of those broad and general abstractions which, in politics, I have generally found to be either truisms, or things that are not true. My own settled conviction, candidly, not hastily, arrived at, and cautiously and deliberately re-examined, with an ardent desire to arrive at the truth, is, that whilst this policy will be injurious to all sections of the country, it will be ruinous, fatally injurious to the South. It is due to those who sent me here, it is due to myself, to give the reasons that have forced these conclusions upon me. After what has passed in my very humble public life, I had supposed that it was not necessary for me to declare my devotion to the South. But even I, sir, all of whose interests and affections are indissoluably connected with, and who have perilled all that man values in defence of the South and its interests, even I am suspected. It is my duty to defend myself, by giving the reasons for my opinions.

Although this selfish and sectional policy has not marked the ancient character of South Carolina; although it has been from a high, generous, and patriotic disregard of her peculiar interests, and the readiness with which she has, on all proper occasions, sacrificed them to the honor of the country, that she is mainly indebted for her high character, and the moral power which she has exerted in the Confederacy, I am forced to say that, in the present condition of the politics of the country, I regard it to be my imperious duty to look first, if not mainly, to the interests of my own peculiar section. Satisfy me, sir, that any policy will advance the interests of the South and of Charleston, and I shall not hesitate to do all that I may honorably do to that end; all that I can do consistently with the obligations of duty and of honor to the other members of the Confederacy. More than that I trust I would not do to advance any interest, sectional or selfish. Further than this I do not think it either right or prudent to go. We, sir, are, and are destined to be, the weaker interest; and to say nothing of the obligations of an honorable patriotism, it is not the most wise in us to avow a policy selfish and sectional. If we do, it will be with an ill grace that we shall complain of it in others who wield the power of a majority. Will this policy benefit the South? I would not vote for an expunging resolution because I should be told it would benefit the South, and I might be told so with as much truth as that this gold and silver policy will; nay, sir, with more truth; for that would be harmless, and this would be injurious. Amongst the aphorisms on this subject, (and no one has descended lower than an aphorism) is, that the banking system has given the North its commercial ascendancy over the South. If any thing is meant by the North, it must be New York; for it is New York that imports exclusively for the South all that is not imported in Southern cities. With just as much truth may a fly on a coachwheel be held responsible for the dust that is made; the fly is on the wheel, and the dust is made, but the poor fly has very little hand in it. The banking system is in existence, and New York has this ascendancy; but it is no more attributable to the banking system than is the dust to the fly. This I will show. And I do not vaunt when I say that I will put it beyond the reach of refutation or argument. One, hearing a proposition of this sort stated, would naturally suppose that the banking capital of New York was much greater in proportion than that of Charleston, or other Southern cities. But what will gentlemen say when they are told that it does not amount to one-tenth, I might say one-twentieth, of that of any one of the cities of the South? I suppose they will say, as did the ardent Frenchman, when he was told that the facts did not support his theory: so much the worse, said he, for the facts—tant pis pour les faits; the facts may or may not be true, the theory must be.

The following is the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of bank capital and circulation on the 1st January, 1837, in round numbers:

	Capital.	Circulation.
State of New York	$37,000,000	$24,000,000
City of New York	20,000,000	9,500,000
South Carolina	9,500,000	7,000,000
Charleston	8,000,000	6,000,000
Pennsylvania	58,000,000	25,000,000
Philadelphia	45,800,000	20,000,000
Georgia	11,500,000	5,000,000
Alabama	10,000,000	7,500,000
Louisiana	37,000,000	8,000,000
Mississippi	13,000,000	5,000,000
Massachusetts	38,000,000	10,000,000

These facts and figures speak for themselves. It will not be pretended that a small city or State, with little commerce, requires as much currency as those which are larger and have greater commerce. Upon what ratio will you regulate it? That of population, or commerce, or, what is the nearest approximation to a just ratio, a combined one of population and commerce. New York has ten times the population of Charleston, and is entitled on that principle to eighty millions. It has twenty. It has forty times the commerce, and, on that ratio, to three hundred and twenty millions: on a compound ratio of numbers and of commerce, to twenty-five times as much, which is two hundred millions. It has twenty. And so of all the Southern cities. New Orleans, with one-tenth of the trade, and one-sixth of the population of New York, has one-third more of banking capital. It is still more strikingly shown in the cases of Philadelphia, which, with one-third of the population, and less than a fifth of the commerce of New York, has three times the bank capital. Not less striking is the case of Boston. Why has New York so far outstripped them both? Will any one, in the face of these facts, hold up his head, and attribute the power and prosperity of New York to the banking system? But it is to the deposite of public funds that the great prosperity of New York is owing. How much has been, on an average, deposited there at any one time? Not more than three or four millions. Add that to the capital and currency of that city, and how strikingly unequal, still, is the statement.

I do not suppose that it will be pretended that public money has any peculiarly refreshing and invigorating quality, any more than so much private capital. This whole notion about deposites is a sheer and downright fallacy. The money is not deposited in New York, unless collected there. No bank issues to the whole amount of its deposites; a portion of it, generally half, remains locked up, and is, to that extent, a diminution of currency, and therefore an embarrassment instead of an aid to commerce. Of all the extravagancies that ever have been broached by intelligent men, this is the greatest—to attribute the commercial power of New York to causes so obviously insufficient. What made Amsterdam so long the commercial metropolis of the continent; London of all Europe; Glasgow of Scotland? Who can tell, or what sane man would have attributed either to any one cause? The advantages of New York are vast and innumerable. The most perfect local position, enormous accumulation of capital, regular packets, and ships without number, and, more than all, facilities of inland transportation, unequalled and perfect, by which goods imported there are distributed all over the United States. If New York had not a single bank, the currency of other States would accumulate there more than at any other point. I met in New York, a few days since, a friend who had gone to obtain funds to set on foot a bank in Arkansas. I asked him if he wished gold and silver. He said no; that for the greater part he preferred exchange on New York. He was right, sir; and the fact is the most conclusive refutation of all these fallacies These are means by which the trade of the South, and of much of the West, may be brought back to our own city of Charleston. But it never will be done if reliance is placed upon every new theory, more political than commercial, that is started. One, and the chief of these means is our great enterprise of communicating with the West; by that, and similar works, this, to the South, great end may be attained, and I hope and believe it will be. I hope so, sir, from every consideration of interest as well as every feeling of affection. I should love that venerable old city, if for no thing else but that it held the bones of the Rutledges, the Laurenses and the Pinckneys; and now, in her day of calamity and suffering, that feeling is almost one of devotion. But I will not support every wild and impracticable theory because I am told, on any authority, that it will benefit Charleston, when I have no shadow of doubt that the effects will be the very reverse. I called, some time since, for a report showing the receipts and expenditures in each of the States. The Secretary has not responded to the call, and I must, therefore, take the report of 1834, the last that has been made. In that the amounts received and expended, in the several States, were as follows, in round numbers:

	Collected.	Expended.
Vermont	$179,000	$2?2,000
New Hampshire	16.000	418,000
Rhode Island	119,000	381.000
Connecticut	47,000	305,000
	$361,000	$1,336,000
	Collected.	Expended.
Louisiana	1,000,000	346,000
Mississippi	1,000,000	316,000
Alabama	721,000	374,000
	$2,721,000	$1,036,000

The four New England States receive more than a million more than is collected. The three Southern States collect one million seven hundred thousand more than is re-expended. The three middle States collect two millions, and receive three. Now, sir, that the fiscal operations of the Government operate injuriously to us, I do not doubt, and have often asserted here. But, in a demand of specie for Government dues, I see only an aggravation of the evil. Whilst bank paper is the currency, and the banks pay specie, the pressure of these unequal disbursements is less severely felt. It is arranged and alleviated by the silent operations of trade and commerce. But adopt the specie system, and the specie must be transported, or kept where it is collected at an equal cost, and it cannot be evaded. Suppose there was now in Mobile a million in specie belonging to the Government, how would you use it? I have been answered in conversation, by prominent advocates of this policy, by transporting the specie. That is my opinion. If the Government does not do it, the officer or employee to whom a draft is given, or the merchant or bank into whose hands it falls will; or he will only allow the specie to remain by being paid for it. In the last five years two millions and a half have been collected in Charleston—certainly less than a million and a half paid out in the State. Suppose that amount collected in specie, and transferred, does it not unavoidably diminish our currency, not one million only, but three? For one million of specie is a safe basis for three of currency. Does it not add just that much to the currency of the place to which it is transferred? Mr. Crawford, in 1817, saw this, and saw, also, that any peculiar currency, being adopted by the Government, would tend to the advantage of that section east of this city, where Government disbursements were chiefly made; and this effect is infinitely increased when that currency is gold and silver, which is the basis of a three-fold paper currency.

Again, in New York, the money paid into the Treasury is almost immediately paid out again, and is available to pay duties twenty times in a week. Not so in Charleston; it is locked up, and only unlocked to be transferred. New York not only retains what is paid there, but much that is paid elsewhere flows into New York. Take the case, stated before, of the paymaster in Arkansas, who sells the Government draft on New York. It gets into the hands of merchants—what for? To draw the specie? No; but to pay to the importing merchant in the city. It moves there in a continual circle, and circulates like the blood, one moment in the head, the next in the feet. But as to the cities of the South, it is blood taken from the arm; and, under such a system, it is demonstrably true, that the more goods we import at the South, the worse for us—the more duties we should pay, and the more specie with drawn from us. I need not be told that such is, and always has been, the case. To a certain, but an infinitely less extent, it has. Under the system of receiving convertible bank paper, the vis medicatrix of commerce and trade has greatly diminished the injurious effects.

It has been said that the South is to be benefited by the exchange on the North being against us. How benefited? By forcing a direct trade to our own ports. This looks mightily like the tariff policy. It is certainly true, that if there was a total non-intercourse with Northern cities, the people of the South would be forced to trade at Southern seaports, and that, in proportion as impediments are thrown in the way of such intercourse, will this effect be produced. But at whose cost? At the cost of the consumer, if there is any thing true in the anti-tariff argument, that the effect of cutting off competition is to increase prices. Ask the farmer to which market he prefers that his merchant should go, to Charleston or New York? His reply will be, to that where he can lay in his goods cheapest. For he knows that the cheaper he buys, the cheaper he can sell. If he can buy as cheap in Charleston, there is no need of artificial checks to competition; if he has to pay higher prices, the consumer ultimately pays the difference. Now, sir, if any State in the South wishes to force the increase of importation in their own cities, nothing is easier. Let the Legislature provide by law to pay one-half the duties on all goods imported; my life on it, the importations there will be enormously increased, and, if I am not mistaken, at some risk of dissatisfaction when the people come to be taxed to pay the money.

The South, it is said, raises the staples which are needed in foreign markets, and has, therefore, the command of foreign specie. A greater fallacy never was uttered. We raise these staples, it is true, but they are marketable commodities, and are any body's who can pay for them. How but in cotton do we pay? How can we pay for the immense amounts which we annually purchase of Northern commodities; such articles as we are obliged to have, and which the Northern people can furnish us on better terms than any one else—negro cloth, shoes, hats, carriages, furniture; all articles of wood, leather, furs; in short, all articles of which the raw material constitutes the chief element of value? Then they have cotton as well as we have, and the same command of foreign specie as we have. Let us state a case.

A new bank is about to be established, and every body wants specie from Europe to take stock. An enterprising yankee comes to the South with a cargo of the articles I have enumerated. Has he any difficulty in obtaining our cotton? But a New York merchant wants a hundred thousand dollars in specie from England; so does a merchant of Augusta. They both have the money in bank notes of their respective cities. The New Yorker deposites his money in the Manhattan bank, goes to Augusta and sells bills at ten per cent. premium. He has then $110,000, whilst the Augusta merchant has $100,000; so that he can ship his cotton to Liverpool, and bring back his specie with the same amount with which the Augusta merchant has his cotton in the warehouse in Augusta. And this is the command of foreign specie which our staples and an adverse exchange give us—another case, I suppose, where the facts and the ory do not agree. So much the worse for the facts But, sir, I go further and do not hesitate to say that, if specie in large amounts is brought into the country, it is done exclusively at the cost of those who furnish the staples of foreign commerce. Such always has been the case, and always will be. Specie never is imported without a depression at the same time in the price of cotton. It is a melancholy instance of party infatuation to see Southern men chuckling at the importation of specie, attended, as it ever has been, by the fall of cotton. Suppose we determine on a metallic currency, or, what is equivalent, bank paper representing specie, dollar for dollar. No one will say that we have too much currency now. I think it demonstrable that we have never had enough. France, with double our population and less commerce, has eight hundred millions of dollars; and prices are not swollen in France. It is one of the cheapest countries in Europe. We, then, are entitled to four hundred millions, whilst we never have had the half of it. But, even take it at what it now is, whence is the hundred millions to come? It must come chiefly from England, our great customer. It is too manifest to need argument, that whilst the whole country receives the benefit, we pay the expense in the diminished price of our staples. England has about thirty-five millions sterling. Suppose half of that is withdrawn, will not prices fall? Cotton, with every thing else. Will not the manufacturers dismiss their workmen? cotton accumulate and demand diminish? Is not a fall in price the inevitable effect? I have no earthly doubt that it is the interest of the cotton planter that specie should be sent from this country to England, and not that it should be brought from England to this country. That we are more interested in the currency of England being abundant, than that it should be so here, for the obvious reason that the more abundant money is, the higher will prices be, and the more animated all commercial and manufacturing interests; and it is the price in England which fixes the price of cotton in this country. The fable, sir, of the boy and his goose does not represent greater folly than for a cotton planter to desire an increase of our own currency at the expense of diminishing that of England. Again, if convertible bank notes are as good as specie, there can be no reason for a discrimination. If they are not, and duties are paid in specie, and the goods sold for bank paper, the price is enhanced to the consumer to that extent. This is too obvious to need argument. Is it forgotten how fiercely, and to the last, we resisted the demand for cash duties? How near the compromise of 1832 was being defeated by the tenacity of Southern men on that ground? What was the difference between cash and credit, compared with the difference between specie and bank paper? Specie is to be imported, and can only be paid for in our own staples. It will not be pretended that the same cotton will procure both specie and merchandise. If specie come, merchandise cannot; and we are forced to buy articles of American manufacture at an enhanced price, at the same time that there is a deficiency of revenue from a diminished importation.

But, sir, this idea of receiving payment for our staples in gold and silver is not a new one. It has been advanced before, and scouted by Southern statesmen as an impracticable absurdity; literally trampled into the earth. Strange that Southern men should be the first to take it up out of the dust. If, sir, I have not been in error as to all the principles of trade and political economy, it is of infinitely more importance to the Southern planter that there should be large importations, than it is at what particular point those importations shall be made. I have always believed, and now do, that a nation cannot, for any length of time, import more than it exports, nor export more than it imports; that all commerce is an exchange of equivalents; that the larger the amount imported, the greater the necessity of equivalent exports; and, of consequence, the higher the prices of the articles exported, and the greater demand for them in foreign countries, from an increased ability to pay for them; and that, of necessary consequence, all impediments on foreign commerce are at the expense of those who furnish the articles for that commerce.

Believing all this, sir, I look with anxiety and alarm to the consequences. The countries of Europe are obliged to have cotton, it is true, but they are not obliged to have ours. It becomes us to look well to the consequences before we make it necessary for our customers to look elsewhere, by putting it beyond their power to buy of us. In the now trembling balance of demand and supply of that great staple, we should be cautious how we throw the weight of a feather in the adverse scale. No commercial event in the history of the world has produced such consequences as would the destruction of the value, or that great reduction in the price of cotton which a large surplus would cause.

In conclusion, sir, allow me to say, that, in all respect for distinguished men who differ with me, I cannot look at the great changes in our fiscal, monetary, and commercial systems, of which I regard the present measure as an important part, in any other light than as injurious to the whole country, and especially to the South; and that, if adopted, when it is too late, that section in particular will repent the infatuation, and, with emaciated frame and limbs stiffened by the long paralysis, will awaken to curse the illusion.

I take this occasion to say, that, in the course which I have felt it my duty to take upon this subject, I have been influenced by no vain-glorious confidence in my own judgment, still less by an ostentation of firmness in opposing what is supposed to be the opinion of the State. No, sir, no. I value my seat on this floor very little, indeed; but I do value, above all earthly honors, the confidence and approbation of those who sent me here; and I declare, in all truth and sincerity, that the loss of these would not be compensated by the approval of the world besides. My relation to my constituents is not the ordinary one of constituent and representative. But, sir, I should be unworthy to represent them, if I could hesitate one moment in choosing whether I should sacrifice their interest, and my own firm and clear conviction of duty, or their approbation and confidence, highly as I value them. Constrained to take the course which I have, it was due to my constituents that I should present fully the reasons that have influenced me. I sincerely thank the committee for the opportunity it has given me of doing so.

REMARKS OF MR. JOHNSON, OF MARYLAND.

In the House of Representatives, May 12, 1838—On the Treasury Note Bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON having moved an amendment to the Treasury note bill, proposing to substitute a provision authorizing a loan for the provision authorizing the issue of Treasury notes—the hour being late, and the Committee of the Whole refusing motions to rise—

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON said that he did not rise for the purpose of entering upon the general discussion of the bill under consideration, and the various amendments which have been offered. He would not think of doing so at that late hour of the night. Nor would he feel authorized in doing so at any subsequent stage of this discussion, until those members who had not spoken during the extra session, or this, upon the various financial schemes, had an opportunity of giving their views, as he knew that there were many who were anxious to discuss the subject. His purpose was to urge upon the majority, who had so often voted down motions for the committee to rise, with leave to sit again, the propriety of an adjournment. He had heard no argument urged sufficiently strong to convince him that this House should spend but a day and a half in examining a bill which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue another ten millions of Government paper—irredeemable post notes. It was a grave subject, involving the whole financial policy of the nation, and operated immediately or remotely upon not only the interest of every State, but upon the welfare of almost every individual in the nation. It should be cautiously and wisely examined. Amid all the confusion and excitement of this late night session, it was impossible to carefully and cautiously examine the bill and the amendments offered.

But we are told [said Mr. J.] that the bill must be passed to-night, for the Treasury is empty, and the public creditors, yes, the officers of Government, are striking loudly at the Treasury door, and the sound will reverberate in this Hall. He would say, let them strike. The people require relief, and they were first in his contemplation. Pass "my bill" for eight hundred thousand pounds "to-morrow," said Henry the Eighth to Edward Montague, of the House of Commons, "or else to-morrow this head of yours will be off." The day for such logic has passed. The people have made this House not to be the quiet recording office of Executive edicts, but the purse holding as well as the purse creating power of Government, in which all money-measures shall originate. And it was their design that they should be fully and fearlessly discussed. Obey the Constitution and ask for a loan, and all sides of this House will respond favorably to it, though they may grieve at the prodigality or bad management which has brought us to such a crisis.

Where was the plan of relief for the people? When it was for the country he would rejoice in supporting it. These Treasury notes had not yet reached the pockets of his constituents, although ten millions had been issued. If any had been in his district, they had found no abiding place there; they had only passed through it in the pockets of a few travellers, or in transitu with members of Congress. He would never vote for any means of revenue or currency that would not enter into the circulation of the interior of the country, into the business transactions of the farmers, the mechanics, and the retail merchants. His district was agricultural, and to that interest he turned his thoughts most anxiously, and responded to the sentiments of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON] He looked to it, and not at the officers of Government, whether high or low. They had a happy facility of getting along very profitably with slight aid from Congress, at least a certain class of them, who were skilled in reading in the distance the signs in the horizon. He meant no reflections upon the upright and faithful, those who regarded themselves as stewards of the general weal.

Members who doubt the wisdom of these new-invented experiments are denounced as bank agents. He was for a National Bank, most true, chartered upon safe and salutary principles; and it was a severe reflection on Congress, if it had not wisdom enough to frame a charter that would prevent a Bank from being an instrument of evil; and the sagacity of Congress was limited, indeed, if it could not frame one to be an institution for salutary and beneficial purposes. It was narrow reasoning to argue against any institution that in possibility it might do evil. The same reasoning might be urged to abolish Congress; for Congress may do evil. It may levy onerous taxes; yet would you, for that reason, take from it the power to levy taxes? A degree of confidence, as well as a degree of discretion, must be tolerated, or all human institutions must be abolished. Bad as human nature is, he believed that its good traits preponderated over its evil propensities.

He would not discuss the subject of a fixed policy of finance at this time.

There was but one bank in his district; its capital did not, he believed, exceed one hundred thousand dollars. It was well conducted, and he never heard any individual complain of either its officers or its mode of doing business. He thought banks necessary, and would be the last to wage a general and indiscriminate war against them. He would perhaps take some more suitable occasion, at least one more congenial with his feelings, to trespass upon the time of the House. His object was to urge an adjournment.

The committee must well remember the expectation awakened by the chairman of the financial committee, when he moved, upon one occasion, to lay aside the duelling report in order to take up this Treasury note bill; that he stated that there would be a full discussion upon it. Can it have been forgotten that, in making his long and elaborate opening speech, but yesterday, he boldly threw the gauntlet of defiance, and fully challenged debate upon the financial schemes of the Executive, in which he has so largely participated? After all this gallant display, will you shrink from scrutiny?

The honorable chairman has been adroit and skilful. An appropriation bill was hurried through, but a short time ago, upon the ground that the public exigencies required its immediate passage. It slumbered long in the Senate; and why? Because, as was admitted, there was no money in the Treasury. Now, this bill, which should have preceded that, was kept in its rear, because, forsooth, you must now carry this through by storm to give the other effect. And thus bills which lavish or create millions are to be smuggled through both Houses, and both Houses are to be muzzled; and if a member has the audacity to question their wisdom, he is to be denounced. If such things are tolerated, the days of dictatorship and passive obedience are truly at hand.

You mistake the people, if you suppose that they will censure those who ask and demand a full investigation of the financial policy of the Government. They will censure and distrust those who shrink from it. There is no law of human nature more certain. These financial schemes reach, in their operation, the most remote and hidden fibres of society; and every man in the nation has felt the pressure, and looks to Congress for some mode of amelioration—some general system of redress. They do not want to see a Treasury bank, to coin large notes which they never see, much less possess; nor Sub-Treasuries, with their swarms of receivers general, and such dignitaries, who are to fatten on the hard earnings of the plain, unpretending, and industrious.

They do not desire to see the Government separated from the people, and the public servants made proudly superior to their masters. He knows but little of the human heart who believes the people will tolerate it with complacency. He has wrongly studied the American character if he believes that the people of this nation will endure it.

Mr. J. was anxious to see the committee rise, and report progress, and have the amendments pending printed. He was desirous to see a vote taken upon each amendment proposed. But he felt fully assured in saying that if the committee reported the bill to the House that night, without having leave to sit again, no vote would be taken on the amendments; the same vote that would refuse an adjournment would sustain the previous question. It was, he expected, in the recollection of many members of the committee, that, during the extra session, he had moved an amendment to the Treasury note bill late one night, about 12 o'clock, to limit the time of issuing Treasury notes; he supported it, with his reasons for offering it. Upon the vote on his amendment, it was lost in the committee by six votes, upon a division. The next day a gentleman from New York, now in his eye, [Mr. BRONSON,] picked up his amendment in the House, and offered it, and it passed almost unanimously. Then one night's meditation, or sleep, effected a wonderful change. [Mr. BRONSON said it was true he had offered the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, but he had given notice, in Committee of the Whole, that he should do so.]

Mr. JOHNSON said that he did not allude to it in unkindness, and was not annoyed in the least that his name did not appear on the journal. It was for a different purpose that he alluded to it. He would say, however, that he had also given notice that he would renew his motion: he had been urged by the very gentleman to do so, which that gentleman must recollect, unless he has a lapse of memory. He had in the House repeatedly tried to gain the floor for that purpose; but the Speaker's eyes but seldom cheered the dark side of the House where his seat was.

The gentleman from New York no doubt thought, with many of his friends, that all that they had promised would be realized. That the issue of the ten millions, authorized by the extra session, would relieve the Treasury and the people, and that there would be no repetition of the request for another issue of ten millions; that that issue would be the first and the last. In this expectation he thought, at the time, the honorable member would be disappointed. He had no doubt at that time that the gentleman from New York would be found, like Shakspeare's woodcock, "caught in his own spring:" that he would be forced to vote against the amendment of which he made himself the putative author.

Mr. J's purpose was widely different in moving that amendment in the committee. He saw, or thought he saw, a power behind the throne, half veiled, half disclosed, that looked with anxious eye and open hand at the trembling sceptre, and anxious to seize it; and, to achieve such a purpose, was desirous to build up a vast Executive paper bank on the ruins of the late monster bank; to build up a vast political machine, bottomed on a consolidated Executive issue; yes, sir, a monster more hideous than any to be read of in prophets' vision.

What he had heard in the other end of the Capitol, after what he read in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of this session, he was convinced that his early impressions were correct. The Secretary asks, upon contingencies and emergencies, to be allowed to extend the issues Such is the cautious language: he to be the sole judge. The plain English of all is, to give him the power to judge of the amount, time, and circumstances, to gradually and progressively establish an Executive bank to issue a new sort of continental paper money.

It was to avoid such a national calamity that he was induced to urge the amendment he did.

In further proof, it was not until yesterday that the chairman moved an amendment, limiting the time for the proposed issue. It was not until he discovered that, without it, his bill would fail. It was then he adopted Sancho's philosophy, that half a loaf was better than no bread, and concluded to do himself, with good grace, what he would be forced to submit to.

Of all the national calamities he would most deplore, the one which he would most strive against would be to see the whole power over money, exchange, State banks, and commerce, swallowed up and devoured by the monster of an Executive bank. And this vast machine in the hands of the most knowing—Mr. Levi Woodbury.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if you were to give him the power to establish a paper mill and a reservoir of ink by the side of his office, to make paper money at will, he would then have to call on Congress every year to enlarge his discretion and power. Mr. J. had no confidence in his Treasury notes, his Treasury circulars, his specie circulars, nor his Treasury orders; they change as quick as the chameleon, and are as vacillating as the wind. His folly has brought the indigent to ruin, and the wealthy to want; and yet we are called on to trust to this most sapient counsellor.

Here Mr. JOHNSON gave way to Mr. CHAMBERS, who moved that the committee should rise: ayes 89, noes 89.

The CHAIR announced that the majority have it. There was a great noise and confusion. Some voice asked the CHAIR if it had voted? He said no. The CHAIR then voted in the negative.

Mr. J. was about resuming, when Mr. ROBERTSON rose to a point of order. Mr. R. said that after the CHAIR had decided the motion to adjourn, it could not vote. There was too much confusion to hear.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DUNCAN, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. ROBERTSON spoke. There were many cries of question, and the CHAIR was propounding the question, if the committee would rise, when

Mr. JOHNSON again rose and said that he demanded to know if he was not entitled to the floor, as he had only yielded it to a privileged question.

The CHAIR said he had a right to proceed. (Great noise.)

Mr. J. said that he believed that the chairman was a member of the Naval Committee, and would most respectfully ask him if he had ever ascended from the Chesapeake, the Potomac, which, from the Indian, means the river of swans, in one of Fulton's magnificent steamboats. The prospect is beautiful: you see not only one of the most beautiful streams in the world, but the scenery is picturesque and delightful. When on deck, you perceive a most strange optical delusion: a promontory of land projecting far into the river, and reaching almost on the opposite bank to an acute point. You wonder how a steamer can pass it; but, as you near it, you find this seeming acute angle rounding gradually and most gracefully, and really exhibiting no point at all. This promontory, like the point started, but not raised, by your decision, is called, by mariners, Point No Point. We have, said Mr. J. on the Potomac, as many curious points as those started, and as often strangely decided, in this House. In the language of the river melody, there is

Point Look Out,
Point Look In,
Point No Point, And Point Again.

Then you have decided that we have just had point no point: when we shall have point again, was not for him to determine. He would say, however, that he had no doubt that the gentleman from Virginia was correct, and the CHAIR was wrong; but he would yield to the decision of the CHAIR, as he had often perceived that there were gentlemen who were under the influence, occasionally, of either optical or mental delusions, and would leave it to others to decide, amid the noise and the glimmering lights of this Hall, which may have influenced the CHAIR or others. But this was not germain to the subject, or to his purpose.

He would ask the committee, in all candor, if it was wise to legislate amid the restive and anxious feeling which has been so often manifested? Was it not due to common courtesy for the majority to yield to the urgent feelings of the minority?—a majority not only strong in number, but powerful in talent—a minority that could suspend all action of the committee by retiring, and destroying thereby a quorum. He would not advise the minority to retire, but he would say that when the hour hand and the minute hand joined at the figure twelve, he would retire to his chamber. He would not join further in the contest, to see if we could wear out the political or the physical constitution the fastest. He would not spend the Sabbath in inquiring if Government paper money was a curse or a national blessing. His reading and reflections of the past had informed him that Government issues of paper had always resulted in injurious consequences. The Royal Bank of France, the Government paper issues of Austria and Russia, all proved it. The history of our own country, the history of bills of credit—and your Treasury notes are nothing more, though technical lawyers may discover a distinction without a difference—from the time they were first issued by Massachusetts, in 1690, by New York, South Carolina, and the other colonies, by the Revolutionary Congress, in the form of redeemable continental paper, to the present time, have always proved ruinous. And yet you will not stop to deliberate, and to pause, and to counsel, on such grave questions, which have such immense consequences in their result. To doubt, is to be accused of suspicion unworthy; to oppose, is to be denounced.

He would ask, in candor, if there was not too much of partisan feeling worked up in these serious national questions. Questions of currency should be divested of all such considerations. For one, he grieved at the strong fanaticism of party which had so long existed in this country. No public man, who was not ultra on the one side or the other, could receive the confidence of any large portion of the people. For himself, he cared not for political results, and would freely avow that he always looked with distrust upon any party in power, in either State or National Government.

The proscriptive feeling of both parties was but a modified form of that crusade which drove half of Europe to lose its best blood on the dry sands of Asia. Under other forms, it exists in this country. It is that which makes many women in one portion of this Union unsex themselves, to mingle in political questions; which makes both of the two strong parties in this country cordially dislike, and bitterly persecute, every high-minded man who will not be as rancorous as themselves; that makes a gentleman, who boldly throws himself upon his pride of feeling, and stands upon his Americanism, and deigns to think and to act for himself, at once placed between the cross-fire of both parties, and denounced by each. The very man who most deserves the confidence of the people, is the last, too often, to gain it; whilst a time serving politician, who is sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other, the loudest wherever he is to be found, is called a patriot, and the most to be caressed by each, and the first to be honored and promoted.

Let the timid and ambitious adopt their own course; he would commend the sentiment of his friend from South Carolina, [Gen. THOMPSON;] do as one's conscience and judgment approves, and trust to the good sense of an honest and high-minded constituency. For himself, he would not desire a seat in Congress, if he was to be muzzled and handcuffed. He would not submit himself to the debasement for the honor of the place.

But he had already said more than twice as much as he had intended when he rose; and would conclude by saying that the committee might force the question that night, but it would be difficult for it to coerce the people into an acquiescence of either its policy or its justice.

REMARKS OF MR. HARPER, OF OHIO,

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Mr. HARPER, of Ohio, next rose and said:

Mr. Chairman. In rising to address you on the subject under consideration, I am not actuated by a desire to embarrass the Administration in obtaining the necessary supplies to enable it to fulfil all its engagements. Heretofore, I have deemed it my duty, and believed it would best subserve the interests of those whom I represent on this floor, to hear, rather than to speak, to listen to the voice of experience and wisdom, and not to delay the action of this branch of the National Legislature, by obtruding upon it any remarks of mine, in disposing of the numerous and important subjects, of both a public and private character, which, in my estimation, demand a prompt decision. It is true, sir, I was well aware it was my privilege; but never, until this moment, did I consider it my duty. Sir, I presume there is no doubt that the public coffers are empty, or nearly so, and, for one, I am willing to aid in replenishing them; but I desire to know why this indecent haste. This bill was taken up for consideration yesterday, for the first time. It provides for issuing ten millions of Treasury notes, at least, and as I shall undertake to show, by and by, for a sum greatly beyond that amount, if, at any time hereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury stands, or thinks he stands, in need of them. Why, sir, one would think the magnitude of the sum demanded, to say nothing of the great principle involved in this measure, would be an admonition to us all to pause and reflect; but not so, the indications are not to be mistaken. Indeed, it is unblushingly avowed that this night, the last of the week, and almost the last hour of the night, this bill must be passed through the Committee of the Whole, and be reported to the House. Mr. Chairman, you must have observed that, in relation to other subjects, from the commencement of the present session until yesterday, whether important or unimportant in principle or amount, (those which were supposed to be connected with the party politics of the day excepted,) they received a calm and patient investigation. All must remember the time occupied on the question whether it was proper to allow interest on certain claims due by the Government for Revolutionary services. But there is a more recent and notable instance. The select committee charged with inquiring and reporting to the House the cause of the death of the Hon. Mr. Cilley had performed that duty; and the chairman had, on behalf of a majority, presented to the House the result of their "labor of love," in the shape of a report, or, as it has been said by some, an argument. Days, nay, weeks, were employed in the discussion of the question of printing that report. The question was admitted by all to be an important one; it was one of privilege, affecting every member on this floor, and more immediately the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, the survivor in that unfortunate affair, and those whom he represented. It is true, some were malicious enough to say that that report was looked to as likely to stay the political tempest which at the time was sweeping over the land. And, sir, you know that, however desirable the supplies of money may be to the Administration, yet it stood in great need of political capital; it wanted men as well as money; and hence the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] although he did, on one or two occasions, observe that he should be compelled to move for a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up this bill, yet with what Christian meekness he submitted to his fate when that motion was made and did not succeed! And, sir, had it not been for the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. SIBLEY,] the object of which was to have the names "of all who were present, aiding or abetting in that unfortunate transaction, presented to this House," the discussion might, for aught I know, be in progress at this hour. The fluttering produced by that motion in a certain quarter was obvious, and resulted in laying the subject on the table. How long it will sleep there, will be for the party to whom the gentleman belongs to determine. Other instances might be cited, in which questions received, as they deserved, the free and dispassionate consideration of the House; yet, important as they were, they were but as dust in the balance, in comparison with the question under consideration.

Yet, sir, this question is to be pressed to a final decision this night, and not a single hour is to be allowed for reflection, notwithstanding the numerous amendments offered by honorable gentlemen, all of them important and well worthy of consideration; the last of which, proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr STUART,] has not been an hour in the possession of the committee. It has been considered heretofore that the Constitution of the United States, in virtue of the provisions of which we are here assembled, secured to us and conferred upon us all the powers of a deliberative body; and such has been the practice heretofore, until within some years past; but now you are to act, not deliberate. Here is a bill proposing to tax the people ten millions of dollars by the issue of Treasury notes to that amount; a loan on the part of the Government to supply its ordinary expenditures; yes, sir, a loan, disguise it as you may; and we, the representatives of the people, are not to be allowed the poor privilege of comparing this bill with the amendments which have been or may be proposed to it, and deciding which will be the best mode of supplying the wants of the Government, and at the same time the least onerous and burdensome to the people. No; we are told we must pass this bill as it is; we must, as was said on another occasion by the chairman of the Ways and Means, "toe the mark;" "now is the day and now the hour." This bill must pass, at this time, for the precise amount of ten millions of dollars; and those dollars to be in Treasury notes, and nothing else. Yes, sir, the term "must" has been employed; this term grated on my ear; it is the language of a superior to an inferior. Here, or elsewhere, I permit no man to assume the superiority over me. I submit to no dictation from any quarter, nor shall the freemen whom I represent be degraded, through me, by an acquiescence on my part in this assumed superiority. To those who are friendly to this measure, deliberation is doubtless unnecessary; they do not act on their own volition; there is a mind and an impulse elsewhere, which directs all their movements. Happy state of apathy and irresponsibility! With me it is otherwise. I cannot consult with those whose interests I am bound to protect. I desire, therefore, a short time for deliberation, that I may examine the various propositions before the committee, that I may give my support to the one which, in my opinion, will most promote the interests of the people.

The pertinacity with which the chairman of the Ways and Means adheres to this particular mode of furnishing supplies for the wants of the Government is to me most extraordinary; it cannot surely be from mere pride of opinion. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] thinks it is; and that as Dr. Sangrado wrote a book to prove the great utility of warm water and depletion in the cure of all manner of diseases, so the Administration, having, at the last and present session been in favor of this particular mode of supplying the wants of the Treasury, are determined to adhere to it, regardless of its propriety as a financial measure, or its effects on the great interests of the country. Mr. Chairman, I cannot but think that there are other and more powerful reasons influencing the friends of this measure than pride of opinion. The Administration has been repeatedly charged, and I am not aware that the charge has been denied, with a desire to establish a Treasury bank. Pass this bill, and the first step, which is always the most important, will have been taken. In proof that such is the design, I beg leave to call your attention to the annual message of the late President of the United States to Congress, in December, 1830. In speaking of the propriety of rechartering the Bank of the United States, he says:

"Nothing has occurred to lessen, in any degree, the dangers which many of our citizens apprehended from that institution as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present Bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified as to obviate constitutional and other objections. It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based upon the public and individual deposites, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the Government; and the expense of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium."

From the period when this message was delivered until the close of the late Administration, whenever allusion was made by the late President of the United States, in his intercourse with Congress, in relation to this subject, the same doctrine was inculcated. Well, sir, the present Executive, prior to his election, declared that, should he be so fortunate as to be elected President, his highest ambition would be to be the honored instrument of carrying out the great principles of his illustrious predecessor, and "walking generally in his footsteps;" and the very first step taken by him was in strict compliance with this promise. When we assembled here at the last or extra session, as it is sometimes called, for the purpose, and no other, as we were told, of providing supplies for the wants of the Government, one of the means recommended by the President in his message, to effect that object, was by the issue of Treasury notes. He says:

"It is not proposed to procure the required amount by loans or increased taxation. There are now in the Treasury nine million three hundred and sixty seven thousand two hundred and fourteen dollars, directed by the act of the 23d June, 1836, to be deposited with the States in October next. This sum, if so deposited, will be subject, under the law, to be recalled, if needed to defray existing appropriations; and as it is now evident that the whole, or the principal part of it, will be wanted for that purpose, it appears most proper that the deposite should be withheld. Until the amount can be collected from the banks, Treasury notes may be temporarily issued, to be gradually redeemed as it is received."

It is true, the President is not very specific on this subject; he was too much engrossed in discoursing about banks and bank paper, about the constitutional currency, the transfer and safe-keeping of the public money, and that great and "crowning mercy," the divorce of Bank and State, and the establishment of the Sub-Treasury scheme. But, sir, his Secretary of the Treasury was more communicative in his report accompanying the message of the President. He is quite explicit. Speaking of the means best adapted to supplying the wants of the Treasury, he says:

"One would be, to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, receivable for all public dues, but without interest. These would differ from the drafts or checks now in use, only as the latter are given for immediate payment, and drawn on persons or banks having public money sufficient to meet them, and, consequently, the holders must be exposed to the trouble and expense of presenting them at the places where payable; still they are nearly on a par with specie. In the present deranged state of bank paper and exchange, and in the favorable condition of the General Government, by its ample resources and exemption from pecuniary liabilities, to impart the greatest confidence in respect to the redemption of such notes, it is probable that they would readily be taken at par by most of the public creditors. Especially would this be likely to happen provided they were issued in denominations as low as twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars."

In accordance with the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, Congress passed the act of the 12th of October, 1837, authorizing the emission of ten millions of Treasury notes. The measure was adopted with great reluctance by many, as they asserted at the time, and many were the protestations, publicly and privately, then, and such has been the case at the present session, that never would they again sanction another emission of Treasury notes. The excuse for resorting to this unusual mode of replenishing the Treasury at that time was, that there existed a great pressure in the trade and commerce of the country, produced by what was called revulsion in trade, and the suspension of specie payments by the banks. That this state of things would be of short duration, as the causes were temporary which produced it, so a temporary relief to the Treasury, by authorizing the issuing of ten millions of dollars of Treasury notes, would relieve it of all embarrassment; and thereafter the Government would resort to the usual mode of raising money to supply the wants of the Treasury. But, sir, it seems that this method of raising the supplies is to be the settled policy of the Administration; that a Treasury bank in fact, whatever it may be in name, is to be established. You doubtless remember that the bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, at the last session of Congress, contained no limitation as to the time in which the notes should be issued, nor did it contain any provision for cancelling them after they should be returned to the Treasury. The proviso to the 12th section, which provides for this object, was adopted by the House, on the motion of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SOUTHGATE.] But for this proviso, the notes might, and no doubt would, have been reissued; so that, instead of furnishing the Government with supplies to the amount of ten millions, a grant, in effect, would have been made of thirty or forty millions; the amount depending, alone, on the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Had the bill passed without the proviso, does any man believe we should be called on at this time for an additional ten millions? I, for one, do not. The Treasury would, in that event, have been as independent of Congress as it desires to be of the people.

Well, sir, the bill on your table provides for issuing ten millions of Treasury notes, in pursuance of the act of the 12th of October, 1837; but it does not provide that, when received in payment by the Treasury, they shall be cancelled, in pursuance of the provision of that act. On the contrary, it is avowed that it is intended they shall be reissued, if, in the opinion of the Treasury Department, it shall be necessary so to do. Indeed, the President, in his recent message on this subject, says:

"The principal difficulty arises from a prohibition in the present law to reissue such Treasury notes as might be paid in before they fall due, and may be effectually obviated by giving the Treasury during the whole year the benefit of the full amount originally authorized; the remedy would seem to be obvious and easy."

And the Secretary in his communication accompanying that message, reiterates substantially the same thing. Here, then, we have a Treasury bank, established by a bill not containing as many lines as it grants millions of capital.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country are not yet prepared for this additional experiment. They have not forgotten that in the early history of our country, when we were engaged in the doubtful but glorious struggle for liberty and independence, with a gallant and powerful nation, the Congress of that day was compelled to resort to continental money to supply the wants of an exhausted Treasury. Even then it was done with reluctance. What excuse can now be given to the people for resorting to the same means for the same purpose? I am not to be told that, inasmuch as we are now a more numerous and powerful people, possessed of boundless resources, vigorous and enterprising, at peace with the whole world, and the Government of that period was engaged in war, the people few in number, and their limited resources dried up by the vicissitudes incident to that state of things, it is, therefore, proper now, as it was indispensable then. This answer, sir, will not satisfy the country. The people will see that now, as then, the Government has resorted to a paper currency, founded on no capital other than its credit; and the recent discovery, promulgated for the first time in another part of this Capitol, that a paper currency, founded on the credit and resources of the Government, was superior to that supported by actual capital, and convertible into specie at any time at the pleasure of the holder, has not, so far as I know, met with a favorable response from any quarter. It is a financial heresy, whose author, for the sake of being thought original, has in this respect rendered himself ridiculous. The history of the country furnishes no example of a resort to Treasury notes for the purposes of the Government, except in times of war, and then only when all other means of supplying the Treasury had failed. But now, in a period of profound peace, with all the elements of prosperity scattered around us in rich profusion, this system is attempted to be fastened on the country, not as a temporary measure, but one permanent in its character. For the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has informed us that it is not expected that the revenue derived from the usual and ordinary sources will, for the ensuing three or four years, be sufficient to defray the ordinary expenditures of the Government; and thus, with the ten millions granted by the bill on your table, with the liberty to reissue it at pleasure, to say nothing of the calls that may hereafter be made on Congress for a similar purpose, or for laws to enable the Department to carry those already enacted into effect, you have a great Treasury or Government bank; ay, sir, a very monster, under the sole control of the President, to be managed and directed by him alone; a great continental paper factory, in comparison of whose power and influence all the banks in this Union, great and small, and of the dangerous tendencies of which so much has recently been "said or sung," are but molehills to a mountain.

Mr. Chairman, it is admitted on all hands that the act of the 12th of October last, and the bill now under consideration, provide in effect for a loan; that is, they create a national debt to the amount of Treasury notes issued and to be reissued under their provisions. If this be so, and no man can deny it, why not have recourse to a loan at once? Why resort to the pitiful subterfuge of calling this "A bill to carry into effect an act, approved the 12th day of October, 1837," "to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes?" Why not deal fairly with the people, and not have recourse to deception, to indirection, and urge that this bill is necessary to carry into effect the act of the 12th of October last? That law is perfect in all its parts, susceptible of being carried into full and entire effect; indeed, the difficulty appears to be that, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, its provisions have been carried into effect too soon. Resort, then, sir, to a loan at once; create a national debt directly, and not by this indirection; meet the crisis like men; do not permit a false delicacy to prevent you from presenting to the people a full and fair account of your stewardship. It is due to them, for this Government is theirs; the debt you are about to incur will be their debt, and they will have it to pay; ay, and what does not always seem present to the minds of gentlemen, we are the people's servants, not their masters. Go, then, to the people, and state to them frankly the wretched and bankrupt condition of the National Treasury; let them see how, in a few short years, the country, from a high and palmy state of prosperity, has been reduced to comparative bankruptcy, the channels of their prosperity dried up, and the bright and joyous expectation of procuring a competency, at least, if not wealth, for themselves and for their children, changed into doubt and uncertainty as to the future, if not into absolute and hopeless despair; present to them your empty coffers, and say to them, we desire to fill them with Treasury notes. Yes, sir, these very coffers, which you were told and taught to believe, for some years past, were to be filled to overflowing with gold and silver, are to be the receptacles of Treasury notes only; or, in other words, continental money—yes, I repeat, continental money, for such it is, in principle, beyond dispute; and the fact that because of the ability of the Government to pay, so that they may not depreciate, as did those issued during the war of Revolution, can make no difference. Say to them, also, that the expenditures of the present year are estimated at not less than thirty-seven millions of dollars, and that the revenue expected to be derived from all the sources heretofore relied on for that purpose will not exceed twelve or fourteen millions; that that sum would have been sufficient to defray all the expenses of the Government ten years ago; that, by some mysterious operation of the promised retrenchment and reform, the promise works practically in an inverse ratio, increasing the expense of the civil list in that short period of time near threefold; and the amount that may be wanted over the amount received is to be supplied by issuing and reissuing Treasury notes. Well, sir, this disclosure, brief and imperfect as it is, may excite some surprise; nevertheless, my life for it, the people will cheerfully grant you any sum that may be necessary to preserve the faith of the Government, and enable it to discharge the just claims of all its creditors; they will not stop to inquire who brought about the present state of things, nor who at present administers the affairs of the nation; they will reflect that it is their country, and, being so, "with all its faults, they will love it still."

But, sir, they will demand, and I, a representative of a portion of the people, here in my place, demand in their behalf, that there shall be presented to us here a clear and explicit statement, not only of the wants of the Government, but particularly of all the means in its power which may be applicable to the supply of those wants. In England, the Chancellor of the Exchequer presents his budget, containing a clear and succinct statement of the amount required for the support of the Government, and likewise all the sources from which he proposes to raise the required sum, "to his Majesty's faithful Commons;" and they are free to choose as to the amount granted, as well as the means of supplying that grant; nor could that minister be sustained an hour who would undertake to invade that right, and dictate to the representatives of the people the manner in which the supplies should be raised. And shall we, representatives of the freest people upon earth, (we are so at least in theory, whatever may be our situation practically,) yield a power conferred on us alone by the Constitution; transfer the purse-strings of the nation, which, by that Constitution, are placed exclusively in our hands, to any other department of the Government? I, for one, will never consent to do so; purpose your loan, sir; the proposition shall have my support, rather than the bill on your table. The creation of a national debt appears to be inevitable; let be done, then, in the way most likely to benefit the country; or, rather, in the way most likely to be the least burdensome to the people; but this direct method meets with no favor from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and those who act with him here; they say there is nothing in this world "like parmaceti, 'tis the sovereignest thing on earth for an inward bruise;" nothing like Treasury notes, paper money. This is the medicine which is to eradicate all the diseases of the body politic; it will replenish the Treasury; and as for the trade and business of the country, they are to be left to take care of themselves. "The people are in the habit of expecting too much from the Government." Rather than adopt this system as a permanent one, and I have shown that it is the intention of its friends to make it so, you had better have recourse to a direct tax, to meet the present pressing emergency; that plan would be less insidious than the one under consideration; it would have the merit of being, what is exceedingly rare these times, open and undisguised; and it would have this additional claim to consideration: it would fairly test the correctness of a new maxim in political economy; that is, "that it is the producer, and not the consumer, that pays all the taxes in this country." Besides, the committee would doubtless be charmed with the eloquence of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] on this subject, and the public opinion enlightened and corrected on this very interesting question; moreover, the people would then know the precise amount of taxes paid by them for the support of the Government, and would hold those who administered it to a strict account in their expenditures. But, sir, if it should be thought that the country has been sufficiently afflicted already with experiments, and it would therefore be unwise to try a new one, why not, as I have already said, authorize a loan? It can be obtained on favorable terms, and in "the constitutional currency;" you need not receive it in "bank rags," and thereby subject yourself to the odious appellation of "rag baron," but in gold and silver, the great increase of which, in most of our commercial cities, within a short time, is matter of public notoriety. This mode of raising supplies is not new in the history of the country; it has been adopted by almost every Administration, and always, heretofore, in preference to issuing Treasury notes; and surely the present Chief Magistrate cannot consider it degrading to follow the example of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. By so doing you will increase the circulating medium by the amount borrowed and paid out to the creditors of the Government; it would find its way into all the channels of trade and industry, and exercise an important influence in stimulating the one, and rewarding the other.

But, sir, there is still another mode by which the wants of the Treasury may be supplied, at least for the present; adopt the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STUART;] he proposes to authorize you to issue two millions of Treasury notes, as a present relief; and, if that shall be found insufficient to enable the Government to discharge its responsibilities, to borrow, from time to time, such sums as may be necessary for that purpose. Do this; pass the bill on your table from the Senate, providing for the sale of four millions of the bonds due from the Bank of the United States; by so doing you will effect a two-fold object: you will obtain money, and what, in the estimation of some gentlemen, is of much more importance, you will have so far obtained a divorce between Bank and State. Do more: call upon the numerous defaulters to the Government, as well those who are in, as those who are out of office, and, as I shall show by and by, have in their possession a sum not less than six millions of dollars; from this source you may realize something; it is not probable it will be much; be it more or less, we are entitled to it. The propriety of this course is to my mind obvious; it is what every prudent man would do in his own case; and what is wise in an individual cannot be unwise in the Government; in regard to this question.

Sir, the people whom I represent have a deep interest in this question. Although they reside in the interior, they are nevertheless extensively engaged in trade, manufactures, and the mechanical arts, as well as in agriculture. By their indomitable perseverance, industry, and enterprise, they have hitherto been highly prosperous; but they, in common with the whole country, are experiencing at this time the effects of the series of experiments which have been in progress for some years past, in the disordered state of the currency and exchanges, in the reduced price of their agricultural productions, and the prostration of confidence and credit. Their progress, however, has only been impeded, not stopped; and they look forward with confidence to the period when experiments will cease. Sir, the bill on your table cannot produce any such results, nor is it pretended that it will. Your Treasury notes cannot pass into general circulation. Their circulation will be limited to the narrow circle of the commercial cities. They will travel from the Treasury Department to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and back again; they will be received in payment of the customs and public lands; and thus a currency is established for the Government and its creditors alone, and in which the great body of the people can have no participation. It will not stop to inquire into the constitutionality of such a measure; it is sufficient for my purpose that it is partial, and therefore unjust. The people of the West have already suffered greatly by the operation of the Treasury circular, which has been in force something less than two years. They have been compelled to obtain specie to pay for the lands they purchased, at a high premium, when, at the same time, other debtors—those, for instance, who owed the Government for duties—could make payment in the ordinary circulating medium. This distinction is odious enough; but it seems there is to be, in effect, an additional one, by the passage of this bill. Your Treasury notes may be obtained by those who are indebted to your custom-houses, but not by those who want to purchase lands. They will not be found in the West. And I venture the assertion, that not one man in a thousand, in that quarter of the Union, has ever owned one, if, indeed, his eyes have ever been blessed by the sight of one.

Mr. Chairman, the country has for years past been taught to believe, by those who spoke, or professed to speak, for the Administration, that this was a hard money Government; that gold and silver was the only currency recognised by the Constitution, and that the hands of the people ought no longer to be soiled by coming in contact with bank paper. Indeed, the precise period when this golden age would commence, was confidently predicted. You will remember, sir, no doubt, what glittering visions were presented to the imagination of the people. Silken purses, filled with "mint drops" and "yellow boys," it was said, would line the pockets of every man in the community, and our majestic rivers would bear on their broad bosoms cargoes of the same precious materials. Well, sir, the time is passed, and the prediction has not been fulfilled. We have had all the tokens that precede, but not the golden shower; and at this moment the mass of the community are left to struggle on with irredeemable paper as their currency, while the party in power is seeking to establish for the Government, and its debtors and creditors, a currency of Treasury notes, and refusing to aid, even indirectly, in relieving the country from its present embarrassments. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means appears to be aware that the pretended effort of establishing an entire metallic currency has signally failed; and that delusions, too, must end some time; for we find him suddenly deeply enamoured with the new system of banking recently adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York. This may be owing to the circumstance that the plan is yet to be tested, and is, therefore, an experiment; or it may be accounted for, perhaps, in consequence of the result of the recent elections in that State. Whatever the reason may be, the country will learn with surprise that all the efforts that have been made to decry and put down banks and bank credit are to cease; and that one who led the van in the assault on both, now declares that "among the most encouraging events of the day, is the great reform measure—the free banking law of New York." Well, sir, I sincerely hope all his bright anticipations may be more than realized. He said, also, "that the passage of that act ought to be a subject of general congratulation." Be it so; but, in his felicitations on this subject, I pray him not to forget that there are other banks in New York, considering their parentage, that have some claim to the friendly regards of himself and his friends; and I cannot but think they will receive it, now that the golden bubble has bursted, and banking is again about to meet with favor.

Mr. Chairman, after hearing the speech of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to which I have alluded, and although there was much in it that was calculated to excite surprise and irritation, I was not prepared to hear the sentiments and arguments uttered on this floor, which were avowed and urged by another member of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. RHETT.] It is true, I anticipated all the manifestations of zeal which usually characterize new converts, but I did not expect to hear those with whom he had so recently professed to act, openly denounced, the whole series of measures of the Administration, past and present, approved and eulogized, and a portion of the community threatened to be handed over to the tender mercies of mob law, if we, who are unfriendly to this measure, freemen ourselves, and the representatives of freemen, should dare to hesitate, or throw the slightest obstacle in the way of the passage of the bill. I demand, sir, by what authority such sentiments are promulgated. If it is derived from his new alliance, he will find it questioned. If it is in virtue of his being a representative of what is called, by way of pre-eminence, "the landed interest of the South." let me tell him, there is a landed interest in this country elsewhere; there is a landed interest in the West, "every rood of which can sustain its man," and that man a freeman. He will find that neither he nor those with whom he acts can effect their object by intimidation. I, as one of the representatives of the free men of the West, here in my place, denounce not only the sentiments which he has uttered, but laugh such threats to scorn. The honorable gentleman says that he has never seen any evidence to justify the charge that the Administration has, at any time, manifested a disposition to injure, much less destroy, either the banks or the credit system which has so long existed in the country. Has he forgotten, that, from the period the destructive sentiment was announced, of "perish credit, perish commerce," in this Capitol, down to this hour, the leaders of the party in Congress, and in the country, as well as the public press, official and unofficial, have been incessant in denouncing the whole credit system as anti-republican in its tendencies, "making the rich richer, and the poor poorer," and equally destructive of morals and equal rights? Has he forgotten, sir, that it was announced from a high quarter, "that all who deal on borrowed capital ought to break;" that those interested in banks, and men of property generally, were called "rag barons" and "monopolists;" and that the banks had but recently, from the same high quarter, been charged with unheard of treachery? If the gentleman is ignorant of all this, and much more of the same character that might be adduced to prove that the Government induced the people to believe that it was for their interest to put down bank paper and destroy credit, and I am bound to believe that he is, I cannot consider him good authority in regard to the disposition of the Administration, at this time, in relation to these interests; he is but in his noviciate in the political church to which he has so recently united himself, and has not, as yet, been permitted to know its higher mysteries. He is, as yet, in the chrysalis state, and when he shall have passed from that, and acquired full vigor and proportions, he will be able to take a more lofty flight and extended view; then he will discover that there is some evidence of what has been believed, by a large portion of the people, to have been the intention of the Government, for years past, in relation to the subject to which I have alluded. Before I can be satisfied on this point, sir, I must have assurances "from the fathers of the church, and not from the junior apprentices of the law," as was once said on this floor on another occasion.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman has been singularly unfortunate in relation to another transaction connected with this subject. He has said that, after the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States, the State banks had wooed the Government into an alliance with them; and he calls it a meretricious alliance; and, when they had consummated their purpose, they violated their plighted troth, and played the wanton. Now, sir, the reverse of this is the fact. I supposed it was a matter of public notoriety, known to every one, that, at the period alluded to, an individual, now high in office, and then high in the confidence of the Administration, was commissioned to visit the various banks in certain parts of the Union, and ascertain the terms on which they would receive, disburse, and safely keep the public money that might be deposited with them by the Government. And thus, sir, the alliance, if there was one, was formed at the solicitation of the Government; and the banks were advised, by the then Secretary of the Treasury, to be liberal in their discounts; and his successor, down to a very recent period, has uniformly declared that they had performed their duty to the Government and the country with the utmost fidelity. They may have played the wanton; but, if so, it was by the procurement and with the connivance of the Government. And now, after procuring this meretricious alliance, and having spent the honey moon in sinful dalliance, they have been "cast, like a loathsome weed, away."

Mr. Chairman, the anxiety evinced in a certain quarter for the passage of this bill cannot be misunderstood. It is the avant courier to another measure, which has deeply excited the public mind; and which, if the late indications of public opinion may be relied on, has received the decided reprobation of the people. I allude to what has at one time been called the divorce bill, at another the Sub-Treasury, and again the Independent Treasury bill. But for the honorable gentleman's anxiety on this subject, I am confident that, with his clear perceptions and vigorous mind, he would find nothing in the bill on your table to recommend it to his support. Now, sir, this consideration furnishes, to me, a decided objection against the measure. It is admitted that, without authority of law, (I will not say contrary to law,) this Sub-Treasury scheme has been in force for at least one year; and, to a certain extent, and from necessity, ever since the existence of the Government. It is very true that the collectors of the customs and the receivers of money for the sales of public lands have not been provided, at the public expense, with vaults, safes, or bolts and bars nor with keys, all of which are provided for by the bill which has passed the other House of Congress, commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill. It has been believed, heretofore, that these things would furnish little additional security in preserving the public treasure, and that the only sure reliance for that purpose was the selection of honest and competent men to receive and pay over the public money. Well, sir, to test the security thus afforded, let us look at the reports laid on our tables, from time to time, by the Secretary of the Treasury. I confess my inability fully to comprehend these mystical and mystified documents; but enough can be gleaned from them to show that the less money is intrusted in the keeping of these Sub-Treasurers, the more will be found in the Treasury; and this I will undertake to prove.

The President in his communication of the 10th, says, "that, with over twenty-eight millions in deposite with the States, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, the United States are, from the situation in which these funds are placed, in immediate danger of being unable to discharge with good faith and promptitude the various obligations of the Government." And the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report in December last, says there is due from banks "four million six hundred and nine thousand dollars," and "four millions of merchants' bonds;" call it, in all, nine millions; deduct this sum from "fifteen millions due from banks and individuals," and there is the sum of six millions unaccounted for. This sum must be in the hands of individuals, agents of the Government. If it is unavailable, those who have or had it in their keeping are defaulters, and whether in or out of office cannot be ascertained; for, although this information was required explicitly by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND] it has not been furnished. Nor, sir, is the amount surprising, when it appears, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 17th of January last, that Littlebury Hawkins, receiver of the public money at Helena, Arkansas, not now in office, as late as the month of November, 1835, was a defaulter to the amount of $115,462 94. One in office as late as the 31st of August, 1837, the receiver of public money at Columbus, Mississippi, in the sum of $61,549 98. And V. M. Garesche, who made the investigation in this case, under the directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, recommends him to adopt, in relation to it, the doctrine of the fable of the fox and the flies; he says: "You will not therefore be surprised if I recommend his being retained, in preference to another appointment; for he has his hands full now, and will not be disposed to speculate any more." I give you these as examples; they are taken from the reports of the Treasury Department, where many cases of a similar character may be found.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to institute a comparison between individuals or Sub-Treasurers and banks in regard to the safe-keeping of the public money, nor whether the disasters of the times have been brought about by their misconduct or a series of improvident measures on the part of the Government. This, under present circumstances, would be more curious than wise. I do not stand here the advocate or the apologist of the banks. I have no connection with them; I am neither president, cashier, director, stockholder, nor debtor, of any bank. I view them, however, as State institutions, deriving their charters from the State Legislatures; a large portion of them created by the friends of those in power. As such, I hold they are not accountable to the Government of the United States; and that an attempt to make them so, either directly or indirectly, is an invasion of the rights of the States. They are accountable to the power from whom they derived their authority, and to no other power on earth. This, sir, is not the tribunal to try, condemn, and sentence them, nor the proper forum in which to assail them with coarse and vulgar epithets, selected from the party newspapers of the day. With much more propriety might the honorable gentleman have arraigned the numerous defaulters by whose malfeasance the country has lost, or is about to lose, some millions. This is a subject that might well excite his virtuous indignation; but he has been content to rail at banks, capitalists, and what he is pleased to term monopolists, alone, and promulgate, in relation to them, doctrines destructive of all law and social order, and subversive of the just rights of the States. Coming from any quarter, this would excite surprise; but, coming from whence it does, it may well excite astonishment. But, sir, this may be one mean of effecting the divorce; but I would advise gentlemen to turn their attention to another divorce that seems likely to result in an entire separation of the people from the Administration, and which the signs of the times in the East, the North, and the West, appear to indicate will soon be consummated.

Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to furnish the Government with ample means to discharge, with good faith and promptitude, its pecuniary obligations. I would be recreant to the character of the State which I have the honor in part to represent were I to do otherwise. She has a deep stake in the honor and prosperity of the country, and has shown her devotion to both in a more gloomy period of our history than the present. She will do so still. All she asks is to be permitted to decide, on a great question like the present, unawed and uninfluenced by party arrogance or official dictation. This right she has never yielded, and never will, with my consent. And should the period unfortunately arrive when she is prepared to do so, I, for one, will not be found ministering at the altar where the sacrifice is made.

REMARKS OF MR. CRITTENDEN, OF KENTUCKY,

In Senate, May 18, 1838—On the new Treasury Note B

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that the bill under consideration, as understood and explained by its friends, was intended to authorize the Treasury Department to issue ten millions of Treasury notes, to be applied in aid of the current revenue, to discharge the expenses of the Government. After a long course of boundless extravagance, the Administration has reached a point at which the ordinary revenues have proved inadequate to the expenditure of Government, and the Representatives of the people are called upon by the President to furnish extraordinary supplies in the form of Treasury notes.

Mr. C. was not prepared to say, as it had been argued by some, that Congress had not the power to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. But it was a power so susceptible of the most dangerous abuse, that it could scarcely be exercised too warily, or watched with too much jealousy.

Our Government is surrounded by motives and temptations to extravagance in the use of the public money. The very habit of voting and expending necessary millions begets a disregard of public money, without taking into account the multitude of other causes, honest and dishonest, that lead to prodigality. Against this evil tendency there is no other safe check or security but in the people, whose interest must ever be opposed to it, and in the responsibility of their rulers to them. But, to apply the corrective, it is necessary that the people should know and feel the existence of that evil; and the more sensibly and immediately they are made to feel it, the more certainly will they redress it. If wastefulness on the part of Government could always be accompanied by an immediate increase of the burdens of the people—if extravagance and taxation could go together, hand in hand, prodigal rulers would not be long allowed in this country to abuse their places. But by this mode of issuing the promissory notes of the people—called Treasury notes—the Government moves softly on, and escapes, as it were, from the people, and the public scrutiny. Its extravagance may be increased, and "fed fat" by the facility with which it supplies itself with means. And while the Government is thus corrupted, and the country run in debt, nothing is done to awaken the people to their true situation. No new taxation warns them of the extravagance of their rulers, and all pressure upon them is carefully avoided, while Government is heaping up the materials of a national debt, in the form of Treasury notes. Indeed, the first part of this process towards a national debt is rather of an agreeable and animating character to the community, and puts out of sight all other consequences. These Treasury notes seem to descend upon them as the mere emanations of a beneficent Government—as the unpurchased and fruitful showers of Heaven, that come without money and without price.

But this delusion cannot last always; and after it comes the end—the bitter end, when all disguise must cease; when the people must find themselves saddled with burdens that they hardly knew of, and when the tax-gatherer must go forth to collect from them, in some shape or other, the money that will be necessary to discharge the debt imposed upon them, with all its accumulated interest.

The primary and proper mode of supplying the public Treasury was by taxation; and when that was inadequate to the public necessities, the usual alternative was to borrow money on the credit of the Government. These were the preferable modes, because they were generally the cheapest; because they were open and undisguised, and because they were understood by the people, and would be certain to excite their jealous and vigilant attention. There might be some occasions and peculiar circumstances that would justify, or even require, us to resort to the use of Treasury notes; but, (said Mr. CRITTENDEN,) I am opposed to the general policy of supplying the Treasury by such means, because, in effect, it was the most irresponsible mode, and was calculated insensibly to lead us on, and beguile us into habits of extravagant expenditure. Why, sir, look at it: this course is already in its infancy, and behold the rate at which it is growing! It is less than eight months since the Administration asked us for ten millions of Treasury notes: well, sir, we gave them what they asked, and what is the consequence? In eight months they come back and demand ten millions more. Sir, is not this a rapid growth? We do not now see what this course may lead to; we cannot look to the end of it. Government credit, that precious thing so much commended by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] is such a gem that it must not be allowed to lie hidden, but brought out and set on high, where it may daily and hourly emit its radiance to enrich and adorn the body politic. We are to use our credit; and that we may turn it to good account, we are to embody it in the form of notes, and thus supply the people with a currency, a better currency. Sir, we are every day edified here by denunciations against banks, bank directors, and bank paper, and corresponding commendations of Government credit and Treasury notes; and we are, at the same time, told that Government must employ its credit. Sir, the English of all this is, that this Government is to use its credit by furnishing to the people a circulating currency of Treasury notes. And is this the course of policy we have entered upon? The chairman of the Finance Committee confesses, indeed, that this bill is only to meet a temporary emergency; so he told us before; but is it not to be feared that we must eventually fall into this as a permanent policy of the American Government? Thus far we have entered only on the initiatory stage of this process; a mere shadowing out of the system; a pledge and promise of the fullness of that abundant, ever-springing, ever-spreading, which is, by and by, to bless the people. How far shall we keep, sir, in the rear of the old issue of continental money? Are we not making progress, and that pretty fast, in that direction? Where are we to stop? Can we say with certainty that when we shall arrive at a certain point we shall go no further? That we shall stop short of excess; and, when we have extended the plan as far as the public good will be subserved by it, that there we shall stand fast? The tendency of the system, its inevitable tendency, is to abuse and extravagance. I think the habits of this Government are decidedly bad, and I will not lend it my encouragement to put its long hands into the pockets of the people and take out ten millions at a dash, merely because I am vaguely told that the Treasury is in a crisis. Sir, we were told that eight months ago, and it then got the Administration ten millions of Treasury notes; now there is another crisis, and we must grant ten millions more. A few such crises, and we shall get up a respectable national debt.

Is this the result of all the experiments; of all the boasted patriotism and wisdom of the last and present Administrations? Is this that blessed era of plain Republicanism and Democratic frugality which they promised? It cannot be forgotten that they denounced the Administration of Mr. Adams as wasteful and extravagant; and that they obtained and came into power and office with the loudest professions of economy. Reform, retrenchment, economy, were the catch-words, the blazonry, of the party. They were printed at the head of electioneering handbills; were written on banners, and represented in transparencies. To confirm the sincerity of all those professions, they had no sooner possessed themselves of the Government, than they commenced an ambitious research into all the public offices, to distinguish themselves, as much as possible, by the display of their superior honesty in detecting, if they could, faults or peculations in their predecessors in office. And when a defaulter to the amount of one or two thousand dollars was discovered in the person of the unfortunate Watkins, a shout of applause and triumph was raised as if some great victory had been achieved. The unhappy man was pursued and persecuted in a manner that seemed intended to manifest to all the world that scarcely any thing else than a human victim could appease the fierce and offended integrity of that faithful and economical Administration.

Now, sir, let the injured, disappointed, and deluded people of this country consider, for a moment, the consequences of all this profession and parade of diligence, patriotism, and economy. Since the reformers and economists came into office, they have more than doubled the expenses of the Government. They decried and put down the Administration of Mr. Adams for expending about thirteen millions of dollars annually; and they have since expended more than THIRTY millions yearly. In the last three years they have expended, or rather squandered, more than one hundred millions of dollars. Yes, sir, more than one hundred millions. Well may such extravagance have produced distress, and excited indignation in the country. But, sir, the end is not yet. They are still in their career of extravagance; and after lavishing millions, the Administration and its supporters here tell us there is an emergency! The ordinary revenue of Government will not suffice; they must have an extraordinary supply, and they beg lustily for more money.

It is not at all strange or wonderful, sir, that spendthrifts should become beggars. But, truly, it must be a bitter and humiliating condition for rulers who have been so long sitting amidst heaps of gold, and indulging in all the luxury of power and prodigality.

Habits of extravagance are hard to change. They become inveterate by continuance. They constitute a disease; ay, sir, and a very dangerous one. It came, about eight months ago, to a crisis, and it cost the patient ten millions of Treasury notes to get round the corner; now it is as bad as ever; it has reached another crisis, and the doctors ask for ten millions more. Well, sir, I must really be permitted to say, that if to keep this Administration on its feet is to cost ten millions of extraordinary supply every six or eight months, why, Mr. President, the sooner they are recorded in the bills of mortality, the better for those that pay the money. (A laugh.)

Sir, I consider the disease desperate; nothing will cure them but depletion and abstinence. If they get no money, they can not waste it. They tell us their constitution is at a crisis; they must have money or death; but I think we might persuade them to try and live a little longer without so large a dose as these ten millions. They say that if this bill is rejected, the Government must "stop." What must stop? The laws? The judicial tribunals? The legislative bodies? The institutions of the country? No, no, sir; all these will remain and go on. What stops, then? Their own extravagance; that must stop, and "there's the rub."

Sir, it will be hard to persuade the people that the amplest supplies have not been already granted to the Administration, if they had been economically applied to the public service. It may be worth while to state, in general terms, the amount of those supplies. The ordinary permanent revenue amounts to about twenty millions of dollars annually; and, in addition to this, Congress, within the last eight months, has granted to the Administration ten millions of Treasury notes, and the fourth instalment of the moneys that were to have been deposited with the States, being upwards of nine millions more; making together, of extraordinary supplies, a sum exceeding nineteen millions of dollars; subject, however, to a credit or deduction of about seven millions, the amount of Treasury notes redeemed, and of debt from the banks postponed to periods of payment beyond the present year. This deduction made, leaves still a clear balance of twelve millions of extraordinary supply. And besides all this, we have lately passed a bill through the Senate, authorizing the sale of the bonds given to the Government by the Bank of the United States, amounting to about four and a half millions of dollars. Thus, Mr. President, you see that, besides granting all the money we have, and issuing our notes for ten millions more, all our little choses and chattels are to be gathered up and sent to market for sale, to supply this Administration. Yet, with all this, it seems, there is a crisis; the Treasury is in an ague fit; the Government is struck with paralysis; it cannot move a foot unless you put your hands under its arms and help it forward.

But we are told it is the consequence of the compassion of the Administration in helping the poor merchants. You deferred the payment of the duty bonds. Well, sir, you did defer it, but you did not remit it. The bonds are to be paid; and they are coming in from day to day. You have got that money, or are getting it daily. Yet there is a crisis. Where is the evidence? I ask for proof. Supposing it were possible I could be induced to vote for this bill, where is the evidence that such crisis does exist? Why the President has told us that the Treasury is almost exhausted; and the chairman here gravely assures us the Government must stop. Well, sir, it may be so; but it seems to me this is rather indefinite ground on which to vote ten millions of the public funds. For what is this money needed? Are we not to ask? Must we lay our hand upon our mouths and put our mouths in the dust, and vote the money? Is it to be enough for us to hear from the Executive that "the money is wanted!" Should there not have been some estimate submitted to us? Is the amount so trifling that we must vote and ask no questions? Must we give them so vast a sum for an unknown exigency? Is this doing our duty? Why, sir, if we are to vote money on no better grounds than this, we had better, at once, place all our money concerns, by a summary vote, in the hands of the Executive. A voice comes from the Treasury, "we must have ten millions." Why? "There is a crisis." What for? "There is a crisis." Well, sir, if this is all the answer, and all the evidence that is required, if they can make up a crisis with such materials, all I have to say is, that the people had better look to their pockets.

Sir, I desire to see this experimenting Administration forced to make some experiments in economy. It is almost the only sort of experiment to which they seem to be averse. And, indeed, they can hardly be expected to attempt it without some compulsion, after they have been so long indulging in all the "pride, pomp, and circumstance" of ambition and of power. Economy is generally looked upon as a guest too plain and homely for a palace. It has, I fear, been turned out of the White House; and the Administration, with its habits of extravagance and magnificence, cannot, without difficulty, be brought to think of "reform and retrenchment." Their cry is still for money, money, money. But for one, I say to them, "Take physic Pomp," [a laugh;] lay aside your extravagance. Too much money has been your bane; and I do not feel myself required by any duty to grant you more at present. If I did, it should not be in the form proposed by this bill.

Concurring with the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] in his "mortal aversion" to a national debt, I am not willing to encourage this Government paper money scheme; because, among other evil consequences, its tendency and leading is to a national debt. These Treasury notes are the seeds of a national debt, to say the least of it. If the Government wants money let it borrow it. If extravagance or necessity shall bring a national debt upon us, let it come openly, and in the most palpable and unquestionable form, and not steal upon us in the disguise of Treasury notes. When it comes upon us in the usual and undisguised mode of borrowing money, the people will at once understand it. They will hold their representatives to a just responsibility, and will apply the proper remedy. The process of forming a national debt may be a little while concealed by the use of Treasury notes; but are they not, in truth, regular evidences of national debt? Do they not constitute a debt, bearing interest? I know that when dressed in the finery of Treasury notes it may be and is called by softer and more fashionable names than that of "debt." "National debt" is too unpopular, too bad a name. It must not be so nominated; oh, no! it is only a use of the "Government credit." It is no debt; it is only the issue of a few Treasury notes, just to meet a momentary crisis; a difficulty that rose in a night, and will vanish in a day. It is not a national debt, certainly not; it is only affording a little facility to the gentleman Secretary, who just now happens to want a little cash. Well, sir, whether it be a national debt, I will not say; this I know—it will be followed, whatever it is, with the serious and substantial consequence that the people of the United States will have to pay it, every cent of it, and with interest.

Moreover, Mr. President, pass this bill, and my word for it this will not be the last crisis we shall see. We shall have them in succession every little while: they will propagate rapidly. Of this ten millions of Treasury notes issued under the act of the last session, about five millions have been returned in payments to the Government, and the balance remains in circulation; grant the ten millions now asked for, and you will have fifteen; and, if like causes may be expected to produce like effects, there will then be greater need of a new grant than there is now. Set "this ball in motion," and it rolls on of itself, and with growing bulk and accumulated rapidity. Give it as many silken names as you please; when pay-day comes, we shall find I fancy, that it is exceedingly like a national debt. And, sir what a singular thing it will be, that the glory of the last administration, which set in the splendors of a full discharge of the national debt, should be succeeded, in the very dawn of the Administration following, by another, a new national debt of fifteen millions.

In conclusion, I have to say, once more, that I cannot bring myself to vote a dollar of supply till I get a little more light. Let me know how this money is to be applied; for what it is wanted. Let me at least have something by which I may excuse myself to my constituents; as matters stand, I have nothing to say to them. I never will vote a dollar on the mere cry of "exigency!"—"crisis!" I will be behind no man in meeting the real necessities of my country; but I will not blindly or heedlessly vote away the money of the people, or involve them in debt. I am, of course, in favor of the amendment; but even if it shall be adopted, I cannot vote for the bill without farther and more satisfactory information.

SPEECH OF MR. GOODE, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, May 14, 1838—On the Treasury Note Bill.

The House having again resolved itself into Commite of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the "bill to carry into effect an act approved on the 12th day of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," with the amendment offered by Mr. ROBERTSON—

Mr. GOODE addressed the House as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I must ask the attention of the committee for a very short time. I make the request with reluctance; but a sense of duty compells me to say something on this bill, not merely on account of its intrinsic importance, but also because I have hitherto abstained from presenting my views and sentiments on any of the leading financial measures of this Administration. I have, thus far, been content to give a silent vote, leaving the floor to gentlemen whose long experience and standing in this House gave them justly a prior claim to its attention. And even now my only apology, as a new member, for venturing on what, in the opinion of some, may perhaps be deemed an act of presumption, is the claim of a constituency who expect it at my hands. The respectability of that constituency I will not attempt to heighten by any compliment of mine, but of whom it is truth to say they well understand their own rights and interests, and who will suffer neither to be encroached upon. To men of this character, who have entrusted me with the expression of their feelings and opinions touching great public measures, I shall be recreant, could I consent to sit silently by and tamely suffer measures to be adopted which I know to be adverse to their dearest interests.

I came here expecting that I should be called to consult with my fellow-representatives on measures for the relief of an embarrassed and suffering community. I have waited patiently, and watched closely, to see measures of that character brought forward by those who represent the sentiments and purposes of the Administration in this House. Nor, in this patient and expecting attitude, have I stood alone; the American people have waited with me, and with me have been watching the course of the Administration; their eyes have been fastened, with intense anxiety, upon this Capitol, the honored seat of the National Legislature. But both they and I have hitherto waited in vain. How can I return to my people—how can we all look our constituents in the face, without having devised a single solitary measure for the relief of their sufferings? I know, indeed, that without us, or our action, the country has begun to relieve itself. I know, as well, that it will, eventually, throw off every impending pressure, and cast to the winds every obstacle in its way to prosperity and greatness. Yes, sir, it will do this, not only without, but in despite of the puny efforts of this cringing Congress, and this footstep-following Administration. But, will that excuse us? No, sir, we must answer it. I rejoice, I exult, that the people have taken matters into their own hands; and if we will turn an indifferent eye on the spectacle of their distress, they will redress their own grievances, and correct us out of our seats on this floor. They have begun; and the work goes bravely on. I am glad—I am happy, that both Congress and the Executive are held to their just and constitutional responsibility to those who entrusted them with power. The day of reckoning must come, and it cannot come too soon.

But some gentlemen affect to believe that the public evils are all imaginary, a mere fancy picture. Ah, sir, their constituents will read them a different lesson. To what class of the community, to which of all the various branches of the national industry, can we turn our eyes and not behold it? I know, indeed, that at the present moment the severest pressure is more immediately on the commercial portion of our fellow citizens; yet, even now, are they the only sufferers? Does not this pressure rest on the day-laborer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and the farmer? And where, in the end, must the burden fall? On the agricultural interest; on the labor and consumption of the country. There is much suffering which shuns the light; it is of a private and individual kind; and so widely is it spread, and so severely is it felt, that it has been rendered tolerable at all only by the vast natural resources of this country, and that indomitable spirit of native enterprise which rises the more the more it is pressed down, and which seems, like the fabled giant of antiquity, to renew its strength whenever you bring it to the ground. Before that energy of the national mind all difficulties must give way; and when the nation has thus broken the chains which have been cast around it, rely upon it that nation will call those to a dreaded reckoning who had a hand in binding them on. But let us pass from the private to the public embarrassments of the country. What is the state of the Treasury? Sir, on the first day of January, 1837, it contained a surplus of forty-two millions of dollars; leaving, after the deduction of five millions as a prudential reserve against unforeseen contingencies, thirty-seven millions to be distributed among the States. Where were these thirty-seven millions on the first day of the following September? I know that three out of the four instalments in which the distribution of it was to be made had been paid. But where was the balance? From its exuberant and overflowing abundance the National Treasury had, in little more than eight months, been reduced to a state of bankruptcy. Ay, sir, in less than six months after his inauguration the new President was under the necessity of calling Congress together to prevent the Government from actually stopping payment.

Compare this state of things with that which had preceded it. But six short months before, his venerable and illustrious predecessor, on retiring to the peaceful shades of the Hermitage, addressed to the people of the United States these parting words: "I have the consolation of knowing that at the moment when I surrender my last public trust I leave this great people prosperous and happy; in the full enjoyment of liberty and peace, and honored and respected by every nation in the world." To what are we to impute so great, so unparalleled, so melancholy a change? Is it that the tutelary guardianship of the late occupant of the White House has been withdrawn? It most certainly is not because the present incumbent has not fulfilled his memorable promise "to tread in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." That promise has been most faithfully fulfilled. These evils, then, belong to that course of action which was begun under the late Administration, and which is but carried out by that which now is. Yes, sir, these are some of the beauties of "the experiment"—the golden experiment. The bubble has burst. It was full blown when the last President retired; it reflected, in full orbed splendor, all the gilded tints of heaven; but it has burst, exploded, gone to atoms, and the country is covered with its ruins. Yes, sir, the whole country, from Maine to Mississippi, from the mountains to the sea, in all its business, its exchanges, its currency, its multitudinous and multiform affairs of every description, presents one spectacle of public embarrassment and private distress, such as no free people will long endure. Slaves may put up with such treatment from masters who sport with their persons and property, and mock at their complaints; but the people of America are of a different kidney; they are no slaves, but freemen, and the endurance of oppression aggravated by taunts and insults from their own servants, the creatures of their pleasure, is among the very last things they will ever think of submitting to.

The experiment has accomplished one object to perfection: it has broken down all CREDIT, national and individual. Mutual faith, that confidence in the honor and integrity of others, has fled away, and has given place to distrust and suspicion. This is the case between individuals; and as to the credit of Government, let its protested drafts and depreciated securities answer. Yet it is a truth, acknowledged from the earliest days of our Government, that "an adequate provision for the support of public credit is a matter of high importance to the honor and prosperity of the United States." The first Secretary of the Treasury, a statesman of the clearest and most comprehensive mind, was deeply impressed with a conviction of this truth. Speaking of the evils which flow from a disregard to the maxims of public credit, he says: "In so strong a light do they appear to the Secretary, that on their due observance, at the present critical juncture, materially depend, in his judgment, the individual and aggregate prosperity of the United States, their relief from the embarrassment they now experience, their character as a people, and the cause of good Government." He further says: "Every breach of the public engagements, whether from choice or necessity, is, in different degrees, hurtful to public credit." And again he adds: "While the observance of that good faith, which is the basis of public credit, is recommended by the strongest inducements of political expediency, it is enforced by considerations of still greater authority: there are arguments for it which rest on the immutable principles of moral obligation." These, sir, are golden principles. An Administration governing itself by these maxims might be worthy of the title of a golden Administration; and when these maxims shall again be tried, you may truly call it a golden experiment. Under the influence of these principles, sir, our nation freed itself from all the difficulties which surrounded its infancy; under a wise regard to principles like these, it has since lived, and grown, and prospered, become the envy of its enemies, and the admiration of the world. And such it continued to be, until the late Administration declared war on public credit, and commenced that course of infatuated measures which has brought us well nigh to ruin. The bitterest reflection which presses itself upon the mind, and heightens all our misery, is the thought that it is all gratuitous; without any necessary or unavoidable cause, but inflicted on us by our own hands. There is nothing to prevent the utmost perfection of individual happiness and public prosperity, but the wilful and perverse course of men whom we have ourselves elevated to power. What is it which the genius, the intelligence, the virtue, skill, and hardy, and adventurous enterprise of the American people cannot accomplish? Only give us "free trade and equal rights," let all the channels of business remain free from governmental obstructions, and the energy of the people will speedily fill them with wealth and abundance. We shall not only have enough for all our own wants; we shall have to spare for the wants of the world. The suffering cause of humanity every where, all that is needed to advance the interests of human civilization, and, by spreading the influence of knowledge, religion, and virtue, to elevate our race to their true dignity—all this shall be supplied from the fulness of American liberality. I rejoice, sir, as an American citizen, that to these worthy and ennobling ends no nation has already contributed more munificently than our own.

Mr. Chairman, I am ready to admit that credit may be abused, and it has been abused. We have all had a melancholy proof of this in the system of the pet banks, and the excesses into which they run, when the abuse was committed by the very men who professed to be the most zealous in decrying and circumscribing credit. For myself, I have never been in favor of a general and indiscriminate increase of banks. I have always considered such a course of legislation as productive of the most alarming evils. Yet this was the natural and necessary consequence of the removal of the deposites, and the consequent resort to the pet bank system. The country swarmed with banks that multiplied and soon overspread the land, and filled it with bank paper of different values, until the currency was deprived of all uniformity and all stability, and the nation was converted into one grand shaving shop, from one extremity to the other. The natural consequence of such a state of things was a train of private bankruptcies, bank suspensions, and at length Government suspensions also.

Contrast with this dreary prospect the spectacle of universal and growing prosperity which our country had prior to this exhibited. Crossed by railroads, traversed by canals, covered with infant villages, flourishing towns, and large and wealthy cities, which always afforded to the farmer a ready market and the best prices in good money; her ports crowded with shipping, and echoing to the voice of the mariner; every water-fall seized upon as the site of rising factories; the most distant points brought by the improvements in travel into almost immediate neighboods; the productiveness of industry multiplied a thousand fold by the power of new and ingenious machinery; the smoke of the workshop, the vapor of the steam engine, the roar of the burdened car, the song of the contented laborer, the waving fields of grain, the comfortable mansions of our farmers and mechanics, all, all told of a happy country, exulting in freedom, rolling in abundance, and hourly growing in riches and in strength. Add to all, this the progress of our citizens in the sciences and arts, the increase of learning, and the important improvements in the systems of education, all contributing to give stability to our free institutions, and to spread light and intelligence, the only safeguards of liberty, into every cottage and family of our happy land. All this has been done in the absence of that vaunted currency of solid gold which has figured so largely in the harangues of orators and demagogues, but of which so little has been found in the hand of the laborer, or the long green silk purses of our honest but too credulous farmers and mechanics. "Gold!" "Gold!" that has been the cry! and gold is still the cry, but not with the people. Oh, no, sir; they have something very different; but the Government has been demanding it in all directions. It has been wrung with an iron hand from the grasp of the people, through custom-houses, post offices, and land offices, and by unconstitutional circulars, issued on the mere ipse dixit of the Executive; and at the same time paying its creditors—the day-laborer on your public works, the war-worn soldier of the Revolution, the gallant soldier, and the weather-beaten tar—in depreciated bank paper, daily vilified by the Government press as trash and rags. Let these men bring that paper back, and offer it in payment for the postage of a letter, and the Government officer (himself paid in gold and silver) will fling it back to him with scorn

This high-handed mode of proceeding has borne with peculiar hardship on the people of the West. The hardy settler, who wishes to purchase him a little farm, and who, to accomplish the object, has collected all his scanty means, which his brings his money, such as his neighbors are content to receive in their daily business, to the land office, and offers it to the Government for his land, meets a repulse, and is turned over to the land office broker, who obliges him to pay 5, 10, and 20 per cent. for money which this Government of the people will condescend to receive. This intolerable exaction falls chiefly on our poorer citizens: on your fifty dollar, hundred dollar, and two hundred dollar men, who are seeking their forty acres, or eighty acres, or a quarter section, to secure a home for themselves and their children. Your ten thousand, and fifty thousand, and hundred thousand dollar men, who could enter land by the township at a time for speculation, have generally been in circumstances to estape the charitable aid of the appendant broker, so conveniently attached to every great land office. Who was benefited by this most arbitrary and unauthorized rescript from the Executive, I do not pretend to know: but this I know; the poor, but honest and industrious farmer was, by its operation, stripped of his little earnings, long and painfully hoarded, till, as he fondly hoped, he had enough laid up to purchase him a home, and in many cases it has plucked him so cruelly as to send him back utterly defeated and disappointed in the attempt to purchase his farm. Such is the practical operation of that far-famed and much lauded measure, the SPECIE CIRCULAR. The grievance lies at the door of the Government. There I leave it. The oppression is great, the people groan under it, and I, as their Representative in this House of the people, demand its redress in their name.

Mr. Chairman, it was under circumstances such as I have been endeavoring to describe that Congress met at the opening of the special session in September. What had the people a right to expect from the President they had so recently elevated to the highest dignity in their gift? They had a right to expect, and the whole country did expect, with one feeling of anxiety and hope, that the President would recommend to Congress prompt, decided, and energetic measures for the relief of the community. The proclamation assembling Congress at so early a day was hailed in all directions, North, South, East and West, as an omen of better times, a pledge and promise of better things to come. It was welcomed as an indication that the new President was about to yield up the high-strung, arbitrary, and oppressive measures which had heretofore marked the administration of this Government, and at length to pay some regard to afford some slight notice of the people and their grievances. But soon, too soon, alas! were they effectually convinced of their mistake. Soon was it discovered that Congress had been called to relieve, not the people, but the Government. Who can ever forget the throb of astonishment and dismay which pervaded a part of this body and the nation on discovering, in the President's opening message, no single measure recommended for the relief of the people, but every proposal directed exclusively to disembarrass the Government alone? The people were left to grapple, unpitied and unaided, with those difficulties which nothing had produced but the acts of the Government: the Government could have relieved them by a touch. It possessed an irresistible majority in both branches of Congress. Had it met the crisis openly, promptly, and with an honest desire first to relieve the people, whose servant it professes to be, and for whose sole benefit and behoof it was brought into being, an almost immediate restoration might have been effected. But the Administration, like the young and headstrong Prince of Israel, rejected the counsel which would have bound the people's hearts to it forever, and pursued the advice of other counsellors, better suited to its ambition and its pride. Like the haughty Pharisees, it bound upon the people grievous burdens, and heavy to be borne, while itself refused to touch them with so much as one of its fingers. The new President came into office under a pledge, previously and publicly given, to "follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor," regardless of what the consequences might be; a pledge which, I will venture to say, has been the most unfortunate event, as well for Mr. Van Buren himself as for these United States, that could possibly have happened to either. The results of this promise were abundantly evident in the tenor of his message at the opening of the special session of Congress. Not only does he abstain from recommending any measures of relief from the embarrassments of the country, but he expressly denies all obligation on the part of the Government to do any thing for the regulation of the exchanges, or for the furnishing of a sound and wholesome currency to the people. What is his language?

"These were formerly regarded as an incidental accommodation, but not one which the Federal Government was bound, or could be called upon to furnish."

He says further:

"This accommodation is now, indeed, after the lapse of not many years, demanded from the Government as among its first duties, and an omission of the duty is treated as a ground of loud and serious complaint."

And has it come to this? Is the Government now all at once to abandon what has been its acknowledged duty ever since it was a Government, and now, for the first time, to turn round and declare that Government is not bound in any way to concern itself about the currency? That it is not its province to take any measures to regulate and equalize the exchanges? What one interest comes nearer home to the people, to the whole people, to every man in the community, than that of the currency in which we are to pay our debts, to collect our dues, to realize our labor, and, in a word, to conduct our whole business? If the Government has no concern in an interest like this, it has no concern with the prosperity or happiness of the nation.

Such was the message of September; and what is that with which the present session has been opened? Does it sound a different note? Does it recommend a different policy? Does it evince that wisdom which is the fruit of experience; that magnanimity which is prompt to acknowledge a discovered error? No, sir! No, sir! with unyielding, unrelenting, unpitying sternness, it adheres to the course already pursued. To relieve the Government, to sustain the Government, to accommodate the Government, this, and this alone, is its scope and aim. With this sole view, its measures are recommended; to this hour not one solitary measure has been proposed to us by the President for the relief of the country.

I shall here be reminded that the message recommends the Sub-Treasury scheme. That measure has, indeed, for the present, been suffered to slumber; but I apprehend that it is but held in reserve, and that the people are yet to enjoy the fulness of its blessings. And what, sir, is the Sub-Treasury scheme but another experiment? An experiment not merely on the financial policy of the Government, but an experiment on the people; and one more bold and daring than has yet been attempted by any Administration. It is put forward in a bill, just as the physician extends his learned finger, and thus feels the pulse of the patient on whom he is to operate. With sagacious touch, he watches every vibration, that he may judge from this test the state of the system subjected to his skill. Just so is it now attempted to feel the pulse of the American people, and cautiously to try how far they will submit to innovation on their established institutions, and to what extent they will permit encroachment on their rights. Sir, I will venture to say that the indications thus far are not encouraging. This darling measure of the Administration has met from the American nation such a greeting as might have been expected from a free and intelligent people. Sir, the medicine will not be taken. The patient has too much will, he must be further reduced; he must be brought lower and made sicker before he will swallow the dose. Such seems to be the policy resolved upon; but he who expects that it will be submitted to very much mistakes, in my apprehension, the American character. Sir, are there no symptoms of resistance? Has no voice come up from the valley; no sound reverberated from the hill? No entire States gone off in solid column? Sir, the muttering thunder may already be heard; it comes with every breeze; it rolls at once around the entire horizon. It peals in the North, and is answered and re-echoed by yet louder peals from the South and the West. Will gentlemen close their ears? Shall public opinion, expressed with so much clearness and so much unanimity, be disregarded by those who are every day professing that the wishes of the people are their supreme law? Sir, this Sub-Treasury bill has been figuring largely in another part of this building, and its discussion has called forth much splendid talent and many profound and masterly views of national policy. But the little, the very little ceremony with which it has been treated by this House, might, one would think, read a lesson to its friends as to the degree of its estimation in this branch of the Legislature. No sooner did it show its face in this House, than it was promptly laid upon the table; nor was this the first greeting of the kind which that proposition received from the assembled Representatives of the American people. At the special session it received a similar fate, and it was generally hoped that the vote which then placed it on your table had consigned it to the peaceful shades of eternal repose.

But no, sir; the President, or at least his organ here, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has disturbed its slumbering ashes; the vaults have been thrown open, the bars and the strong boxes have given way, and its ghost stalks through this House a portentous shade, threatening the living with all the horrors of its prison house. I have been at a loss to imagine what can be the motive of the Administration in thus determining to urge the passage of this bill against the known will of the people. They cannot pretend ignorance. If they have any doubts, let them inquire of the Connecticut delegation. No, sir, they have no doubts about the matter. That plea can avail them no longer. Why then insist so desperately on this measure? Is it that they hope to build a fortress where they may set public sentiment at defiance? Do they hope to erect a bulwark which shall separate the Government from the people, and against which the thunders of public indignation may be hurled in vain? Is it to provide themselves with a refuge where they may in safety share the "spoils of victory" wrung from the hands of a vanquished people, vanquished in their own stronghold, this Hall of their chosen representatives? If that is the hope, I trust, sir, it will be effectually blighted.

What is this Sub-Treasury scheme? Let us look at it for a moment. If I comprehend it, the plan proposes to place the entire revenue of this Government for distribution and safe-keeping in the hands of individual receivers holding their appointment from the President's recommendation, and subject to removal at his pleasure. The money is to be put unreservedly in their hands, professedly to be kept, and practically and in fact to be used by them, under no other restraint than the dread of detection and exposure. But, allowing them to be ever so honest; it will, under such a system, be in the power of the Executive to favor or to oppress any portion of the country at his will. He can place the public funds at any point and to any amount that may suit his own purposes. He can thus punish or reward at will. He can drain the West and fill the South or East whenever he will; he can take vengeance on obnoxious States, and can reward obedient States in a manner which cannot be resisted or inquired into. The operation can go on, and the people know nothing about the matter till they learn it through the effects. These offices, while their effects will be so great, will themselves be little other than mere sinecures—Government strawberries—rewards for favorites, a retirement for broken down party hacks, worn out in character and property. Who shall limit their number? Judging from the experience of foreign Governments where the system has been adopted, we may expect them to multiply like the locusts in Egypt, and, like these locusts, they will eat out our substance. In the hands of these men, the entire treasure of the country is to be deposited. Some of them will hold under their lock and key millions of the public money. It will be drawn from the hands of the hard-working man, to be poured, at the President's beck and pleasure, into the pockets of this army of mercenaries, the janizaries of the throne. Sir, we have heard much of the danger of uniting the purse and the sword: let that bill become a law, and the thing is done. The President will have at his disposal not only the military, but the moneyed power of the Republic. And think you a power like this will be suffered to sleep? Will such an instrument rust for want of using? Never, sir, never. In the good old times of genuine Democracy—I mean the days of Thomas Jefferson—had an officer of this General Government attempted, in the slightest degree, to influence the free elections of the people, he would have been instantly dismissed from office. But how is it now? The very reverse is true. That office-holder who refuses to exert his whole industry and influence at the ballot-boxes, may count upon being turned out as soon as the election is over. He is no longer worthy to be trusted. He has betrayed his trust; failed in his first and highest duty. Such is the state of things with such power as the Executive now possesses. Give him this Sub-Treasury bill, and how long will it be till State officers and Congressional representatives will be chosen by a rescript from the throne? Such is the measure proposed by the Executive to meet and to relieve the distresses of a suffering people. This is the Administration's physic for all the ills of the Republic.

But, sir, they prepared for us another dose; and though we would not swallow the first, we were compelled to take the second. This was the bill to postpone the payment of the fourth instalment of the distribution act. By this the people were deprived of nine millions of dollars to which they were entitled, both in law and equity. The money was a surplus, collected from the people, over and above the wants of the Government. Three other instalments had (though with infinite reluctance, and in the worst possible way) been already returned to them; they were equally entitled to the residue; but no, they could not have it, the President had need of it. The Treasury called for it, and we gave it at their earnest entreaty, but not with my vote. Was this all? No, sir; we had heard a great noise about gold; we were told of the vast amount of it which had flowed in under the wise measures of this hard-money Administration; but, when matters came to the point, the gold was not to be found. No, sir, nor the silver either. The Treasury was in a strait; the national money-box was full of emptiness, and these hard-money, gold-boasting, gold-importing, gold-promising rulers came to Congress for the issue of ten millions of Government paper. Ay, sir, ten millions of paper money—Treasury promises. This was the Administration gold that was to shine through the silken purses of our farmers' wives and daughters. Well, sir, we gave them what they asked. They were very humble, very thankful, and made many promises that they would never ask for any more. Six months have elapsed, and here they are, at our door, begging, in humble tone, for just ten millions more!

But let us look at the bill. What is its title? "A bill to carry into effect the act of October, 1837." Now, sir, here is deception on the very face of the bill. The first feature of the measure is falsehood. A bill to carry into effect the act of October! Why, sir, what was the act of October? It was a bill to authorize the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes. Well, sir, were not the notes issued? Yes, sir, every dollar; and was not that law fulfilled? It was complete in itself; it proposed to do a certain thing, which thing it did. And now they put forth to us a bill purporting to carry into effect the law of October!

It is deceptive in another respect. It professes to provide for the issue only of notes to be a medium of paying and receiving the Government dues; whereas its real purpose is to furnish to this nation a paper circulation—a paper currency. Sir, I do not pretend to be much skilled in these matters. I am no financier; I never, in my life, could make something out of nothing; but this hard-money Administration proposes to pay its debts and supply a currency to the people, by engraving promises in blue and red ink. Instead of authorizing a loan of money, and with that money paying its creditors, it proposes to pay them in promises to pay. Why this device? Why not borrow, as has been done before? Can it be that these wise and able financiers are ashamed of the condition into which they have brought us? Do they blush to think that so soon after their own boasting, and the public joy over the payment of the national debt, the people should discover that a new debt has been created? That is the fact. Disguise it as they please, there is a deficit in the Treasury, and a new national debt must be created to meet it. Sir, no portion of this responsibility rests at my door. I have opposed this whole course of measures from their inception. It is true I did not inflict any speeches on this House, because I perceived that the subject was in good hands, and heard it ably and convincingly debated by others more competent to do it justice than I can pretend to be. I contented myself with voting. But I can do so no longer. It has become a duty to myself to place my own position fairly before my constituents and the country.

The act of October has not only been carried into full effect; the grief is that it has been too fully accomplished. The ten millions, which were to be received in payment of the public dues, have come back too soon. The revenue pours in too vast. They cannot keep the notes out. These forces of the Administration, with their red and blue uniforms, will not keep the field. They rush back into winter quarters, and there, alas, they die! Yes, sir; not one of them ever returns to the service. There was in the act of October a most unfortunate clause about cancelling. The blame, no doubt, rests entirely with those who were so much opposed to that act. They wickedly suspected, nay, they dared to put that suspicion into words, on this floor, that those Treasury notes were intended to circulate as money! Yes sir; that the plan was to have a new issue of the old continental. Such a suggestion shocked the feelings of the friends of the Administration; and to put it forever at rest, this cancelling clause was inserted in the bill. It was an ugly clause, a very ungracious clause; and accordingly it has been omitted in the present bill. There is not a word about it; and, though the issuing of these notes is to be subject to the provisions of the bill of last year, there is nothing to prevent the reissuing of them as fast as they come in. Sir, here is no camp fever to sweep off the troops as fast as they come in. No, sir; they may "fight their battles o'er again, and thrice may slay the slain."

I object to this new issue of promissory notes. There is no adequate means of payment. We have already ten millions out which must eventually be paid; I am not prepared to send out millions more. It is true, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has shown us a long array of assets which are to be realized; but these exposes of the expected resources of the Government differ so much from each other that my trust is greatly weakened in any of them. Sir, what does the Treasury actually need? Must we grant them the whole of these ten millions to relieve their necessity? If so, let them say so plainly, and I am ready to give it, in any proper mode and form. Let them present us such a bill as I can consistently and conscientiously vote for, and it shall have my prompt support. I will vote it cheerfully—gladly. I have no pleasure in the embarrassments of my Government. Let who will administer it, when it is in need it shall have any and all the help I can consistently render it. Sir, what is the reliance of the honorable chairman, and his friend, the Secretary of the Treasury, for the payment of these Treasury notes? Their trust is on broken pet banks. Their reliance is on the twenty eight millions which have gone back to the people of the States. Ah, sir, if that is their hope, they may look long for its coming. I strongly suspect they will never behold that money coming into the Treasury to pay these Treasury promises. Sir, it is one thing to give a note, and another thing to meet it. They have promised ten millions; they now want to promise ten millions more; and, if they go on much longer increasing the national debt, the day is not far distant when our farmers will have to plough one furrow for themselves, and another for the Government. I am opposed to this indirect course of legislation. Let them honestly tell us how much they are behind-hand, and I am ready to vote them a loan for the amount. But, sir, no more Treasury notes. I never vote for them, unless in an emergency; I never have voted for them. The practice is unwarranted and dangerous. What, sir, resort to Treasury notes in a time of profound peace! It has never been done. I know that, during a war, and immediately after it, in a great national crisis, this measure has been ventured on; but only for the shortest possible term; and when that expired, the notes have been recalled with all speed. But here are two emissions in less than a year. Sir, is it possible the Government is maturing for us a new plan of currency, which is to be carried whether we pass the Sub-Treasury bill or not? Time will show. For myself, I am so utterly opposed to the scheme, that I cannot vote even for the grant of two millions of Treasury notes, and a loan for the balance. I am ready for a loan of the whole ten millions; and I am assured, on good authority, that the money can be obtained with ease, and in time to meet the emergency. I will vote for that. I am ready to relieve the Treasury; that is my desire; that is the desire of the people of my district. When the Government is in serious difficulty, all party distinctions vanish, and the genuine American feeling comes forth with prompt and efficient aid. But they are against this paper money. You said that without interest it would be at par with specie; you have put six per cent. interest upon it, and it is depreciated notwithstanding. It is even below the paper of non specie paying banks. Yes, sir, below that rag money which is here cried down in such terms of vituperation. A recent paper from the great money market of our country has this consoling paragraph:

"There are just now no less than six different kinds of currency used in the city of New York! Treasury notes, which are below par, and are used exclusively to pay custom-house dues; the notes of specie paying banks, received at the post office; specie, to sell at the brokers; safety fund bank notes, for ordinary circulation, but not received at the city banks; and two or three nondescripts."

Yet you are going to throw ten millions more of this sort of money into the market. I object to it. It is not necessary; the Government can obtain a sound currency without it; and why issue a trash which is sure to depreciate, and which cannot depreciate without, in the same degree, sinking the credit of this Government? Pass this bill, and it will flow out in floods. No man can tell what amount of it will be in the market in six months.

I object, further, to the course which has been pursued in the attempt to force this bill upon the House by the force of caucus machinery and a midnight session. Not only are we asked to borrow money, but the precise form and mode is prescribed to us. Here is a bill for you: pass that just as it stands; and pass no other. Sir, is this language proper to be held to the Representatives of a free people? To be held to us by servants? Is the Executive to direct us what course to take? Is he to dictate the laws? I trust it has not yet come to that. It is our duty, I admit, to provide for the public necessities; but are we not to judge of the proper mode in which it shall be done? Must we, willing or unwilling, vote a currency which is to become a drug in the market? which is to sink the credit of our Government? and for which the head of the Treasury must come down into the money market and negotiate for terms? Shall we submit to this needless degradation when we can command the silver, which will benefit the country and the Government, and this because the President or his Secretary, or the Secretary's sub-Secretary in this House tells us we "must?" Sir, it is a dictation which I, for one, as a Representative of a portion of the people of Ohio, am not prepared to submit to. The policy is bad. It has been condemned by our greatest and our wisest men. It was most pointedly denounced by the late President of the United States. In his letter to Mr. Blair, in July last, he says:

"I hope no Treasury notes will be issued. The Treasury drafts on actual deposites are constitutional, and no not partake of paper credits, as Treasury notes, which are subject to depreciation by the merchants, and banks, and shavers, and brokers; and will be, if issued, and the Government cannot avoid it."

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will not deny that this is high authority; a majority of this House dare not deny it; yet he will have us go in the very teeth of the advice of one whose lightest word was once law to him, to them, and to the nation.

Mr. Chairman, taking all these objections together, they present, to my mind, an insurmountable barrier to a vote in favor of this bill. I cannot vote it. I will not. Let us have a sound currency; "a better currency" than these printed promises; a currency that will not depreciate; a currency that will pass as freely in the mountains as in the cities and courts; in the West as in the East; which will have a uniform value, and a free and universal circulation. Such a currency these notes can never supply.

I close, Mr. Chairman, with great reluctance, and chiefly to repel the injurious charge that the opponents of this bill are unwilling to meet the wants of the Government, and look with satisfaction on the difficulties of their country. That charge I cast back with indignation on those who have made it, and challenge them to try us with a fair and honest bill, which owns the exigency of Government, and provides a safe and honorable method of relieving it.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNN, OF INDIANA.

In the House of Representatives, May 14, 1838—On the Treasury note bill.

The House having again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the "bill to carry into effect an act approved on the 12th day of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," with the amendment offered by Mr. ROBERTSON,

Mr. DUNN rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The object of the bill under consideration is, to supply the wants of the Government by an issue of ten millions of Treasury notes. It involves, therefore, an inquiry into the nature and extent of those wants, and the best means of supplying them.

In common with many who have spoken on this and other occasions, I must complain of a want of that information necessary to determine the first question to my own satisfaction. If I look to the various statements furnished this House by those whose official stations make it their duty to afford this information, I find so wide a difference between them that I cannot rely upon the estimates thus furnished with that certainty and satisfaction which a representative ought to feel when voting away the money of his constituents. When I look to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted at the present session, I find that he makes the whole amount coming into the Treasury the present year $33,015,787. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the next best authority on all subjects connected with the finances, has recently favored the House with a speech, in which he foots up the receipts at about the same sum. But, in comparing the items which compose these aggregates, I find a most surprising difference in the amount of almost every one of them. The Secretary calculates the amount to be received from customs and sales of land at $18,500,000; the chairman of the committee sets down that item at $15,000,000; a difference of three and a half millions of dollars. This variance is very great; and, however it may meet with some excuse from the fact that the estimate must, from its nature, be conjectural, yet it would have been much more satisfactory to me, and I think to the nation, had some reason or plausible supposition been given for so great a reduction. The next item, however, appears to me still more extraordinary, and is without any such excuse. It is the estimate of the receipts from postponed duty bonds, $4,000,000; the second bond due from the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, $2,293,121; and the balances becoming payable the present year from the deposite banks, with interest, $1,466 666; making, according to the Secretary, $7,759 787. In the speech just alluded to, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has brought up these expectancies to $10,000,000: being two and a quarter millions more than the Secretary made them.

This is a matter, sir, about which there should be no uncertainty. It cannot rest on conjecture. The whole amount of postponed bonds and bank balances falling due within the year is matter of record, and should admit of no mistake. How, then, shall we account for this vast difference?

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here interposed, and said: With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, he would explain to him and the committee that, on examining this subject, an error had been discovered in the Secretary's estimate. He had not allowed enough for the postponed bonds; and, therefore, in correcting that error, he had set down the sum to be received at ten millions, instead of the sum given by the Secretary.

Mr. CURTIS here desired to inquire of his colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, at what sum he had estimated the postponed duty bonds falling due this year?

Mr. CAMBRELENG answered about six millions.]

Mr. DUNN proceeded. For all the purposes I had in view, Mr. Chairman, the explanation does not help the matter. It was not my intention to go into the inquiry, at this time, who was right or who was wrong, in regard to this estimate, but to show to the committee how little reliance could be placed upon these official reports from the Department, and to remove from myself and others the clamor that is attempted at our expense, that, when we seek to investigate these matters for ourselves, we are consuming time unnecessarily, and endeavoring to bankrupt the Government. Sir, this is the charge put forth against us, although but two days have yet been spent in the consideration of this bill. If I had faith in the accuracy of these official statements, I might take them upon trust. But who can ask that of me, after the explanation just given?

It is admitted that a mistake of two millions of dollars has been made in the Treasury report of last December, and never discovered until now; or, if discovered before, never accounted for to this House or the nation; and which, perhaps, never would have been accounted for, but for what has just taken place.

Sir, it seems to me that when an officer of this Government commits an error of such magnitude in his official correspondence with this body, a due regard for us and for himself would require an ample and immediate official explanation. I will not, however, dwell further upon this topic, but pass to another item.

The next one which I wish to notice is the amount of Treasury notes under the act of October last, remaining to be issued during the fiscal year. This, according to the Treasurer, is $5,700,000; but, according to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is seven millions, showing a difference of $1,300,000. This also, Mr. Chairman, being a mere matter of figures, should admit of no mistake, and, to say the least of it, shows a great negligence in the making up of these statements.

Again, sir. In the item which follows is a much greater variance. The balance of money which would remain in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, is estimated by the Secretary at $1,083,498, while the chairman of the committee reduces it to $500,000, a difference of more than one-half. How can this be?

[Mr. CAMBRELENG requested to explain, and say, that the estimate of the Secretary was made up a month before the close of the year, and therefore was conjectural. His statement, being made afterwards, gave the true amount.]

Mr. DUNN proceeded. Be it so, sir. I do not expect that the estimate could be precisely correct; but here is a difference of 50 per cent. and more; and that, too, when the Secretary pretends to give us, to a dollar, the exact balance that will remain in the Treasury. It only affords further evidence how dangerous it will be, when legislating on these subjects, to rely upon the skill or accuracy of the Department in question.

Now, sir, take the statements thus furnished by the Secretary and by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] and select the largest items contained in each, and it gives us an income of thirty-six and a half millions. In like manner, take the smallest sums given by each, and it makes the revenue twenty-nine millions—a difference of seven and a half millions, nearly the whole sum asked by this bill. And yet, sir, with all these palpable discrepancies before us, when we hesitate, when we stop to inquire, when we complain of being compelled to vote upon such financiering, haphazard, and in such haste, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] threatens us with the vengeance of the people; calls it a refusal of supplies for the necessary wants of the Government, and is pleased to compare our conduct with that of a party in Congress which voted against supplies to carry on the late war with Great Britain.

Truly, sir, I am at a loss to know where that gentleman finds facts for either his charge or comparison. There has been no refusal to vote supplies. I have heard no gentleman say that he would not vote for all that was demanded, even by the lame and inaccurate estimates furnished to us. Even that gentleman's colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] when he declared that the House would be justifiable in refusing, at the same time stated that he would give what was asked. And has not the Opposition, and more than once, too, offered an immediate issue of more than two millions of Treasury notes for present emergencies, and thus afford time to look into this important measure; and who, sir, has voted that proposition down? Have we not time and again, and months ago, besought the friends of the Administration to furnish the House with a statement of all the demands against the Government, and more especially of the Florida war, accompanied with an offer to supply the whole sum at once? It is true, sir, we gave ample notice that, before we could consent to vote for appropriations for new operations, we should insist upon an investigation into the extravagant and wasteful expenditure of former sums. And how have all these fair and honorable propositions been met by the dominant party here? Why, sir, rejected with disdain. Let it not be said, then, that we are withholding supplies.

And, was it so, largely must the gentleman have drawn upon his imagination, when he likened it to the opposition of the minority in Congress to furnish supplies for the last war. Are the circumstances of the country the same? Are we engaged in a struggle with the most powerful nation on the globe? Do the footsteps of a foreign foe pollute our soil? Are her ships hovering over our coast? No, sir. And if there is no similarity in this respect, can the gentleman find it in the character and ability of the statesmen of that and the present day? Will he compare the gentleman who now fills the Executive chair with that exalted man who, though now gone down to the tomb, can never be forgotten? Will he liken the present head of the Treasury Department to the able financier who then guided its destinies? Will he venture to tell us, after what we have seen and known, that we can as safely place millions of the people's money in the hands of our present rulers, as we could in the hands of those of the period named? Ah, sir, well may we say that then

"This land was famously enriched
With politic grave counsel."

Can we say so now? But, sir, bad as our rulers are, they still belong to my country, and I will not pursue the comparison further.

Taking the sum demanded as the true one, I next desire your attention to the other question which I propose to consider, viz: the best method of raising the amount needed. And here, sir, let me say, that not the least objectionable feature of this transaction, in my estimation, is the attempt to dictate to this House the mode and manner of providing this supply. This power of originating the ways and means, placed so entirely within our control—so jealously guarded by the framers of our Constitution from all interference as to be prohibited to the other branch of Congress—hitherto held so sacred that, on more than one occasion, this House has spurned from it measures emanating from that quarter, merely because, by possibility they might be construed into an encroachment upon this authority—should be kept still more carefully from the pollution of Executive interference. How much better would it have been, more respectful to this House, more creditable to the Administration, to have permitted this matter to remain open to the unbiassed action of the House. But, instead of that, we find a particular course designated for us; and gentlemen of high standing with the Administration tell us, in a tone of authority, that they will have this measure carried, or they will have none. Sir, whenever a bill of this magnitude can be driven through this House by the mere force of Executive recommendation well may we tremble for the safety of the country.

Sir, we have a duty to perform to those who sent us here; and, in reference to the bill before us, that duty is to inquire whether the method proposed by the Administration is the best one for supplying the wants of the Treasury. And, for one, I intend to make that inquiry, and act according as my judgment shall determine it.

We have about ten millions of claims falling due us within the present year. More become due the next year, and some the year following. Why shall not some of these bonds be disposed of? A bill to direct a sale of the bonds of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania is now on the files of the House, having passed the Senate, and, as it appears to meet with no opposition, can, if the Administration side of the House will consent, be taken up and made a law immediately. This will provide six millions, surely enough for all present purposes.

This, I conceive, would be our course in private life. No man, becoming embarrassed, and holding notes and bonds of others in good credit, and which could be cashed, would think of issuing his own paper, and compelling his creditors to take it.

But, sir, if we must have resort to our credit, is there no other way of using it that will be more effectual for the purpose intended, and more satisfactory to the country? If the object is simply to raise money and pay off our debts, what are the interests that should be consulted? Surely the first should be that of our creditors, the poor and honest men we have heard about, to whom, it is said, we owe this money. Which of the two modes, a loan or an issue of notes, will be most satisfactory to them? In the one case they will get paper promises; in the other they will get money, and hard money, too, if they desire it. Sir, we have heard much about the credit of this Government, and how it would degrade itself to pay any thing but gold or silver. Is there any of this squeamishness manifested in the present measure? We are offering the Administration gold and silver; they are insisting upon irredeemable Government paper. Sir, I have an authority at hand quite to the purpose—an authority which will not be disputed in all that relates to hard money. It is the argument of one high in favor with the Administration one who, if report speaks true, has a pre-emption claim upon the next vacancy in the White House.

In a recent speech made by that gentleman, [Mr. BENTON,] upon the propriety of receiving specie-paying bank notes by the Government, he employs arguments so apt to my purpose on this occasion, that I could not add to them, if I wished. He says:

"It is the most revolting proposition ever made in this Congress! It is a flagrant violation of the Constitution, by making paper money a tender both to and from the Government. It is fraught with ruin and destruction to the public property, the public Treasury, and the public creditors. The notes of nine hundred banks are to be received into the Treasury, and disbursed from the Treasury. They are to be paid out as well as paid in. The ridiculous proviso of willingness to receive them on the part of the public creditor is an insult to him; for there is no choice; it is that or nothing. The disbursing officer does not offer hard money with one hand and paper with the other, and tell the creditor to take his choice. No! he offers paper or nothing! To talk of willingness when there is no choice, is insult, mockery, and outrage. Great is the loss of popularity which this Administration has sustained from paying out depreciated paper; great the deception which has been practised upon the Government in representing this paper as being willingly received. Necessity, and not good will, ruled the creditor; indignation, resentment, and execrations on the Administration, were the thanks with which he received it. This has disgraced and injured the Administration more than all other causes put together; it has lost it tens of thousands of true friends. It is now getting into a condition to pay hard money; and this resolution comes to prevent such payment, and to continue and perpetuate the ruinous paper money payments. Defeat the resolution, and the Government will quickly pay all demands upon it in gold and silver, and will recover its popularity: pass it, and paper money will continue to be paid out, and the Administration will continue to lose ground."

What could be more apposite to the occasion on hand? However some of us might question the applicability of the argument to bank notes redeemable on demand in specie, yet none can doubt its full force as regards inconvertible Treasury notes, always below specie par, and most frequently beyond that of non-specie paying bank notes. Sufficient for me is it, that it completely refutes any supposition that our creditors would prefer these notes to money, which the course we propose will give them. Let those gentlemen, then, who profess so much regard for the public creditor, and who contend that to offer him bank notes payable and paid on demand on demand in specie is "insult, mockery, and outrage," reconcile this forcing upon him of Treasury paper.

If the course we propose is thus better for the men we owe, let me ask if there is any interest of the country that forbids it. I know, sir, it has been, both at the last and present session, contended that by the issue of Treasury notes no debt was created; it was no loan of money. The President, in his September message, holds this doctrine:

"It is not proposed to procure the required amount by loans or increased taxation." * * "Treasury notes may be temporarily issued, to be gradually redeemed as it (amount due us) is received."

Thus, also, chimes in the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report at the same session:

"It need not be a loan, or an increase of taxes of any kind." * * "One mode would be to authorize an issue of Treasury notes, receivable for all public dues, but without interest."

And even very recently, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means used the following language:

"We have heard much, sir, here and elsewhere, about a bankrupt Treasury, loans and a public debt. Such statements and anticipations are without foundation."

"There is nothing, sir, in the past or present condition of the Treasury, nor in the prospect ahead, to warrant this charge of bankruptcy, or to authorize a public debt."

Then, sir, the very beauty of the Treasury note scheme was, that it was no loan, created no public debt: a position so plainly untenable, that the good sense of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] will not permit him to occupy it. He gives it up. And, in doing that, he abandons the whole ground. Ever since the measure has been under consideration, both at the late and the present session, how has the Opposition been stigmatized as the paper party—the party desirous of plunging the country in debt? I rejoice, sir, that the admission has been made; that this charge is removed from our shoulders, and placed where it belongs. But, sir, should we leave the subject without inquiring why it was ever made? Was it, sir, because Gen. Jackson had just boasted of having paid off the national debt? That the sounds of rejoicing on that occasion had not yet died away in the distance, and the party dared not acknowledge that already they were compelled to create a new one? Sir, I congratulate the people that they are to be deceived no longer.

Then, sir, whether we issue ten millions of Treasury notes, or ten millions of stock certificates, they alike create a debt against the Government for the same amount. There can be no difference in that respect.

It would, perhaps, be doing injustice to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] not to say that he did attempt to make a distinction between a temporary and a permanent debt. For all the purposes of my argument it is immaterial whether it be temporary or permanent, which only means that one shall be paid off a little sooner than another. Either is a charge upon the country, and I fancy will be paid as soon as the country is able to do it. But, sir, the gentleman expressed his surprise that the proposition for a loan should come from the South. And he then went over an argument which I have very often heard before, that the South pays much more than her fair proportion of the revenue of this Government, by reason of the operation of your tariff laws; and, therefore, (contended the gentleman,) a permanent debt would be onerous upon the South. I am truly at a loss to know, sir, by what process the South will escape from paying the same proportion of this debt whether it be temporary or permanent. There may be some necromancy about it that I do not understand. It is, however, the other position assumed by the gentleman, and by other gentlemen from the South, upon almost every occasion—the inequality of the tariff laws—that I wish to examine.

It can only be maintained by the assumption that the citizens of that section of the country purchase and use more foreign goods than the same number of citizens in other sections. Such seem to be the settled opinions of Southern gentlemen, and we have an amusing instance of the fact in the argument made the other day by another gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] You may recollect, sir, that, in support of the Cumberland road bill, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALHOON] remarked that his State would derive some advantage from the expenditure of public money along that road. That many little stores would spring up as it was improved, and would purchase their supplies at Louisville and other Kentucky towns. Well, sir, in reply to this argument the gentleman from South Carolina turned all those stores into grog shops. He did not seem to consider it possible that we could have in that country any other kind of shops. Now, sir, however some of our Western folks may like a little of the blue ruin occasionally, I cannot believe that they are any worse than their neighbors in that respect. But certain it is that they are not quite so bad as the gentleman would seem to think, or as the gentleman would seem to think, or as the gentleman would seem to think, or as the man who contended that this article was not only meat, drink, and clothing, but pretty good washing and lodging to boot. Sir, I would have gentlemen to know that our people do purchase and use their full proportion of foreign articles; and pay into the coffers of the Government their full proportion of taxes in that way; and, in addition, that every surplus dollar they can raise is dragged away through the land offices. And yet, sir, you hear none of these complaints of oppression and inequality which are continually arising from other quarters.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] told us that the measure proposed by this bill was not making fictitious capital for circulation. It was merely borrowing money. Surely ours is much the most simple method of borrowing. We propose to ask persons to lend us the money to pay our debts, and to give them our bonds for the amount. The bill proposes to issue our own notes and compel our creditors to take them, for, according to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] it is compulsion. The one is a voluntary loan; the other a forced one.

But what is meant by this expression, fictitious capital? Do Treasury notes any more, or so much, constitute real capital as United States stock? Neither of them is money, and the true and only distinction I can perceive is, that certificates of stock carry no pretence of being money about them; Treasury notes do, and therefore are fictitious.

It is the residue of the expression, however, that I wish to examine more particularly. These notes are not to be fictitious capital for circulation. I can give no other meaning to this than that they are not to become currency. So also says the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. "They should never be issued in small denominations to circulate as money." Here, sir, is another very extraordinary change of opinion. Last fall the measure was supported in opposition to a loan, for the very purpose of supplying a circulation; and no means have been left untried to force the Government issues upon the country as currency.

Mr. Woodbury, in his report at the last session, speaking of these notes supplying a circulation, tells us:

'Especially would this be likely to happen, provided they were issued in denominations as low as 20, 50, and $100."

Again, he says:

"They would combine the most important requisites appertaining to any paper currency."

And what did the same gentleman from South Carolina inform us then?

"In issuing these notes, it is not our object simply to raise money, or to pay debts, but, in the paralytic state of the country, we want a medium in which the revenues of the country can be easily collected; and domestic exchanges be carried on without embarrassment to the banks."

And the more completely to effect the object, that gentleman, and, I believe, the whole party here, were anxious to strike out the clause allowing interest from the bill. And, in support of that view, he told us: "If these notes bear interest, their circulation will be impeded."

Sir, this measure was, then, considered antagonist to bank circulation, and more especially to the circulation of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania. You will recollect, sir, that so anxious was the gentleman from South Carolina to effect this, that he preferred these notes should have no promise of redemption about them; that they should be bills receivable alone. So far from desiring it to be a temporary measure, then, he wanted these notes to become "merely instruments of collection, to be kept out forever, and be expanded or contracted as the wants of the country, for the purpose of exchange and collection, may require." He then further remarked:

"By issuing bills receivable in payment of public dues, I believe a medium will exist which may be made available in the hands of individuals for all the purposes of exchange, and which will entirely supersede the necessity of a Bank of the United States."

Sir, this matter was well understood last fall; and notwithstanding every effort to the contrary, this House would not permit that this paper should be used as currency. We gave interest upon it; and did the Administration then submit to the will of the House, and give up their darling intention? No, sir. Every means that ingenuity could devise was resorted to to get around that interest clause. First, we had notes issued bearing a nominal interest of one mill, then bearing two per cent. and lastly five per cent. and, while thus endeavering to put forth their own paper, to make room for it, an outcry was raised against the banks with a view of destroying the local circulation.

Can the public, then, rely on this casual declaration, that it is no longer intended to use this paper as circulation, so contradictory to all the sayings and efforts of the party heretofore; and so contrary, too, to all their conduct now? For, if the absurd project is given up, if now the measure is simply to borrow money, why not do it the straight old-fashioned way? Have they given up the Sub-Treasury scheme, of which this Government paper was an important part? No, sir, we have no satisfactory evidence that the party has given up that Treasury bank; that thing so signally disapproved of by Congress when first broached by General Jackson. I know, sir, they will most stoutly deny that they ever had any such intention, even in the face of all the Executive recommendations, from the issue of Government paper to the special bankrupt law closing the State institutions, all tending to that end. Not daring to call this project by its right name, the efforts made to dupe the public in regard to it have been not less bold than some of them have been ridiculous.

Thus, your Secretary of the Treasury, when recommending this very measure of an issue of Government paper, prefaces by telling us that it may be done "without treading on the debatable ground of either the power or policy of chartering a National Bank." Now, sir, what put that in his head, if he did not think that he was at least approaching the questionable limits? Then, after chalking out his plan for an issue of Treasury paper, a well-known banking power, and, taken in connection with other powers desired by the Executive to be conferred upon the Treasury; well calculated to excite suspicion, and completely (if not more) carrying our General Jackson's original plan, he concludes with this solemn assurance: "But no loans of them appear advisable, nor any bank incorparation, band officers, or bank machinery whatever, in connection with the subject;" as if this people could be duped into the belief that there could be no bank without an act of incorporation, and that treasurers, registers, auditors, and clerks could not be as much bank officers as presidents and cashiers.

Truly, sir, this effort of the worthy Secretary puts us in mind of the old story of the artist, who, having painted on the tavern sign what he designed should represent General Washington and his horse, out of abundant caution was induced to write upon it, this is the man, and that is the horse. Our Secretary, however, improves upon the example. The difficulty with the limner was, that, after all his pains, the observer might fail to understand his intention; that with the Secretary was, that his might be too obvious. And, therefore, having first told us what he did not intend to make, and having dipped his pencil in colors least likely to disclose his object, he yet finds himself constrained to write upon his picture that it is neither man nor horse.

I think sufficient has been shown to satisfy every one that the measure proposed by the bill was originally maintained as one antagonist to bank circulation, and may be considered so still. It must, therefore, be injurious to the State institutions, and embarrass them in the effort of resumption. It may be injurious in two ways: 1st. It will fill the country with that much more of paper money; and 2d. It is a power which may again be abused as it was before, and with it new experiments tried upon the currency, tending to keep up the present confusion and general stagnation of business. This is the great evil of the times, and, all admit, cannot be removed until a general resumption of specie payments takes place. To effect this as soon, and with as little loss as possible, should be our grand effort; and, if I have failed to satisfy you that a new issue of Government paper will retard this event, it should be a sufficient objection that it will not hasten and insure it so certainly as will the measure proposed by the amendment.

I have heard no friend of the bill contend that it will aid or hasten a resumption, while the beneficial influence of a loan must be very evident, whether it is taken at home or abroad. Forming a valuable remittance, it will be equal to a new creation of value to the amount; equal to just so much cotton, rice, or tobacco, and will thus tend to equalize foreign exchanges, and keep them regular. So also at home such a stock would be exceedingly desirable. Many men have withdrawn their capital from the usual pursuits of trade; nor will they be likely again to jeopard it in such operations until more quiet times. But an investment in stocks so safe as this will be, will be eagerly sought by all these cautious men, and thus money will be drawn out from its hiding places, and put to the purposes of commerce, which might otherwise for a long time remain idle, to the great injury of the country.

Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment, I rely much on this argument: that while it answers all the purposes of Government in paying its debts, it will aid materially in bringing about the resumption of specie payments by the banks. I am fully sensible, sir, of the danger I incur, as well as all others who act with me, of having our motives misrepresented, when say one word in behalf of these institutions. Already in the course of this debate have we been denounced as representing the interest of capitalists as distinguished from that of the country. But, sir, I complain not of it; it is what public men must expect: our conduct is before the country, and I abide the result. Satisfied I am that the country will see, as we do, that, in some way or other, every man, woman, and child in this broad land is interested in the welfare of these institutions, and that whatever shall bring distress or relief to them will in the act convey benefit or injury throughout all the business relations of life; and, according to my understanding, it is much to the credit of the Opposition that they joined not the outcry against these banks, but, as far as in their power, have sought to allay excitement, restore confidence, and set them again in operation, as being most effectual for the relief of the people. And having fought manfully in this battle, and in some degree protected this great interest from the assaults of those in power, until it could recover from the shock, and the business of the country revive with it, we were not prepared for the remarks lately heard here and elsewhere, that the Administration has never been hostile to the banks, that it has always been their true friend, and we their false one.

A more particular inquiry into this matter I deem neither inapplicable nor unprofitable. It is important as regards our standing with the country, and also as regards the rival measures in hand, in showing which is supported by the true friends of the business and commerce of the nation.

I would first inquire, how it hapens, if the designs of the Administration have always been friendly towards this interest, that so deep and settled a conviction should prevail to the contrary. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] tells us that the charge has been made and reiterated by the press under bank control, until the country has got to believe it. Sir, the Administration has had a much more efficient press under its control, and quite as active in its cause. How then could this charge have obtained its foothold, unless the conduct of those in power had lent it countenance? No, sir, there is too much truth in it, and this denial is an afterthought. Until very recently it was believed that more favor was to be gained by abusing the banks, than being their friend; and it was not until the people, becoming jealous of the designs of power, and fearing the destruction of State interests, rallied around them, that the alarm was taken, and this denial made.

As it is more than likely that gentlemen and myself may differ as to what hostility is, when directed against these institutions, I will, to avoid all misunderstanding, have resort to the same high authority to which I have before referred, [Mr. BENTON.] From that gentleman's late speech I read you so much as will show how such hostilities, as he alleges, were formerly carried on against the same interests by the present Opposition party.

"First, there was a war against the local banks generally, during the whole panic session, in which no term of reproach was too odious to be lavished upon them; and no statements to discredit them, no assertion to destroy confidence in them, no attempt to excite runs upon them, and to blow them up, were too shameless or too unscrupulous to find authors, abettors, and aiders, in the ranks of their present most officious friends."—Mr. Benton's Speech, 14th March, 1838.

Whether the Opposition ever were enemies of the State institutions, as thus asserted, I shall leave for the public to determine. Time has shown the truth of the warnings we then gave of what would be the result of the mad attempt of the party in power to break down the National Bank, and to stimulate and excite the State banks to supply its place. The experiment has been tried, and let the people judge of it.

My purpose now is to show that, ever since the catastrophe in May last, the Administration has been hostile to the existing institutions; and, instead of aiding and helping them to resume specie payments, has greatly retarded the operation. And how was this great object to be effected? There was but one thing wanted, and that was a restoration of confidence; and, so far as the action of this Government was concerned, how was that to be done? None can hesitate in the reply. By the Government bestowing its own confidence upon them, and speaking well of them. In the late disturbed state of affairs, it required not only that Government should manifest its own confidence by its assertions, but by its acts. It would be in vain to tell the people to have confidence, and place their property and business again with the banks, while we are refusing them our confidence and our business. It would have been bad enough if the Government, when it refused further to confide in the banks, had let them alone, and not sought to destroy what little of reputation they had left. But such was not its pleasure; and, not only has it ceased all connection with them, but its agents and partizans have assailed the banks from all quarters with untiring abuse.

The elements of hostility against banks, as laid down by Mr. BENTON, are:

1. In the use of terms of reproach, to render them odious.
2. In statements to discredit them.
3. In assertions to destroy confidence in them.
4. In attempts to excite runs upon them, and to blow them up.

And now, sir, in reference to these matters, I will begin with the very head of the party, and refer you to General Jackson's celebrated letter to Messes Dawson. He thus denounces the banks:

"After the treachery of the banks to the Government, it will be in vain to suppose that the people can ever be induced to acquiesce in their employment again as public depositories."

This short sentence, in my estimation, covers the whole ground of hostility, as defined by Mr. BENTON. Here is the term of reproach, "treachery," calculated to render the banks "odious," to "discredit" and "destroy confidence in them;" and to destroy confidence in them for all time to come. For he says the people can never acquiesce in their employment by the nation; and if they are thus unsafe for the nation, must they not be so for the people?

Not satisfied, however, he alludes to this "treachery" again and again in that letter; and strives to show that it might be committed in a time of war, and thus bring the country under foreign subjection. Thus directly impeaching the patriotism of those interested in these institutions, and warning the country to trust them no longer.

This charge was afterwards made on this floor by a friend of the Administration—the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MURRAY.] His language was:

"Such depositories will ever have it in their power to thwart the purposes of Government, by withholding her funds, which, in extraordinary circumstances, as in time of war, might enable them to upset the Government."

He also tells us that

"The history of banks will show that gain is the great object of their creation and existence. This they pursue with the avidity of a hungry tiger."

Surely, sir, this is strange language to come from a party friendly to the banks, and desirous of restoring confidence in them. Their patriotism is directly questioned. It is asserted that they are entirely governed by interest; and in another part of the same argument we are told that they are in the hands of brokers and shavers, and would continue so to be. A calculation is then entered into, to show how the people will lose fourteen millions of dollars by the depreciation of ten per cent. on the one hundred and forty millions of bank circulation.

Do we not find here statements that discredit, and assertions that will destroy confidence in, banks. Why, sir, a friend, in place of magnifying the losses sustained by the suspension, would have entered upon the much more easy task of showing how destructive to all interests would have been the continuance of specie payments under all the circumstances. He would have noticed the fact the banks, having on hand but one dollar in specie to three or four of their paper out, could not long have sustained the demand, and that suspension could not therefore have been averted at that period of alarm; while the unavailing effort, requiring severe exactions upon their debtors, would have created much greater distress and confusion. And when setting down the discount on paper at ten per cent. while the banks had in their vaults one-quarter to one-third enough specie to redeem their bills, he could scarcely have omitted to inquire what would have been the discount on the 90 or 100 millions that would have remained after all their specie was gone in redemption. In place of being 10 per cent. and a loss of 14 millions, he would perhaps have set it down at 50 per cent. and a loss of 45 or 50 millions at least.

I might, sir, allude to many other speeches delivered in this and the other branch of Congress, by friends of the Administration, tending to discredit and destroy confidence in the State banks. It will be found that the very gentleman [Mr. BENTON,] who detailed the manner in which the Opposition had warred against them, has himself, in that same speech, been guilty of the same offence. He states, sir, that many of the banks were "rotten to the core, and would fall to pieces" the instant they are put the test. He talks about forcing and driving the banks to resume, by the "fear of consequences" but never of aiding or helping them; and, taking his speech altogether, none can mistake that the leading object of forcing a resumption is the hope that most; if not all the banks will be destroyed in the operation.

But, sir, I shall not detain the committee with further reference to speeches on this point, except to call their attention a little more particularly to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT.]

At the very time when he claimed to be a friend to the banking interest, he charged that interest with being leagued against the Government. He denounces, in most fervid terms, the capitalists of the country as united in a design to overthrow the Government. He declared that it was better to be conquered by British arms, than to submit to such dictation; and none can have forgot his threat, to leave this Hall and go home, if the course of the Opposition was successful; none, his pregnant warnings (so apt to produce the very results predicted) of popular excitements, prostration of laws, and destruction of all chartered interests. Sir, language but little, if any, less violent drove the rioters upon Hart's flour store in New York. No man told them to do the deed. It was just such inflated pictures of imagined wrongs that maddened the multitude; just such solemn warnings of what might happen, that taught them what to do. Sir, I acquit that gentleman of any intention or wish of producing such results by the language he used; but of its tendency none can doubt, and, therefore, much is it to be regretted that it was ever used here. It is sufficient for my purpose that it places the banking interest in an unfavorable light before the country, and is calculated to discredit and destroy confidence.

Mr. Chairman, I might detain you here for the balance of the session with proof on this point, extracted from the Government press in every quarter of the country. But it is too well known, that, for the past year, it has been the special duty of every paper in the support of Government, or under its pay, to abuse the banks, and every body connected with them. I shall, therefore, content myself with referring you to an extract, of recent date, from the Government organ published in this city.

In an article headed "The Real Relief," in the Globe of the 23d April last, we have such expressions as follow. Speaking of the banks which had suspended because the New York banks had done so, the editor says:

"A part of these have since closed their eyes in eternal sleep; and, so far as they are concerned, the event has proved that it was approaching INSOLVENCY, and not the example of New York, which occasioned them to shut up. How many more may be in the like condition, time will soon tell, and especially will it soon tell how stands the account with that living personification of trick and impudence; that Jupiter Tonans of rags and shinplasters; that succedaneum of spavined, foundered, and wind-broken politicians; that huge and helpless carcase across which Mr. Biddle sits, and on which a brood of harpies roost and feed."

Then, sir, follows a great deal about "her enormous debts" and "rotten credits." Her "thirty millions of immediate liabilities, which four millions of specie" in vain attempt to look in the face. Her debtors and resources are described as "worn out politicians;" "editors of newspapers, depreciated stocks, and loans upon long time at low interest, to cousins, jobbers, parasites, and sycophants."

All this is pressed upon the public, although the editor admits that "doubtless a catastrophe to his [Mr. Biddle's] Bank will carry mischief to a great many families in the United States." But, by way of comfort, he says that,

"The chief loss in the United States may be in the resurrection notes, now under discussion in the Senate. Be the event what it may, the HUNDRED MILLIONS OF GOLD AND SILVER in the country is the sheet-anchor and RELIEF of the people. Let the productive classes begin to look out for a share of that, and they are safe! Many other banks will be involved in any catastrophe that may befall the 'great regulator.'"

May we not here find some symptoms of hostility as defined by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON?] Such unparalleled and gross abuse of Mr. Biddle's Bank may be considered fair for all who belong to the Administration. Yet it does not appear to me likely to aid in the operations of commerce, or in the restoration of specie payments, to be thus undermining the credit of an institution of such extended business, especially when the editor tells us that "doubtless a catastrophe to his [Mr. Biddle's] Bank will carry mischief to a great many families." And surely it must be very cold comfort to the business community to be assured that the chief loss will be in the resurrection notes, which happen to amount to the very respectable sum of about six millions of dollars.

Political partisans may think the "mischief to a great many families," and the loss of six millions of dollars to the community, well repaid by the destruction of this odious monster, the United States Bank. But I fancy, sir, the poor families, the widows and orphans who own the stock, the business men who handle the paper, will derive but little consolation from that result, or find the imagined relief in the hundred millions of gold and silver in the country.

In the assurance that "many other banks will be involved in any catastrophe that may befall the 'great regulator,'" may we not find something very likely to discredit banks, and destroy confidence in them? And does not the recommendation to the productive classes to begin "to look out for a share" of the gold and silver, look very much like an attempt "to excite runs upon" the banks "and blow them up?"

And now, sir, let us dwell but for a moment upon this act of "treachery" for which the banks have been arraigned and persecuted with so much violence. It is the late suspension of specie payments. I understand the friends of the Administration are not willing to go behind that act, and inquire into the causes which led to it; for then it is soon brought home to their own absurd tinkering and experimenting on the currency. It is called treachery to the Government. The banks owed the Government for its deposites, and the people for its paper; they could not pay both in specie, and would not pay one in preference to the other; and thus, because the Government was unwilling to share the same fate with the people, the banks are denounced for it. Time will not permit that I should detail the evils that would have resulted from an opposite course. It is sufficient for me to say, that for this act the banks have been tried and acquitted. They have been tried by the State Legislatures, to whom they were alone amenable, every one of which, I believe, has been in session since this act of treachery took place, and in no instance has it been condemned, but, on the contrary, has been approved of as the only course that could have been taken to save the country from far greater disasters. And, sir, have they not been tried by the people, too? and, in every instance where the issue has been fairly made up, in spite of all the exertions of politicians and the press, the people have sustained them.

We have seen what pains have been taken, both in the Dawson letter and elsewhere, to convey the impression that these institutions are wanting in patriotism, that they should not be trusted, for fear that they would seek to thwart the Government, overthrow it, and bring it into subjection to a foreign yoke. Mr. Chairman, tell me, if you can, of any interest in this country that will suffer so much from foreign conquest as the banking interest will. Does it possess any charm that will protect it from the exactions and plunder consequent on such occasions? Sir, we find the storm of war and invasion always falling most heavy in that direction. And, sir, what proud examples does our history furnish of the most devoted patriotism on the part of these institutions and their owners. When did your country, in her utmost need, call for supplies to fight the common enemy, and not find these institutions ready to aid? Did they then seek for pretences to thwart and overthrow the Government? Sir, in one official report, I find it stated that a few banks advanced on loan to the Government, during the last war, over six millions of dollars, nearly one-tenth of your whole war debt; and this does not include occasional sums advanced on Treasury notes and otherwise; for often was it the case that your ships could not sail, or your armies march, until the advances were made. And this was done by banks in their corporate capacity, embarrassed as they then were, and limited in number and capital. Who can estimate the sums thus loaned for the service of the country by stockholders, officers, and persons otherwise connected with banks? When we consider that nearly all men who have spare money are in some way interested in these institutions, and that it is from such men that these supplies mainly come, it may be readily asserted that more than one-half, if not three-fourths of your war debt, came out of the pockets of these bankers.

It has been the policy of the Administration to denounce this interest as aristocratic. The party press has been, and is, filled with the outcry against these "monopolies"—"rag barons;" and the effort seems to be to convey an impression that these institutions are altogether owned by an exclusive class, a privileged few, and the idea of great wealth is attached to them. Sir, I think an investigation will satisfy every one that the business of banking in this country is most generally diffused among all classes of society. I have no general knowledge that will guide me in forming an opinion upon this subject; but, so far as local information goes, it is to the contrary. And it was but the other day that I met accidentally with a statement of the number and the occupation of the stockholders of four banks, I think in New Haven, Connecticut—a State where, if we are to take the latest doctrine of the times, the banking interest has lately defeated the Democracy. As it throws some light on this topic, I will read the statement to the committee. There were 1,170 stockholders, and the description is as follows: Females, 318; minors, 85; executors and administrators, 43; societies, academies, &c. 26; seamen, 18; merchants, 118; mechanics, 51, lawyers, 27; farmers, 168; Revolutionary soldiers, 5; clergymen, 16; physicians, 22; old men retired from business, 82; manufacturers, 46; occupations unknown, 66; and the residue, being 54, were tavern-keepers, clerks, Government officers, brokers, officers of banks, of colleges, &c.

Now, sir, this I call a pretty fair Democratic division of these benefits among all sorts of people. If any interest seems to be peculiarly favored, it is that of the ladies; and, however they might be disposed to bring us under domestic subjection, I will not entertain the thought that they would either bow themselves or consent that we should do so to a foreign yoke.

It appears very evident that the great object of government is to reach that power of concentrated action on the part of the people, so efficiently embodied in the form of corporations; and which, from its safety, simplicity, and complete adaptation to all the purposes of business, and its now universal use, forms the great barrier to the establishment of that Government institution which it was intended should grasp and control all the exchanges, currency, and business of the country. It is thus alone we can account for corporations of all kinds being included in these denunciations. All are monopolies, corrupt aristocracies, ulcers on the body politic, exclusive privileges, dangerous to liberty, and, therefore, to be put down, that this Government leviathan may have the whole ground to itself.

Sir, the people should carefully examine what it is in this principle that renders it so offensive to our Government; and reflect how intimately it is connected with our whole social and political system, ere they consent to eradicate it; for it will be readily seen that our whole political fabric, State and National, from foundation corner to topmost stone, is composed of corporations. No assemblage of the people, for political or other purposes, can act or speak efficiently but by assuming many of the features and attributes of a corporation. And, rest assured, the same distorted vision that can perceive danger to the country in the existence of these corporations, established for commercial, manufacturing, and other business purposes, will be far more likely to discover it in the unrestrained right of the people to assemble and concentrate their power for political objects; and the next step may be the dispersion of such factious bodies by reading a riot act, and with military power.

It is alleged that these chartered rights cramp and fetter our energies, and have a tendency to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. Is this shown in the countless turnpikes, railroads, and canals, intersecting the country in every direction, and cheapening all the necessaries of life? And these odious banks, when rightly conducted, what are they but additional aids of capital to industry and enterprise?

Deprive men of moderate means of this power of association and concentration of their capital, and all this business must fall into the hands of the wealthy. No, sir, this system marks the genius of the age, and can only be destroyed with the spirit of enterprise and freedom which gave it birth. On no page of history do you find corporations arrayed on the side of arbitrary power. They dwell not with despotism, but are ever found the first and last bulwarks behind which are fought the battles of freedom. Where, let me ask you, would have been the liberties of Europe, but for her free incorporated cities? It was those chartered privileges, first bought with a price, or extorted from their haughty lords, around which the hardy burghers rallied, and successfully defended with naked valor, against steel-clad chivalry, and the iron arm of the feudal age. They rose like islands of rocky base, but green and verdant summit, amid that ocean of ignorance, barbarism, and blood, which then overspread the world, breasting its rude surge, and giving limits to its power.

Mr. Chairman, there is one test we can apply to the Administration, which must clearly indicate the sincerity of its intention to aid in the work of resumption. Whether true or false, as stated before, the fact is fully impressed on the public mind that the measures and designs of the Government, the issue of Treasury paper, the Sub-Treasury, the continuance of the Specie Circular, the refusal to receive specie-paying bank notes for revenue, are all hostile to the speedy resumption of a specie business by the banks; and this impression cannot be removed by mere individual declarations, by unauthorized persons, and especially when others, equal in influence and authority, hold the contrary language. Now, sir, if sincere in this matter, is it not the duty of the party to afford to the public some plain, satisfactory, and solemn assurance, that shall remove these impressions from the public mind, and dissipate all doubt and uncertainty? Can this be obtained from them? Have they abandoned the Sub-Treasury bill? No, sir; they are only desirous of power to take it up. They are still pressing the Treasury note bill. Time and again have they rejected propositions for the repeal of the specie circular; and as to the receiving of specie-paying bank paper, it is an utter abomination in their sight. No pledge can be obtained from them. How fared the resolution of one of their friends, [Mr. HAMER,] offered the other day, and having this for its object? A very indefinite resolution it was, so far as it pledged the Administration to any particular act; still it maintained a principle, and specified a duty, and was, therefore, one step gained.

That most extraordinary resolution deserves particular consideration, as it contains the first evidence of a change of opinion in the Administration ranks. It is remarkable both for its admission and its assumptions. As to the first, we there had it distinctly admitted, for the first time, that the "business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country are in a deranged and embarrassed condition." There were no ifs or buts about it. It was not merely the business of the banks or merchants that was deranged, it was the business of the country.

Sir, that gentleman held a very different doctrine last fall, when we were trying to show that the country was in difficulty. There was no embarrassment then in his section. The trifling derangement of the paper currency was rather a benefit than a disadvantage, as it enabled merchants to collect their debts, and pay banks what they owed them. He advised all persons out of employment to go to the West, where plenty was to be had at fair prices.

And so, too, the other gentleman from the same State, [Mr. DUNCAN.] According to his story, the happy West had experienced no difficulty—had felt no embarrassment. Her farmers had plenty of cash to jingle in their silk purses, and held in utter contempt all fear of panics and pressures.

Another admission worthy of notice is, that Government has something to do with the "business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country;" and also, that Government COULD aid these operations, if it would. Thus rejecting the former doctrines of the party, that Government should take care of itself, and could not and ought not to interfere with these matters.

So, also, it admits that the banks, of some or them, at least, were making laudable efforts to resume specie payments. And, more than all, that is the duty of the Government to aid the banks in this effort to restore the currency.

But, sir, if it made some singular confessions, it contained the quite as extraordinary assumption that it was the design of the Administration to aid the banks in their laudable efforts to resume. Why, sir, this was too much of a practical joke for even the gentleman himself to persist in it, and he had to erase it before the resolution itself was disposed of or considered. Thus, sir, the party was unwilling to place it on record here that there was any design, any duty, any willingness, on the part of the Administration, to aid in any way in this important work.

Not the least singular feature in this transaction is the reason given, as I understand, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER] for not again offering his resolution. It was that the public had been fully apprised of the course which the Government intended to take on the subjects specified, and the whole object of his resolution was therefore accomplished. And the letters of Mr. Woodbury, addressed to Mr. Newbold, were referred to as containing the necessary information. Now, sir, I have examined those letters, and can find no such assurance as appears to me to be satisfactory. There certainly is nothing in them which offers the least prospect of a discontinuance of the unjust and impolitic discrimination in the medium of payment for duties and public lands occasioned by the Specie Circular. And what confidence could be placed in the casual expression, that notes of specie-paying banks would be received for duties, when, at that very time, the official organ of the Government was denouncing every thing of the kind? This was its language:

"It is believed we have near ninety millions (specie) now; there is every prospect of an increase of twelve or fifteen millions this year; so that, by the time Congress meets next December, there will probably be one hundred millions in the country. It is probable that one hundred and fifty millions is as much as the country could employ; and, unless the paper-money party succeed in their design of compelling the Federal Government to use paper money, that amount will be attained in a few years."—Globe, April, 1838.

Does this look like an intention, on the part of Government, to receive paper money?

I have already read you some extracts from the speech of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] which convey any thing but an intention to collect and pay out bank paper. I will give you a few more, which, to my mind, can hardly be construed into a design to aid the banks by the reception of their notes in payment of public dues; and, I think, show very conclusively that no sort of relief may be looked for from the Administration. Speaking of the banks, he says they have received all the aid which they need. Hear his language:

"They have received the aid which they need in the one hundred millions of gold and silver which now relieves the country, and distresses the politicians who predicted no relief until a National Bank was created. Of the nine hundred banks in the country, there are many which never can resume, and which should not attempt it except to wind up their affairs. Many of these are rotten to the core, and will fall to pieces the instant they are put to the specie test."

And again, speaking of receiving their notes, he says:

It "would fill the Treasury with notes that could never be redeemed, would dispense with the use of gold and silver at home, would occasion the exportation of the one hundred millions which the Jacksonian policy has collected in the country."

That gentleman holds out in prospect a great deal of force and compulsion in reference to this work of resumption, but nothing of aid and assistance. In the same speech he says:

"A moral sense and fear of consequences will compel them to resume."

Again:

"There is specie enough, then, in the country, to enable every bank to resume; and the moral sense of some, and the fear of consequences in others, will induce a resumption by all except the insolvent and the political ones."

And in this he merely reiterates the doctrine of Gen. Jackson, contained in his Dawson letter:

"If the revenue is collected in gold and silver, it will force the banks to resume."

So, also, the article read before from the Globe, headed "The Real Relief," must satisfy every one that there is no intention on the part of the Administration to afford that assistance to the banks which it is in its power to do.

Now, sir, this publication in the Globe, this speech in the Senate, are subsequent to the letter of Mr. Woodbury, and are entirely at variance with it. How, then, can the country be quieted without some Congressional action on the subject?

Mr. Chairman, I shall not deny that a change in the opinions of our rulers has taken place, but it by no means follows that there is to be any change in their conduct, and that is the important thing for the public. It becomes very necessary, therefore, that these opinions should be looked into, their nature, and how formed, as it will explain much that has taken place, and is the only way to determine their future action; seeing that they will give us no pledge on the subject.

When the suspension of specie payments took place, the Administration was compelled to act decisively and in great haste upon the subject. It admitted of no delay. There could be no half-way ground. They must either sustain the banks, or they must go against them. This will appear very evident from a slight examination.

Did they take the first course, doubtless the country might be sooner relived. But judging from experience, it would be a work of years, require great contraction of the currency, (always accompanied with distress,) and much greater concert of action among the banks than, from their number and dissimilar interests, could be expected. And with all the Government could give, it might still be impossible to effect the object, (as was found the case before,) without a National Bank; and that the President had unfortunately pledged himself not to grant. Any delay in the resumption was dangerous, nay, fatal, for popular indignation would increase; and as it was well known that the Opposition had warned the country of this event, and had tried to prevent it, it was very certain that the blame of the disaster would fall where it deserved to do, upon the Administration. Its already shattered reputation could not withstand this additional shock. That course was therefore out of the question. Now, on the other side, it was doubtful whether the banks could resume when aided by the Government, it was held most clear that they could not when opposed by it. The banks would necessarily be the first objects of the people's vengeance, and by being the first and loudest in the outcry against them, the Administration stood a fair chance of turning the eyes of the people from its own delinquencies, and placing the whole blame and punishment upon these institutions.

It was seen how easily the public had been duped by the falsehoods propagated against the United States Bank, and by the promises of a better currency. If, by such a course of abuse, overwhelming detraction and gasconading promises, the party had been able to overturn that institution in the day of its prosperity, at the very moment when it was doing the most good, and conferring the most public benefit, what might not be expected by an early, united, and vindictive proscription of the State institutions in their then embarrassed condition? So, also, the opportunity was the best that had yet occurred since General Jackson's first attempt, perhaps was the only one that ever would occur, to force the Treasury bank upon the country. It was foreseen that, in a time of quiet and reflection, it would never be adopted; and it was supposed to be the only remaining measure required to perpetuate the power of the party.

Sir, the fear on the one hand, and the hope on the other, were too great for their virtue. The interests of the country, in an early and efficient restoration of its business, were lost sight of; and from every quarter of the Union, press, pen, and voice were employed to prostrate the State institutions.

But, sir, they were mistaken in more respects than one. The confidence of the people had been too often abused to permit empty declamation and round assertion to be taken as proof. The party watchwords had lost their magic. The people had become jealous of power, and determined to sustain the State banks in their efforts to restore a sound circulation. So, also, some of the banks have already resumed, and, notwithanding the advice of the Globe to "the productive classes," to get a share of their gold and silver as soon as possible, no runs have been made upon them Much greater unanimity and concert of action appears among the banks than was expected. All have acted with great prudence in preparing for the event, and confidence seems to be gradually but firmly gaining ground.

In these things, then, the gullibility of the people, and the ability of the banks to resume, the Administration has been mistaken; and, so far, a change of opinion has taken place, and, should the banks be able to persevere, it is more than likely you will soon see, not merely a straggler here and there declaring himself not opposed to the banks, but the whole party, press, and people, declaring the same thing. And, as they never acknowledge an error, or take any thing back, they will doubtless contend that they have never said a hard word against them.

But the question still remains, will this change of opinion, and situation of things, produce a change in the conduct of the Government towards these leading interests of the country? In my judgment, this depends very much upon another question, and that is, whether the Administration has become satisfied, not only that the banks will resume, but that no action of the Government can cause them to suspend again. For, sir, it must be borne in mind that such an event has been anticipated, and is looked for by the Administration, and until they give up that hope, I greatly fear they will not heartily join in the exertions now making for the benefit of the country.

Sir, we have abundant proofs that both these opinions were entertained, viz: that the banks could not generally resume, and that, if some did, new explosions would take place, in the report made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on the 5th of March last. I will refer you to a few particulars as to both points. It is there said:

"Some of the banks may resume at an early period; but, while there is evidently so little concert of action or harmony of purpose among them, it would be unsafe to invest the public money in the notes of any bank; and when a general resumption will occur is not now to be anticipated."

He also speaks of the revival of trade being "postponed to an uncertain period." So, also,

"The explosion of the State bank deposite system was too recent to warrant the expectation of its renewal at an early period, if at all."

He then thought the proposition to renew the connection between the Government and the banks as "extraordinary," and he says: "It would seem to be time enough to discuss its expediency after a general resumption of specie payments." If now adopted, he says, we shall have deposite banks in the East, and an Independent Treasury in the West.

Now, sir, these will show that, so recently as the 5th of March last, the party had no expectation of a general resumption. Some banks might resume, but let us see whether the committee thought they could sustain themselves. They remark further:

"We must certainly anticipate embarrassment in some sections, and we should accordingly prepare for it. The banking system of this country must be thoroughly reformed, before confidence in the convertibility of bank notes can be permanently revived. No such reform can, at this time, be anticipated. A few more disastrous revulsions may compel us, at some future period, to correct the vices of our system; but, for the present, it is evident that our local currencies are to be still further vitiated by State legislation."

Again: he says that the "system is liable at all times to explosion."

Again

"It is obvious that the power and the mischiefs of our banking system are about to become still more formidable; and there is too much reason to apprehend, in a few years, an explosion more disastrous to all branches of industry than any we have hitherto felt. While the States continue to multiply banks, no effort of the General Government, whether by a National Bank, or an issue of Treasury notes, could prevent a suspension of specie payments." "It would at least seem to be prudent to collect from the banks our six millions of suspended balances, before we inquire into the expediency of again placing the Treasury of the United States in jeopardy."

Again:

"The finances of the latter must become embarrassed at every revulsion, so long as our revenue consists of bank notes or bank deposites. The convertibility of either into specie is wholly illusive, and has been hitherto sustained by confidence alone. That confidence is now destroyed. If a few banks only had suspended specie payments from bad management, confidence might have been continued in others. Or if, as in time of war, Government had deemed it expedient to borrow their credit and sanction its abuses, it might have revived with the return of peace," &c.

It is thus very evident that the Administration has looked to, and calculated upon, other and further explosions. It is here given as a reason why the funds of the Government should not be jeoparded either in the way of "bank notes or bank deposites." It is directly alleged that the convertibility of either is wholly illusive, and can be sustained by confidence alone. That confidence is now destroyed, and Government will not seek to restore it. The mischiefs of the system are to become more formidable, the local currency still further vitiated by State legislation. A few more "disastrous revulsions" are to take place before that "thorough reform" can be applied which is necessary, and until which it will be unsafe for the Government to have any connection with these institutions.

Now, sir, what is that "thorough reform?" We have understood it to be the introduction of the Sub-Treasury plan. Has, then, the Government given it up? Where do we find any evidence of an intention to abandon it? If a few more "disastrous revulsions" are necessary to effect the object, have we not great reason to fear that, so far as it can, without meeting the public eye, Government will promote those revulsions? It may be a part of the plan of operations, and for that reason Government will not identify its business with that of the people, as, in such case, both are to be alike injured, if these institutions are again "blown up." Sir, there is great danger on this head. The banks will have a fiery ordeal to undergo. I could wish they had the countenance of the Government to sustain them; but if that cannot be, let us not place any thing in the power of the Administration that may be perverted to their injury.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that two short months had not elapsed ere the gentleman who made that report of the 5th of March passed his sponge over all the gloomy pictures which it contains. In his opening speech on the present bill, we heard no more of "disastrous revulsions," other explosions, trade postponed, currency to be further vitiated by State legislation. All now is gratulation and great joy. He discourses thus:

"As to the prospect of our future revenue, every thing is encouraging. Confidence and trade are evidently reviving." "Some cities in the Union, where they have attempted to postpone the payment of the debts, may yet suffer, but, in the present prosperous condition of the country, trade must soon revive." "There are other gratifying evidences of a restoration of confidence and a revival of trade. Our Northern banks have resumed specie payments earlier than was anticipated twelve months ago, and much earlier than they would have done had this Administration yielded to the demands of trade."

The study and comparison of this report and this speech would require, and are worthy of, more time than I have now to bestow upon them. Two productions so dissimilar could never have emanated from the same source, under any other Administration than the present. But upon the reasons given for this great change in the prospects of the country, I have something to remark.

A principal cause is, the firmness of the Administration in resisting "the demands of trade." It seems admitted, then, that "trade" (by which I suppose is meant the active business men of the country) has made demands upon the Administration, and that they have been rejected. We may all recollect, sir, that "trade" foresaw the approach of our present difficulties, and made a solemn demand upon the Executive to call Congress together, and take some measures to avert them. And since then, "trade" has been demanding of the Government, instead of abusing and discrediting the institutions of "trade" that it should aid and relieve them. "Trade" believed that the one course would retard the return of prosperity, and that the other would give immediate life and vigor to all business. The Administration, pretending to know much more about these things than "trade" did, has refused all its applications, and, according to the gentleman, that very stubborness has brought about the revival and resumption so much sooner than was expected twelve months ago. But the gentleman forgets; it is only two months ago; and, after ten months of this firmness had been manifested, the revival of trade, in his estimation, was yet "postponed to an indefinite period." It can hardly be that the remaining two months of firmness could have produced these great results.

But the gentleman gives us some other causes; setting aside a few minor ones, such as the Canada war, &c. we find one which mortal man would scarcely have conceive of as coming from that quarter, and that is that New York has passed a general banking law. Yes, sir, the fears that "our local currencies are to be still further vitiated by State legislation." "that the "power and the mischiefs of our banking system are to become still more formidable," are given to the winds, and the prospect that banks are to become as plenty as blackberries has changed the whole aspect of affairs. And now we are told:

"We need no chartered regulator, State or Federal. Our own banking law, the perpetual charter of free trade, is all we require to bid defiance to all hostility, protect ourselves, and regulate exchanges."

Mr. Chairman, I am unable to perceive, in all that has been given to us, any thing that can justify me in the belief that all the difficulties, and embarrassments, and derangements of business, and currency, and exchanges, are at an end. And some reasons may be given why the joy manifested by the gentleman may be found in local and party considerations, in which the great body of the people cannot participate.

If it be true, as has been said, that the original experiment on the currency arose from a desire to change the great money regulator from Chestnut to Wall street; and if it be true, as is alleged by the gentleman from New York, that "we had no banking capital adequate to the pressure" in that city, and he perceives in this new measure that increase of capital, and the change of that power of regulation, why, as a citizen of New York, he may have cause to rejoice.

I it be also true, as we have heard it rumored, that there is to be established in that city a real thirty or fifty million monster under this new system, to be made the Government depository, and which may be owned and governed by the Treasury, why, as a party man, he may have cause of rejoicing. But, sir, I fail to perceive how the whole country, its business and exchanges, are to be benefited by this new arrangement. I cannot conceive that any large bank in New York, or elsewhere, or any number of them, can give to the whole country what the Bank of the United States did—a sound currency and cheap exchanges—unless you give it the same powers which that Bank possessed.

We may have a sound currency furnished by well managed and cautious State banks, but the equalization of exchanges can only be effected by some large institution having its branches extended over the whole country, possessing the confidence and business of the Government, and having the power of transferring its capital to those places where most wanted, according to the turns of trade and changes of season. I doubt whether the people of this country would consent that such power should be bestowed on any local institution. If so bestowed, it is questionable whether the power may not be used for local rather than general benefit. Not deriving its authority from Congress, it will feel no responsibility, nor will it submit to investigation. It may be, however, that these very qualities, the absence of control by Congress, and freedom from search, make it the more desirable for a Sub-Treasury.

I have thus, sir, gone through with this subject. Desultory I necessarily had to be to meet the positions of those who preceded me. It has been my object to maintain what I firmly believe, the existence of a hostile feeling on the part of the Administration against the local banks, and that there is great reason to fear its further continuance. Whether the motives I have assigned for this hostility are the true ones, is a minor consideration. But believing it to be the desire of the people that all aid and countenance shall be given to our business institutions in the effort now making to resume and continue specie operations, and conceiving that the amendment to the present bill may aid in that effort, while it is less expensive and more effectual to meet the wants of the Treasury, I feel constrained to support it.

I have, also, endeavored to show you, sir, that great confusion exists, and much uncertainty in regard to the finances of the nation; that the information furnished us by those who ought to know all about this intricate matter, is any thing but satisfactory; and that even so late as the commencement of this session, the Treasury Department was unaware of the approach of this ten million deficiency. In the hands of persons who calculate and keep their accounts so badly, I conceive this power of issuing Treasury notes a dangerous one. There is less of publicity and notoriety about the manner of its exercise, than in the open and public negotiation of a loan. And, sir, above all, I fear the confirmation of a precedent which may be dangerous. Already have we found it so. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] at the last session, based much of his argument upon the fact that such things had been done before, under the colonial and continental Governments, and in the last war; and he now brings our own act of the last session in array against us as additional authority. Sir, we have read the history of those early times to little purpose, if the precedent can have any weight with us. Whatever benefits were derived from those issues were so counterbalanced by evils, and this power was considered so liable to abuse, that the wise men who framed our Constitution have prohibited its use by the States of this Confederacy. It was only under the pressure of dire necessity that the statesmen of the last war resorted to it; and they have given us solemn warning not to follow the example. Sir, the very fact that precedent is thus relied upon, should convince us how dangerous it will be to continue the practice longer. Let us, therefore, preserve the examples that have been named; not as precedents to be followed, but as beacon lights to the mariner, warning him of dangers not the less alarming because they are concealed beneath the surface of a smooth and smiling sea.

SPEECH OF MR. SOUTHGATE, OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, Saturday, May 12, 1838.—The bill providing for the reissuing of ten millions of Treasury notes being under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. INGHAM of Connecticut in the chair)—

Mr. SOUTHGATE rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr CHAIRMAN: I expressed a desire to address the committee on the questions involved in this bill, and to that end, at this late period in the evening, made the motion which I did—that the committee rise—not doubting but that the usual courtesies would be extended, at any rate, to one who but once before had trespassed on the indulgence of the House; but, sir, to my utter astonishment, this poor privilege has been denied me, and by a party vote, you have determined that you will not rise. Mr. Chairman, I am not deceived in the purpose you intend to accomplish. You are resolved to pass this bill, if you can, this very night. Yes, sir, force it through; stifle debate; drive us to submission, or starve us out by a regular siege. But, sir, so far as I am concerned, you have mistaken your man: I will not retreat. I am ready for action; and, for one, I promise you that here, in my place, unawed by your power or threats, unsubdued by hunger or fatigue, will I remain, battling for my constituents and my country, this most dangerous of all former Executive experiments, until the morning sun of Monday shall find me yet struggling against your trained party phalanx and your ready doers of Executive bidding. Sir, the history of free legislation furnishes no parallel for this indecent haste. But two days since, the President sent us a special message demanding more money; not submitting to us, the immediate representatives of the people, who, under the Constitution, are authorized to raise money for the support of the Government in our own way and manner, but in a special and particular mode, unusual and extraordinary; the reissuing of ten millions more of Treasury notes. And, sir, what is done? Forthwith your favorite investigating duelling report is, by the very men who got it up for party purposes, laid on the table; and now you find gentlemen here ready to vote, who have not been seen here for a week. The shibboleth of the party has gone forth. The faithful troops are in the field, and before midnight the battle is to be fought and won. But, sir, before the deed is done, I am resolved that my constituents and this nation shall know something of the actings and doings of the men in power, who are now abusing the confidence reposed in them by a confiding people.

But, before I proceed to the consideration of the merits of this bill, (if any merits it have,) I feel it my duty to pay my respects to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] who has just poured out his whole stock of volcanic lava upon monopolies, aristocrats, banks, Whigs, Federalists, with all the cant of an unfledged and newborn modern Loco Foco Democrat. Mr. Chairman, have you never observed that, as in the Christian so in the political world, it is the latest convert who makes the most noise, and that he is all the while laboring to show by his works that he is entitled to promotion and the confidence of his associates? The gentleman from South Carolina, without any authority other than what he draws from his own imagination, has attempted to prove that we who are opposed to this bill are desirous to embarrass the Government; to withhold the supplies; and impair the public credit and the national honor. And, sir, in the full measure of his denunciation, he boldly charges upon us that, like the Federalists during the late war, we have combined with the banks and the aristocrats to war upon the Executive and his Administration. What act, sir, done or omitted to be done, has authorized the honorable gentleman to attribute to the opposers of this bill any such motive or purpose? Is it because we will not silently submit, with our arms folded, to pass this bill in the form prescribed by the Executive, without stopping to inquire whether for good or for evil, that we are thus unceremoniously denounced by one who has just "entered the service?"

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, not a little strange that the honorable gentleman, who, within the recollection of us all, was among the foremost in the front rank, with his unfurled nullifying banner, ready to resist, even at the point of the bayonet, certain supposed encroachments of Federal power, unauthorized, as he believed, under the Constitution, should now indulge in such harsh sentiments with reference to those who are found in their proper places, opposing with all their constitutional and moral power the passage of a law which they believe so full of mischief, and of such doubtful constitutional authority! Yes, sir, the honorable gentleman is not content, in the fulness of his new born zeal, with his thundering philippic against the opposers of this bill, but he threatens the banks with mobs; and we are told by him that the "mighty contest for power and mastery is between the banks and the people;" and that, unless the "banks cease their hostility towards the Government, the people, in the majesty of their power, burning with patriotic indignation, may raze their marble columns to the ground, and scatter the contents to the winds." Sir, has it come to this, that here, in the American Congress, doctrines so revolutionary, so full of mobocracy, so well calculated to encourage lawless rapine and plunder, shall be uttered by a representative in his place, as the only argument why we should at once, and without delay, grant the President more money! I trust in God he speaks his own, and not the sentiments of his new allies. I hope, for the honor of my country, that he stands "solitary and alone" in his glory. But, sir, the honorable gentleman has wholly mistaken the parties in this great contest of which he has spoken. It is not a war of the banks against the Government, but a war between the office-holders on the one side, and the people on the other; a struggle on the part of an insulted people against those in power, who have abused the confidence of the people, and who are endeavoring to separate themselves in their monetary concerns from all that belongs to their future prosperity and destiny. Mr. Chairman, these banks are no handlings of mine. I have had no agency in creating them. The people have found out who has. You induced them to aid you in destroying the United States Bank by promising them a better currency. You told them the State banks would furnish it; they listened to your advice, and confided in your opinions and promises. You deceived them, and wide-spread ruin is the consequence. Then, sir, you promised them gold and silver. Where is it? And now, when by your own folly you have ruined the people, and bankrupted your own Government, you are demanding irredeemable Treasury notes, to enable you to live a few short days, before the tornado of public opinion comes to sweep you from your political existence.

Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from South Carolina to say, that if we did not pass this bill forthwith, he would offer a resolution that we adjourn and go home. Come on, sir, with your resolution. I challenge you to offer it; and I promise you that you shall have an amendment, which, in my judgment, will test fully your sincerity; and that is, that each and every one of us resign, go home to our constituents, and submit ourselves to their judgments and opinions. I come, Mr. Chairman, as you all know, from a district as doubtful as any gentleman in this House. I am anxious that something shall be done for the good of the country, and am satisfied that the people have nothing to hope or expect from the majority in this House.

I have great confidence in the honesty of purpose and intelligence of the people whom I have the honor to represent. I am willing again to make the "experiment" before my constituents; and if I am sacrificed, I shall have the consolation to know that I have fallen in the cause of my country. Will you, Mr. Chairman, and you, Mr. Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and all others of you who are setting at defiance the known wishes of your constituents, dare accept of the proposition to resign? No, sir; I know you will not, not one of you, as long as there is a dollar left in the Treasury. And, sir, if I might be permitted to indulge in a prediction, for the benefit of the gentleman from South Carolina, if he should be so fortunate as to get back here in December next, that instead of commanding, as he now does, more faithful troops than a Roman centurion, he will be left without a corporal's guard.

But, sir, I have done with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina; after the merited lashing which he has received at the hands of my colleague, [Mr. MENEFEE,] it is cruel to add to the sum of his afflictions. And now, sir, for the honorable gentleman, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG;] and before I proceed to examine his budget of blunders, I beg leave to refer the committee to the message of the President at the opening of this session. The President informed us, in almost the very first sentence of his message, that "we are blessed with domestic tranquillity, and all the elements of national prosperity;" and, Mr. Chairman, I am curious to know of what these elements are composed. Do you find "all the elements of national prosperity" in that commerce which but yesterday covered every sea, and wafted the rich productions of our soil to every clime and country? Do you find these "elements" in the now deserted but once prosperous manufacturing establishments of the North and the East and the West? Do you find them, sir, with that meritorious but persecuted class whom you have denominated the "aristocracy of wealth," the merchants? Do you find them, sir, in the depressed value of the products of the South and the West? Or are they found abiding with the industrious mechanic and laboring man, who have intrusted all their political power in your hands, under promises made to his "ear, but broken to his hear;" and who are now burning with indignation, demanding of you, in the name of their suffering wives and children, to cease your experiments and return to the sound principles of our fathers? Sir, your experiments may be sport to you, but they are death to my constituents. The President, who reposes upon his ottoman, or lounges upon his sofa, in the full enjoyment of twenty-five thousand dollars of the people's gold, knows nothing, feels nothing, in common with his suffering constituents. They petition him for relief, and he tells them that "all communities are apt to look to Government for too much." What, sir; insult the people by telling them that they are not to look to their own Government—institutions of their own creation—to the men who hold office by the tenure of their will—that they have nothing to hope from that Government in times of suffering and distress! And above all, sir, not content in adding insult to injury, that he will separate himself and his Government from the people, and take for himself and his faithful office holders all the gold and silver, leaving for the people, his masters, nothing but depreciated rags!

Mr. Chairman, it is no wonder the people are sweeping all before them, withering you like a Syrian sirocco; for cursed, thrice cursed, say I, be that Administration whose policy sends the poor man's wife and children supperless to bed; and, sir, all the people will cry amen!

Now, sir, for the chancellor of the exchequer [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] He sees, or thinks he sees, the evidences of brighter prospects in the distant view before us; he unfolds the mystery; he holds the key to the secret "elements of our national prosperity;" he stands forth as a messenger, proclaiming "good news and glad tidings" from high places, to make the hearts of our poor constituents leap with joy. Stand aside and listen to this syren song of better times and better days, for a second Daniel has come to judgment! Yes, sir, we are solemnly informed by the financial organ of this House, that we have passed the Rubicon; that another shower of British gold is coming. Prepare your silken purses, ye credulous people, and let the "interstices" be large, that you may certainly see it. But let us see what are these hitherto unknown "elements." The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says they are coming, because the Bank of England has, for the purposes of speculation, sent over a few millions of her gold on loan to our merchants, (which she will recall whenever it is her interest to do so,) and because the little Queen Victoria has established a viceroyalty in Canada, and sent over a few men and some money to subdue and keep in subjection the revolutionary spirit of the people of Canada; and because the States, or some of them, have sent to Europe their bonds, and have got the money; because the Legislature of New York have authorized private free banking; and last, though not least, this Administration has remained firm to its purpose: therefore, all will be well, and the country restored to its former prosperity! These, Mr. Chairman, these, sir, are statesmanlike, elevated, dignified, comprehensive views of prosperity, to come from the financial premier of this Administration. How admirably will the honorable gentleman's speech read in the British Parliament! How will all Europe gaze with wonder and astonishment at the simple means by which a great nation, yesterday in ruins, is to-day restored to solvency and prosperity by the magic powers of her rulers! Does the gentleman hope or expect to deceive the people, or lull them to repose, by any such reasons as these? Sir, if prosperity is coming, and I hope that it is, it will be found to flow from the recuperative power and energy, moral, commercial and political, of our people.

We are told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the bill now under consideration is designed for temperary purposes only; he told us the same story at the extra session. He then informed us, and so did the Secretary of the Treasury, that if we would grant the power to issue ten millions of Treasury notes, he would not call upon us again; and, sir, it would give me no surprise if, before the end of this session, we are called upon for ten millions more. The Secretary of the Treasury gave us directly to understand, at the extra session, that the resources and revenues of the Government would be ample to meet all the claims of the public creditors. It turns out not to be so; nor is it the first time that the Secretary has himself been deceived, and deceived us, as I will show you hereafter. And now, sir, what is the fact? The President sends us a special message, states that he must have money forthwith. Some of his faithful office holders are in need, no doubt, and he seems to complain that the "principal difficulty" that has brought on this "serious embarrassment" "arises from a prohibition in the present law to reissue such Treasury notes as might be paid in before they fall due." Sir, that prohibitory clause I had the honor of introducing; it has produced the very effect that I designed it should produce. I offered it because it was clear, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he designed to issue Treasury notes, without interest, to make them a currency; and because I then believed, and am now confirmed in opinion, that it was the deliberate intention of this Administration to create a Treasury bank, to be managed and controlled by the President and his friends. The Representatives of the people approved of that prohibitory clause, and neither the President nor his Secretary has any right to complain. But for that provision the people never would have known what was the true condition of the Treasury. These notes could have been issued and reissued, and reissued again and again, indefinitely, at the will and pleasure of the Secretary; and, sir, with a standing capital of ten millions, and ample power to kite from one sub-treasurer to another, who could tell when the day of reckoning would come, the extent of the debt created, and the amount of money wasted and expended?

The bill, as reported at the extra session, was designed to be connected with another favorite measure of this Administration, the Sub-Treasury, to be dovetailed upon it, as is evident from the fact that these notes were proposed to be issued by the Secretary without interest, and in sums as small as twenty dollars. The bill, sir, contains no express prohibition against the reissue of these notes; all the power you desire is embodied in this small bill; and if you can hasten it through to-night, and dare vote down all amendments, or gag us with the previous question in the House, (as I have no doubt you will,) or force us to leave this hall by your continuous night session, then, sir, you will have accomplished all you want. But, as I told you before, by the blessing of God, I will watch every footstep, and be with you at the life or death of this measure, come when it may.

The Secretary of the Treasury informed us, in his report of December last,

"That it now appears probable that, during the next year, means will be possessed, without any permanent loans, recall of former deposites, or increase of taxes, sufficient to redeem seasonably the Treasury notes that become payable, as well as to meet all ordinary appropriations."

How admirably has this Secretary predicted! In less than six short months thereafter it not only "appears probable," but is absolutely certain, that this Government, with her ten millions of Treasury notes, is not only out of money, but actually out of notes; and we are informed by the President that some means "must be selected that can be made efficient in its operations at a very early day, or it will be impracticable to preserve the national faith unbroken."

Mr. Chairman, there is a strange discrepancy in the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that, to my mind, is wholly unintelligible. The chairman of the committee states that the sum expected to be realized from banks, merchants' bonds, and the bonds executed by the Bank of the United States, on account of the Government stock in that institution, falling due in October, is ten millions of dollars. Now, sir, what says the Secretary in his report, made in obedience to the order of this House on the 26th March last? He states the actual amount in the deposite banks to be ($4,609,000) four million six hundred and nine thousand dollars. Here are the names of the banks, and the amount in each; but I will not trouble the committee with reading them off. He states, in his report of December last, that the bond payable by the United States Bank in September, 1838, is ($2,293,121) two million two hundred and ninety-three thousand one hundred and twenty-one dollars, and that the amount of postponed merchants' bonds is four millions of dollars. But, under the provisions of the law of the extra session, only one-third of the amount in the deposite banks can be collected, or is expected to be paid; and that sum will be (1,536,000) one million five hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars. The entire amount, therefore, which the Secretary can expect to command from these sources is ($7,829,121) seven million eight hundred and twenty-nine thousand one hundred and twenty-one dollars; and not ten millions, as the honorable chairman has so boldly stated. Nor is this the only blunder, in the long catalogue, which can be detected in the reports of the Secretary, and the statements of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The President, not knowing much about the finances, (for I suppose he has had other things of late to disturb him,) but, relying on the Secretary for correct information, says, in his communication of the 10th instant, that he "Submits a statement, prepared by the Secretary, by which it appears that the United States, with over twenty-eight millions in deposite with the States, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, are, from the situation in which those funds are placed, in immediate danger of being rendered unable to discharge with good faith and promptitude the various pecuniary obligations of the Government."

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the amount of the "statement" prepared by the Secretary is nothing more nor less than a general sweeping "statement," without data for a guide, or fact for its foundation. We are not advised how much of this fifteen millions is in the banks, nor are we informed how much is in the hands of "individuals," and who those individuals are. We know, from the Secretary's former report, that the entire amount in the deposite banks in March was (4,609,000) four million six hundred and nine thousand dollars; and, from his report in December last, that the amount of postponed merchants' bonds was four millions of dollars; making, in the whole, eight million six hundred and nine thousand dollars, (8,609,000.) And yet, sir, with these reports before us, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means declares in his place that we had "six millions due us from merchants," and in "October last eight millions from the deposite banks." Who shall we believe, the Secretary or the chairman of the committee? But, Mr. Chairman, if, according to the report of the Secretary, as furnished by the President, we had "upwards of fifteen millions of dollars in the hands of banks and individuals," and there is only shown to be eight million six six hundred and nine thousand dollars in the hands of the merchants and banks, I demand to know where is the remaining six millions and upwards of do lars? Why has not the Secretary fully informed us? Why has he not stated, fairly and honestly, who has this money? Why does he not raise the veil, and let us have a peep behind the curtain? Why not have given us the names of the thousands of little sub-treasurers that hang in clusters around the public crib, feasting and fattening and revelling on the people's money? Did he not fear that the long black list of defaulting leeches might darken for a season the halo of glory that so recently surrounded the "illustrious predecessor," and obscure the yet gloomier paths of the "successor." Or was he fearful that, by telling the whole truth, the people might see how nearly this modern Democracy and public plunder and the "spoils of victory" are convertible terms?

Mr. Chairman, I desire distinctly to be understood; and here in my place, before the assembled Representatives of the people, I charge the fact to be, and challenge any gentleman friendly to the Administration to deny, if he dare, (and if he does, I will prove the charge from the record,) that your land office receivers, in and out of office, have in their hands the enormous sum of one million nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars, ($1,950,000;) that your defaulting custom house officers not now in office, but who have been fully surfeited and given way for a fresh set, have in their hands the round sum of one million four hundred and twenty-seven thousand four hundred and ten dollars, ($1,427,410;) making, in all, three million three hundred and seventy-seven thousand four hundred and ten dollars, ($3,377,410.) Nor, sir, does this sum include the two thousand and more of defaulting postmasters; nor are the custom-house receivers now in office, who are defaulters to the Government, and other receivers and disbursers of the public revenue, embraced in this estimate; because the Secretary of the Treasury, for reasons best known to himself, has declined to give us the information. And, sir, that the committee, and this nation, may fully understand the subterfuges and shuffling evasions of the Secretary of the Treasury, in endeavoring to conceal from us the true condition of those in office, and the amount of their defalcation, I beg to refer the committee to the resolution which passed this House, on the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND;] and which, together with the novel reasons of the Secretary, I shall read in support of the charge, and for the edification of the committee. Here is the resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, as early in the next session as practicable, the names of all receivers, collectors, or depositories of the public money, who are in default to the Government; the amount of such default; the length of time due; the security given, if any; and how much has been, or will likely be, lost; together with a copy of all correspondence upon the subject, from the 1st of January, 1831, to this time."

This resolution was adopted at the extra session; and it not only required the Secretary of the Treasury to send us the names of "all receivers, collectors, or depositories of the public money, who are in default," but to send us also all the correspondence in relation to the subject. I repeat, sir, the Secretary was ordered to inform us "who are in default." The resolution was general, full, and comprehensive; requiring the names of all "who are in default," those in office, as well as those out of office. And, sir, instead of complying with the plain and simple meaning of this resolution, apparent upon its face, and which could have been understood by any schoolboy in my district of ten years of age, he has sent us, for our edification, a list of public defaulters, who were not in office on the 12th of October, 1837! Not one word, not one name, or one letter, with reference to those defaulters who are in office. And in order the more effectually to divert our attention from the true object of the inquiry, and say something which he supposed would satisfy my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] who was curious to know the true condition of these biped subtreasurers, he gives us in his report the following most extraordinary reasons. He says:

"But it will be seen that they do not include any cases connected with the Post Office Department, as its concerns have usually been kept separate, and are supposed not to be embraced in the purview of the resolution. For similar reasons, the cases of disbursing officers, attached to the army and navy, or to other departments, and the cases of individuals, such as merchants and former purchasers of public lands, are not included, though the indebtedness of many of them is very great."

What, Mr. Chairman, does the Secretary mean, when he speaks of the cases of "individuals," "such as merchants," and "former purchasers of public lands?" These are not the "individuals" embraced in the resolution. Why, sir, this is a downright insult to the understanding of the House. Does the Secretary suppose we are so stupid as to believe that there are any "merchants" who are defaulters to the Government as "collectors, receivers, or disbursers of the public revenue?" No such thing. They owe the Government, it is true, for duties on goods imported; but does it therefore follow that they are defaulters within the spirit or intention of the resolution to which I have referred? The Secretary, moreover, knew that, by a law of the extra session, these merchants were permitted, on certain conditions, to withhold payment for the periods and upon the conditions therein provided. So much for the merchants. And then comes the "former purchasers of public lands." Why, sir, I am astonished. Who is it that owes the Government the first dollar as a "former purchaser of public lands?" The Secretary ought to know, as every body knows, that the former purchasers of the public lands, made under the credit system, have long since either relinquished the purchase and obtained scrip therefor, or forfeited the land to the Government. I appeal to every Western man now before me to know whether or not I am right. You know, (pointing to Mr. HAMER, of Ohio,) you know, sir, that your Secretary either knows nothing about this matter, or is wilfully practising a deception upon this House and this nation.

I am sensible, Mr. Chairman, that this may be considered somewhat of a digression from the main question; but I have been forced into this debate, at this late hour, against my will; and if you are rendered the least unhappy, in consequence of some of the exposures which have been made, you must take the "responsibility" on yourselves. I have not yet done either with the Secretary and his defaulters, or with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Secretary gave us, at the extra session, as a reason for withholding from the States the fourth instalment, (which was passed by a party vote,) that the money was "chiefly in the custody of banks not paying specie." Sir, he might with more propriety have said it was "chiefly" in the hands of the office-holders, and not in the banks. And, sir, if these defaulting office-holders had then been compelled to disgorge the millions of the people's money in their hands, the necessity of withholding the fourth instalment would not have existed, and the pressing necessity for more Treasury notes greatly diminished. And, sir, while I am on this subject, I demand to know where these six millions and upwards of the people's money have gone? If the House will take up a resolution, which I submitted long since, calling for information on this subject, I am persuaded we will know all about it. But, sir, where is the money?

At the time the deposite law passed, the fourth instalment was in the Treasury, or reported to be there. It is not in the banks, because I have shown you there are only four millions there; it is not in the Treasury, because the Secretary says he has not got money enough, even in Treasury notes, to last him two days. It is, therefore, clear that the Secretary has taken the funds which by law were ordered to be deposited with the States, and appropriated the same to other purposes; or he knew, or should have known, that a very large amount thereof, and, for aught I know, more, was in the hands of his own defaulting officeholders. And that information, although expressly called for, has been evaded and withheld from the people's representatives. Mr. Chairman, I do not make these charges without having the evidence before me to sustain them. Sir, the correspondence touching the defalcations of land office receivers, has, at last, been laid on our tables. (I wish that every man in this nation had one.) The special agent of the Treasury, Mr. Garesche, appointed to examine into the condition of these offices, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 14th day of June, that the land office receiver at Columbus, in Mississippi, was a defaulter to the Government in the sum of $55,965 54; and gives as a reason for his defalcation, that he had been "led away from his duty by the example of his predecessor," and that "another receiver would probably follow in the footsteps of the two;" and thereupon recommends his "being retained" in "preference to another appointment!" and for aught I know, he was retained.

Do you remember, Mr. Chairman, that when a late administration came into power, in their laudable zeal to ferret out public plunderers, they found one poor Auditor who was defaulter for some few hundred dollars; and that forthwith his goods and chattels were seized and sold, and his body imprisoned; hunted down like a felon, with denunctations from high places? "Let him rot in prison, for he has only used the money of my people, but has dared to interfere with the freedom of elections." But now, sir, when a public defaulter is detected for a large amount, he is recommended to the mercy of the Secretary, and the question is not now asked, is he "honest and capable," but is he of our party? Nor, sir, is this all connected with these public defaulters; if you will examine the report to which I have referred, it will be found that, in many of the cases, where the defalcation is very large, the security taken by the Secretary is wholly inadequate. Take, for example, the late receiver at Helena, in Arkansas; there the defalcation is largely upwards of one hundred dollars, and the penalty of the bond only twenty thousand dollars. The report shows, throughout, a culpable negligence in this particular, on the part of the Secretary; and, sir, the result will turn out to be a loss to this Government of a very large amount. And now, Mr. Chairman, while we have these Sub-Treasurers before us, and have some practical knowledge as to the manner in which they have taken care of our money; and as you propose hereafter to place all of our money into the hands of these same individuals, or a fresh supply of them, in gold and silver, with all your provisions for security—such as strong boxes and bars, and bolts, and keys—I intend to offer an amendment to that bill, (if you should see fit to bring it up,) and I hope you will adopt it; that you have a strong chain provided for each Sub-Treasurer, well secured and fastened to his body and his strong box; who may, like a lion fastened to a pole, move in solemn mockery around the treasure of his master, to prevent him from running away and forgetting to leave his money behind

Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to the discussion of the policy of issuing Treasury notes, as distinguished from an open, acknowledged loan, and the effect of the one or the other of these measures upon the prosperity of the country, I must again refer to the statement submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in his speech on this bill, in order to show that he has not presented the condition of the Treasury in that open and candid manner demanded by every consideration of sound policy, more especially when he knows that, whatever may be its condition, we are bound to furnish the necessary supplies to enable the Government to discharge its obligations. But, sir, instead of a manly exhibition of the resources of the Government, present and to come, both the Chairman and the Secretary act upon the same principle which governs individuals who, conscious of their own bankruptcy, are endeavoring to conceal from their creditors and from the world that most important fact, under the fond hope that something may occur which, in the then unknown future, may save their credit from being impaired, and their honor from blemish. Mr. Chairman, can you hope for any such result? Do you flatter yourself that you can any longer deceive us or the people? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means yet stoutly denies that the Treasury is bankrupt, and attributes its present condition "not to any supposed want of resources, but to the manner of executing the Treasury note bill of October last." And pray, sir, who was it that was charged with the execution of that? Your President and Secretary. Who was it that designed to tickle the people with an experiment of Government paper money? Who was it that issued some six or more millions of this same paper, bearing the nominal interest of one mill per cent. per annum? Who was it that, by such an issue, designed to make this paper a currency if they could? And, sir, who could not have told the President and Secretary, whose duty it was to execute this act, that irredeemable paper money, without interest, and payable on time, would either return promptly into the Treasury, or sink far below the value of gold and silver? And, sir, it has returned, and with such wonderful rapidity that it scarcely performed a journey from the political metropolis to the commercial emporium of this nation. That division of this grand experiment, like all others that have preceded it, has wholly failed; and, sir, the residue of these notes have been issued at an interest of five and six per cent. Yes, sir, one creditor gets a note without interest, and another more highly favored one gets a note at five and six per cent. Is this right? is it just? is this your notion, Mr. Chairman, of "equal rights" and "equal privileges," now the cant words of your party? And what do you suppose, sir, will become of these five and six per cent. notes? Will they circulate as a currency, (each man who may be fortunate enough to get one, taking with him a slate and pencil to figure the interest,) or will not the capitalist take possession of them? Will not that odious Nick Biddle look after them to pay off his bonds, due in September?

Mr. Chairman, I fear that I am trespassing on your kindness; this subject involves so much of interest that I fear I shall weary your patience. [Here several members said, go on! go on!] Do not be uneasy. I have not yet done with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; he is a fine subject for dissection. An anecdote occurs to me just now; but I have not time for anecdotes; facts, sir, facts, are better. Now listen to some of the chairman's facts. He says "that, in January last, we had due us and in the Treasury eighteen millions of dollars;" and "at this moment, (says he) if the debts due us from banks and merchants were paid, we should have a balance of fifteen millions in the Treasury." Ghost of Falstaff! where art thou? Sir, I demand from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to know by what process he figures out any such result? Give us the particulars.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG rose, and said there was a small mistake of five millions, because the Treasury notes to be issued were considered as so much money.]

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, there is so much blundering in this business, and the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is so full of his financial romances, that I confess I do not understand him. I hope, sir, that I have convinced the honorable chairman by this time that he must figure again; always to be mindful, however, that he cannot figure this nation out of debt.

But, sir, what is the true condition of the Treasury, and its probable resources during the present year, and its expenditures? The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts from customs at	$13,000,000

From lands	5,000,000
United States Bank bond due in September	2,293 121
One-third of $4,609,000 from deposite banks	1,536.000
	$21,829,121
Merchants' bonds	4,000,000
	$25,829,121

Here, then, sir, you have the maximum of the expected receipts into the Treasury during the year 1838. But I contend that the first item of thirteen million five hundred thousand dollars from customs is greatly overrated. The Secretary himself places very little confidence in this estimate, because he says, in his report of December last, "that, in the fluctuating condition of our receipts and expenditures, results are likely to happen essentially different from some of these calculations." Yes, sir, these results have happened, and we are now acting upon one of them. But will you command from customs any thing like this sum? The importations of foreign merchandise are greatly reduced, and will fall far short of any previous year within the last ten years; and, besides, the ad valorem duties are rapidly diminishing. Yes, sir, the day is at hand when, if the extravagance and wanton waste of this Administration are not arrested, or the tariff greatly increased, you must either create another large national debt, or resort to direct taxes; the one or the other must, and will, be the certain and inevitable consequence.

But suppose you realize the full amount of the estimates, which I have shown is not probable, will that meet an expenditure of thirty seven million nine hundred and twenty-six thousand eight hundred and ninety-two dollars, as estimated by your Secretary of the Treasury, besides your millions of Treasury notes now outstanding? Mr. Chairman, your expenditures will greatly exceed the receipts into the Treasury. At the end of the year, according to your own estimates, you will be near twenty millions in debt. How will you pay it? Will you borrow the money at three, or not exceeding four per cent. or will you issue Treasury notes at six per cent.? taxing the people the difference of from two to three per cent. on twenty millions of dollars, in order to keep up appearances of solvency, and prevent the odium of another national debt. Do you really suppose that the people are such stupid fools as not to know, that, when you issue Treasury notes at six per centum to command money, when you could borrow as much as you wanted at from three to four per cent. they (the People) are not the sufferers and the victims of your folly? And, sir, does this Administration place such a low estimate on the intelligence of the People as to believe that they are incapable of understanding that an issue of ten millions of Treasury notes is just as much a national debt as though the identical sum was borrowed by direct and open loan? Sir, I will not detain this committee, attentive as it is, in the discussion of the constitutional power to issue these notes. To say the least of it, the power is constructive, doubtful, and by no means clearly defined. The Constitution gives us express power to "borrow money," but not to issue bills of credit; and these notes are bills of credit. Those who oppose a National Bank on constitutional principles, and are the advocates of this Treasury note bank, or more properly called old continental currency, had better supply themselves with arguments to prove to the People that they are not more ultra in the exercise of Federal power than the Federalists of '98. They had better renounce the name of "Democrat," and assume that which their policy and their measures indicate them to be. And, sir, to those who profess to "follow in the footsteps of their illustrious predecessor," I hope that I do not intrude, if I commend to their serious judgment the opinions of that "predecessor," as expressed in his letter to the editor of the Globe, and dated at the Hermitage, July, 1837. He said, among other things,

"I hope no Treasury notes will be issued; the Treasury drafts upon actual deposites are constitutional, and do not partake of paper credit as Treasury notes, which are subject to depreciation by the merchants and banks, and shavers and brokers, and will be if issued."

And now, sir, with all your promises to follow in his footsteps, although many of you, from the highest to the lowest, have come into office from the power of his mighty name, when you have returned him to the Hermitage you turn a deaf ear to his counsels, and set at naught his entreaties. But this is no business of mine; you can settle the account with the People, your masters.

The question, Mr. Chairman, therefore, for us to decide is, whether it is best that we should issue Treasury notes to supply the wants of the Government, or borrow the money. It has been shown that, in order to keep these notes from returning rapidly into the Treasury, they have been, and are designed to be, for the future, issued with an interest of six per cent.; and it is admitted that this Government can obtain money, by direct loan, at from three to four per cent. not paper money, irredeemable and payable on time, but gold and silver; and no man in his proper senses will pretend to say that the credit and of the Government would not prefer to receive gold or silver, or its equivalent, to your depreciated modern continental paper.

The bonds of this Government, bearing an interest of three per cent. would readily command specie in Europe, and the importation of the metallic substances would increase the facilities of the banks in resuming specie payments, and add greatly to the circulation of the precious metals, so much desired by the people, and pretended to be desired by this Administration. Sir, when my honorable colleague, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] at the extra session, proposed, as a substitute for your Treasury note bill, to sell the bonds of the Bank of the United States, which had been executed on account of the Government stock formerly held in that Bank, and which then amounted to upwards of seven millions of dollars, you rejected the proposition by an unbroken party vote. Nothing would answer your purposes but your experiment of Treasury notes. That experiment has been made, and, instead of affording relief to the people and the Treasury, it has but increased your embarrassments. Sir, you pretend now to be the advocates of an exclusive gold and silver circulation; and at the very moment you are making war upon the banks and bank paper, and charging the people with being subject to their influence, and controlling the elective franchise, you are pressing their representatives for more paper money; yes, sir, that same character of paper money which depreciated in the hands of our Revolutionary fathers, who spent their lives and their fortunes in the service of their country, and who have not to this day been remunerated by this Government; and who have gone down into the grave in suffering and sorrow, as departed monuments of the ingratitude of their sons. Sir, I put it to the solemn consideration of the committee, in the name of my whole country; that country which is ours to preserve, and which the Constitution has confided to our guardian care; nay, sir, I demand of you, by the sufferings of our fathers, and the affliction of our common constituents, to pause in your mad career. Throw off your party trammels, assume the character of statesmen, and decide in reference to this question as becomes dignified legislators, deliberating for the present and future weal of our once prosperous but now bleeding country. And, sir, if you will not thus act, then I appeal to that people whom you have wronged, and whose interests you have disregarded, and shall await with confidence their judgment at the people.

SPEECH OF MR. KENNEDY, OF MARYLAND,

In the House of Representatives, June 22, 1838—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the "bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue"—

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland rose and addressed the Committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I did not believe, until within a few days past, that the gentlemen who have taken charge of this bill would have again pressed its consideration on the House. I thought, sir, that under the admonition of public sentiment, which has recently through so many channels been conveyed to the ear of the Administration, this Sub-Treasury scheme would be regarded as a doomed and foregone expedient, stamped in advance with the reprobation of the country, and no longer to be entertained in discussion here. Never, in the history of this Government, has there been presented a public measure, in reference to which the wishes of the constituent body have been more explicitly communicated to the representative. It has been canvassed by the people with a scrupulous deliberation; it has been investigated by them with all that care which a painful sense of present evil could suggest, and they have expressed their disapprobation of it in every form in which they were able to find a voice. I did not suppose that with the principles by which the friends of the Administration in this body affect to be governed, they could have brought themselves so far to resist that voice as again to propose the bill. I thought indeed, sir, that the late action of Congress, in the almost unanimous and even eager repeal of the Treasury order of July, 1836, would be construed as a decisive sentence against this measure. I cannot understand how that repeal and this bill may consist with each other; and I should be glad to hear some intelligible reconcilement of the two. It is true that the joint resolution to which I refer, does not in express terms repeal the Treasury Circular; but it accomplishes the same end, quite as effectually, by forbidding the Secretary to discriminate in the moneys he receives for public dues; and as he has kindly volunteered to say that he will not refuse good bank paper for the customs, he is no longer at liberty to refuse it for public lands, and so we have in fact repealed that noxious Treasury order which has so long annoyed the country.

That order being out of the way, I would ask to what elements may all this machinery of the Sub-Treasury apply? Is it necessary to build vaults, and construct safes, and create all the agencies designated in this bill to guard a few rolls of bank paper? The apparatus of this scheme essentially belongs to the gold and silver reign, it deals only in coin, and has its existence and daily continuance in the phantasmagoria of the hard-money system. The moment you abandon the absolute coined metal, your Treasury system becomes a system of credit in account, impalpable to the guardianship of stone and iron, unamenable to lock and key; it rests upon the personal fidelity and integrity of your agents. How shall the details of this bill apply to it?

Mr. Chairman, I especially regret that this bill has been brought forward at this time, because I know that a most happy conviction began to gain ground with the public, that it was now the purpose of the Administration to bring itself within the range of the business and wants of the community, to take a position in which it might sympathize with the people, and, if not actually extend its aid, at least abandon its indifference to their distresses; that it meant now to give up its war against the currency; to cast aside its experiments, devices, and jejune expedients, and to address itself honestly, with the lights of past experience, to the actual need of the nation. This hope was vivified by the late repeal of the circular; it had gained gradual strength by the long slumber of this Sub-Treasury bill; it was corroborated by the unwonted tone of toleration in which many of the friends of the Administration, in both Houses of Congress, have lately spoken of the banks, and by the awakening good sense with which they have derided and renounced the singular folly of the hard money imposture. The people had, therefore, begun to turn their faces towards the dawn of happier times, and to promise themselves a speedy restoration of that prosperity which had been denied them only by the unwise action of their own Government. The very agitation of this measure, in the midst of these joyful hopes, has struck despondency deep into the bosom of the trading classes, and the people now watch your proceedings here with renewed alarm and anxious suspense; they daily ask, in a tone of wonder, can it be true that you design to perpetrate the enormity of putting this odious system upon the country?

The zeal with which the bill is urged leaves no room to doubt the sincere desire of its projectors to carry it into effect, and I have heard that its friends entertain hopes of its passage. Such a result may possibly demonstrate the power of a majority on this floor, and show that here, at least, notwithstanding the general revolt of the nation, the banner of the Administration, torn as it has been in recent conflicts, is still upheld by men bold enough to defy the almost universal popular voice. That struggle will yield but a worthless triumph, whose greatest success can have no better end than to continue, for a brief space, the oppressions of a power against which public judgment is accumulating its censure, with fresh and still fresher indignation, and which is surely doomed to be prostrated by those overwhelming bursts of indignation of which the Administration have already had a foretaste.

Mr. Chairman, this bill assumes to be remedial in its character. It arises out of a suggestion of the President, made at a time when he had called Congress together to deliberate upon a great national convulsion which had brought disaster into every class of society. It may be said to have been the only topic of consideration at that moment; it was the only relief proposed. Although the afflictions of that day are passing away, still they are yet severely felt, and this measure is again presented, as at first it was, as a measure of relief. In that view I mean to discuss it, and to test its adequacy to its proposed object, by calling the attention of the committee to the origin and nature of the evils which it is designed to remedy.

Sir, I was somewhat curious to know upon what grounds it would be advocated here as a measure of relief, and I have therefore listened to the debate with eager attention. On one side of the House I found the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the foster parent of the bill, a thorough going State bank advocate, even carrying his predilections for banking to what I should call a point of ultraism. But a few weeks ago, when the Treasury note bill was under discussion, he opened that debate with congratulations upon the returning prosperity of the country, and with the declaration that the great license of free banking which had just been granted by the Legislature of New York, marked an era in the history of our country from which we were to derive a permanent and solid restoration of health and strength. This new free banking, with its expected millions—even fifty or a hundred—was now to be superadded to the present banking system of New York, and the country, in his opinion, was to thrive under that impulse beyond all former example. Such, sir, was the tone of feeling with which the gentleman from the city of New York entered upon the discussion of this Sub-Treasury bill. He is a bank man, sir, an ultra State bank advocate. He is emphatically for the paper system, even greatly enlarged beyond its present amount. He sees in this system the maintenance of the superiority of New York, and the great aid of commerce. Indeed, from his remarks upon this bill, he has persuaded himself, oddly enough, I think, that its tendency and purpose are, in fact, to aid and sustain the banks. He defends and supports it with that view, and as powerfully conducive to advance the interest of his own city.

On the other hand, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] is altogether in the opposite key. This gentleman is profoundly indoctrinated with the dogmas of the hard-money school; he is persuaded that all our sufferings and all our weakness have come from the banking system. That system, in his judgment, has not only held this nation in thrall to Great Britain, but it has rendered the Southern States the "colonial vassals" of their Northern brethren. He views the over-towering elevation of New York with an unfriendly eye; sees in it the fruit of systematic oppression, exercised by the General Government, against the South; and his whole desire is to break up that commercial connection which he deems so unnatural and so hurtful; to give to the South a circle of trade circumscribed to its own limits, and thus render it independent of the North. In this bill he persuades himself he finds the means of accomplishing his purpose. It is the only measure which, in his judgment, will break down the banking system, and pluck from New York the fortunate honors of her present ascendency.

Sir, the bill has another class of supporters. They may be said to be represented by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER.] The tenets of this class may be described, in brief, as professing to inculcate that bank credits have permanently crippled the commerce and industry of this country; that upon the hard-money system—the pure metallic currency—we should have advanced by more rapid strides to wealth and power, and that we should now have exhibited a mercantile community free from all apprehension of those disturbances and dangers to which experience has proved our currency to be subject. In the opinion of the honorable gentleman, the age has at last received the true light, and is now about to discard paper money for ever, as unworthy the improved philosophy of our day; and he is especially anxious that the United States should take time by the forelock, and be the first to step into this glorious reformation. That step, he believes, will be made by passing this bill.

There is yet another class, of whom the gentleman from Virginia, who spoke before his colleague on that side, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] may be deemed the interpreter. They are the mere naked divorce men. Without professing to see any thing mischievous in banking, or any thing good in it, they stand on the simple ground of the Constitution, and affirm, whether it be expedient or not, that the Government has no power to receive a bank note in payment of any thing; that the whole usage of the people of the United States, from the beginning down to the present day, has been vicious, unconstitutional, and naught. That uniform and unvarying precedent is nothing; that acquiescence for half a century is nothing, that the judgment of courts, the expositions of contemporaries, the enactments of Legislatures, and the opinions of cabinets uncontradicted and unreversed from generation to generation, are nothing; and that whatever of constitutional power was a matter of doubt on the first day of the Government, will, in spite of all decisions and of all conformity, be a matter of doubt and debate a thousand years hence. For these reasons this class also sustains this measure.

In the midst of this contrariety of opinion, I could not but remark how exceedingly difficult it was for one in my situation, being new to this House, and to the respective claims of gentlemen here to be ranked as leaders, to make a sober and just estimate of the grounds upon which the Administration hopes to sustain this bill before the country. Surely one or the other of these motley-opinioned defenders of the scheme can have but little claim to be considered as exponents of the Executive mind! If the bill be what the member from New York represents it, I would advise the gentlemen from the South to pause and look about them, lest they make a fatal mistake in their method of pulling down the city of New York, and building up Charleston. And to say the truth, I think there is reason to fear that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is not altogether wrong in his expectations. With that unscrupulous favoritism by which this and the last Administration have been accustomed to execute the laws, New York, provided she demean herself less contumaciously than she has lately done, may turn her political acquiescence to some account under this proposed system. There is power in it, as I shall hereafter show, for the conferring of any amount of favor. But it is very clear that the gentlemen of the South do not, in any one point, agree in the conclusions, or give credit to the wisdom of the honorable chairman.

If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] be right in his estimate of the character and tendency of this bill, then I warn the representatives of the North to look to it. They are not hard money men—they do not wish to strangle the banking system—above all, I presume, they do not wish to check the commerce or restrain the industry of their own region. If they do, let them follow the lead of the member from South Carolina; and when they go home to their constituents, let them say that they have been converted to a conviction of the soundness of his views, and therefore voted for the bill.

Mr. Chaiman, I am not unfriendly to the prosperity of South Carolina. No man on this floor wishes her well more heartily than I do; and look with a profound gratification to that noble and wise spirit of enterprise which has lately prompted her to scale the Alleghany with her great road. God speed her in that glorious rivalry by which she has been endeavored to place herself on a commanding eminence amongst the States! There lies her path to wealth, power and happiness; let her pursue it steadily, and she will reap her reward. None will exult in it more than myself. But when she aims at breaking up the commercial union of the North and South, and especially when she teaches her people that this Government has been unkind to the South, she gives a dangerous direction to their thoughts. A fancy of discontent is quite as stimulating as a real cause, and may teach the weaker-gifted in the gifts of head and heart the mischievous habit of calculating the value of our Union. Whether designed or not, these preachings of discontent tend towards that horrible catastrophe of disunion, with the contemplation of which I would not have our people familiar. It is in the very bounty of the Almighty that our North and South are united in those beautiful bonds of brotherhood which their mutual commerce with each other have created; it will be the regret of this whole continent, when independent circles of trade shall be formed, which shall leave the different geographical sections of the country no longer useful to each other in their dealings. Sir, it will lead irresistibly to separation.

I would hope, sir, that these thoughts, or any thought kindred to them, never entered the mind of the gentleman from South Carolina in his support of this bill, and that, after all, he has been harmlessly dealing in the dogmas of that new philosophy which has of late become so peculiarly the product of his own State. South Carolina has, for a time, gone in pursuit of strange gods—she has fallen into the spiritual sins of false doctrine, heresy, and schism—she has become mischievously sophisticated—bewildered with political metaphysics—I trust she will soon return to that rectitude of opinion which is more compatible with the moral rectitude and lofty patriotic bearing that distinguish her sons.

I said, sir, that I wished to test this measure as a measure of remedy, and, with that view, would endeavor to trace our present disasters up to their origin. I shall do it as briefly as the nature of the inquiry and my respect for the patience of this committee, already tried to its utmost verge, will permit.

There was an opinion sedulously inculcated during the latter part of the last Administration, that the specie basis of the country was insufficient to sustain the paper circulation, and the people were taught to believe that it would be a wholesome exercise of the power of the Government, and, in fact, was its duty, to take measures for the importation of the precious metals. Every body remembers when this opinion began to predominate. It was about midway in that career of patchwork expedients to give us a "better currency," which constituted first the dream, and finally the monomania, of Jacksonism. Gouge had just published his book of bank horrors, in which, somewhat after the manner of an antimasonic pamphlet, or one of Parson Weems's tracts, "God's Revenge Against Drunkenness," he had arrayed in melancholy juxtaposition all the vices, sins, and misdemeanors which could be traced to his subject, or be brought to its illustration. This book suggested the hard money scheme. It fell in the way of the President just about that time when he was beginning to doubt the efficacy of the great and famous EXPERIMENT. It furnished him a happy thought, when it pointed out to him how he might retreat from the odium of the possible and even then probable failure of that scheme. From that moment he was taken with the hard money madness, and straightway the whole tribe of dependants, following his lead, took the same frenzy, and soon became even more rabid than their chief.

This was not the least mischievous of the errors which characterized that extraordinary era of popular delusion. The notion that the specie basis was inadequate to the currency, and that it was the province of the Government to enlarge it by forced importations, was the principal cause that brought about the catastrophe of the suspension. To those who have not fully studied the subject, it may sound like a paradox, but it is nevertheless true, that the suspension of specie payments was induced by the importation of the precious metals; and the resumption is to be accomplished—in fact has already been prepared, and we may consummated—by the exportation of them.

I shall, before I conclude, have occasion to notice this importation of specie with more particularity; for the present, I design to inquire into the soundness of the position assumed—whether the coin was insufficient to sustain the currency, and whether good was likely to result from the interference of the Government. To the presumptuous, unskilful, and ignorant intermeddling of the Government with this subject, the common opinion has already assigned the common distress. I wish to inquire if there be not cause for this imputation.

The ratio which specie may safely bear to the paper circulation of the banks is altogether incapable of fixed and determinate regulation. It necessarily must change with respect to time, place, and circumstance—defying all attempt at invariable adjustment. It is subject to the ordinary mercantile relations of supply and demand, and will be governed by the principles applicable to those relations. The fundamental law of our country requires that all paper should be convertible into gold and silver; it has not indulged the absurdity of contemplating the possibility that all would be converted. It is the creditor's right to require his debtor to pay in coin. The purport of this provision is to furnish a standard of value; it refers every object of traffic to the value of the precious metals, but does not require that these metals shall be the actual commutation in every transaction of trade. The convenience of society has uniformly made the equivalent of coin, in the great affairs of trade, more acceptable than the coin itself, and coin now is no longer necessary as a commutation for bank paper, than as its presence is requisite to preserve the standard of value in the paper. What is the ratio of coin necessary for this purpose, is a problem that will ever be varying in its terms. It is very obvious that, if every holder of bank paper insist upon having the coin at any given moment, the richest bank may be compelled to abandon business; if the public be content not to demand it, it is equally clear that a very small portion of coin need be kept on hand. We must not confound ultimate solvency with this question of convertibility. Banks, no more than private individuals, are affected in their actual solvency by not having coin at hand, although the effects of not paying in coin when required are very different in the two cases; the bank would be discredited for want of punctuality; the individual would escape almost without comment. It is, therefore, the peculiar duty of banks to keep a portion of their funds in hard money, sufficient to redeem so much of their circulation as may be demanded. If they kept an amount equal to their circulation, they would lose the legitimate profit of their business; if they kept less than might be demanded of them, they run the risk of losing their credit. They must ascertain the safe medium between these two extremes. What is that medium can never be so accurately determined by any authority as by the banks themselves. It is a question which will depend upon the state of public confidence, and that confidence must, from its nature, be affected by the circumstances or events of the day. No degree of prudence, nor no amount of wealth, would suffice to save a bank from being drained of its coin, if the whole community were determined to set upon it with a demand for coin. Even if the specie in its possession exceed the circulation, the bank may still be exhausted, provided it be determined to continue its business and to maintain that circulation at a fixed amount. A hundred dollar note paid out on discount to-day may be returned with a demand for specie to-morrow; if it be reissued in another discount, in pursuance of the purpose to keep up the circulation, it may again return to draw its amount in specie, and through a continuation of this process the same note may take out of the vault ten times its own amount of coin.

Again, sir, this relation will be affected by the condition of the community in which it exists. An active thriving business, driven in a densely peopled region, promotes rapidity of circulation. The bank note passes from hand to hand with such celerity as to give it renewed confidence in its progress. In such a state of things a given amount of paper performs double, treble, perhaps tenfold work in the way of exchanges; whilst in a sluggish community, of amongst a widely scattered population, the circulation, from the mere slowness of its movement, requires a broader basis of specie.

I refer, Mr. Chairman, very cursorily to these considerations, to show how futile must be the endeavor to regulate the relation of specie to paper by any fixed and unvarying law; how still more absurd it must be to make this a subject of Government action.

I have taken some pains, sir, to ascertain what has, in fact, been this relation in our own country for several years past. That inquiry has afforded me the following results: From the year 1830, the returns to the Government, upon this subject, have been full, and, I believe, accurate. They will show that from that period down to the present year, 1838, the aggregate specie in all the banks has averaged a ratio of between one-third and one-fourth of the circulation; in 1830 the circulation was a fraction less than three of paper to one of specie in the banks; in 1837, less than four to one.

Dividing the States into sections, with reference to the nature of their trade and population, we shall find by the official returns, that on the 1st of January, 1837—a period, let it be remarked, two months anterior to that at which General Jackson boasted of the prosperity and happiness of the country, and of the success of his humble efforts to restore a sound currency—in the six New England States, the circulation was rather above five dollars of paper for one of specie in the banks of that region; that in the five Middle States, including this District of Columbia, the paper was rather less than three to one; that in the four Southern States, including Florida, it was under four to one; and in the six principal Western States, it was but a fraction above two to one. In the State of Massachusetts, a thickly peopled and busy State, the bank circulation from 1830 to 1837 vibrated between five to one and eight to one—never more than a small fraction below five, nor above eight. Connecticut presents about the same relation. New York, in 1834, exhibited about six of paper to one of specie; since that period it has shown about three to one. The general aggregate of the United States, as I before remarked, varies slightly between three and four to one, during the last eight years; the commencement of that period being one in which the currency of this country was confessedly the best in the world; the termination of it certainly presenting the worst of which we have any knowledge in any mercantile nation. And yet, sir, in 1830 we had not, it is supposed, above forty millions of specie in the country, whilst now it is proclaimed, as one of the fruits of our wise statesmanship, that we have accumulated near one hundred millions. The truth is, our currency has been gradually growing worse, notwithstanding all our efforts to increase the specie; it has lost its excellence in proportion as it has become the care of the Government.

Turning to Great Britian we shall find nearly the same results. From the year 1880 down to 1830, a computation of the circulation of the Bank of England will afford an annual average of about four pounds sterling in paper to one of bullion. In August, 1797, a few months after the suspension of specie payments, the circulation of the bank was about eleven millions sterling to four of bullion; in 1798, it was £12,190,610 sterling to £5,546,100 of bullion, less than two to one. In 1799 it was about as 13 to 7; and in 1800 and 1801 nearly the same; showing that, for nearly five years after the suspension, the ratio of specie to circulation was larger than, with some few exceptions, it had ever been before or afterwards. In 1783, more than thirteen years before the suspension, the circulation was six and a third millions to little more than half a million of bullion. In 1825, four years after the resumption, the circulation was £19,398,840 sterling to £3,634,370, somewhat above five to one.

The Bank of France suspended specie payments in 1806, for about four months; yet France has upwards of six hundred millions of dollars in her specie currency. The bank issues no note of less denomination than five hundred francs, equal to one hundred dollars, and has always sustained a very high credit.

I have brought these facts into view, Mr. Chairman, still further to demonstrate the natural, the insuperable difficulty of a fixed ratio, and also to show how little the solvency of a bank depends upon the amount of specie which it may have on hand. It belongs to the credit system, in whatever manner that system may be constructed, to be subject to occasional variations in its relation to the metallic basis of the country; and no care of the Government can possibly remove the causes which may affect that relation. The true principle by which it is controlled is that which is suggested by the demands of trade and the amount of foreign debt—in other words, by the state of foreign exchange. A demand for specie abroad will necessarily influence this relation at home. The precious metals will perform their office in the liquidation of that demand, in spite of all the care of Government; and whilst they are so employed, the only safeguard which the domestic currency can resort to is that prudent economy in the concerns of trade which the private judgment of every man suggests to him in his individual concerns when his affairs have been deranged by a too prodigal expenditure of his means.

Ours, sir, is essentially a credit system, gauged by gold and silver. To whatever disorders it may be incident, it is still that to which we owe our rapid advance to national prosperity, and we will never part with it for any promise of good from the hard money scheme. We have been educated in the perception of its value; it is domesticated in our homes; furnishes our ordinary implements in the thrift of life, and has become constitutionally parcel of ourselves. Whatever may be its defects, we take it with them, in preference to any substitute. If it has its fluctuations, so has the pure metallic currency, not less hurtful than those of paper. The accumulation of a foreign debt would, with that currency, as with any other, carry away the precious metals, and thus raise the value of all that were left behind. If a merchant import gold when the country is in want of hardware or cloth, gold will grow to be redundant and cheap, whilst hardware and cloth will become dear. A failure of a crop may stint the supply of credits abroad; a foreign subsidy may take away a portion of your coin; every cause which operates in this form, will change prices relatively to the precious metals, as they change them in reference to good paper. It is commerce and industry and enterprise that produce these fluctuations; a very small share of the evil is ordinarily to be ascribed to the nature of the currency.

In reference to this question of the ratio, it is proper to inquire a little more into the nature of what is termed the currency. It has been often contended here that the Constitution allows no currency but gold and silver. Sir, the Constitution makes no reference to currency at all. It supplies, as I have said before, the standard for all values, and that is all that it professes to do. It was manifestly so understood by its founders when General Hamilten, in the first year of General Washington's administration, issued his Treasury order to receive bank paper, and when, in one year afterwards, (1791) Congress ratified that order by positive legislation. The currency of the country, in the aspect of it which I propose to present, includes that whole mass of paper credits which are use I in commercial dealings for the discharge or transfer of debt. It embraces promissory notes, bills of exchange, draughts, checks, and other evidences of indebtedness All of these, sir, by the theory of our Constitution, are as much payable in coin as the notes of a bank. They all profess to be convertible or redeemable paper; yet no individual ever thinks it his duty to keep gold or silver at hand to meet such engagements. If coin be demanded, his resource is the bank; so that, through this process, the banks may be said to be under an obligation to provide for the convertibility of all this amount of paper. Compare the specie retained by the banks with the sum of all these engagements, and it will be seen that the ratio is not one-tenth—perhaps not a twentieth—and yet it is amply sufficient. In England, since the passage of the law making the notes of the Bank a legal tender every where but at the Bank itself, the directors have endeavored to establish the rule of keeping one-third of the amount of their circulation and deposites in bullion. They have not been very successful in this endeavor. That Bank now virtually supplies the coin of the three kingdoms, and upon a basis of about ten millions sterling of bullion, sustains a bank circulation, including all the country banks, as well as those of Scotland and Ireland, not much short of sixty millions.

Sir, I would not have troubled the committee with this uninviting detail of money statistics, if I were not aware that upon this subject many errors of opinion have obtained credit with the country during the last eight years—errors which I think may be distinctly traced to the sedulous efforts made by the last Administration to persuade the people than an increased supply of the precious metals was essential to the safety of our currency, and that the Government itself, without respect to the laws of trade—nay, even in direct counteraction of them—might compel their importation from foreign countries. This opinion, enforced with all the official authority of the Executive, has engendered a brood of false doctrines, and the people have consequently turned to counting the coin as the only test of the prosperity of the country.

While such has been the course of the late Administration, it is worthy of remark that the "follower in its footsteps" began his career with the declaration of the constitutional disability of the Government to interfere with this department of our social economy, even so far as to correct the evils which the ill-judged and incessant interference of his predecessor had inflicted upon the country. Holding this doctrine of the present Executive altogether indefensible, either in the reason of the case or in the face of established and invariable precedent, I think the people have a right to demand from the Government that the remedy proposed shall be broad enough to meet the whole extent of the disease.

Mr. Chairman, it is easy to understand how prompt and expansive must have been the effect of this artificial animation of the money action upon the general concerns of trade. It quickened business in every department of life, and greatly increased consumption. The consequence of this was to increase importation—not by overtrading, but by increasing the demand. And then, sir, prices naturally rose. Every thing that was bought was sure to sell at an advance; you might scarcely go wrong in a speculation. Trade traffic, and adventure spurned their old and sober channels. They fell into the hands of new men, and dealt in new commodities. The farmer turned from his plough, and the mechanic from his tools, to become lords of boundless acres, and the founders of towns and cities. People became extravagant in their habits of expense, and rioted in the imagination of riches infinite. France was not more mad in the wild frenzy of Law's great scheme, than were our people in this revel of fancied wealth.

At this epoch another movement was made—the most extraordinary of all the blunders of that eccentric and wrong headed Administration. I scarcely know in what language to characterize the pre-eminent folly of the measure with which Gen. Jackson attempted to check the evil inclinations of this period. I have before said, Mr. Chairman, that, about midway in the career of the experiment, the President fell upon the hard money scheme. Towards the end of the year 1835, there were few men around him who did not perceive that the ultimate failure of the experiment was not altogether so impossible an event as the first boastings of its author might have warranted them in believing. The President himself, it is very clear, began to belive it probable. It was the thought of the moment, the instinct of cunning, which prompted him to take shelter against the disgrace of failure, in that new device of bringing the nation to the constitutional currency, the pure metallic system. We all remember how suddenly this change came over the land; and we can never forget the efforts of General Jackson to discredit the paper system which he had just matured, nor his strenuous exertions to introduce coin into the country. Sir, his success in these endeavors has been the chief topic of his glorification. The frequent plaudits of his flatterers are still ringing in our ears with the boast of the treasures he has amassed; and even now they have not ceased to render tribute to his renown in this achievement. This Sub-Treasury bill itself is but another act of mean homage offered up to him in that same hollow glorification—it is part and parcel of the trickery by which a name has been sought to be canonized, and a party enabled to sustain its dynasty of imposture. I beg, sir, to call the attention of the committee to these measures for increasing the supply of the precious metals, and for retaining them in the country.

I proceed now, Mr. Chairman, to trace out the further action of the Government upon this subject, and, in the course of this inquiry, to show in what measures of the late Administration the mischievous opinions to which I have just referred were embodied as active principles.

From the earliest period of this Government the people have been accustomed to contemplate the banking system as a system, to a certain extent, under Federal control. Their experience of its beneficence, which has not been small, has invariably presented it to them as a system, partly within the management of the States, and partly directed by the power and interests of the Union. Twice only, since the year 1791, has this Federal superintendence been suspended, and at each of these epochs the consequences have been the same—an excessive increase of local banking, a total derangement of the currency, a succession of ruinous bankruptcies, and a suspension of specie payments. Whilst the Federal control existed, these evils were unknown; and, as soon as that control was restored, they rapidly disappeared.

The banking system of every mercantile country, sir, presents, in greater or less development, two conspicuous principles of commanding influence in their respective spheres—the principle of alliance or centralization, and the principle of competition. These are more especially remarkable in the United States, where our political and commercial relations tend to give them great importance. The principle of centralization, notwithstanding the unfriendly comments by which it has been assailed of late, with a view to render it odious, is of singular value to our system. I am convinced that, without it, no system of banking could be devised which would be tolerated by the country; that, with it, our system becomes all that the public convenience or welfare demands.

This country, sir, is divided, in reference to trade, into two great sections: the first, embracing the whole North, may be denominated the commercial section; the second, comprising the South, the producing section. The Middle and West are tributary to both. Nothing can be more happy for our social welfare than this natural division of our interests. In the beneficence of Providence it seems to have been ordered as the great instrument of harmonious union to the millions who now inhabit and who shall hereafter dwell upon this immense extent of territory. The imports of the North are paid for by the purchase of foreign credits from the South. The great crop of the South, which is annually exported to England and France, produces the fund upon which the importer draws for the liquidation of his foreign debt; the manufacturer, too, of the North, purchases his raw material in the South. Thus is created a yearly demand, at an appointed season, for funds in the South. The importations of the North being distributed far and wide over the whole country, in their turn, also, and at an appointed season, create a similar demand for funds at the point of import. The tide flows and ebbs with exact regularity; or, rather, this tendency of money-demand, like the monsoon, steadily drives for six months in one direction, and six months in its opposite, with a precision which enables every one to count upon its motion. At one season, some forty or fifty millions are needed in the South; but a few months roll round, when the same amount is needed in the North. It is impossible to conceive a state of trade to which that feature of the banking system I have characterized as the principle of centralization is more indispensable than this.

A banking system under the control of one mind, diffusing itself to the extremities of the Union by a number of banks all in alliance, subject to the same government, and never acting in conflict with each other, but ever uniting to produce a common result, would seem to be the only machinery by which such a circle of trade could be advantageously sustained. The head of this system holds a position from which he has a view of the whole field of commercial action. He perceives at what point succors may be needed, and where the force is redundant. He has power to subtract from the one for the relief of the other. When funds are necessary in New Orleans, and are no longer required at New York, the transfer is but a simple act of his will. When they have performed their office in the South, it is as easy to retransfer them to their former position. Thus, sir, have the demands of that great internal trade been regulated with a simplicity and an effect wholly without a parrallel in any other country on the globe. The power to accomplish this is the result of the principle of centralization. Without such a principle all would soon degenerate into confusion.

We have, sir, six and twenty independent Governments, sovereign as respects this question of banking, all capable of prescribing laws for its management, with the single restraint that they shall make nothing else than gold and silver a tender for the payment of debt. This restraint, weak as it is, is the only point of common obligation. They have no other compulsion towards concert, nor other perceptible common duty to produce alliance or similarity of structure amongst them. Their policy, in regard to this subject, is as various as the habits, manners, and modes of thinking of the different States One State, with a small population but great capability, Mississippi for example, authorizes the creation of banking capital to the amount of fifty millions, and applies herself eagerly to the task of giving expansion to her industry in every shape in which she can employ it. Another State, Virginia, with treble the population of the former, and perhaps with resources equally abundant, erects a banking system which scarcely employs seven millions. It may be the wisdom or the caprice, the false reckoning or sober estimate of each of these States which has persuaded them to adopt a policy so widely different from each other. Mississippi may have overshot her mark, or Virginia may have too timidly kept herself below her power; still each has acted upon her own perception of her interest, and, it is obvious, without the slightest reference to the other. And so it is, sir, throughout the Union. A survey of the whole will show you the banking system of the States erected and sustained altogether upon local considerations, presenting every conceivable inequality in its operation. In one portion, distrust, caution, and doubt fettering the industry of the State; in another, emulation, adventure, and hope, tinging its enterprise with sanguine hues, and leading, it may be, sometimes, to extravagant excess. These several jurisdictions are no more capable of producing uniformity in banking, even if they were inclined to do so, than in any other matter of general concern to the Union. As well might you expect the States, sir, by their fortuitous concurrence, to produce a uniform law of naturalization, the uniform organization of the militia, or an equal and properly apportioned representation in this hall, as to expect of them harmony and concert in their regulation of the affairs of trade through the agency of their banks. Let capital abound in one region, and the demand for it be ever so urgent in another, what State bank would be found transferring its funds to meet a temporary emergency growing out of such a cause? The States will necessarily be influenced only by the considerations which arise at home, and have reference to their domestic interests. The want of uniformity might be harmless if there was not also incident to this system, when left to follow its own impulses unchecked, not only a want of co-operation with other States, but often actual interference with them and counter-actions in their several concerns. Instead of moving under the constraints of a general system, their main impulse will be found in the principle of competition.

This competition will be manifest in the legislation of State against State; it will extend itself, and predominate in the contest between city and city, and still more actively on the narrower theatre at home, in the rivalry between bank and bank. The great instinct of this principle of competition is a hurtful one: its tendency is towards excess. Two banks in the same village will run the race against each other. Each will strive to supply the neighborhood with the greater facilities, to lend upon more attainable securities, to embrace a larger class of dealers, to lure adventure, as means abound, by still greater enticements. If a large circulation may be absorbed to-day, a still larger one, in the reckoning of these rivals in the race, may be absorbed to-morrow—the larger the circulation the greater the profit. The feverish cupidity of avarice will perceive in such a course the road to large gains; and, whilst the banks pursue it, the last thought which will occur to the authors of these efforts will be the consequences of this excited action upon the general welfare of the nation. Such, sir, are he tend ncies of the uncontrolled principle of competition in banking.

The action of a central power restrains and corrects these tendencies. A National Bank, under an efficient organization, has, if not an absolute, certainly a most decisive control over the value and amount of the local currencies supplied by the State banks. To say nothing of that most important action of a National Bank upon the exchanges—by far the most useful of its functions—such an institution regulates the local currency through another influence of great value to the stability of the banking system. A bank sustained by the credit of the Government, and strengthened by the deposites of the public moneys, cannot but enjoy the univeral confidence of the nation. Its paper will necessarily be esteemed as of the best, and will be current in every avenue of business. Such a paper, sir, becomes a gauge by which to measure the value of all other paper for which it may be exchanged. In that respect it holds towards other paper somewhat of the relation which the precious metals hold to itself. I know, sir, that it is a received and familiar proposition that a better currency will not circulate in the presence of an inferior one. This is true of coin: it is not true of paper. Coin will not circulate in the presence of a depreciated paper, because it may immediately betake itself to foreign countries, where it will command its value, or it may retire into private hoards, to be kept until a better state of things shall draw it forth into circulation. But when a bank is able to put forth an unquestionable paper, all of inferior value will disappear before it. The public will prefer that paper which enjoys the highest credit, and they will refuse all other whilst that is attainable. It is the interest and business of such a bank to render its paper at all times attainable; its profit consists in supplying the public with a circulation which can neither be hoarded nor sent abroad. This paper, in fact, circulates upon its superior credit, and thus engrosses to itself, as far as its own volume will permit, the business of the community. It is, sir, by the influence of this principle that the paper of a National Bank, fortified by the credit and resources of the Government, becomes a regulator of the value of all of all other currency in the nation; it furnishes the gauge or standard to which all local paper, in its own district or appropriate range, must conform. In this aspect, the central banking power may be said to constitute a great Conservative element in the adjustment and preservation of a sound currency.

It is, Mr. Chairman, in the just balance of these two principles of centralization and competition that the greatest efficiency and safety are given to our system. The central power alone might not be sufficiently observant and regardful of local wants; in the greater profits of the more important operations of exchange, it might lose sight of sectional convenience, and of the wants of the lesser circles of trade. the local banks will ply within these limits, greatly to the advantage of themselves and of the public. On the other hand, the local banks alone, for the reasons I have given, would found utterly incapable of fulfilling the broader functions assigned to the central power.

The necessity for this division results, in part, from the nature of our confederacy. The Federal power is essential to the control of all interests which expand beyond the limits of a single State, whilst the State power is well entrusted with the municipal regulations necessary to its own well-being. The institution of banking, having a great and predominating influence over the currency of the country, rises in consideration far above a mere municipal concern, into one of the broadest national importance, and nothing has been found more authentically established in the experience of this Government, than the absolute necessity of imparting to the management of the banks a certain share of Federal supervision.

Mr. Chairman, I charge it upon the late Administration, as one step taken by them towards the embarrassment of this nation, that they rashly and most unwisely deprived the country of the benefit of this Federal supervision over the currency, by the destruction of the late Bank of the United States. Sir, that Administration did not very maturely reflect upon the consequences of the destruction of the bank They sinned against light, for it is evident that they recognised, to the fullest extent, the value and the indispensable necessity of this principle of centralization upon which I have remarked. Their whole course, in the early stages of that pernicious movement which has brought upon us our present disasters, attests their acknowledgment of the necessity of the Federal control through a central power in banking. When General Jackson first resolved upon the downfall of the Bank, it was not to destroy the machinery of a national institution; it was only to build up another, as he believed, of a more efficient structure. His first messages reiterate, again and again, the necessity, the great utility and importance of a National Bank. The war against the bank was a war of individual hate; its object was individual punishment. The pretext was an objection to the form of organization only—a question of detail to be corrected in a new establishment. The Executive, at that time, so far from repelling the necessity of the principle of this Bank, engaged in the struggle to give that principle more scope and effect. And even afterwards, sir, when this strife between Leviathan and Behemoth ceased to be a contention of argument, and became one of passion, and when the victorious chief had turned all his malice to its direst account, and struck down his adversary, even then, sir, the principle was still avowed and promulgated that, without a central power, the currency could not be sustained. That central power was attempted to be fashioned on a new model, but out of old materials. It was the chief and most conspicuous design, in the celebrated experiment, to manufacture a great central or national control over the currency, out of some thirty or forty State banks, which were to be affiliated by a Government contract, and clothed with all the Federal powers heretofore conferred upon the Bank of the United States. In fact, it was designed by this form of association to erect a Bank of the United States, with all the function of alliance and centralization of which the association was capable. And, sir, it was proclaimed to be capable of this function to as beneficial an extent as the Bank whose term was just drawing to a close. It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to occupy the time of the committee with a discussion of the value of this scheme of General Jackson and his cabinet, but I refer to it to show that, even up to the moment of the failure of the great experiment, embracing much the longer portion of the existence of that Administration, the party in the ascendant were as fully imbued as I am at this moment with the conviction of the importance of this central banking power. which it is now, in certain quarters, the habit of some of the same party and of the same men to portray in so many shapes of abhorrence and disgust.

It was the duty of the President, before he entered upon the rash enterprise of pulling down the Bank of the United States, to be well assured that he could supply other machinery capable of performing the functions and rendering the services which the destruction of that institution might suspend. It was his boast that this new contrivance of the associated State banks would amply fill the space, and even more faithfully discharge the duties of the retiring Bank than that Bank itself had ever done. I need not recall the glowing promises of success which the Administration poured forth with such lavish exultation upon the birth of their experiment; nor, sir, is it necessary to dwell for a moment upon the signal failure of that famous abortion; the first are written in every line of official communication which the self-complacent spirit of the President addressed, in a thousand forms, to the country, upon the auspicious event; the last has been baptized in the tears of the nation. Sir, I have a right, therefore, to charge the last Administration, and its present followers, with all the consequences which have flowed from this misjudged and ill-fated measure.

In following up the train of events that sprang from this movement of the cabinet of General Jackson, the next step was, if possible, even more mischievous than the first. It will be seen, sir, in the course adopted in the employment of the State banks. One would have supposed, Mr. Chairman, that a statesman, entering upon so fearful and momentous an experiment as that of 1833, would proceed at least warily and with some cautious reserve in the untried and perilous career before him; that he would reflect upon the novelty of his position, weigh its dangers, and, in shaping his course, rather incur the risk of being chid for too much discretion than taxed for his boldness. Far other than this was the characteristic of the advance of the late President to the difficulties of the crisis. When the public moneys were removed into the keeping of the chosen banks, instead of admonitions of prudence in the use of the public funds, instead of restriction or constraint, the Administration made haste to order that these treasures should be scattered far and wide with a profuse indulgence. The depositories were enjoined to take care that no facility be denied to commerce, but that the moneys on deposite be distributed as broadly and as liberally as the public convenience, the demands of trade, might require. Instead, sir, of advising the banks that now, the great regulating and controlling power being withdrawn, it became more urgently their duty to guard against that licentious issue which the uncurbed principle of competition must engender, they were exhorted and commanded to let loose the fullest play of that rivalry, and drive their headlong course as swiftly as their appetite for gain might prompt. The President, sir, was not left unadmonished of the inevitable end of this mistaken policy. Here, in this Hall, and in the Senate, he was told to what result this madness must impel the nation. From all quarters the same prophetic warning was poured into his ear; and all thinking men, every where but in the Executive mansion, foresaw the certain disaster that awaited the experiment.

Sir, at this time another element concurred to tender the experiment more mischievous. The President's veto had announced to the nation the entire hopelessness of obtaining a renewal of the charter of the National Bank. Upon that subject he was peremptory and emphatic; and the States, being thus assured that the bank was to expire, were invited to increase their banking capital. At once, as by a common impulse, every State in the Union set about enlarging its means of banking. The pretext was the necessity of supplying the vacuum of capital to be occasioned by the extinction of the National Bank. Under this pretext, nearly four hundred banks and one hundred and ten millions of capital were created between 1834 and 1838, whilst at the same time, that bank whose extinction furnished the plea for this increase was not withdrawn, nor was its activity in business even diminished, but on the contrary, yet lives and thrives in the full possession of its capital, and is likely long to live and thrive The activity imparted by these measures to the banking system of the country soon began to be felt in Western speculations in the public lands, and it became apparent, at an early day, that the public treasure would be greatly augmented through this channel. Sir, in view of such a result, and with a learned forecast of the disturbance the event was likely to produce, the wisest man amongst the counsellors of this nation, the most effective and trusty of her statesmen, brought before Congress that great measure, the bill for regulating the distribution of the public lands. By a fatality which signalized the career of the late Administration, and invariably impelled it—whenever there was a choice between right and wrong—into the wrong path, the President thought proper to put his veto on this measure, and thus convert the whole proceeds of the sale of the public domain, which properly belonged to the capital of the nation, into the ordinary revenues of the Government—eventually producing some forty millions of surplus, which, in its course of production, was fed by, and contributed to feed, the local banks, and to turn all the currents of ordinary commerce awry. Instead of restraining the accumulation of revenue, which prudence would have suggested as essential under the new system of deposite, the President took every step in his power to augment it, and to distribute it in the most unwholsome manner his opportunity allowed: it was accomplishing the worst possible purpose, in the worst possible way, and extracting the greatest amount of mischief out of the most mischievous thing he could devise, I, therefore, again lay it to the account of that Administration, as in part the cause of the present embarrassments, that it built up that disproportioned and ungoverned system of State banking which has been found so injurious, and nurtured that system by the unhealthy and unnatural stimulus of excessive treasure unwisely accumulated in the manner I have described.

First, it was promulgated, after Mr. Gouge, and almost in the terms of his book, that it was essential the specie basis should be widened by excluding from circulation all bank notes under the denomination of one hundred dollars, or at least of fifty. This notion was embodied in the Treasury contracts with the banks, and finally in the currency bill of 1836; it was to be carried out by degrees, beginning with the exclusion of fives, then of tens, and so onward to the ultimate term I will not stop, Mr. Chairman, to inquire into the policy of this measure. It has proved itself to be impracticable, and is therefore merely nugatory; but I may say, in a word, that if the object in view were to render the bank circulation more stable, by fortifying it with a strong deposite of the precious metals, it would seem to be, at least, a very doubtful mode of accomplishing that object, by compelling the community to abstract these metals from the banks as the only medium of payment under the amount to which paper, according to the scheme, was to be confined. My purpose is, with this next, the great feature in this hard money feature.

We were creating debt abroad. The activity of speculation, to which I have already alluded, had enlarged the demand of the country for commodities of foreign production as well as of domestic. Prices were on the increase. Such, in brief, sir, was the state of things at home. A prudent Government would have feared a foreign debt, and taken some cautions against its increase. Not so, Mr. Chairman, with ours. It was proclaimed as the great ambition of the President, his paramount wish, that the precious metals should be made to abound. New mints were provided for. In the language of a conspicuous Senator, famous in the annals of this movement, it was prophesied that "gold was to swim up the Mississippi in a never-failing stream." The agent of the deposite banks, as a certain semi-official functionary [Reuben M. Whitney] was then called, had orders to communicate to the whole circle of depositories within his charge, that it would be agreeable to the President to learn they concurred with him in the propriety and importance of making large importations of specie from abroad. The hint, sir, was not lost. It was not the temper of the deposite banks to frustrate even the whim of the President in those days; and so they all set about the work of importation. In the mean time, the President himself turned importer of specie, and the indemnities were ordered home at great sacrifice, in gold. Individual merchants were prompted, through the same influences, to engage in the same operation. It is a little remarkable, in the change of times, that those who now quarrel with a State bank for purchasing cotton to pay a foreign debt, should then have seen no harm in forty banks or more turning merchants, and importing gold and silver to create such a debt. The amount brought into the country from Europe, in the year 1835-6, has been estimated above forty millions of dollars—more than thirty of which came from England. How much was imported from South America and other foreign countries we have no means of knowing; undoubtedly the amount was considerable. Sir, with the exception of the indemnities, nearly the whole of this vast amount of coin was brought into this country at the expense of a debt to the same amount to the people from whom it was obtained. It swelled the already accumulating balance against us. It was brought here in forced counteraction of the laws of trade—against the principle which regulates supply and demand—in absolute hostility to the interests of our commerce. At the very time that it came here we should have been retrenching expenditure and lessening the foreign debt, instead of increasing it. Our currency did not require this aid. We had in the country even more specie than, in past times, had been found necessary to the safest condition of our paper issues. As the balance of trade, or the state of foreign indebtedness which would have required remittances to England, was against us, so also, sir, as between the Atlantic States and the West, the balance was, in like manner, against the West, and the course of trade required remittances of specie from the West to the Atlantic. In fact, the whole tendency of exchanges, from the remotest western border, was eastward, even until they crossed the ocean. In this juncture, the President was not only so absurd as to direct the importation I have spoken of, but to go a step further, and, by the only means in his power—means which an accident had put at his disposal, and which in a thousand years he might not have had again—to check and countervail the current of domestic exchange between the West and the East. This he accomplished by an act similar in character to the importation of coin from abroad—it was done by the instrumentality of the Treasury circular. The rage of speculation in the public lands had already carried Eastern credits to the West, and brought that region largely in debt to the Eastward; and at the very time when the people of the East were looking anxiously to the settlement, the circular was interposed, professedly with a view to carry specie to the West and keep it there, lest it might obey the laws of trade, and go where it was wanted, and where it could have afforded relief to the unnatural pressure which this most unnatural course of Government interference had produced.

Mr. Chairman, in all these measures the first instincts of the people and of their representatives were true to the suggestions of good sense and the national interest. The prevalence of these instincts was only suppressed by the dictatorial authority and mischievous popularity of the Executive. The Bank was rechartered by Congress—the removal of the deposites was forbidden by Congress—the land bill was passed by Congress, and the Treasury Circular rejected by it. Yet in each of these four cardinal measures—the fountains of all the ills the country has lately suffered—the Executive will has outweighed and despised the legislative judgment; and by that will alone, defying all other authority in this land, have these measures been enforced.

Well, sir, the day of reckoning came. As money poured into this country from abroad, it increased our banking basis, and therefore increased also the paper circulation. The abundance of money raised prices to a corresponding height. Forty millions added to our specie circulation could not do otherwise than augment our prices. If our trade were confined to a domestic circle, if we had no concerns with foreign nations, such an increase of price, being gradual, would cause no very signal distress. But we have a great Southern staple, which seeks its chief market in a nation from which we import large amounts of goods, and which goods, being generally ordered in advance of the export, are designed to be paid for with funds arising from that export. As nearly as it may be counted on, our importation from England is graduated by the expected value of the cotton export. By the operation of our money system, the cotton had risen to its highest price. The factors of the Atlantic had purchased the crop at these high prices before it was gathered; even, in some instances, as I have understood, before it was grown. It was paid for chiefly, I presume, by a small advance in money, and in notes at long dates. The planter had used these funds in purchases of land and negroes, at correspondingly high prices, and had stipulated to pay, as his factor was to pay him, partly in money and partly in notes; and so the series of engagements went onward into other classes of society.

In England, sir, the very reverse operation was now about to take place. That country had become disturbed with our apparent posperity. The fame of rich investments in America and heavy rates of interest, and of the harvest of speculation in our public lands, had lured hither large amounts of British capital, a great deal of which also came in the precious metals. This drain of funds from England began to produce alarm, as soon as it was seen that our Government had interposed itself to prevent the adjustment of the mercantile balance. Apprehensions were even expressed there that the Bank of England might be driven, by these demands upon the national coin, to another suspension of cash payments. It was a measure on the part of that bank and of the English nation, not only of retaliation, but of absolute self-protection, to bring values to the standard of the actual state of her currency, that currency reduced to its proper relation with the precious metals. In other words, whilst prices in the United States were rising to the standard of our large paper issue, they were falling in England to the standard indicated by the state of her diminished coin. To accomplish this reduction in England, the bank raised the rate of discount one per cent. in June and July, 1836, and thus produced that curtailment which immediately brought down the prices to the desired rate. The effect of the operation was to throw a loss upon the shippers of American cotton of some five or, even perhaps, eight cents a pound. The factor in New Orleans was the first to be struck down, and after him, in rapid succession, all his dependencies onward to the planter, the land speculator, and the thousand others standing in this connection, came to the ground with a general crash. The importing merchant was now made aware that where he looked for foreign credits there were none to be had. The cotton crop, instead of producing eighty millions in England, did not produce over fifty, and all who had counted on this source for foreign funds were, of course, disappointed. The embarrassments of the importer turned him back to the country dealer for funds; the rise of exchange compelled him to seek coin for remittance, and, at every step in his search for coin, he was met by the Government, a busy intermeddler, shutting up the avenues of trade and obstructing the only channels of relief.

The Government had for some time been crying out against the banks as the sources of these approaching evils, and the people, especially the more uninformed part of them, looking only at the confusion which they saw in the currency, joined in the cry against the banks, and commenced that run upon them which, in the end, resulted—as every body, except the Executive, had foreseen this whole movement must have resulted—in the suspension of specie payments.

That suspension, I think I have shown, Mr. Chairman, originated in the pernicious measures of the Administration. It was brought about by the unskilful and unwise policy of importing the precious metals at a time when the interests and demands of trade set in an opposite direction. It more immediately came from the extravagant speculations of a class of persons not connected with the regular operations of trade and commerce. In such a convulsion, the prudent and the wise suffer their share of affliction as well as the thriftless and the unwary. Wealth, industry, and circumspection are no safeguards against such a calamity, when the calamity has once found footing in the nation. I do not believe, sir, that, in the ordinary channels of regular commerce, there has been any over-trading or over-banking; I have seen no evidence to induce such a conclusion. On the contrary, our merchants and our mercantile banks have conducted themselves through the difficulties of this alarming crisis with prudence, moderation, and wisdom, worthy of all praise. The attempt of the present Executive to throw the blame of these disasters upon the merchants is an act of such gross injustice and wickedness as to entitle it to the scorn of all honorable men. It is a base effort to screen the authors of our calamities from that indignant censure which their misdeeds have long deserved. The admirable patience, fortitude, and fidelity, with which the merchants of the United States addressed themselves, in these late trials, to the task of sustaining the national credit and good faith, have not only won for them the applause of their countrymen, but have drawn forth the spontaneous and cheerful tribute of panegyric from all nations with whom they hold intercourse. It has been uttered in the British Parliament from the lips of impartial statesmen, in language which has found a response throughout that kingdom; and it will not be forgotten here, sir, as long as America shall take pride in the integrity and honorable bearing of that intelligent and patriotic class of her citizens. The charge was made in a spirit which does no honor to its author, and will be ever regarded as the subterfuge of a baffled politician, seeking to find a scapegoat for his own offences, and selecting that body for his purpose whose numbers may be supposed to render them the least available of all others in the State, in the electioneering contests for power. The truth is, sir, that the late Administration and its successor have waged a war against the banks and the merchants, which has resulted not only in their own overthrow, but in deep and lasting injury to the greatest interests in the nation, without producing a modicum of good, unless it be in the lesson it has taught us to avoid such follies in time to come. It has of late become the fashion to deny these hostile sentiments of the Administration against the banks. I am glad to see it, sir; it is an indication of an approaching change of policy; it is a sign of contrition for past offences. It is nevertheless true that such a war has been waged, and that a bitter hostility has been evinced by the Executive against these institutions, and even now, sir, is secretly felt, although not openly avowed. Gentlemen on this floor have asked for the proof of this hostility. To say nothing of that Trojan war between the Bank and the late Administration, with all its artillery of denunciation, they may find the proofs in the common cant of the day against what is termed monopoly; in the incessant assaults which of late years have been directed against all corporate bodies and chartered rights, and in the debates of every State Legislature where the Administration party have had a voice. They may find the proofs in the daily diatribes of the Globe and of the thousand slave presses whose feculent sheets are employed to scatter far and wide this Globe poison. They may discover evidences of it in the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Convention. Sir, it was predicted, foredoomed and instigated in the famous letters of Dallas and Ingersoll; it was not less conspicuously exhibited in the letter of last July, from the Hermitage, on the occasion of the suspension; we had some inklings of it even in that abortive farce of a revolution attempted in Maryland; and, latest of all, sir, we have seen evidences of it here on this floor, on a very recent occasion, in the almost frenzied gesticulation with which a gentleman conspicuous in the ranks of the Administration [Mr. RHETT] denounced wo to all those who deal in banks or sustain their cause—wo, to come in threatened popular vengeance, even to the downpulling of the public edifices, the overthrow of social order, and the peril of the domestic hearth. These, sir, are some of the proofs of that war of the Administration against the banks; let gentlemen point me to any evidence of hostility from the banks against the Government, of which so much has been said in this debate.

Mr. Chairman, I have presented to the committee what I conceive to be the leading events in that train of Government policy to which the nation is indebted for all it has suffered. I will beg to say a few words upon the nature of the remedy which, in my judgment, this retrospect suggests as the only one appropriate to the case.

In the first place I wish to see a solid and permanent resumption of specie payments as speedily as that can be accomplished; and I am fully convinced that this bill would not only retard the resumption, but render its continuance even a matter of uncertainty.

In the next place, I wish to see the creation of a National Bank—believing that to be the only possible device or instrument by which we may hope to establish and maintain a good currency in the country. Sir, I am persuaded that the greater part of the people of the United States now entertain this conviction, and that, day by day, as we grow older in experience, that conviction will be extended. Nothing can be more artificial than the public sentiment which has been conjured up against such an institution. That sentiment was fabricated here, at Washington, and circulated under the auspices and by the force of party dictation, without even the semblance of consultation with the people. I cannot for a moment doubt that, if the deliberate opinion of the country upon this question were polled, after every man had made himself acquainted with the real nature and value of the proposition, nine-tenths would give their suffrage in favor of a National Bank. I speak not, sir, of the late Bank of the United States—although I know nothing to the disparagement of that institution—but of such a bank as may be matured by the wisdom of Congress, guarded by such provisions as past experience may have demonstrated to be necessary, and clothed with all the powers requisite to the discharge of that great national function which I have attempted in the course of my remarks to explain. Such a bank, sir, I repeat, would meet, if I do not greatly mistake the judgment of our day, the approbation of by far the larger portion of the citizens of the Union. There are many, sir, I know, who entertain constitutional scruples on this question. They belong to a hopeless race of men, who must live out their day, and leave the settlement of their doubts to another generation. I will not argue with them. To the gentlemen from Virginia, especially, I say, that I will not consent to moot constitutional points with them; it is encouraging them in a vicious habit, which has already sufficiently retarded the growth and power of that venerable mother of States. Let Virginia give up her dialectics, renounce her spirit of dissertation and debate, and betake herself to commerce and manufactures; let her do this and thrive; let her still neglect it, and it may be her fate—(here Mr. WISE added, "to die of an abstraction")—I adopt the gentleman's expression, though I hope a better destiny awaits her—"to die of an abstraction."

Sir, the efficacy of a bank in the regulation of the currency has been conceded on all sides. The late Administration, in all its zeal to destroy, was obliged to concede it. The history of the war against that bank is full of acknowledgment of its usefulness to the currency. When General Jackson first assailed it, he endeavored to sustain his opposition to it on the plea that it had failed to perform this function of regulating the currency to the satisfaction of the country. He was signally defeated in this position by his own friends. The charge was referred to the investigation of both Houses of Congress. In both, committees were raised of the ablest men in the nation, strong, devoted friends of the President; their reports are amongst your records; they give the most explicit and unqualified contradiction of the President's allegations against the usefulness of the institution. No one will suspect the late Governor of South Carolina, Mr. McDuffie, nor the present Mayor of Baltimore, General Smith, (the respective chairmen of the committees of the House and of the Senate on this inquiry,) of a disposition, at that time, either carelessly to discredit the President's opinion, or to misrepresent the value of the bank; and yet their reports were full and conclusive on the question. Ever since that time, the ground of attack has been changed; and now, instead of affirming the incompetency of a bank to perform the duties assigned to it with advantage to the nation, the whole stock of party vituperation, and all the oratorical pruriency of party declaimers, are exhausted in painting the danger of such an institution to public liberty, and in fearful summonings of the terrors of the money power.

It is odd enough, Mr. Chairman, to hear these appeals to the frighted imagination of the country against this phantom of the money power, urged, if not by the gentleman himself, at least by the friends and coadjutors of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who has lavished such encomiums upon the new free banking of his own State; that system of banking which is not to supersede the old, but which is to reinforce it with additional means—a cumulative, auxiliary system of banking without stint or limit—

"Giving its sum of more
To that which had too much," and intended to increase the money power of New York far beyond the utmost limit heretofore assigned to a National Bank.

What is this formidable money power that has so disturbed the fancies of gentlemen here, and the equanimity of the nation? Our laws recognise no distinctions of rank or class amongst our citizens. We have secured the rights of property as cardinal in our social constitution. It is well appointed that labor, diligence, and skill, shall have their reward, and that reward be preserved inviolate from aggression. Under this protection, this whole nation of working people has grown up into a marvellous power of combined wealth, intelligence, and comfort, unexampled. It is of the nature of wealth to attain social power and influence; it is a valuable feature in our system that it should do so; but every one must remark how small is its tendency, how inadequate its efforts to obtain political power. The jealousy of wealth, the watchfulness of its assumptions, the common suspicions entertained against it, almost amount to a popular proscription of its hopes for political elevation, and even strip it of the influence to which it is justly entitled. "Whoso," says a nervous English writer, "has experience, is sovereign (to the length of sixpence) over the whole world. He commands cooks to feed him, philosophers to teach him, and kings to mount guard over him—to the length of sixpence." This, sir, is an epitome of the money power. It accumulates social comfort and social strength; it makes men and states more happy, prosperous, and invulnerable from without. Would you seek the external manifestation of that power, you shall see it, sir, in the subdued wilderness of our frontier; in our great rivers, cleft by the keels of a thousand steamboats; in our plains and valleys, as they yield their tribute to the labor of husbandry. You shall witness it in the smoking forges of the West, and in the swift shuttles of the East; in the cities, towns, and villages, which adorn and enliven the land; in our churches, hospitals, colleges, and schools. You shall note it in the quiet and substantial homesteads of our people, and in the happy faces that gather around those firesides, such as the like may nowhere else be found. You shall hear it in the carol of the ploughman as he traces his furrow, and in the blithe song of the sailor boy at the mast head, when he plies his voyage to the remote shores of Europe or Asia; in the heavy creaking wagon, the flying steam car, and the rattling stage coach; in short, sir, you may hear and see it in all the avenues where trade and industry ply their profitable thrift. It is the secret, the miracle of the might of this Anglo-American man. What is there to dread in it?

Mr. Chairman, I turn from these considerations to a review of the bill before us. The friends of this measure affect to believe that our long-established system of banking was principally objectionable from the instability of the currency which it created, and from its power of producing panic and pressure upon the country; they declare themselves unwilling to entrust the public treasure to the keeping of any such agency, holding it to be insecure; and they present us this bill as the corrective of each of these defects. They speak, sir, of the patronage and influence of the banking system with disinterested horror, and boast that, by this new contrivance of a Sub-Treasury, they clip the wings of patronage, and reduce it to insignificance. Let us examine this bill, to ascertain how far it realizes these promises.

I think it may be assumed, from the fact of this question being pressed upon the House after the repeal of the Treasury circular, that it is the purpose of the Administration to revive that circular with even a broader scope than it had before. Indeed, sir, this bill itself provides for a gradual substitution of gold and silver for paper in the payment of all public debts, and designs ultimately to reject all paper. I take it for granted, notwithstanding this specie clause was struck out of the Senate bill, it is not to be struck out here, and that we are eventually to have the policy of the specie circular renewed and extended. In that view, I beg leave to invite the attention of the committee to the eventual operation of this measure. Your revenue may be rated at some thirty millions. These are to be paid in gold and silver, and placed in the custody of the receivers or other officers of the Treasury. How are they to be distributed? The Government will have disbursements to make to the full amount, perhaps, of the revenue; but the coin, sir, will be but partially used in these disbursements. The Treasury will draw warrants, drafts, or orders on the fund, which may be put forth to any amount, of any denomination, and in any form, that the Secretary may choose. They will be printed on bank paper, and engraved with all the exterior symbols of a bank note, and may be adapted to circulation, as money, to any extent that the head of the Treasury shall direct. These drafts will constitute a circulating medium, and the Government will so far become a bank of circulation. That this paper will be safe, no one will deny; the objection to the system does not lie against the stability of the paper, but it does lie most cogently against the power which this faculty of making paper shall give to the Executive. Such a paper kept in circulation may ultimately represent the whole revenue of the nation, whilst the coin upon which it is issued, or a great part of it, will be locked up in the Government custody. The Government refusing to receive any thing but coin for public dues, will render coin at all times a subject of mercantile demand, and will thus establish a current of business, the effect of which will constantly be to set upon the banks of the country, and to keep them stinted in their supply of the precious metals, or, at least, ever in apprehension of this drain upon their money resources. The city of New York, sir, collects about ten millions of the revenue. This amount, according to the system, is to be entrusted to the hands of one man. It is not at all impossible to administer this proposed law in such a manner as to collect the whole ten millions in specie, and retain that sum in the city of New York. The amount of gold and silver employed to sustain the bank circulation of that city is usually, I believe, but little above three millions. That coin would be drawn into the hands of the receiver, leaving the banks either under a compulsion to import specie from abroad, or to become supplicants for its restoration by the Government. The eleventh and twelfth sections of the bill give the Secretary power to transfer these funds from any one point to any other, at his own discretion. In the execution of this power he may, in a day, drain the city of New York or Philadelphia, Boston or Baltimore, of the Government deposite of specie, or equally, at his pleasure, accumulate the whole at either of these points, producing scarcity or abundance, exactly as it may gratify his purpose of reward or punishment, his political favoritism or displeasure.

The Government has now, sir, some five millions to pay in Florida. Suppose the same obligation in existence with this bill the law of the land. The five millions would be drawn in warrants payable in New York. These warrants would be sent to the South just as exchange was valuable on the North; and every warrant would be a bill of exchange, saleable at a premium. The Government is thus converted into an exchange merchant, making its profit according to the rates of the day. Even when there is nothing to be paid for public disbursements in the South, still may the Secretary, under this bill, draw his warrants on Northern funds, and throw them into the Southern market, to take advantage of these operations of exchange. Every one must see, Mr. Chairman, that the powers conferred by this bill, and the absolute control of the disposition of the Government revenues, are neither more nor less than the machinery which shall constitute the Executive a great national banking power, with faculty to furnish circulation and deal in exchange, to the full amount of the fund at its disposal. It is an easy step, sir, to get the privilege, on any casual pretext, of issuing, as we have lately done, Treasury notes to some large extent, and you have, in the result, the banking power carried out to its utmost scope.

Is there no field here for party favor? What shall be the rates of exchange? Shall not the Government sell drafts par to one man, at par to another, and above it to a third? Who shall prevent it? We may easily imagine the inducements which might persuade a Government agent to gratify a political friend, or disappoint a political adversary in these dealings. Yes, sir, and we may imagine, too, the motives that may arise to punish a whole city obnoxious to Executive displeasure, by removing the deposites or withholding exchange, and to reward another more complaisant in its feelings and respect for the higher powers. The enginery is here which may serve this turn to any extent. This power of transfer contained in the 11th and 12th sections of the bill, is an admirable machine to produce obedience and submission; and I will undertake to prophesy that if this bill be passed, the Government will have no cause to complain of the refractory demeanor of the fiscal agent at Portsmouth. I am still, sir, so unreformed by modern schooling, as to think that, in the concerns which relate to trade and currency, it is much safer to confide in the integrity, the habits of business, the intelligence and interests of a board of merchant directors, than incur the hazard of the selfish and obsequious spirit, the alien temper and unskilfulness of a mere political functionary.

Mr. Chairman, if the revenue is not to be collected in gold and silver, but, adopting the policy of the new Treasury order, it is to be received in bank paper, the power conferred by this bill is still more mischievous. Suppose, sir, the ten millions of New York to be received in the notes of specie-paying banks, what will be the result? You will have a Government agent in that city continually clothed with the power of visiting the banks, according to the caprice of Government dictation, with the demand for coin; one hundred thousand dollars exacted to-day from one bank, another hundred to-morrow from another; indulgence and forbearance extended to one and denied to another. The price of this favor we may be at no loss to conjecture—obedience, implicit obedience to the pleasure of the Executive. What would be the effect of such demands? Why, sir, immediate action on the whole circle of customers of the bank. A sudden call for a large amount of coin requires curtailment of discount and pressure upon the debtors of the bank. Can you conceive, sir, a more potent engine of panic and commercial distress than this power of demanding coin? And yet, sir, it is not only conferred by this bill, but it is essential to the system that it should be exercised. Nothing can be more absurd than to suppose all this apparatus of the Sub-Treasury erected to preserve bank paper: the very foundation of the system, as I remarked at the outset, is the collection in coin, or the conversion of the deposites into coin.

The power of combining against a bank to draw its specie, even in ordinary circumstances, is one which excites alarm. The difficulty of such combination, as well as the disinclination of the public to abstract the coin, is the great protection of the banks. But here, sir, we have ready made to our hand an agent, with all this power of combination in his single self and in its worst shape; an agent, too, holding no interest in common with the community—unsympathizing, cold blooded, and heartless as regards their wants or wishes—whom it is his prerogative and office to disturb and distress as often as his own or his master's fancy shall impel him. I put no trust in such functionaries. I do not even, sir, like the name which this bill gives them—these receivers general. I remember an anecdote of Voltaire which somewhat prejudices me against the tribe. A circle of the friends of the philosopher were passing a winter evening at Ferney. It was proposed to beguile the time by telling robber-stories. Every body had invented his tale; Rosseau had told one of thrilling horror. When Voltaire was called on, he began as follows: "There was once upon a time a receiver general—my friends, I have forgotten the rest." It was unanimously voted that this was the greatest robber-story of all. I fear, sir, these receivers.

I think, Mr. Chairman, it is very obvious to calm reflection, that this Sub-Treasury scheme will entirely fail in the accomplishment of any promise which its friends hold out; that it will weaken and render more unstable the currency of the banks; that it will rather furnish means and occasion for panic and pressure, than remove them; that its patronage and influence are infinitely more formidable than those of the Bank; and that its pledge of greater security to the public treasure is altogether illusory; that, in short, it proposes a new system for regulating the public moneys, clumsy and awkward in its detail, highly inconvenient to the commerce of the country, dangerous in the powers it confers upon the Executive, and most mischievously hostile to the safety and usefulness of our banking system.

In addition, sir, to these objections, which are suggested by the views the friends of the bill have taken of its character, and upon which I have forborne to dwell with more than a passing notice, I have a still deeper aversion to it, founded on the general principles, in regard to the currency, which it was my principal object to illustrate in this speech. It fails to erect, in any safe or useful form, that central power of federal control which I think essential to a permanent and sound currency; it also furnishes an artificial necessity for occasional Government influence or direction in the importation of the precious metals—an influence altoge her pernicious it its character. For these reasons, sir, I utterly abhor and reject this bill.

SPEECH OF MR. BIDDLE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, May 15, 1838—On the Treasury note bill.

The House having again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the "bill to carry into effect an act approved on the 12th day of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes"—

Mr. BIDDLE said that, in looking back upon his brief career in public life, he was struck with one salutary change which had been wrought upon the dominant party by the recent indications of the popular will. There was no longer a reckless feeling of security in power and place. We were not now presented, as at the special session, with a bill from the Senate for raising money by the issue of Treasury notes. The claims of propriety, if not of strict constitutional right, which demanded that a measure of this character should originate with those directly and promptly responsible to the people, seemed to be treated with, at least, a show of respect.

Mr. B. was opposed to the bill now, as he had been at the special session, and the reasons which influenced him then had only gained strength from subsequent reflection and interchange of sentiment with his constituents. There was no wish to withhold the necessary supplies. The disposition throughout the House was to act with liberality. The question before us was as to a choice between different methods of putting the Administration in funds; and Mr. B. for one, would not be cajoled or driven from a preference for the plain, direct, and open pledge of the public credit in the shape of a loan. No one denied that in this way the most advantageous terms could be procured. No one denied that, while the issue of Treasury notes is most seductive and dangerous as a precedent, it involves great pecuniary loss to the public, as well as gross injustice to its creditors.

His great objection to the bill, Mr. B. said, as urged at the special session, was one that, by repeated handling, had lost all freshness; yet that very handling had established its consistence and solidity. Here was a plan to run the people into debt by stealth, to prevent their realizing the fact that this Administration was raising money by a mortgage of every inch of soil, and of the whole industry of the country. Half a century ago, the first Secretary of the Treasury said:

"The emitting of paper money by the authority of Government is wisely prohibited to the individual States, by the National Constitution, and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the Government of the United States. Though paper emissions, under a general authority, might have some advantages not applicable, and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable, to the like emissions by the States separately; yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse, and, it may even be affirmed, so certain of being abused, that the wisdom of Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an expedient." "The stamping of paper is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, that a Government in the practice of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any such emergency, to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource, to avoid as much as possible one less auspicious to present popularity."

Here, sir, is the secret of the tenacity with which this scheme is clung to. It is more "auspicious to present popularity" than to exercise the express constitutional power to "borrow money." That would be too direct and intelligible. That would arouse the people. They would begin to demand retrenchment and economy. They would begin soraly to investigate the causes which have led to the present state of things.

It was not a little curious to note that every important measure of this Administration was brought forward under circumstances of such alleged urgency as to preclude deliberate consideration, and to subject its opponents to the charge of impeding the business of the country. At the special session, a distinguished Senator, [Mr. BENTON,] in full communion with the Executive, explained the manner in which he had been won over to give a reluctant assent to the issue of these notes:

"I distrust, dislike, and would fain eschew this Treasury note resource. I prefer the direct loans of 1820-'21. I could only bring myself to acquiesce in this measure when it was urged that there was not time to carry a loan through the forms; nor even then could I consent to it, until every feature of a currency operation had been eradicated from the face of the bill."

Such was the pretext eight months ago. It succeeded then, and the experiment will be tried again and again, so long as the members of this House, acting under a high responsibility to the people, are found willing to abandon principle, when urged to precipitate action by the Executive whip and spur.

Sir, another powerful objection to these Treasury notes is, that they swell the mass of irredeemable paper money, and give to executive officers a greater latitude of discrimination in payments to public creditors. It may be remembered that, at the special session, I ventured to call the attention of the House to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, proffering to members of Congress specie for their mileage and pay. The report of the Secretary, in reply, has never yet been made the subject of animadversion. I attempted at one time to call it up, but the effort was baffled by an assurance that the Committee of Ways and Means had introduced a bill, or made a report, which would render further discussion superfluous. I have never been able to find any such bill or report. I propose now to advert briefly to the Secretary's communication. After stating the reasons which led to this offer to such members as chose to receive specie, he adds:

"Other means of payment were at the same time proposed for any who might deem it proper under the existing circumstances of the case and of the Treasury, to demand or accept gold and silver, either in full or in part."

Mr. Chairman, I would ask, how many members are aware of their having been thus classified by the Secretary? If the paragraph just quoted had formed part of the letter to the clerk containing the offer, would any gentleman have ventured to accept the specie? The Secretary anticipates that a portion of the House will decline to receive it, "under the existing circumstances of the case and of the Treasury." Called together to redress an evil which had fallen upon the whole country, they "might not deem it proper," at the very first step, to exempt themselves from its pressure, and to create, in truth, a pecuniary interest adverse to the rectification of the currency. The terms of Mr. Woodbury's letter imply, at least, a compliment to those who pursued the latter course. The effect, then, of the offer would only be to yield an undue advantage to the unscrupulous. It is far from my purpose to inquire into, or criticise, the course which any gentleman has thought proper to pursue; I desire, merely, to show that the power which this state of things confers is liable to the greatest abuse, and that it has already been the means of placing on record a sort of censure upon such members of the House as closed with the Secretary's own proposition.

The compensation of the judges is a matter around which the Codstitution has thrown a solemn guaranty, with a view to guard their purity and independence. Let us note the contingencies which influence it under the Secretary's power of discrimination:

"Where judges and other officers of courts resided near land offices, in which there was an ample supply of coin, or near collectors, and a request was made for drafts on them rather than on banks, they have often been given and paid in specie."

Thus, the salary of a judge was made to vary, to an amount of more than 10 per cent. at that time, by the accident of his "residing near" a land office or collector, and by his urging a request upon the Executive to be allowed such a preference over his brethren. Who can conceive of a Chief Justice Marshall waiting in the antechamber of a Secretary until his turn might come to be admitted on such a beggarly errand? What class of judges would be most likely to hunt up information as to the ways of the Treasury, and strive to turn that knowledge to account by negotiation and importunity?

Speaking of those by whom no specie had been received, the Secretary says:

"They have, when inquiring, been informed that the Department did not request them to accept any other medium of payment unless more satisfactory than to wait till sufficient specie could be collected or be provided by Congress for all public creditors and officers demanding it. They have been assured, also, that the Department would spare no proper effort to have this accomplished at the earliest day practicable."

What mockery is here! Take the case of the laborers in your service—the men, for example, whom we have seen, day after day, toiling at these grounds to bring them into shape, to prepare a luxurious carpet of verdure for our eyes to repose upon, to spread over our heads the foliage of every climate: what mockery is it to tell them, on Saturday night, that they are not obliged to take the shinplasters tendered to them, but that they have the alternative of starving! Are these the men likely to make their way to the presence of the Secretary in order to inquire why they are thus paid, or to profit by the information that although they and their families may perish for want of food, yet their executors or administrators may, at some future day, obtain good money? No, sir! The claimant who gains in this scramble is the man of personal or political influence, who comes on here and requires from his Senator, or member of the House, an introduction to the Secretary, in order that he may negotiate under imposing circumstances. And where is the fulfilment of Mr. Woodbury's pledge that this injurious inequality should, so far as depended on him, cease at the earliest possible day? Do we find it in this scheme to continue and perpetuate a system which shall multiply the materials for discrimination, and give a wider scope for favoritism of caprice?

It is said, however, by an honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] that in abandoning Treasury notes we place the Government at the mercy of the moneyed class. Sir, when we look at the facts—when we look at the causes which have led to the depreciation of Treasury notes, even those bearing an interest of six per cent. it is difficult to conceive a proposition more widly erroneous. Why is it that, whilst others are borrowing at three per cent, this Government is burdening the people with the payment of six, and even then cannot keep its obligations at par? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] at the special session, indulged in this confident language:

"Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not wish this Government to issue Treasury notes of any description, in any form whatever, liable to depreciation. There was already an outcry throughout the country against depreciated paper. We had too much of it now; and the evil would be augmented if the credit of the Government should become depreciated. He was anxious to guard against that event. For this reason, amongst others, he had come to the conclusion that it was better, taking all interests into consideration, to adopt the issue of Treasury notes bearing a moderate rate of interest."

Adverting to the doubt expressed, whether these notes would find their way to a foreign market, Mr. C. exclaims:

"Sir, what we have seen within a few montas past! Have not not seen the twelve months' bonds of the United States Bank remitteed to London and sold there? Nay, have we not even seen the bonds of the Morris Canal Company—an institution, by the way, not of the most unquestionable credit—have we not seen even the bonds of that company remitted and sold abroad? Yet, sir, gentleman tell us that five per cent. Treasury notes, issued by the Government of the United States, cannot be remitted to discharge any portion of our foreign debt."

Now, sir, have his predictions been verified? Can he deny that the result has demonstrated their fallacy? And why is it that the Bank of the United States and other institutions have been able to raise money at a rate so much lower than the Government? Assuredly not on account of their better credit. The credit of this nation is made up of the value of every man's property, the productiveness of every man's industry, and the high moral tone which will always render the whole available to meet, in good faith, the public engagements. Does not every one see, then, that the actual pecuniary loss, as well as the reproach which it seems most unjustly to cast upon our credit must be attributed to the miserable skulking manner in which the pledge of the public faith has been managed? Instead of an open and direct offer to borrow, which shall attract the attention of capitalists, and insure the widest range of competition, these notes are issued in dribs to the public creditors, and their price, as they straggle into market, is fixed by the shavers into whose hands they unavoidably fall. They are bought up, less with reference to the interest ultimately payable on them, than on account of their receivability in payments to the public, and with a view to profit by the daily fluctuation of the demand, as a greater or less amount of dues to the Government chance to become payable. And yet, sir, when we seek to rescue the Government as well as its creditors out of the hands of this worst and narrowest class of money-dealers—when we entreat that the credit of this great Republic may be used in a mode which shall not only be most productive, but in some measure comport with the national dignity—a cry is raised that we are all in a plot to bring the Government into disrepute!

Mr. Chairman, there is an argument which, with this Administration at least, ought not to be destitute of weight. In a letter, dated Hermitage, 23d July, 1837, addressed to the editor of the Globe, General Jackson says.

"I hope no Treasury notes will be issued. The Treasury drafts upon actual deposites are constitutional, and do not partake of paper credits as Treasury notes, which are subject to depreciation by the merchants and banks, and shavers and brokers, and will be, if issued, and the Government cannot avoid it."

Sir, who has proved himself the more sagacious and far-sighted of the two, General Jackson or Mr. Cambreleng? I had the curiosity to stop, on my way to the House, to inquire at a broker's office the difference between Treasury notes and specie. The answer was, that the notes bearing six per cent. interest were at a discount of two per cent. and those bearing one mill interest at a discount of three per cent. The difference has been, to my knowledge, much greater, and may be so again, when the demand for their employment in payments to the public shall slacken. And, sir, even when you see them quoted at par, it is the broker who profits by this precarious rise, not the individual to whom you gave the note, and who was obliged to pass it off as he best could at the moment.

But we suppose that this fluctuating currency should, at any moment of issue, be above specie, it is plain that the creditor to whom the notes are paid receives, at the public expense, just so much more than he is entitled to. Here would be a new point in the range of discrimination. Why should this premium go to those who may succeed in getting Treasury notes, when they happen to be better than the constitutional currency? Why should not the public be benefited by the state of its own credit? Suppose a six per cent. United States stock, commanding 110 in the market, where would be the wisdom of discharging claims by issuing certificates at par? And what would be thought of a Secretary who boasted that certain creditors designated by himself received ten dollars on every hundred beyond the amount due to them in gold and silver? Take it, then, as you will, we are, by this scheme, at every point of time, cheating either our creditors or ourselves; and are, at the same moment, giving to an executive officer a power over the hopes and fears of every public functionary, as well as of every individual who has pecuniary relations with the Government. What a mark for cupidity these above-specie notes! How irresistible the temptation to fawning and sycophancy on the part, for example, of those United States judges who, as appears by Mr. Woodbury's report, approached him with "requests" to be allowed pecuniary favors in which other members of the court could not participate!

Here, then, is an Administration pledged to "follow in the footsteps" of General Jackson, treating his anxious injunctions with marked contempt, even after experience has fully demonstrated their wisdom. And this is done for the purpose of disguise—as a mask. The people are burdened with the payment of double interest; the public creditors are cheated, in order that we may be led blindfold into debt. Rely upon it, sir, that, in Pennsylvania, this scornful abandonment of General Jackson's "footsteps" will not be atoned for by the accession of those who now act as volunteer guides upon the new path into which you have diverged.

It has been asked by gentlemen on this floor, Does not an individual, when unable to pay his debts, give a due bill, or I O U, as the Government now proposes? Sir, I take up the question, and follow the train of reflection it suggests. Suppose a man of integrity to have so far miscalculated as to find himself unable to discharge the weekly demands that press for satisfaction. Would he not, if his credit were good, render that credit available by going to a bank or other leader, and raising the money? Would he say to those by whose labor he had profited, "I have no money; but here is my due bill, which you can pass off at discount; or, if you choose, you can procure store goods with it at one of my establishments?" What would be thought of a manufacturer who, on pay day, should meet his hands with such a proposition? It is said we have resources in the perspective, and, therefore, need not borrow. Why, sir, this is the case of every man who seeks a loan with any expectation of success. He says: "I have a great deal coming to me; my books show a vast amount due from individuals of undoubted credit; but, meantime, there are calls for cash which I must meet with punctuality and good faith; I ask a discount until those claims come round." Sir, it has probably happened to every one to witness, with indignation and disgust, the devices of plunder by which an unprincipled employer has sought to pinch and screw the laborers in his service. And yet a system which we would brand as infamous in private life is seriously recommended for the adoption of this great people!

Mr. Chairman, if the parallel hold good as to dishonesty, it is not less complete as to improvidence. He who can get rid of present demands by merely signing a due bill, is delighted at this easy mode of putting off the evil day, and runs thoughtlessly on. But a reckoning at last comes, and he finds himself overwhelmed. He is a victim to that facility which the first Secretary of the Treasury describes as so treacherously seductive. Had he been driven to a loan—had his credit been brought to a test—he might have been forced to reflect, ere it was too late, upon his folly and extravagance.

Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] whilst contending that opposition to this measure is to place the Government at the mercy of the moneyed power, thought proper to indulge in a strain of invective against banks and capital, and even to threaten our cities with outbreaks of popular violence. I will not repeat the able argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON,] in reply. It was a matter of general merriment in the House to witness how instantly the inflated balloon, at the first touch of his spear—the spear of Truth—collapsed, and shrunk up into nothing. Sir, the absolute absurdity of the charge, in reference to this bill, disarmed the indignation it was calculated to provoke. Yet who could patiently listen to these efforts to get up a spirit of arson and assassination? It is easy to say they mean nothing, except in the way of caution and warning. This is the flimsy veil always thrown over such suggestions. Once establish that they are justifiable, and pretexts spring up, or may be manufactured. Whose judgment is to decide when the fit occasion has arrived? If there be any meaning or relevancy in the gentleman's remarks, the rejection of this bill would be a proper signal for Lynch law. If this House should choose to profit by the lessons of Gen. Jackson, when backed by experience; if it should choose to pay its creditors honestly and equally; if it should refuse to incur extravagant interest, and insist on rescuing the credit of the country from the hands of brokers and shavers; why, then these denunciations come into play. The misconduct of this House is to be avenged by pillage, and murder in the streets of Philadelphia! People are impelled to violence by the very thought that they may be deemed tame, and cold, and spiritless, in disappointing the predictions of their special advocates and orators.

Surely, sir, this strain is altogether misplaced in the mouth of a gentleman and a scholar; it belongs to a different, though very numerous, class. Some one says, in Shakspeare, "I'll have a starling that shall be taught to speak nothing but Mortimer." There is a race of politicians, all over our country, who seem to have been educated on the same plan as this starling. They have been taught to speak nothing but "bank! bank!" and are altogether at fault when required to vary the note. Yet I do injustice. The starling is a gentle and interesting bird. Rather are we reminded of a filthy parrot, hung out in front of a sailor boarding house, taught by its master to utter exclamations at each passer-by, and never joyous or happy unless when engaged in screaming out rogue or strumpet.

Sir, we are led to infer, from the strange inapplicability of the gentleman's remarks, at least to this bill, that they were prepared for a very different occasion. In the confusion he may, by an accident not uncommon, have put his baggage on board the wrong boat. Yet there may be method and calculation in all this. It is perhaps, apprehended that no opportunity will hereafter occur for the delivery of Sub-Treasury speeches. These things often hang by a frail chain of coincidences. Mr. B. remembered to have heard of a lady, very fond of attending auctions, who bought, amongst other things, a second-hand brass knocker, bearing the name of "Henderson." She explained that her husband might die; she might marry a Henderson, and then it would come into play. The story ran that her husband did died, and she did marry a Henderson. But this was not every body's luck. It was wise, then, for those who had such speeches ready, not to trust to the future. There was, indeed, a peculiar hardship on those gentlemen from South Carolina who had gone over to their bitterest personal and political foes on this scheme, that it seemed to have disappeared—to have been buried by the people at the Cross Roads, with a stake through its middle—before they had enjoyed an occasion to pronounce its eulogy, or even to ask for it the rights of decent sepulture.

One other remark of the gentleman claims a passing notice. He tells us the "money power" has been insubordinate, and forgetful of its appropriate character. Let us see how far the denunciation savors of consistency from that gentleman, or from the distinguished head of the school to which he belongs [Mr. CALHOUN.] It is now agreed that the great danger from a National Bank is, not that it will prove an antagonist of the existing Administration, but that it may become a supple instrument. This is a doctrine pressed at great length by many Senators. They doubtless smile, in secret, at the notion of danger from a contest between the Government and a Bank; although, as the clamor had been got up on that pretext, they feel justified in turning it to account. Subserviency is the matter to be really dreaded. And, undoubtedly, they are right as to the sympathies of money with power. Falstaff describes his soldiers as "a commodity of warm slaves, that had as lief hear the devil as a drum." So it is with money. Its habits are warm; its palm moist and tremulous; there is no rugged vigor about it. It shrinks from contest, and will purchase safety by the most abject submission. And yet, sir, in reference to a signal instance in which all these debasing tendencies were resisted; in which a Bank stood up manfully and braved the frowns and rage of the Executive, rather than compromise its trust; we hear of danger to the country from that very unyielding perseverance in the discharge of a high and solemn duty. The Executive triumphed; the Bank was prostrated. Should a new Bank, at any distance of time, be created, it will go into operation, not only with all the evil tendencies said to be inherent in its nature, but with the memorable lesson constantly in view, that its predecessor fell a victim to stiffness in maintaining an independence of Executive dictation. South Carolina, it seems, now holds that the triumph of the Executive should be complete; that it ought not to be disturbed by even a feeling of sympathy for the victim. How is it, sir, that her proud and chivalrous spirit can thus stoop to pluck the dead lion by the beard?

The gentleman tells us that there has been a systematic warfare of the banks upon the Government, whilst the latter has remained almost passive. Sir, there may be a satisfactory reason why he is not very familiar with the history of that period. Whilst that war was in progress, another of a very different character was going on against himself and his fellow-citizens. At that period, as I remember, it was the fashion to introduce scurrilous paragraphs in the Globe, with "John C. Calhoun, who could never speak the truth when falsehood would answer the purpose," &c. The cry at Washington then was, that John C. Calhoun should be hung up on the first tree; and the gentleman himself was denounced as the worst of traitors. It may well be, then, that his reminiscences of the subordinate contest are somewhat vague and shadowy. Sir, I am not now about to traverse that vast field; but if he will take the trouble to look over the official paper, which is now the organ of his party, he will find abundant materials for better understanding the history of the two contests simultaneously carried on. Without going back more than a year, he will find an essay in the Globe, from one who was evidently admitted to the councils of the party, and probably a principal actor. It is a production of great frankness, written at a time when the suspension of specie payments was supposed to have rendered the banks universally and for ever odious. The writer says:

"It was deemed essential to force her (the Bank,) into the field prematurely, and cripple her in anticipation. This could be done only by a removal of the deposites, early in General Jackson's second term. It was believed that, if she submitted to the measure in peace, she would be quietly stripped of her power, a new system would be in full and successful operation before the expiration of her charter, and she would slide out of existence almost unobserved. If she resisted, it was not doubted that she would be vanquished by the ever victorious chieftain."

And again, as to the employment of the State banks:

"Let those who now inveigh against the employment of the State banks at that time, look back, and ask themselves whether it was possible for General Jackson to accomplish his object by any other means. If he had proposed a separation from all banks, he would have found all the State banks and their friends in full and effective alliance with the Bank of the United States—a league which it was not desirable to encounter. Neither the public mind, nor the opinions of the members of Congress, were then prepared for a separation of bank and State."

Sir, in these paragraphs you have a compendious view of the warfare upon the Bank of the United States, as well as upon the State institutions. We all know how artfully the latter were played off upon the former. Their cupidity was excited; their pride, local, and personal, inflamed; the influence of the Philadelphia institution represented as an injurious and mortifying ascendency. At length, the whole were thrown together into the cock-pit, with gaffs fixed by a dexterous hand, to tear each other's eyes and pierce each other's hearts!

I turn, sir, to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] Whilst urging the immediate passage of this bill as indispensable to save the national credit from degradation, he has introduced a medley of topics well calculated to provoke the widest discussion. If he deemed it necessary to connect them with this measure, notwithstanding the pressure for time, how has he found it reconcilable with justice or decorum to join in a pertinacious though unsuccessful effort to cut off all opportunity of reply?

We have heard, amongst other things, a eulogy on the general banking law of New York, as having broken the chains by which chartered monopolies had so long fettered the energies of the great Empire State. Of the merits of that scheme I am not about to speak. As the act of a sovereign State, it is entitled, on this floor, to the highest respect; and, as an interesting experiment about to be tried by a leading member of the Confederacy, it claims our heartiest good wishes for its success. The only point of view, however, in which the subject becomes of national interest has escaped the notice of the chairman. At the commencement of the present session of Congress the President adverted to the great revolution in the State of New York, which had given a complete ascendancy to his political opponents. He assured us that this result was brought about by the influence of the banking corporations in that State. Now, sir, do we understand that this charge is persisted in? Are we still urged to believe that a Legislature which has thus disenthralled the people from an odious bank monopoly came into power as the creature and instrument of that bank monopoly? This part of the message has not been disposed of by the House. It has gone forth to the world as a stigma upon free institutions. It has been cited in the English newspapers to show how sordid and venal is the State which borders upon Canada, and how little reason there is to dread collision with a people thus characterized by their own chief magistrate.

It has pleased the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to introduce, in the most incidental way, a topic of the deepest interest at the present moment—that of the resumption of specie payments. I am glad he did so. In every part of the country the eyes of the people are turned towards the banks. These institutions have existed for some time at bare sufferance. Popular opinion has thus far restrained the pursuit of the remedies against them which the laws already afford. Ought forbearance to be continued longer? This is a question which has swelled to a magnitude that claims for it the attention of all; and he may be justly deemed a public benefactor who lends his aid to the formation of an enlightened and dispassionate judgment.

Mr. B. had, therefore, hoped to learn from gentlemen on this floor, whose reputation stood high for financial knowledge and experience, how they thought this resumption was to be generally and safely effected and continued, particularly in the interior, under the system which they had so long struggled to fasten upon us. For his constituents, at least, he could offer a pledge that they would give a fair hearing to argument, and that they would sternly carry out the conclusion at which their judgment arrived. They had no sympathy with these institutions, except as instruments to promote the public benefit. They were no more wedded to the banks than they were to the gas-works or the water-works, or any other institution which had demanded a larger investment than suited the means or convenience of individual capitalists. Mr. B. personally, had the same feeling. He owned not a dollar of bank stock, and his own simple habits and pursuits had preserved him from any feeling of gratitude for favors conferred, or of resentment for their refusal.

Sir, said Mr. B. I well know that these institutions never can be what is called "popular." The benefits they render are invisible or unheeded, whilst causes of irritation are daily addressed to the eager passions of men. For one who receives aid, how many hundreds are there who encounter denial—who deem themselves injured or insulted—and clamorously denounce what they represent as partiality or caprice? And, if this be the case within the immediate sphere of their accommodations, we know that in the country they have always been viewed with dislike. They are regarded as complex machines, by which money is rapidly made in the towns, through mysterious processes denied to those whose hard earnings are derived from direct toil—from the sweat of the harvest-field. Long before the great contest of recent years, which has drawn so largely on this feeling, who does not recall the numberless instances in which he has seen it successfully invoked by small demagogues to earn a cheap and worthless popularity? It is part, indeed, of that jealousy between town and country which may be so readily worked upon and inflamed. No, sir! The public man who exposes himself to the charge of being an advocate of banks, does so at imminent risk. He must look for support to the consciousness that he is called upon by duty to oppose himself, at all hazards, to the artifices of designing political knaves, and with a full knowledge that he becomes a mark for the grossest misrepresentation.

Yet, sir, I would fain hope that the public mind is now prepared for more just and enlarged views. It seems impossible for any one of us not to see the deep stake which the whole community has in guarding these institutions from wanton assault or premature condemnation. The capital which they hav drawn to the West from the Atlantic cities and from Europe has passed into every form of prosperous industry. To prostrate them is only to compel its extraction and withdrawal through legal process and by ruinous sacrifices. What class may flatter itself with exemption from the evils of that epoch? Surely not the farmer, when he looks round on a languid and deserted market, once thronged and fervent with the busy and the prosperous.

Mr. Chairman, I must here advert, before proceeding further, to one of the most extraordinary political movements it has ever been my fortune to witness. We have recently heard from a distinguished Senator [Mr. BENTON] a call on the Administration party to take up a new position, under a new banner. The appeal has been eagerly caught at, and the experiment is now urged, in Pennsylvania, at least, with all the energy that belongs to a last desperate rally.

Sir, it is undeniable that the personage to whom I allude wields a greater influence over the party than any other individual. His skill and tact in reaching the popular mind have been greatly underrated. His promises touch the imagination, and take advantage of that love of excitement—that craving after mighty changes in our day, such as shall make a new era in the history of man—in which each successive generation has delighted to indulge, and towards the achievement of which it has stood ready to pour forth its blood. Let us, then, look at the sincerity and consistency of appeals from a quarter so influential.

At the special session, this Senator emphatically declared that public confidence in banks was irretrievably and forever gone; that gold might be imported into the country by hundreds of millions, but that an attempt on the part of these institutions to resume specie payments would be but the prelude to a mighty and universal crash. I read, sir, from the speech of 22d September last, which has been more widely circulated through my Congressional district than any other delivered at that great crisis:

"Another revulsion must come. Thus it was after the last resumption. The banks recommenced payments in 1817; in two years the failures were more disastrous than ever. Thus it was in England after the long suspension. Payments recommenced in 1823; in 1825 the most desolating crash of banks took place which had ever been known in the kingdom, although the Bank of England had imported, in less than four years, twenty millions sterling in gold, about one hundred millions of dollars, to recommence upon. Its effects reached this country, crushed the cotton houses in New Orleans, depressed the money market, and injured all business. Why was this? Why was it that, within two years after the resumption, both in England and our America, these disastrous revulsions ensued? Loss of confidence was the cause; and that loss resulting not from the act of the Government, but from the conduct of the banks themselves. The banks had failed, and, therefore, they could fail. The people had seen them fail, and, therefore, they feared they might do so again. There was no confidence in them; no more than the coachman places in the balking horse, when he comes to the hill. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] wishes the Government to do something to reanimate confidence in these banks. Could a law of Congress inspire confidence into his coachman, and give him faith in the balking horse? No more can it be done in relation to these banks."

I pray you, sir, to pause upon the deliberate convictions of this great Administration leader. The attempt to resume specie payments must, according to him, terminate in a speedy convulsion. There must be "a desolating crash of banks." The "cotton houses in New Orleans" must be "crushed." "The money market" must be be "depressed." "All business" must be "injured." Even the most direct and open cooperation of the Government, in sustaining the banks, will be ineffectual to avert or mitigate the catastrophe. No bank that once suspended can ever revive. The public confidence is dead; it cannot be galvanized into a show of vitality.

Now, sir, can it be denied that such representations may render inevitable the very mischiefs thus elaborately pictured? They have been anxiously circulated, in every variety of form, to be read, pondered on, laid aside, and recurred to again and again. The party newspapers have dinned them into the ears of the people, without intermission. And what individual, who puts the slightest faith in that speech of 22d September, would consent to keep by him for one moment a five dollar note, if he could, with his utmost speed, contrive to reach the bank before the final "crash?" Sir, many of my unsophisticated constituents have laid all this to heart. They have taken it for gospel. But how must they be startled when the very same voice is now heard proclaiming that the party is about to escape from numberless discomfitures, by rallying its broken forces under a new banner? The old catchwords have lost their potency. Divorce will not answer. The new cry, it seems, is to be resumption. That which, in the Party Almanac of September, was announced as a comet to scatter from its fiery tail dismay and desolation over this fair land, becomes the mild morning star, emblem of hope and faith, before which all true believers are to bend the knee, and put up their orisons. And this resumption is to be instant, sharp, peremptory! No sympathy is to be indulged with weaker brethren; no preparations to break the predicted "crash;" no generous enlarged views, prompted by an enlightened and farseeing self-interest; no thought even of the cherished "cotton houses in New Orleans." The whole assembled party is, at the word of command, to step from the ranks and array itself, as one man, under the new banner sent out from Washington. Oh unutterable faith in the gullibility of the people! Oh matchless confidence in the powers of audacity!

Mr Chairman, I put it to your candor whether the banks may not well pause when they hear this precipitate action invoked from the present quarter. It is clamorously demanded by those who have prophesied utter and wide-spread ruin from resumption, under any circumstances. It comes from those whose reputation in matters of finance depends on the fulfilment of those predictions. Can they be sincre in urging that resumption in the face of a Government war upon them? What! they who declared that even the strenuous support of the Government could avail nothing? Sir, they well know that if the banks stop payment again, after a premature resumption, their fate is sealed. Do they look to this result? Undeniably, it would be the consummation of their prophecies. Would it not be the consummation of their ardent hopes?

It is roundly asserted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] that every bank, except those in the Southwest, may safely resume. Now, in the first place, he takes for granted that all the speeches with which the country has been flooded, under the frank of members of Congress, of Executive officers, and of the President himself, contained nothing but arrant falsehoods, and that this was so understood by the people. If there was believed to be one word of truth in them, the banks could not resume.

When the chairman makes this assertion, are we to understand him that the banks are prepared to redeem, at any moment, all their liabilities in coin? No. This, he will tell you, is not necessary. It is sufficient, if there be enough to meet the calls of trade and public convenience; the remainder of the notes will be sustained in circulation by a knowledge that the resources of the banks, in claims upon solvent borrowers, are abundantly sufficient to insure the holder against loss. And, sir, doubtless this might, under ordinary circumstances, be safely assumed. But what becomes of it when the avowed policy of the Administration invites and demands a run upon the banks? The very persons who talk of the forbearance which would result from public confidence, are those who now strive to blast that confidence, by preaching up utter, uncompromising distrust. What is the whole theory of the experiment? Is it not that confidence in any bank is misplaced, and full of peril? How is a proselyte to it made but by persuading him that his modicum of interest in the public treasure is insecure so long as paper shall be received? And if you succeed in fixing these apprehensions upon him, can it be supposed that the same individual will leave his private means at the mercy of this imminent peril? You compel him to feel restless and uneasy whilst he has a bank note in his possession. The Government has crossed it with the mark of rejection, and proclaims that rejection as part of a political creed. It raises the panic cry of sauve qui peut. Who that is obliged to go to the bank to get a note changed, in order to pay specie to the Government, will not, at the same time, think it safe to cash all he has in his possession?

Besides, sir, it is a trite and familiar truth, that so long as the Government will receive for its dues only a particular commodity, that commodity must command a premium. It must rise in price above any substitute or representative which will not, every where, answer the same end. Holders of notes will eagerly make the exchange, and send the coin where its aptitude for a particular purpose secures to it a profitable market. And such a commodity will, of course, flow to the points where heavy payments are to be made. We witnessed the process, on a small scale, under the Treasury circular, exacting specie for payment of lands. The banks at Pittsburg found their coin disappearing, and travelling westward. Did it produce any salutary effect there? Not at all. So far as the circular was honestly enforced, it only tended to accumulate masses of specie at remote points, to remain inert and useless, until brought back by the sure but tedious operations of commerce. The very term circulation suggests that analogy to the human system which inspires the utmost caution and repels all idea of violence. By external force you may extravasate the blood, but you add no vigor to the swollen limb, and the whole system remains sore and languid until the tumor is reduced. The same spectacle will be witnessed when you create an additional current towards the custom houses. You only extend the operation which was going on when the banks stopped. How can specie quietly remain in the interior, as the basis of a safe paper circulation, at points where there are no great land offices or custom-houses, when you create for it this artificial demand elsewhere? You compel a determination towards the extremities; and how is the life-blood to be thrown back upon the heart, to perform its salutary functions through the whole system? Close up your custom-houses and your land offices, and all sound banks might safely resume specie payments to-morrow. It is the vicious action of this Government which, after destroying the best currency in the world, still struggles against the natural tendency of our elastic country to rise above disaster.

The present relation of this Government to the people is that of an Irish absentee landlord, living luxuriously in London, whilst his agent collects the rents in gold. The fraud and oppression to which such a state of things gives rise are in Ireland familiar objects of odium. Look at a sketch by one of her most gifted writers.

"The agent would take nothing but gold. The same guineas were bought and sold several times over, to the great profit of the agent, and loss of the poor tenants; for, as the rents were paid, the guineas were resold to another set."

Sir, this is precisely what took place in the neighborhood of the land offices under the special circular. What a millennium for brokers and shavers! You will see it on a yet larger scale at the seaports, when specie shall accumulate there, like a great sand bar at the mouth of one of your rivers—not to fertilize—no, sir—but to warm into existence myriads of noxious insects to fasten upon the social body.

The real commercial interests of the seaports are identified with the prosperity of the West; cripple or embarrass it, and your canals and railroads may be abandoned. Even with regard to the duties on imports, how trifling a portion is ultimately discharged in the vicinity of the custom-house at which they chance to be paid or secured? They fall most heavily on the purchaser who is furthest removed from the seaboard. The various agents of traffic, intermediate to consumption, take care to remunerate themselves liberally, in the price of the article, for every charge to which it is subjected in its passage through their hands; and the tax which thus grows, at each stage of transit, carries its highest accumulation into the remotest cabin.

Let me say, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I am not one of those who believe in the gloomy predictions which have gone forth from the Senate of the United States, and been so industriously circulated. I do not believe that faith in all these institutions is irretrievably gone, I do not believe that a general "crash" awaits resumption. No, sir; the blessed rays of credit will again cheer and warm us. The cloud, raised by the breath of party, has not quenched the orb of day:

> To morrow he repairs the golden flood,
> And fires the nations with redoubled ray.

But, sir, infinite circumspection and the nicest judgment are required to guard against the dangers, intrinsic and factitious, which attend the process. Above all, this senseless warfare which you have been waging for so many years must cease; and then we may safely confide the rest to the energy and intelligence of the great people we represent.

SPEECH OF MR. MASON, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, May 12, 1838—On the Treasury Note Bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON having moved an amendment to the Treasury note bill, proposing to substitute a provision authorizing a loan for the provision authorizing the issue of Treasury notes—the hour being late, and the Committee of the Whole refusing motions to rise—

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, rose and addressed the House as follows:

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is intended to furnish to the Treasury the sum of ten millions of dollars, in aid of the current revenue. It is simply a bill for supply, and as such I shall treat it, avoiding all collateral matter, the example of the honorable chairman of Ways and Means, who brought it in, to the contrary notwithstanding.

We are told, and I believe correctly, that the Government wants so much money; as one of the representatives of the people, I am willing to grant it, and thus to me there remains the single inquiry, what is the best means of raising it? This question I shall discuss. I am bound to do so, because it has been the pleasure of the chairman of the Ways and Means, in his reports asking the supply, to avoid such discussion altogether. He has been content with declaring that the deficiency in the revenue "must be provided for, either by an authority to reissue the Treasury notes received, or by an issue of others in their place." And this word "must," having the same significant use, is found appropriately alike in his reports of the 5th and 23d of March.

Sir, let me say to the honorable chairman, that in a report addressed to the intelligence of the representatives of the people, and least of all when asking a supply, this word "must" is not parliamentary English. It is the language of Courts, but has no place in Parliament. I should have thought it his duty, in recommending the supply, to canvass before us the best and most economical means of raising it. The financial condition of the country, as well as of the Treasury, is familiar to his mind; we have a right to expect from him an exposition of the "ways and means" of supply, when, in lieu, we have nothing but an imperative monosyllable.

This, sir, is a departure from usage. Former committees, in laying before the country the necessities of an extraordinary supply, to meet a deficient revenue, have thought it their duty to present fully the several modes of raising it, whether by taxation, loan, or an issue of Treasury notes, and to recommend that which, under the circumstances, to them might seem best.

Our chairman, however, thinking otherwise, it is our right, as it is our duty, to consider this subject fully, and with the best lights we can command, each for himself; and this would seem the more necessary because, notwithstanding the whole inquiry is shaken off by the committee in the use of their confident monosyllable, yet it is remarkable that the recommendation comes from them at last in the most crude and undigested form. They were not themselves satisfied with the results of their own reasoning. Let me trace, for a moment, this vacillation of purpose, not so much, sir, with a view of confuting them, but to show the propriety of full consideration by this House.

We have then, first, the bill of the 23d of March, entitled, "A bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," accompanied by a report at length. This bill provides for an issue of $10,000,000 of Treasury notes, payable one-third in twelve, one-third in eighteen months, and the residue in two years after their date, to bear interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and to be redeemable at maturity at the Treasury, for which redemption certain funds are specifically pledged in the bill.

This is a loan out and out, to be effected by a sale of Treasury scrip, bearing interest, redeemable at stated periods during which it was to run, and not in the mean time receivable in payment of public dues.

In the report accompanying this bill, (our printed document No. 716,) much reasoning is used to show that, by the unfortunate provisions of the act of the special session, for the issue of Treasury notes, it had exercised an impoverishing instead of an invigorating influence upon the Treasury. Under that act, it is said, the issue of $10,000,000 had operated a reduction, in lieu of an augmentation of the revenue; and this reduction of the revenue, so brought about, was to be provided for by a new issue under the proposed bill.

One not versed in the mysteries of finance, as the honorable chairman is, would be a little curious to know how an extraordinary supply of $10,000,000 in aid of the current revenue, could reduce instead of increasing it. But, having ascertained the fact, it was his duty to trace out the causes, however perplexed the problem might be; and he has accordingly detected and exposed the offending matter. After capitulating certain extraordinary demands upon the Treasury, arising out of the Indian wars and the troubles on the Canada frontier, he says: "Notwithstanding these additional estimates, the current resources of the year would, with proper economy, be equal to all the demands upon the Treasury, whether for ordinary or extraordinary purposes, but for two provisions of the Treasury note act referred to; the one authorizing their receipt in payment of public dues, and the other prohibiting the Treasury from reissuing them."

Well, sir, this bill for a loan took the regular course of a first and second reading on the day that it was brought in, and was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Before any further action was had upon it, there was brought in from the same committee a second, entitled "A bill supplementary to the act entitled an act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes," reported on the 13th April. This was in like manner twice read, and referred with its predecessor.

Things so remained, without action on either, until the 23d of April, only ten days after the last bill was reported, when, at the close of a long day's debate upon a different subject, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, without notice or reason assigned, moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from all further consideration of these two bills, and that they be recommitted to the committee that brought them in; which was done accordingly. And thereupon and forthwith thereafter, he reported the third bill, being that now under consideration, and bearing the very equivocal title of "A bill to carry into effect an act approved the 12th of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

Thus we have had, in the short space of one month, running from the 23d day of March to the 23d of April, three several schemes for supply, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, each variant from the other, and each proposing for itself to raise the supply by its appropriate machinery.

The first was a loan through the medium of Treasury scrip.

The second, an issue of Treasury paper to the amount, and in lieu of such as, under the provisions of the former law, had returned into the Treasury and been cancelled.

And the third, an issue of Treasury paper to the amount of $10,000,000, in lieu of the entire emission authorized by the former law, and, as I understand it, to be reissuable and redeemable at the discretion of the Secretary.

Thus infirm of purpose in their recommendation, we should have expected some lenity and indulgence to those who might evince a disposition to select between the various modes of raising this supply, as they emanated from the committee, whether by loan, as proposed in March; by a partial issue of Treasury paper for immediate use, and a loan for the residue, as proposed on the 13th of April; or by an emission for the whole demand, in lieu of either, as recommended on the 23d.

But no, the honorable chairman can brook no delay. From the tenor of his remarks made yesterday, it would seem that we are expected to carry the last project of the committee at once into law, without even looking back, or considering in any form what his own committee recommended so very shortly before.

Of these noxious projets, sir, I prefer that of the 13th of April, providing an issue of Treasury paper to meet immediate want, and a loan for the residue; and I would take it as proposed from the Committee of Ways and Means, with this single difference in the the terms of loan: that, instead of selling Treasury six per cent. scrip at twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months, I would extend the time of payment and reduce the rate of interest.

As the first reason for this preference I have but to quote from the report of the honorable chairman which accompanied the bill—an authority for which I ask his respect. He recommends the loan in preference to notes receivable for public dues, because the latter have been found, under the experience of the late law, to reduce, instead of augmenting the revenue. Let me be understood, if you please, as adopting the objection, though not as the chairman has conceived it. I am at some loss to know how a credit of $10,000,000, fully realized as so much money, can reduce the revenue. But I can well understand, if the time of credit be too short, how a revenue, reduced by other cruses, may be unable to meet current demands, and at the same time to absorb the issue under it. And this is the true pith of the objection to any similar issue, as it is taken in the report of the committee—an objection that was ably taken, and well relied on, however misconceived in its application.

What was the condition of our revenue then? A sudden and violent revulsion had just occurred in every branch of trade and business, putting a complete stoppage upon the whole. There were no customs, because importation had ceased, and of the public lands the sales were at an end. Being cut off from the supplies of trade, our merchants could not pay the revenue bonds given before the catastrophe. And of the public money on deposite all had been used, which, from its locality, could be made available. The banks too had suspended payment throughout the country, and all sources of revenue were cut off alike from the Government and from its debtors.

In this state of things Congress, at the special session, ordered an issue of Treasury notes, redeemable in twelve months, and in the meen time receivable in payment of public dues. I then preferred the bill in that form, and, under the circumstances then existing, should certainly have that preference still.

First, because it was the only means by which the Government could make its credit available. A loan could not have been negotiated on any terms, certainly not at home, for there was no many disposable in market, save the disgraced currency of the banks; nor abroad, because of the prohibitory rate of exchange.

And secondly, because this disgraced currency, not being receivable by Government, it was paralyzed alike in receiving or paying its debts; and Treasury notes receivable furnished a medium for both.

By this receivability Government was obligated to retire these evidences of debt as fast as they were presented before the entire credit expired, and it has resulted in practice that they flowed back upon the Treasury faster than the accruing revenue could absorb them.

Knowing well that the revenue was yet in far too enfeebled a condition to meet the Government expenditure, and provide for this debt as it flowed in, the committee, in their report, have earnestly remonstrated against a like provision in the new issue

That such is, in fact, its condition, I have only to refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying the President's message to this House on the 10th day of this month, in which he says, that "during the present year the revenue has been paid in Treasury notes to such an extent, that only about one-fourth of a million has been received from it in money, so as to assist in discharging the current expenditures." "These last, [the expenditures,] on an average, have been over two millions monthly, and in April nearly three millions."

And yet, mirabile dictu, notwithstanding this remonstrance, and the satisfactory reasoning on which it rested, the committee, in one short month, dismiss their own objections, repudiate their own arguments, and come back, at one bound, to the very position so recently abandoned. We are now urged by this bill to do the very thing against which the committee that brought it in themselves remonstrated but one short month before.

Sir, the objection then taken holds with equal force now. The credit is too short. What argument could make this plainer? By the issue of Treasury paper, as proposed, you impose upon the revenue the duty of redeeming the notes as fast as they come in. The committee complain of this feature in the law of October. The Secretary tells you that, under its operation, while the expenditure is from two to three millions a month, the cash receipt does not exceed one-quarter of a million; and yet, with theory and practice both united against it, we are required now to re-enact the very same law.

But, sir, without the light of such experience, I should be against this mode of raising money, except under circumstances of such imperious necessity as left no other alternative.

I cannot consider this as a party question, although by no means one of those who profess a freedom from all party restraint; yet on occasions where such restraint would overrule my own sense of right, I cannot and will not regard it. I concur fully in the necessity of raising this supply. I am prepared to vote for it cheerfully, and without stint, and without any rebuke upon the Administration; for I do not believe that it is just responsible. I trace its diminished revenue to causes over which it has, and ought to have, no control; to those causes which have operated to impair the revenue of all alike, whose resources are implicated in the trade and business of the country.

Until that trade and business shall revive, and be again in a condition to make its wonted returns to the public coffers, money must be raised upon the public credit in some form. To this all are agreed; and our plain path of duty is, to obtain it on the most economical terms within the pale of our authority.

Looking to the former practice of the Government, I am taught to believe that an issue of Treasury notes has been looked upon rather as the alternative of an unembarrassed financier than the choice of undoubted credit.

In the first war loan of 1821, Mr. Gallatin, then at the head of the Treasury, (whose ability and knowledge of this subject none will question,) reported to Congress that, of the eleven millions authorized to be raised by loan, but little more than six millions had been taken, leaving a deficit of nearly five millions of dollars. Speaking of this deficiency, he says:

"It is confidently believed that the amount which remains unsubscribed for will thus be filled as early as the money may be wanted for the public service. In order, however, to prevent the possibility of disappointment, and to remove doubts and erroneous expectations, I beg leave to submit the propriety of authorizing the issue of Treasury notes on the following principles, viz:

"1st. Not to exceed in the whole the amount which may ultimately not be subscribed to the loan; that is to say, that the amount received on account of the loan, and that of the Treasury notes, shall not together exceed $11,000,000.

"2d. To bear an interest," &c.—Gallatin's Report on the Finances, May 14, 1812.

Here, then, we have proofs that the first issue of Government paper, since the old continental money, (the history of which we all know,) was not recommended or resorted to until a loan had failed; and then only and strictly as auxiliary to a loan direct. So far from being treated as an ordinary resource, Mr. Gallatin asked the power, in his own emphatic language, only "to prevent the possibility of disappointment" if the loan should fail. It was considered by him as the very "medicine of state," to be administered only in the last resort, and when otherwise the patient must expire. Under such auspices, we had our first issue of Treasury notes, amidst the embarrassments of a war, and under the pressure of impaired credit. The necessities and difficulties of the times forced this measure into use upon a skilful though reluctant financier. His sagacity doubtless foresaw the consequences, though from them there was no escape. The emission was continued from time to time, at increased interest, until they were depreciated at the doors of the Treasury as low as seventy-five for the hundred.

Mr. Dallas, who came after Mr Gallatin into the Treasury, was opposed to the continuation of this policy. But Mr. Eppes, then chairman of the Ways and Means in this House, espoused the opposite. His purpose was to create and continue a Government paper to supply a circulating medium for the country, to take the place of the paper of the State banks, then discredited by the suspension of specie payments.

"The want of some medium," says Mr. Eppes, "which, resting on a firm and solid basis, may unite public confidence, and have a general instead of a local circulation, is now universally acknowledged;" and, after recommending a further issue of Treasury notes for this purpose, he continues:

"To receive their circulation, it would be necessary,

"1st. To issue them in small sums.

"2d. To allow holders to fund them at pleasure in 8 per cent. stock.

"3d. To make them payable to bearer, and pass by delivery.

4th. To make them receivable in all public dues.

"5th. The United States, to prevent redundant circulation, to retain the power of redeeming them at pleasure, or of funding them."—Report Committee Ways and Means, October 10, 1814.

Such was Mr. Eppes's idea of the true uses and intent of a Treasury issue. But even he was obliged to rest it for support on the funding system. Regarding a permanent debt as the lot of our country, in common with all others, he looked to that as the legitimate and only support of his scheme of Government paper money, to be funded at the pleasure of the holder, or at the will of Government, in permanent 8 per cent. stock.

Mr. Dallas, however, in a letter to Mr. Eppes, soon after this report appeared, condemned this scheme in the strongest terms. He considered, with Mr. Gallatin, that Treasury paper should be resorted to only under peculiar circumstances, as a means of temporary supply. "Under favorable circumstances," he writes, "and to a limited extent, an emission of Treasury notes would probably afford relief: but Treasury notes are an expensive and precarious substitute either for coin or for bank notes, charged as they are with a growing interest, productive of no countervailing profit or emolument, and exposed to every breath of popular prejudice and alarm."

Sir, I have cited these authorities to show that an issue of Treasury paper has been looked to by our ablest financiers, only as a temporary expedient of supply, when the price of money was so high, or the credit of Government so low, as to justify its use.

In October last, when the issue of ten millions was authorized, I considered those circumstances as existing, to which Mr. Dallas refers as justifying the occasional use of this "expensive and precarious subsitute." The Treasury was empty, the sources of revenue dried up. The public money on deposite in the South and Southwest was inaccessible, and at the North it had been drained almost to the last dollar. A loan would have produced nothing, there being no money to invest, and a heavy European debt absorbing every dollar that could be disengaged from the ruins of commerce.

There was no alternative, as I conceived, but an issue of Treasury notes to meet the exigency, and to furnish a temporary supply.

Now the condition of affairs is altogether different. The foreign debt has been wiped off; exchange has been turned in favor of this country, and the precious metals are again pouring in. Money is once more abundant, and to be had at the lowest rates.

I ask, then, why is this Treasury issue to be continued, on terms so onerous to the country, when the supply may be had in coin, if required, on far cheaper terms?

Let us estimate the difference in cost. By the late law, twenty thousand dollars was appropriated from the Treasury, to defray the cost of the emission, including the salaries of four extra clerks, at $1200 per annum each, to keep the accounts. These clerks and these salaries at least must be continued so long as the system is kept up.

Then the rate of interest must be at the least 6 per cent.; and when we allow for depreciation, which to my apprehension is inevitable, the loss to the Treasury will fall in proportion.

On what terms, then, could a loan be obtained? I pretend to no certain knowledge on this head; but, from the best sources of information to which I can refer, Government stock having from three to five years to run would bring par in the market, and yield coin, or its equivalent, at an interest of from 4½ to 5 per cent.

But we are told by the honorable chairman that a loan would be "unjustifiable." I quote his own word, because the Government will have the money from its own resources for the year, before the loan could be made available. And for these resources he refers to the instalment from the deposite banks in the South and West, to fall due in July, the merchants' bonds for revenue, on which time has been allowed, and the bonds of the Bank of the United States, all which he estimates at some seven millions of dollars.

Now, sir, in reply to all this, I quote back upon him an authority which he, at least, cannot venture to contradict. I quote his own report upon the state of the finances, made to us on the 5th of March last; when, after a dispassionate and extended view of the whole ground, he says:

"It is obvious that, far from being a surplus, there will be a deficiency, which must be supplied, either by a reissue of the Treasury notes redeemed, or by an authority to issue others. There is not the least probability that our revenue for two years to come will be equal to the wants of Government; and if for the next four years it should be sufficient to meet our expenditures, and to redeem the Treasury notes which have been or may be hereafter issued, it will be full as much as can be reasonably anticipated."

And, again, in the same report, speaking of the probable time for redemption of this paper, he says:

"The Treasury notes required for the service of 1838 and 1839 will only be issued to discharge claims as the money may be wanted; and any surplus which may accrue in 1840 and 1841 will be immediately applied to their redemption."

What broad admissions have we here, sustained, too, as they are made, by facts and reasoning in the report, in opposition to confident declarations thrown out in the debate! Let the honorable chairman reconcile them if he can. What, then, are the facts? Why, that for two years, at least, yet to come, were the Treasury free from debt, the revenue would not be "equal to the wants of Government." And with this burden of ten millions of debt in Treasury notes, to be redeemed, it will, under the most favorable circumstances, require four years, at least, to effect it, and meet ordinary demands at the same time. The years 1840 and 1841 are presented as the earliest period at which any surplus can be spared, to begin the final redemption of the Treasury notes.

But, sir, without this authority from the committee, we have enough in the report of the Secretary himself, communicated to this House but two days ago, to satisfy us that the Treasury is in no condition, from resources ordinary or extraordinary, to provide for this debt at any time earlier than that indicated in the report.

He tells us that, on the day his letter is dated, the whole money in the Treasury available for use but little exceeded $300,000, and of the ten millions of paper authorized to be issued in October last, the whole had been used, except about $200,000, making, for available means on hand, not six hundred thousand dollars, with nearly four millions and a half of Treasury paper yet unredeemed.

"That, during the present year, the revenue had been paid in Treasury note to such an extent that only about one-fourth of a million monthly had been received from it in money, so as to assist in discharging the current expenditures," while they (the expenditures) had, on an average, for the current year, been over two millions monthly, and, in April, nearly three millions.

And, looking forward, he further says, "as more than four millions of the Treasury notes are still outstanding, and the banks generally have not yet resumed specie payments, it is probable that a great part of the revenue will, for some time to come, be paid in a similar manner."

What, then, have we before us, in all these facts, to justify the belief that this Treasury issue is only wanted to anticipate, for a few months, the extraordinary resources of the year, to arise from the bank debts and the merchants' bonds?

A rough estimate, based upon these data, will be accurate enough at least to illustrate the view I am now presenting.

First, then,

The expenditures to be provided for to the end of the current year, being seven and a half months, at $2,500,000 per month, about the Secretary's estimate, equal to		$18,750,000
Our resources are—
Cash revenue, at $250,000 per month, for same time	$1,875,000
Extraordinary receipts of the year from banks and merchants' bonds	7,000,000
		$9,875,000

Leaves a deficit of nearly ten millions of dollars to be filled up by the new Treasury paper. So that, at the end of the year, and under the most favorable circumstances, we shall be just where the report of the committee has placed us, with no surplus on hand, and this Treasury debt unredeemed. And for this prospective view, I have again the full authority of the Secretary himself, for in the same letter of the 10th of May, he says:

"By the seasonable adoption of either of these measures," (authority to reissue the old Treasury notes, or an issue of new ones,) "all anticipated embarrassments during 1838 can probably be obviated; for, in that event, no provision of additional means to meet the expenditures of the year will be necessary hereafter, unless, before the close of the session, it shall appear that new appropriations have been made, or are likely to be made, exceeding the estimates submitted by the Department in December last, by several millions, or that the revenue will be materially less."

Against this reasoning of the committee, then, and these facts of the Secretary, how vain and idle is it for gentlemen to declare roundly in debate that the exigency requiring this Treasury issue will pass off with the year that produced it. If there be any who believe it in truth, I can only say their credulity is far greater than mine. We are told, however, by an honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] that it is monstrous to advocate a loan, for that would be the creation of a national debt, a thing in every way to be abhorred. Sir, have I understood that gentleman aright? In his reply to his colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who denounced this Treasury issue as unconstitutional, did I not understand him to vindicate it on the single ground that it was but a loan in another form? That the Constitution gave full power to borrow money, and this was one and a legitimate mode of exercising that power?

[Mr. RHETT here interposed, and was understood to say that by a national debt he meant a permanent debt.]

Mr. MASON resumed. A permanent debt, sir! What does the honorable gentleman mean by that distinction? The debt itself is, in fact, already created, and its permanency depends altogether upon the time within which you can redeem or pay it off. What is the honorable gentleman's idea of permanency? This debt was authorized under the law of October last. It has been already fully incurred by an issue of the whole ten millions. Nearly one-half of it is yet unpaid, and we are now asked to have the loan renewed by another issue of the same amount. It is in proof, by facts and reasoning from the highest sources, that it cannot be cancelled for four years to come, if, indeed, it require not a longer time. What then are we to do? Why, when we return here in December, continue the loan for half a year more by a new issue of Treasury notes, and so on from time to time, until the revenue is adequate to afford a sufficient surplus beyond expenditure to wipe it off. Are we then to be frightened by shadows; by this spectre of a public debt; when we have it before us already actually incurred, fixed upon the Treasury beyond retrieve? No, sir; I, for one, am for meeting it boldly and aboveboard. The Government owes the money, and must have it. I would have them to go abroad, like men of character and credit in private life, who manage their affairs with economy and thrift, and borrow the money in open market upon the best terms it can be had; and not, like mendicants, borrowing at disadvantage, from day to day, or from half year to half year, in the vain hope of keeping their necessities out of view. This, sir, I regard as the true and honest policy; it is the only end at which I aim in my opposition to this bill. It is due from us to the people we represent, upon whom the burden falls, that we should borrow the money upon best terms to be had, by extending the loan to a period when we expect to pay, and not to increase the cost by a series of short and delusive credits.

For the present exigency, and to meet the immediate demand, I have no objection to a limited extension of this Treasury issue; and for that purpose, when the proper time shall come, I may offer to amend this bill. But, regarding this debt as fixed and inevitable for at least four years to come, I am for meeting it at once by a loan for that period, at the lowest rate of interest, and to have done with this wretched substitute of short credits, at high rates, upon depreciated paper.

A few words more, sir, in reply to what fell from the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] and I will pass to another part of this question. In advocating this bill, I understood him to say that it had been the invariable practice of the Government to raise money by an issue of Treasury paper in preference to a loan, whenever the condition of the revenue required an extraordinary supply. Sir, the honorable member is entirely mistaken. The facts are historically against him. I have shown already that it was first introduced by Mr. Gallatin, in aid of a loan; that it was not even proposed until the loan had been tried, and had failed; and at last was conceived and recommended exclusively as a subsidiary, and in no sense as a primary measure of supply; that in 1814, though recommended by Mr. Eppes as a medium of circulation, to rest on a funded debt, Mr. Dallas denounced it as "an expensive and precarious substitute." And I have now to state, in addition, that Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of the Treasury, in estimating the supplies for 1820, recommended that a deficiency shown to exist should be met by a loan in preference to an issue of Treasury notes, and a loan of two millions, the amount required, was ordered accordingly.*

The facts, then, being against him as to the practice of the Government, I submit to the honorable gentleman on which side is the weight of authority?

But, sir, the same gentleman, in the excess of his zeal in favor of this most expensive use of public credit, talks of a loan as bringing the Government to the feet of the moneyed power in the country.

I would respectfully ask, what is the moneyed power in this country, of which he has so holy a horror? Does he mean by the moneyed power those men, dispersed every where through the country, who, by patient toil and frugal life, have become the artificers of their own fortunes? or those in our commercial cities, who have amassed wealth in the more hazardous but not less laborious pursuits of trade?

Such men as those (and amongst my own constituents we have many of the class first enumerated) are always of the most exemplary life, and will yield to none in every virtue that dignifies the man, or ennobles the patriot. But what is the moneyed power thus stigmatised in this Hall by the honorable member? There is certainly none such known to our laws, our institutions, or our usages. We have no separate classes, created by law, and set apart as the hereditary possessors of wealth, rank, or privileges of any kind. The protection of law is extended to all indifferently alike, whether in the acquisition of property, or its protection afterwards.

I cannot see, therefore, the force of such allusions, unless this chimera of a moneyed power is placed before us in some embodied form, intelligible to reason, at least, if not tangible to the sense.

Again, sir, we have from the honorable member a like wild denunciation of the banking interest, and are told that the true question upon this bill is whether the Government shall be made subordinate to the banks, and compelled to afford them its credit. Is this, then, the moneyed power which is so obnoxious to the fervid declamation of the honorable member?

If it be, let us inquire for a moment what these banks are, thus held up to the execration of the country as usurpers of Federal rule, or traitors to Federal power. Sir, are they not the domestic institutions of our own States, brought into being by their laws, fostered by their policy, and sustained by State authority alone? Are they not the cherished institutions of the gentleman's own State, of mine, and of every delegation upon this floor?

By what authority, then, are they arraigned here? Will the honorable member contend for a supervisory power on this floor over the domestic policy of the States? I should be startled, sir, to hear of such assumption from any quarter, but more especially from that whence that gentleman comes.

Are they denounced under a belief that their existence is inconsistent with a new scheme of control over the whole financial concerns of this immense people, to be exercised by a central authority, through the machinery of a grand Treasury bank? If it be so, sir, for one, I rejoice that they present so formidable an obstacle in the way of Federal usurpation. I rejoice that they are to be found firmly planted on the soil of every State, like bulwarks to protect State rights and State supremacy against the aggressions of Federal power.

But I respectfully tell him, and those who would act with him here in forcing through this great Treasury device, that their hopes have withered in the bud; the measure was too strong for the age. The people, sir, have frowned it down. Their intelligence saw in it the creation of an actual money power, backed by the whole revenue and patronage of the Government—a power unknown to the Constitution, and of the most dangerous and corrupting tendencies.

Yes, sir, this whole Treasury scheme is dead. In the other branch of this Legislature it fell to pieces in the hands of its own friends. Here, I humbly predict, come up when it may, it can have no better fate; and in the history of its defeat I am cheered and solaced to trace a signal and glorious triumph of the people, asserting the supremacy of their State authorities.

But, sir, in further disparagement of these State institutions, we are told by the honorable gentleman that the banks sought this alliance with the Federal Government, and now clamor at its continuance.

What authority has he for this? On the contrary, does he not know that the facts are directly against him? Is it not notorious that every connection which has existed between the Government and the banks, whether State or National, has been of its own seeking? Whenever it has granted a charter, has not the Government of its own will made itself a stockholder, and retained a large share in the administration of its affairs? But the gentleman's allusion was more immediately to the late connection between the Government and the State banks; and here the contradiction is even more striking and remarkable. These institutions, created by the States for domestic purposes, were moving quietly on in the domestic sphere allotted them, when the Government sought them out and tempted them to this new duty of holding and disbursing the public money. Yes, sir, sought them out at home, by a special agent sent from this city to visit them in the States, and negotiate with them to become the public depositories. So far is it from being true that the banks sought the alliance, the fact is, that many declined the proffer when made to them by the Government. I know that one bank, at least, of the few in my own State, did decline it; and I have been told that others did so elsewhere.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, here rose and stated that the public deposites were declined by some of the banks in that city, when tendered by the Government.

Mr. RHETT answered that, though refused by some, they were sought by some in the most sycophantic manner.]

Mr. MASON resumed: It is no part of my purpose, sir, to enter upon a vindication of the banks. I seek only to show the very facts of the case, that the public may form an enlightened judgment. I again repeat that this "alliance," as it is termed by the honorable member, was of the Government's own seeking. They devised and planned, and ultimately executed, the measure, the banks assenting only to their overture. Nor is the position at all shaken, although it be shown that, after the connection was thus formed with as many banks as was thought necessary, it was sought by others in an unworthy manner.

Where equally, sir, is the honorable member's proof that a clamor has been raised against the Government by the banks since this connection was discontinued? Those who seek to fasten this sub Treasury (or, as I consider it, this Treasury bank) upon the community have been clamorous enough against the banks, Heaven knows. Even the honorable member himself, while disclaiming all hostility to them in one breath, has spoken of them to another as a set of sharpers, Shylocks, and money-dealers, seeking to usurp the high places of Government. But I am yet to hear the first word of complaint, even, from them against the Government.

We have no petition, no remonstrance, no statement of grievances of any kind from them, or from any in their behalf. They have never come up here in any form, save when they are dragged into the arena for political purposes, as we have this day witnessed, by the honorable member from South Carolina.

No, sir, the banks are silent. They remain where the Government found and left them—at home, in their appropriate duties. Nor is there, I apprehend, a single member in this House, or a single document on its files, from which we could learn whether the banks would or would not reassume their late engagement, if the Government were again to propose it to-morrow.

Leaning, as they do, altogether upon State authority, they are just as independent of us as we are of them.

I have thought it my duty, sir, to say thus much on the subject of the State banks, from no purpose of vindicating them, but to expose, in its true and proper light, the relations lately subsisting between the Government and these institutions; and having so said, I will only add, that, for one, I believe it is not to the interest of either of the parties that the connection should be renewed, on the terms and to the extent of that recently dissolved. Although well satisfied that the agency of these institutions is the best within our reach for the custody and disbursement of the public money, yet that agency ought to be coupled as I believe it well may, with a restricted use by Government of the bank paper, founded on a system of periodical settlement with the banks, and periodical conversion of their paper into coin; and the custody and disbursement of this last may be effectually and simply provided by special deposite in their vaults. When the proper time comes, should none other do so, I may present a bill having these ends in view.

Having thus shown, as I humbly submit has appeared in proof, that this debt already created cannot be paid off from the accruing revenue in a shorter period than four years; that the money can be raised by a loan in open market, on terms far better than by periodical emissions of Treasury paper; and that, however, amid the distresses of war, and struggling under impaired credit, the Government at one period was driven to this resort, the opinion of our best and ablest financiers has condemned the practice, it becomes the more remarkable that this measure, to the exclusion of any other, should now be pressed upon us with the zeal and pertinacity amounting to actual intolerance which has distinguished its advocates.

In this view I cannot but consider that it is treated by them as part and parcel of that great Treasury machinery already adverted to, which has been given to the country at various times under the imposing names of the divorce bill, the reform bill, and, last, the Independent Treasury.

We know that Government paper was looked to as a favorite auxiliary by the original founder and chief propagandist of the new school of finance; and in looking back to the report of the Secretary at the special session, we find that he, in recommending a Treasury issue then, had far other views in its favor than the single and legitimate one of supplying the Treasury with means.

After asking authority to issue Treasury notes, coupled with a power to invest any occasional surpluses in the Treasury in State stocks, and to sell such investments when the Treasury was low, he adds:

"An addition consideration in favor of those measures is, that since the payment of the public debt, which absorbed any occasional surplus of receipts, it is impossible, according to the views expressed in some previous reports from the undersigned, that, with sources of revenue so fluctuating as ours, and so dependant on commercial prosperity, any fiscal operations should be long continued with ease, vigor, and uniformity, without some such REGULATION as a power to issue and redeem Treasury notes, or to invest and sell the investment of surpluses."

Now, sir, the power to deal at the Treasury in the State stocks, to raise or depress them in the market, either as the will of the Secretary or the wants of the Treasury might prompt, is one that few will be found to advocate. It has certainly received but little countenance, so far, from any quarter; and our Committee of Ways and Means has given it but slight encouragement in their report to this session. Failing in this, the alternative "regulation," which the Secretary asks, is a permanent authority at his will to "issue and redeem Treasury notes." Sir, I have a right to call it a permanent authority, because its prescribed function is that of regulation. And no power can regulate a thing that is not permanent and abiding.

Now, sir, I ask, where is the constitutional sanction for this "regulation?" This permanent authority to "issue and redeem Treasury notes" either in "anticipation of the accruing revenue," or to meet "occasional emergencies," as the Secretary expresses it? The power to levy money is, by the Constitution, given to Congress, and to Congress alone. Its wordsare:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," &c. and "to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

The power is here given exclusively; none other than Congress itself can borrow money on the credit of the United States. This power is the most important one granted; and it is delegated in the most special and circumscribed manner. A part of the trust is, the amount of revenue to be raised, but it is a part only; another and equally important portion is, the mode of doing it, whether by taxation or loan. Neither the one portion of this trust more than the other can be delegated by those to whom it is confided. The Secretary recommends that this power be delegated to him, that he be authorized to "borrow on the credit of the United States," by a Treasury issue, whenever he may judge it expedient, either in anticipation of taxes levied, or to meet "occasional emergencies."

Our revenue is derived altogether from imports and sales of public land. What these will amount to from year to year, and whether equal to the authorized expenditure, is necessarily conjectural. If they be not, if in any one year the revenue falls short of the estimate, it is the duty of Congress alone to decide whether it shall be augmented or the expenditure cut down: and if augmented, whether by new taxes or by loan of money, Congress is to decide, when the exigency arises. It is the appropriate duty of the immediate representatives of the people for the time being, and they cannot delegate the whole trust or any part of it.

For my own part, sir, I wish to see our financial affairs conducted as they have always heretofore been, without the aid of any of this new machinery, either of Sub-Treasuries or Treasury "regulators." I wish the revenue to flow into the Treasury from sources open and tangible to popular inquiry; and whenever a deficit occurs, let it be promulgated and its causes traced, that, if necessary, a proper corrective may be applied, and in the mean time the deficiency made good by a special law, to "originate in the House of Representatives," as the Constitution requires. I want no other "regulator" in the Treasury than an able officer at its head, one who shall manage its affairs under the existing laws with intelligence, forecast, and good sense.

I have thus, sir, attempted to lay before you the reasons which compel me to differ with those who advocate this Treasury issue; they have been given with the freedom and independence due to the occasion, and, I will add, under some provocation from the intolerant spirit evinced by those who have been its champions on this floor.

I shall vote for such amendment as may be offered, limiting the issue to the immediate and pressing demands upon the Treasury; and for a continuance of the debt by open loan, until the revenue is adequate to wipe it off. Should such an amendment, however, not prevail, I must bow to the decision of the House, and take the bill as it is; the alternative being to leave the Government without means.

*Since the foregoing was delivered, in looking at the report of the Committee of Ways and Means for that year, (1820,) at the head of which was a most distinguished statesman from South Carolina, [Mr. Lowndes,] it is found that he recommended, with Mr. Gallatin, a loan in preference to an issue of Treasury notes. The following is quoted from his report:

"It appearing to your committee inexpedient to resort to Treasury notes, and it being impracticable (if no objections existed against the adoption of such a course,) to carry into effect a system of Internal duties in time to meet the deficit of the present year, your committee had only to choose between a loan of a temporary character and one of longer duration. They have preferred the latter, because it carries the time beyond that in which other debts are payable; and because it is believed that the loan will thereby be obtained on decidedly better terms than one of shorter duration."

SPEECH OF MR. LEGARE,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, October 13, 1837—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "imposing additional duties, as depositaries in certain cases, on public officers,"

Mr. LEGARE addressed the committee, in substance, as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I do not know how I can more appropriately begin the remarks I am about to make than in the very words with which a most able English writer addressed himself to the cause and character of the recent crisis. The events [says Mr. Samuel Jones Lloyd, in a pamphlet published last spring] which have occurred, in connection with the late pressure, upon the moneyed and mercantile interests, are full of instructive illustrations of the effects, both beneficial and otherwise, of our present system, and the evil consequences of this pressure will be as nothing compared with its benefits, if amongst these we shall be enabled to reckon an increased degree of intelligence upon subjects connected with currency, and a nearer approximation to sound principles in the management of our paper issues. The revulsion, it is true, has been far more disastrous on this side of the Atlantic than in England; and yet even at its darkest period—now, as I confidently believe, passed away to give place to returning prosperity—I found consolation in the idea, that dearly as we were buying our experience in this important matter, the price would not be too high for the benefits we should ultimately derive from our reverses. A national visitation ought to be considered as a great providential lesson. It teaches the most momentous truths, and it teaches them in the most impressive manner, and what we have recently seen and felt will dispose us—if any thing can dispose us—to look the difficulties, with which this subject is surrounded, fairly in the face.

Sir, it is surrounded with difficulties. Even in England, as you perceive from the citation I have just made, they are felt and acknowledged by the most able men. I have upon my desk many other proofs of the same fact. They abound, for instance, in the minutes of evidence taken before the committee of the House of Commons on the renewal of the charter of the Bank of England, in 1832. You will find there that while high authorities* agree in thinking that there should be but one Bank of issue for the capital, at least, if not for the whole country, the representatives of the great commercial and manufacturing interests, on the contrary, protest against the continuance of a monopoly to which they impute the most sinister influences over their immense business,† and demand a system of joint-stock banks, regulated by principles more agreeable, as they contend, to the course and policy of trade. A third party insists upon the necessity of compelling all banks of issue to give adequate security to the public (in Government stock, &c.) for the redemption of their issues,‡ while every stockholder or partner shall continue to be, as at present, responsible for all the debts of the company to the whole amount of his private fortune. A fourth (and I have just received from London a little volume in which that opinion is most plausibly maintained) urges the most unlimited freedom in banking, and sees no more danger to society from perfect liberty in this than in any other branch of business, the supplying, for example, the market of a great capital with the necessaries of life.§ In this complexity and distraction of English opinion upon this subject, however, all parties agree in one thing, and that is, in adhering to the paper system. Nobody there thinks of any thing so extravagant as the overthrow of that system, whatever defects may be seen or supposed to exist in it, or whatever projects may have been imagined to purify, to correct, and to improve it.

But if such is the state of English opinion in regard to this subject, how must it be with us, when to all the intrinsic difficulties of the thing itself we add those arising out of the complicated structure of our political institutions? It would be hard enough to say what ought to be done, in the present emergency, were this a simple consolidated Government; but how much harder is it to advise the administration of a federal Government as to the course it ought to pursue, where one happens to doubt its possessing all the power necessary to give complete relief, without a co-operation of others. For, sir, at the risk of being set down in that category of "tiny politicians" of whom the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,] in a very amusing speech, in the course of which, however, he uttered some grave and important truths, spoke last night with such profound contempt, I must confess I agree with the Executive in the general principles of constitutional law involved in the message. In the division of the attributes of sovereignty between this Government and the States, it may and must happen that we should experience sometimes a chasm, and sometimes a conflict of powers. More is taken from the States, perhaps, than has been given to the Confederacy; neither can do enough, while each can do too much, for perfect harmony; defects, discrepancies, and contradictions, exist in the scheme itself, detected only in a long course of practice, and which nothing but practical skill, the wisdom called for and called forth in the management of great affairs, especially political affairs, can reconcile and rectify. Undoubtedly, the task is an immensely difficult one—but it must be undertaken, and it must be done. The subject before the committee is an example of the high and difficult duties I refer to, nor can I imagine an occasion better fitted than this to awaken the House to a lively sense of its infinite responsibilities to the country.

Judge then, sir, with what deep disappointment and regret I learned that the bill on the table was to be pressed upon us at this short session. It is quite enough for me that it proposes a great innovation upon the whole course of the Government, from its foundation up to the present moment, and upon all the habits of our people. They who see deeper or clearer into such matters than I do, must pardon me for declaring that I cannot conscientiously vote for the measure in such haste. If I had no positive objections to it, it would be quite enough for me that I have not had sufficient time to reflect on it. During this extraordinary session, (for so it has been in every sense of the word,) fatigued, harassed, exhausted, by incessant attendance, by night and by day, in this hall, it has not been in my power to inform myself on any subject as I could have wished to be able to do. I have had absolutely no time for minute research, hardly a few hours for calm reflection. Under such circumstances, I cannot vote for the bill. I must go home to my constituents and talk with them. Many, perhaps most of them, understand these matters better than I do; but when I left them, although this subject had been discussed, and ably discussed, here and there, by an individual or two, public attention had not been awakened to it; and nothing like an opinion, certainly no opinion favorable to the principle of the bill, had been formed in regard to it.

And here, sir, I might take my seat again, if I had risen only to explain my vote, or to influence those of others, on the proposed measure. But the true issue seems to me very far to transcend, in importance, that single measure, important as it unquestionably is. It involves, in my opinion, the whole credit system of the country. I do not say that the bill on your table presents that issue—still less that the Executive message presented it, or propounded any principle or opinion that should lead to it. But no one who has watched the progress of this discussion in this House or in the Senate, in or out of this Capitol, will deny that it must soon come to that. Sir, if there is any truth at all in what has been urged with great ability, and all the zeal, I had almost said the fanaticism, of the deepest conviction, by men accustomed to influence, nay, even to control, public opinion in different parts of this country; if they have any idea of rigorously carrying out the principles they profess, to their logical consequences, in practice; if what they say in the highest places, on the most solemn occasions, is not such idle declamation as such men are not to be suspected of, they mean that, and nothing short of that. Doctrines have been uttered with all the authority which can be imparted to paradox from talent ripened by experience, which seem to me inconsistent with the Constitution not only of American, but of all modern society, with its whole spirit and tendency, with all its wants, and all its ways. I have sometimes, in the course of the debates, looked around me to see where I really was; whether the shade of some old lawgiver, some Minos or Lycurgus, had not been evoked, to bring a degenerate age back to the stern principles of Dorian polity, to an Agrarian equality of property, to iron money and black broth; or else, if it were not the spirit of Benedict or Bernard returned to the holy solitudes of Monte Casino, or Cluni, or Citeaux, to preach to a world lost in vanity or pleasure the blessings of poverty and mortifications of the flesh. Now, sir, it may be true that luxury, according to the old saw, is the ruin of States, and that sumptuary and Agrarian laws are necessary to maintain your true Spartan discipline. But I am excessively disinclined to try any such experiment upon my constituents; at least without receiving an express instruction to that effect from them. I am afraid they have no taste for black broth, that Spartan discipline will be irksome, and even revolting to them. In short, sir, I have reason to believe that, without being as deeply imbued, perhaps, as other people are with the spirit of the age, they do still partake too much of it to be willing to forego the many agreeable objects that principally engage and excite it.

Sir, I am far from denying that, in the eyes of a stern reformer, with opinions of a certain complexion, this generation is a perverse and crooked one. We love money, I admit, as much as men ever did—certainly as much as they did in the Augustan age, nearly two thousand years ago. The committee will excuse my quoting a very common piece of Latin to prove it, after the example of other gentlemen in this debate.

> Quærenda pecunia primum est;
> Virtus post nummos—Hæc Janus summus ab imo > Prodocet.

Make money by all means, and before all things. Washington street certifies it to Wall street, and Wall street declares it to Broadway, and Broadway proclaims it to Chesnut street, and Chesnut street publishes it to the whole country. We have the same strong thirst for gold which has unhappily afflicted mankind in other times, and especially in very civilized ages; and the only difference is, that we have learned how to acquire, by honest means, a thousand times more of it. I will add, however, in justice to the age, that it has made a great discovery in social philosophy. We have found out that what I would call physical civilization—a demand for the conveniences and accommodations of life, and an abundant supply of them—is and must be the basis of all other civilization that is intended to be high, solid, and lasting. Every real improvement in the condition of mankind springs out of, or leads to, the elevating of the standard of comfort among a people. Sir, this is the grand work—the mission—of modern commerce, which, in my opinion, is just beginning to develope its mighty resources—to pour out the inexhaustible fulness of its treasures and its blessings. A great revolution is taking place—has taken place in human affairs. War is every day becoming a more and more remote contingency. I do not say an impossibility. I know human nature too well for that. I am fully aware, too, how many disturbing causes, growing out of the history of the past, still exist to prevent the realizing, all at once, of the great end of Christian civilization, the dream of Henry IV, and of Sully—the union of all nations in a state of peace under the protection of law. I know, especially, what is to be dreaded in this respect, from that dark power that hovers over the confines of Europe and Asia, and throws its vast shadow over both. But during my last residence of four years abroad, I saw sufficient grounds of quarrel, to have led, under the old order of things, to twenty wars, as spreading and bloody as the thirty years' war, or the seven years' war; and yet these threatening differences passed harmlessly away, cloud after cloud dissolved as they rose above the horizon, leaving the sky more serene than before. Sir, it is a favorite phrase of those who boast of what is called the "march of intellect," that things are thus changed because the "schoolmaster is abroad." But, I tell you that something far more effective than the schoolmaster, a mightier than Solomon, is abroad. It is the steam-engine, in its twofold capacity of a means of production and a means of transport; the most powerful instrument, by far, of pacification and commerce, and, therefore, of improvement and happiness, that the world has ever seen; which, while it increases capital, and multiplies beyond all imagination the products of industry, brings the most distant people into contact with one another; breaks down the barriers which exclusive legislation would oppose to the freedom of mercantile exchanges; effaces all peculiarities of national character, and promises, at no distant period, to make the whole Christian world, at least, one great family. Sir, the social effects of this great instrument of modern improvement have been singularly promoted by a branch of industry in which the part of the country I have the honor to represent is most deeply interested; and I will avail myself of this occasion to call the attention of the committee to a view of our Southern institutions, that may not have occurred to it before, or made the impression it ought to make upon them. I beg you, sir, to believe that I do not speak in what is called a "sectional" spirit, for I protest before God that nothing can be further from my heart. But let not those whose minds have been recently so much inflamed against what they consider as the abomination of domestic servitude, shut their eyes to the truth. Sir, I allude to the cultivation of cotton, and its effects, through the increase of commerce it fosters, upon the condition of society. Whoever shall write the political history of that invaluable plant will have a more important work to perform than has ever fallen to the lot of a biographer of statesmen or philosophers. I will venture to say, without going more into details, that the single circumstance of bringing the wonderfully cheap fabrics produced by modern machinery, within the reach of even the humblest of the laboring classes, of substituting decent and comfortable raiment for the few scanty and filthy rags—the squalid exterior, which makes poverty not only more painful, but at once more humiliating and degrading to its victim, and more disgustful to others than it ought to be, will signally contribute to elevate the condition of the poor in the social scale; to raise their self esteem, and to increase the sympathy of others for them—in a word, to make them feel themselves men, entitled to a place among men; not pariahs and outcasts, whose contact is contamination. A people well clad and well housed will be sure to provide themselves with all the other comforts of life; and it is the diffusion of these comforts, and the growing taste for them, among all classes of society in Europe; it is the desire of riches, as it is commonly called, that is gradually putting an end to the destructive and bloody game of war, and reserving all the resources hitherto wasted by it for enterprises of industry and commerce, prosecuted with the fiery spirit which once vented itself in scenes of peril and carnage.

But, sir, the result of all this is that very inequality of wealth, that accumulation of vast masses of it in a few hands, against which we have heard so much said lately, as if it were something inconsistent with the liberties, the happiness, and the moral and intellectual improvement of mankind. Gigantic fortunes are acquired by a few years of prosperous commerce; mechanics and manufacturers rival and surpass the princes of the earth in opulence and splendor. The face of Europe is changed by this active industry, working with such mighty instruments, on so great a scale. I have travelled in parts of the continent which the spirit of gain, with its usual concomitants, industry and improvements, has invaded since the peace, at an interval of fifteen years, and been struck with the revolution that is going on. There is a singularly beautiful though rather barren tract of country between Liege and Spa, where, in 1819, my attention had been principally attracted by the striking features of a mountainous region, with here and there a ruin of the feudal past, and here and there a hovel of some poor hind, the very haunt of the "Wild Boar of Ardennes," in the good old times of the House of Burgundy. I returned to it in 1835, and saw it covered with mills and factories, begrimmed with the smoke and soot of steam engines; its romantic beauty deformed, its sylvan solitudes disturbed and desecrated by the sounds of active industry, and the busy hum of men. I asked what had brought about so great a change, and found the author of it—a man, having a more numerous band of retainers and dependants than any baron bold of the 14th century, and in every respect more important than many of the sovereign princes on the other side of the Rhine—was an English manufacturer, who had established himself there some twenty years ago, without much capital, and had effected all this by his industry and enterprise. Such, sir, is the spirit of the age; of course, in this young and wonderfully progressive country, it is more eager and ardent, and therefore occasionally extravagant, than any where else. But it is in vain to resist it; nay, I believe it worse than vain. It is evidently in the order of nature, and we must take it with all its good and all its evils together. The great designs of Providence, in giving to the most active and enterprising of all races a new world to possess, to build up and to adorn, are not to be thwarted by our policy, even if we thought it good policy to thwart them; all the instincts of that race would revolt at a system which would disappoint its high destiny.

Mr. Chairman, I have made these general remarks because as you will have perceived, they have a direct and important bearing upon the collateral issue presented by the advocates of this bill, though not in the bill itself, as something to be accomplished here. In a country so much governed by opinion it is all-important that opinion should be enlightened; and errors uttered by distinguished men in high stations, and surrounded with whatever talent can contribute to render them seductive and imposing, cannot, without public detriment, be suffered to pass unnoticed. On this occasion, as I have already intimated, it is far less the measure proposed, than what I consider as the quo animo of its advocates here and elsewhere, that has excited my alarms and my opposition. But I have objections, which I will now proceed to state, to the policy of the bill itself.

There are two very distinct questions presented to the committee. The first is, shall the revenues be collected only in gold and silver? The second, how shall they, when collected, be kept and disbursed; shall Sub-Treasuries be established by the Government, or shall banks be employed for that purpose, as heretofore; and, if the latter course be preferred, then shall the banks be allowed the use of the public deposites, or shall special deposites only be made with them? It is very evident that these propositions have no necessary connection with each other, and that either of them may be approved or rejected by those who do not reject or approve the other.

As to the collection of the revenue in specie, my objections are by no means so strong, or, I should say, so vehement now as they were at the opening of the session, when gold and silver were selling at a premium of nine or ten per cent. At that time it appeared to me that such a measure would have been a mere wanton act of oppression upon the people of the States, for no earthly good purpose whatever. It would have been simply authorizing usurers and money brokers to lay upon the importers, and through these upon the consumers of foreign goods; that is to say, upon the public, and especially upon the planters of the South, a tariff of duties in a good degree arbitrary, for their own benefit and that of the functionaries of the Government. Believing as I did and do, that the paper circulation of the country, from the great and sudden contraction in consequence of the panic, was rather too much reduced than redundant, I confess, as I said on a former occasion, I could not see that justice, at least, that equity and good conscience, made it imperative upon us to resort to so stern a measure; especially as the idea of furnishing, by that means, a broader metallic basis for our circulation had proved itself to our very senses to be completely fallacious. We all now see that not a dollar collected by the Government and disbursed by its creditors circulates for one moment as money, but is carefully hoarded and sold as merchandise; and that it will continue to be the case so long as, from any other causes whatever, exchanges shall be unfavorable to the country, is equally evident.

I admit that since the fall of the price of gold and silver to five per cent. this objection loses somewhat of its weight, but it loses none of its truth. The same law of currency now operates, though in a mitigated degree, to make it an objectionable measure to repeal the act of 1816, and so to discredit, pro tanto, all bank notes in perpetuity. Yes, sir, to organize panic and perpetuate distrust, so far as your example has any weight. And why do so? What apology have you to make for an act that certainly requires one? What public occasion, what pressing exigency requires it? The Message puts the subject, I admit, in a very specious and captivating form. It supposes the case of a war, and the Government to find its whole treasure suddenly turned into bank credits; and we are asked whether such a thing could be borne. But admit that, in the case of war, the Government would be driven to that and any other measure of equal, or even of greater severity. What then? Does it follow that such a system should be unnecessarily adopted in time of peace? But the truth is that, even in time of war, it would make less difference to the Government than is generally supposed. Certainly some of its operations, distant naval expeditions, and the like, would require gold and silver; and they must be had, at whatever price, from within or from abroad; but, after all, with such credit as that of the United States now is, it is impossible to imagine that the nation should be embarrassed even for a single moment, by the failure of its banks to pay some millions in gold and silver. Look at England in the eventful period between the suspension of payment in '97, and the peace of 1815. It is now universally confessed that that measure, and that measure alone, boldly empirical as it was once thought, enabled her to sustain the burdens of that terrible conflict, and to achieve a triumph worthy of her generous constancy under misfortune. I do not, therefore, see how even the necessities of war would compel Government, abounding in such resources of public credit as no other Government ever enjoyed, to resort to a measure so novel, so harsh, so inconsistent with the established order of things in the country, and with all the habits of the people.

But the great objection with me is that which appears from a passage quoted by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] to have presented itself to Mr. Dallas, in 1815. You will do some harm by refusing bank paper. Considering how little specie there has ever been in this country, you may, by requiring it to be paid to you in a large amount annually, make it always an article of merchandise; you will thus permanently discredit bank notes, and render impossible the restoration of their convertibility. But that is not all: even should this mischief not ensue, you at least, by thus rejecting them to the whole extent of your transactions, abandon the currency to its fate under the administration of the States. You make no efforts, you exert no influence to maintain its purity and uniformity, by distinguishing between corporations which redeem their notes, and those which are notoriously insolvent. You proclaim your distrust of all of them alike—you write it in your statute book. However disastrous the condition of the monetary concerns of the States may be, through want of skill or want of concert, you leave them to themselves, and that when, standing in the most intimate and the most commanding relation towards them all, you might, if you gave yourselves the least trouble about the matter, exercise a most salutary control over them, and remedy these great inconveniences for the benefit of us all. For, sir, it is not enough to say you have no power, strictly so called, under the Constitution, to regulate the currency. I admit that you have none. What then? Have you no influence—influence of example, influence of precept, influence of authority, influence of patronage, influence of connection and custom in business, in the use of these very deposites? Has not the Constitution provided that all defects in our institutions shall be corrected by amendments regularly recommended and introduced; and is it not one of your duties so to recommend and introduce them?

Why do you not urge upon the States any reform you may judge necessary in the matter? I appeal to every one that hears me, what he should think of an individual, who, possessing immense influence in a community, with an income of many millions a year, should, in a time of trouble, coolly withdraw himself from society, and hoard his money, like an usurer in a commercial panic, waiting until the extreme necessities of his neighbors shall throw them upon his mercy? Is this the morality we are taught in our private relations? Shall nothing be expected from him to whom so much has been given? Shall he hide his light under a bushel? Shall he bury his ten talents in the earth, and escape condemnation as an unprofitable servant? And shall that be right in a Government, which, in a private person, shocks the moral sense of all mankind? In a Government standing towards the people of this country in relations so very peculiar! Sir, what answer would you have to give to the States, if, in a moment of public calamity like that which is just passing away, feeling their distresses aggravated through your harsh exactions of what their people had not to give, appealing in vain to you for succor or for counsel, they were to hold to you the language which indignation and astonishment would naturally inspire, under such extraordinary circumstances? If they were to say to you, "We have done every thing to exalt and to magnify you; we have clothed you with authority and awe; we have armed you with mighty powers, with the axes and fasces of supreme jurisdiction; we have surrounded you with all glorious equipage and pomp of empire, endowed you with a vast treasury, with fleets, armies, senates, judges, that palace, these gorgeous domes, this capitolium fulgens —what for? That you should renounce all community of interest, all sympathy with us? That there should be no ties of affection or of duty between us! that you should ostentatiously proclaim yourselves, as your worst enemies have sometimes alleged that you are, a foreign Government in the midst of our country, and even will avail yourselves of a moment of cruel revulsion and calamity, to make us feel that you are so in spirit and in truth!" Sir, I do not know, I cannot conceive, how such a course should fail to strike every body as a perversion of all the eternal obligations of morality, which are and ought to be as binding upon communities as upon the individuals that compose them; how gentlemen can, at such a moment as the present, entertain, without emotion, the strange proposition that this Government should bury itself, like Sardanapalus, in a selfish repose, a degenerate and inglorious indifference to all the interests of the country; or, if I can make such a comparison without shocking them too much, that, like Nero, it should fiddle while Rome is burning.

Agreeing, then, sir, with the Executive in the principles laid down in the Message, I differ with it in the practical inference deducted from them. In the division of power between the Government and the States, I think with it, that all that is required to meet this emergency has not been given to the former. But the inadequacy of our powers is no excuse for not exerting them to the uttermost for the public good, especially as there is reason to think that the convention did not foresee the present state of things. We can do much, if we cannot do every thing. The occasion calls only for a good will and a moderate share of practical ability, and I have no hesitation in saying that, among the existing banking institutions of the country, can be found ample means of accomplishing the two great objects of restoring specie payments, and ministering hereafter, in all ordinary times, a convertible currency, which is all that we can expect to do.

Sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood. It is of the utmost importance that the paper of the banks should not only not in fact be depreciated, (as I believe is actually the case,) but should be able to stand the only sure, and, to the public at large, satisfactory test of that fact—I mean convertibility into specie. I am fully aware that the accident of a failure in the means of making their payments in the precious metals is one against which, according to the course of modern commerce, there can be no complete security, and that nothing can be more absurdly exaggerated than the importance attached to that ocurrence, which happens in consequence of an extraordinary drain for specie, or otherwise by persons not familiar with the principles of banking. Nay, more: I admit that the most usual effect of a great revulsion in trade is to throw much paper out of circulation; to contract the currency, and so to bring down exchanges and prices, and raise the value of the money that remains in the hands of the public. But a suspension of specie payments, though it may not be a present evil, is always fraught with danger. It is the indispensable duty of a statesman to put an end to it as soon as possible, either by encouragement or by compulsion. It is for this, among other reasons, that I so cheerfully acquiesced in the issuing of Treasury notes, inasmuch as it relieved us from the necessity either of directly refusing to take the paper of the banks at par, or, by receiving it, as we might otherwise very safely have done, of betraying those companies into an impolitic enlargement of their issues before the balance of payments had been turned in our favor, as I hope it will be by the coming crop. I regarded it as an excellent temporary expedient for avoiding, at present, this choice of evils. So far, I think nothing is more unfounded than the general charge of insolvency against all our banks, which is so inconsiderately uttered by the press, and in debate, as well as the assertion, repeated over and over again on this floor, that the country is laboring under an exclusive and depreciated currency. It is not yet so; but it will, I fear, very soon be so, if the banks do not make an effort to return to specie payments in the course of a few months. Now is the time to do so: now that their issues are contracted; that importations have been checked; that exchanges are becoming more favorable, and that great Southern crops are about to be sent forward to make them still more so. Let every one interested in the fate of these institutions, as well as in the commercial prosperity of the country, exert whatever influence he may possess, to bring about that result, and to deliver the banks from the temptations to dangerous excess to which the return of an active and prosperous business will inevitably expose them, if they do not, once more, lay themselves under the restraint of convertibility.

Sir, should they unhappily take a different course, and should this Government, after using all its influence and authority to establish the currency of the country on a better footing, fail of its success in its most zealous endeavors, I admit that it may be driven to the necessity of taking care of its own business and creditors, by an independent legislation of its own. There is no doubt that a variously depreciated currency cannot be tolerated as the settled system of the country. The ports of one State cannot be preferred to those of another, in this way, any more than by an express statute to that effect. Nor can the public creditor be justly paid in money really depreciated—I mean not in reference merely to gold and silver, which are themselves liable to great fluctuations in value, but to the general mass of commodities that compose the conveniences and necessaries of life. The effects of a redundant currency, once they begin to be distinctly perceived, are counteracted by a general rise of prices. Money is twice as easy to be got, but you have to pay twice as much for every thing which it buys. But there is one class of persons who have no means of indemnifying themselves by raising the nominal value of their property or their claims. It is the class of those who live on fixed incomes—annuitants, fundholders, functionaries of States, pensioners. They are paid a certain sum, and with every diminution in the value it expresses, they lose just so much of what they are fairly entitled to. In this view of the subject, therefore, it is quite clear that Government is under the highest of all moral obligations to see that their dues be not paid them in what is really worth a great deal less than it purports to be.

What I have hitherto said relates to the first question propounded by the bill on your table—shall gold and silver only be received in payment of Government dues? As to the second inquiry, sir, whether the revenue shall be kept by officers of our own, or by the banks, and, if in the latter, whether in the shape of special or general deposite, so much has been said, and so ably said upon that head, against the system recommended by the Message, that I am very little disposed to trouble the committee with any additional remarks in regard to it. Were I driven to make a choice between the two plans referred to, I should, as at present advised, greatly prefer that of a special deposite, on a small commission, as at once the safest, the cheapest, and most simple—as departing less from our previous customs, and not being so liable to the great practical objection of going permanently to increase the already enormous and disproportionate influence of the Executive power, which, beyond all doubt, far exceeds any thing that was anticipated by the founders of the Government, and seriously threatens to disturb, if not to subvert, the whole balance of the Constitution. I need not say that I have no reference whatever to the present, or any other individual incumbent. I speak of the operations of great general causes, and of a system whose effects are almost entirely independent of the will of man. Another very grave objection to the scheme reported by the committee is, its resemblance, or, at least, its fearful leaning, to that of a great political Bank of the United States, of which a justly celebrated report of one of my predecessors upon this floor* demonstrated, some years ago, the dangers and inconveniences, as I have always supposed, to the universal conviction of the people. But, although I should prefer the special deposite system to that of the Committee of Ways and Means, I am not yet prepared to adopt it. That immense benefits have been conferred upon the country, by adding to its productive capital the large amounts of public money which would otherwise have lain dormant in the Treasury, does not admit of a question. I will venture to say that, in the course of the half century that has elapsed since 1789, countless millions have been the fruit of this truly paternal and beneficent system. Our predecessors, Mr. Dallas among them, seem to have been deeply impressed with this view of the subject. They seem to have felt themselves bound to render our system of taxation, which, even in its mildest form, is, in fact, a confiscation of private property for public uses, as little burdensome as possible to the community. Sir, whatever we may think of the policy of pursuing their footsteps any further, no one can deny that they are entitled to the gratitude of the country for the past; and I, for one, am too sensible of the benefit to throw it away without very mature consideration, unless under the pressure of a cogent necessity.

But we have been told, sir, that, far from being an innovation, this mode of collecting the public revenues was universal from the earliest times until the beginning of the last century—that is to say, until an age of philosophic light and diffusive civilization, at which another good old plan, established from time immemorial, the burning of witches and heretics, unhappily ceased too. This coincidence certainly appears to me to be entitled to some consideration; the committee will see that, in the matter of innovation, going back too far is at least as dangerous as going forward too rapidly. But there has been another reference to the examples of the past, which struck me still more forcibly as a most extraordinary perversion of the lessons of experience. Sir, I do confess to you that, before any discussion had taken place in either part of this Capitol on the subject before you—long before I had heard of any allusion to the Quæstor referred to the other day by my eloquent friend from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,]—at the bare stating of the project in its first conception and most general outlines, certain images presented themselves to my mind, and have ever since haunted it, in spite of all I could do to banish them. They were ideas that, in my simple way of considering such matters shocked and alarmed me; ideas of Roman conquest and Asiatic despotism. I thought of that most fearful of all things, a vast empire with power centralized at its capital, with commerce centralizing by the inevitable course of trade, which always and every where tends to centralization at some great emporium, with its revenues collected only in gold and silver, to be hoarded, as was the way at Rome and Babylon, or Persepolis. I fancied I could see one of the proconsuls or prætors—the bashaws of the Republic, as Montesquieu so justly calls them—Verres, for example—going forth with that same Quæstor, surrounded with an army of publicans, or farmers of the revenue, to gather the dues of Rome in some devoted province—another Sicily—as dues were were wont to be gathered by the Satraps of that military commonwealth; that is to say, wrung with their blood from subjugated nations, whose pleasant places were laid waste without remorse, to glut the rapacity of conquest. Sir, I little imagined that such a system would have been cited, nay, alluded to, in this age, except with a view to inspire the horror and execration it is so well calculated to excite. Roman example! "The Demon City," (as it has been well called by a writer of genius†) whose whole history, from beginning to end, is a tragedy far deeper and more dreadful than the tale of Œpidus or the Atridæ, and leading, too, to a catastrophe of an awful political justice. Why, sir, there is nothing in the annals of Mongolian conquest worse than the ravages perpetrated by her consuls—by Mummius, Paulus Æmilius, Sylla—in some of the fairest and most civilized portions of the earth. There were flourishing countries whose fertility and population were exhausted by a perpetual drain of corn and gladiators, to feed her lazy and licentious populace, and amuse them with the unutterable atrocities of her amphitheatre. And what was the end of all this misrule? Weakness, poverty, desolation, barbarism—the Goth, the Vandal, the Hun. Yet, long before the footstep of a barbarian had been impressed upon the soil of the empire, as Gibbon has well remarked, long before that scourge of God, under whose horses' hoofs the grass was said never to grow again, had been sent to avenge the wrongs of mankind, in the course of half a century after Constantine had founded a new Rome, whole tracts of fertile country had been completely depopulated and abandoned. Even of that paradise of all this earth, on which poetry and panegyric have been exhausted in every age, in all languages, the Campania felix, a very considerable portion was become a waste. Nor, sir, was this only owing to the despotism of the Cæsars, as an excellent writer has well observed,‡ in reference to this passage of the "decline and fall," and as this committee will do well to remark. There co-operated with that misgovernment a curse which has been said, and is thus proved, to be worse than "the inclemency of the seasons and the barrenness of the earth§—a decreasing currency. The supply of the precious metals had been for upwards of two centuries continually diminishing, while the quantity of them, sent in quest of luxuries to the East, to return no more, had been increasing in the same proportion, and a revenue of 15 or 20,000,000*l.* was constantly levied in gold and siver, to be expended at a distant capital or on the frontiers. This important fact speaks volumes to us on this subject. It is unquestionably true that one of the greatest calamities of the declining empire was a circulation diminishing so frightfully that the pay of a general in the third century was nominally not higher than that of a private had been in the reign of Augustus.‖ So much for the Roman Sub-Treasury system, and the example of the Quæstor.

*Mr. McDuffie. Report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in 1831.

Mr. Gallatin remarks of this system of Sub-Treasuries presented as an alternative to a Bank of the United States, in his celebrated pamphlet on that subject, that "with the exception of the power of receiving private deposites, the object of which provision is not perceived, this is precisely the species of National Bank which has been suggested in the President's last Message, (1830.) The question whether the purchase of drafts would, as we think, be a charge on the Treasury, or prove, as seems to be expected, a source of profit, is one of secondary importance. It is sufficient to observe that the issues of the State banks could not, nor indeed is it expected they could, be checked by this plan."

leads to fluctuations in the currency, and that brings me to consider the general effects of the credit system upon the prosperity of the country.

I begin by admitting that there is something in this objection, but by no means as much as is thought by persons who have not very attentively considered the subject. Undoubtedly, if your revenue, instead of being uniform, or at least varying very little from year to year, be permitted to fluctuate extremely; if a great surplus, like that of which you disposed last year, is to be allowed ever and anon to accumulate, and then to be withdrawn from one depository, and scattered among many others, to be again suddenly withdrawn from them, and ultimately distributed without reference to the wants of commerce and the course of business, but on merely arbitrary principles, among the States; if such financial blunders are to be repeated often in our future policy, we should do well to confine the effects of them within as narrow limits as possible; and even a system of hoarding might, in such a case, perhaps, do less harm than all this vexatious irregularity and uncertainty. But, in the first place, whose fault was that? Whose legislation occasioned that preposterous accumulation? Whose unequal and oppressive tariffs extorted from commerce the vast sums which were afterwards to be lavished upon it with such intoxicating effects? Yours, sir, this House, this Congress is responsible for whatever mischiefs grew out of that strange anomaly. Let the blame light upon the heads of the guilty. I trust in God we are not destined soon to see another such surpluses; and, if we should, most certainly I should expect proper precautions to be adopted to prevent its operating again so powerfully to derange the business of the country. But what sort of argument is it against the comparatively moderate depesites made in the ordinary course of things by the Government, to recompense the banks for their services as fiscal agents, and make taxation less oppressive, that an enormous accumulation like that referred to, so capriciously disposed of, so violently transferred from one place of deposite to another, produced much evil? And here, sir, I beg to ask gentlemen whether it has ever occurred to them to imagine what would have been the effect, what would always be the effect, of such an accumulation, if it had been in gold and silver? What if our revenues should ever again amount to what they were in 1815? Will any man undertake to say that the abstraction from the circulation of the commercial world of so large a sum as forty or fifty millions of specie would not at any time occasion a serious derangement of business and fall of prices abroad, attended with all the usual evils of such an event? I shall advert hereafter more particularly to the important subject of the supply of the precious metals for the purpose of commerce, but I here call the attention of the committee to a view of it that is entitled to their profound consideration. If I do not greatly err in all the conclusions to which I have been brought by my researches in this matter, no calculation can be made of the effect which the adoption, I will not say of the "hard money system," but of any system whatever, calling for a much greater demand of the precious metals, might have upon the state of trade.

[Mr. L. here entered into a course of reasoning upon historical facts, to show that the importance of these fluctuations in the paper currency have been very much overrated, &c.; after concluding which, he proceeded as follows:]

Sir, to the general declamation against banking we have to oppose the experience of the most prosperous nations in the world. There is a country, for instance, whose whole currency is of paper, and where one seldom meets with a piece of gold—whose banking companies, whether with or without charter, subjected to no restraints or control but such as spring out of the vigilance of a free and eager competition, have, for upwards of a century together, conducted their affairs with so much skill, integrity, and prudence, as not only never to have occasioned any loss either to the public or the parties interested, but, on the contrary, by the confession of all competent judges, to have conferred the greatest blessings upon both—to have contributed more than any single cause, perhaps than all other causes put together, to bring out, and develop completely, all the resources of the land—to foster industry, to animate enterprise, and, by an abundant supply of the means of exchange, to turn its capital and labor to the greatest possible account—where, in addition to these economical advantages, they have contrived to exercise a high moral control, a sort of censorial.

But, sir, another objection to the present system is, that it authority, over the community, and especially the humbler classes of it, by bestowing rewards in the shape of credit upon industry and economy, and lending upon good personal character as if it were solid capital, and, through a system of cash accounts and interest upon small deposites have given to the deserving laborer the combined advantages of a Savings Bank and a friendly endorser—a country which has made greater progress, within the period mentioned, than any other in Europe, with an agriculture second (if second) only to that of Flanders, with a flourishing commerce, with manufactures of the greatest extent and the most exquisite refinement—whose cities have almost kept pace with ours, whose whole face, in its gladness and beauty, bears testimony to the spirit of improvement that has animated her: what country is that? Scotland, sir. Every body has heard, or ought to have heard, of the Scotch system of banking; and I ask if any thing can be more irreconcilable with the theories so confidently advanced her, than facts connected with its history? I know, sir, what may be said in reply to this otherwise triumphant example. I am aware that the Scotch banks have, in times of pressure, been compelled to lean upon the Bank of England; that objections have been made by high authorities, to the principles on which they have been conducted; and that other persons, admitting their unquestionable usefulness and success, have ascribed it to circumstances which render the system an unfit model for imitation elsewhere. Be it so. But still it is banking—banking on the English plan, with a very inadequate supply, scarcely any supply, of bullion—banking without limitation or control, without any reference or responsibility to Government:—banking, in a word, with all the defects imputed to that system, in their most exaggerated forms.

But if this example be not satisfactory, let us look at the experience of the two other countries in which the system exists, and exists, as we are told, in its most vicious state—England and the United States. Look at the results. I have no faith at all in speculative politics. A theorist in Government is as dangerous as a theorist in medicine, or in agriculture, and for precisely the same reason—the subjects are too complicated and too obscure for simple and decisive experiments. I go for undisputed results in the long run. Now, surely a philosophical inquirer into the history of the commerce and public economy of nations, if he saw a people pre-eminently distinguished in those particulars above all others, would be inclined to ascribe their superiority to what was peculiar in their institutions; at least whatever might be his ideas a priori on such subjects, he would be very slow to deny to any remarkable peculiarity in those institutions its full importance as one of the probable causes of the success which he witnessed, unless he could clearly show the contrary. Then, sir, by what example are we to be guided in such matters, if not by that of England—by far the most magnificent manifestation that the world in any age of it has ever beheld, of the might and the grandeur of civilized life? Sir, I have weighed every syllable that I utter; I express a deliberate conviction, founded upon a patient inquiry and a comparison, as complete as my limited knowledge has enabled me to make it, between the past and present condition of mankind, and between the great nation of which I am speaking, and those which surround her. Sir, there is a gulf between them—that narrow channel separate worlds—it is an ocean more than three thousand miles wide. I appeal to any one who has been abroad, whether going from England to any part of continent he not descending immensely in the scale of civilization? I know, sir, that the word is an ambiguous one. I know that in some of the graces of polished society, in some of the arts of an elegant imagination, that in the exact sciences and in mere learning and general intellectual cultivation, some nations have excelled, perhaps, many equalled England. But in that civilization which, as I have said before, it is the great end of modern political economy to promote, and which is immediately connected with the subject before you—which at once springs out of and leads to the accumulation of capital, and the distribution of wealth and comfort through all classes of a community, with an immense aggregate of national power and resources—that civilization which enables man to "wield these elements, and arm him with the force of all their regions," which gives him dominion over all other creatures, and makes him emphatically the Lord of the Universe—that civilization which consists not in music, not in playing on the flute, as the Athenian hero said, but in turning a small city into a great one—in that victorious, triumphant, irresistible civilization, there is nothing recorded in the annals of mankind that does not sink into the shades of the deepest eclipse by the side of England. I say nothing of her recent achievements on the land and the sea—of her fleets, her armies, her subsidized allies. Look at the Thames crowded with shipping—visit her arsenals, her docks, her canals, her railways, her factories, her mines, her warehouses, her roads, and bridges—go through the streets of that wonderful metropolis, the bank, the emporium, and the exchange of the whole world—converse with those merchants who conduct and control, as far as it is possible to control, the commerce of all nations, with those manufacturers who fill every market with their unrivalled products—go into that bank which is the repository of the precious metals for all Europe—consider its notes, as well as the bills of private bankers, at a premium every where, more valuable than specie, symbols not merely of gold, but of what is far more precious than gold, yea, than fine gold, of perfect good faith, of unblemished integrity, of sagacious enterprise, of steadfast, persevering industry, of boundless wealth, of business co-extensive with the earth, and of all these things possessed, exercised, enjoyed, protected under a system of liberty chastened by the law which maintains it, and of law softened and mitigated by the spirit of liberty which it breathes throughout. Sir, I know, as well as any one, what compensations there are for all this opulence and power, for it is the condition of our being that we "buy our blessings at a price." I knew that there are disturbing causes which have hitherto marred, in some degree, the effect of this high and mighty civilization; but the hand of reform has been already applied to them, and every thing promises the most auspicious results. I have it on the most unquestionable authority, because, from an unwilling witness, that within the memory of man, never were the laboring classes of England so universally employed, and so comfortably situated, as at the beginning of the present year.*

But I said that there was another nation that had some experience in banking and its effects. Sir, I dare not trust myself to speak of my country with the rapture which I habitually feel when I contemplate her marvellous history. But this I will say, that on my return to it, after an absence of only four years, I was filled with wonder at all I saw and all I heard. What upon earth is to be compared with it? I found New York grown up to almost double its former size, with the air of a great capital, instead of a mere flourishing commercial town, as I had known it. I listened to accounts of voyages of a thousand miles in magnificent steamboats on the waters of those great lakes which, but the other day, I left sleeping in the primeval silence of Nature, in the recesses of a vast wilderness; and I felt that there is a grandeur and a majesty in this irresistible onward march of a race created, as I believe, and elected to possess and people a continent, which belongs to few other objects, either of the moral or material world. We may become so much accustomed to such things that they shall make as little impression upon our minds as the glories of the heavens above us; but looking on them lately as with the eye of the stranger, I felt what a recent English traveller is said to have remarked, that, far from being without poetry, as some have vainly alleged, our whole country is one great poem. Sir, it is so; and if there be a man that can think of what is doing in all parts of this most blessed of all lands, to embellish and advance it; who can contemplate that living mass of intelligence, activity, and improvement, as it rolls on in its sure and steady progress to the uttermost extremities of the West; who can see scenes of savage desolation transformed, almost with the suddenness of enchantment, into those of fruitfulness and beauty, crowned with flourishing cities, filled with the noblest of all populations; if there be a man, I say, that can witness all this passing under his very eyes, without feeling his heart beat high, and his imagination warmed and transported by it, be sure, sir, that the raptures of song exist not for him; he would listen in vain to Tasso or Camoens, telling a tale of the wars of knights and crusaders, or of the discovevery and conquest of another hemisphere.

Sir, thinking as I do of these things—not doubting, for a moment, the infinite superiority of our race in every thing that relates to a refined and well ordered public economy, and in all the means and instruments of a high social improvement, it strikes me as of all paradoxes the most singular, to hear foreign examples seriously proposed for our imitation in the very matters wherein that superiority has ever appeared to me to be most unquestionable. The reflection has occurred to me a thousand times in travelling over the continent of Europe, as I passed through filthy, ill-paved villages, through towns in which there is no appearance of an improvement having been made since the Reformation, as I have looked at the wretched hovel of the poor peasant or artisan, or seen him at his labors with his clumsy implements and coarse gear—what a change would take place in the whole aspect of the country, if it were to fall into the hands of Americans for a single generation!

But is it paper money and the credit system alone that have achieved all these wonders? I do not say so, sir; but can you say, can any one presume to say, that they have not done much of all this? I know that the cardinal spring and source of our success is freedom—freedom with the peculiar character that belongs to it in our race—freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom of commerce, freedom not merely from the oppressions, but from those undue restraints, and that impertinent interference of Government in the interests properly belonging to individuals, which stand in the way of all improvement in the nations of continental Europe. It is this vital principle, the animating element of social equality, tempered and sobered by a profound respect for the authority of laws, and for the rights of others, and acting upon that other prominent characteristic of the Anglo-Norman race, the strong instinct of property, with the personal independence and personal comfort that belong to it, that explains our unrivalled and astonishing progress. But of this rational, diffusive liberty among a people so intelligent as ours, the credit system is the natural fruit, the inseparable companion, the necessary means and instrument. It is part and parcel of our existence. Who ever heard of CREDIT in a despotism or anarchy? It implies confidence—confidence in yourself, confidence in your neighbor, confidence in your Government, confidence in the administration of the laws, confidence in the sagacity, the integrity, the discretion of those with whom you have to deal; confidence, in a word, in your destiny and your fortune, in the destinies and the fortune of the country to which you belong; as, for instance, in the case of a great national debt. It is the fruit, I say, of all that is most precious in civilized life, and to quarrel with it is to be ungrateful to God for some of the greatest blessings he has vouchsafed to man. Compare Asia with Europe; hoarding has been the usage of the former from time immemorial, because it is slavish, oppressed, and barbarous; and it is curious to see the effect of English laws in breaking up (as they are doing) that system in Hindostan. Depend upon it, sir, all such ideas are utterly alien to our way of thinking—to all the habitudes of our people, and all the interests of the country. My friends from beyond the mountains are familiar with the great principle, the magical effect of credit in a young and progressive country. They know what miracles are wrought by a small advance of money to enable enterprise and industry to bring into cultivation a virgin soil. They know how soon the treasures of its unworn fertility enable them to pay off a loan of that sort with usurious interest, and make them proprietors of estates rising in value with the lapse of every moment. Compare the great Western country now with what it was twenty years ago—sell it sub hasta—and compute, if the powers of arithmetic will enable you to do so, the augmentation of its riches. Sir, this is one of the phenomena of our situation to which attention has hardly ever been called—the manner in which the mere increase of population acts upon the value of property. To be struck with the prodigious results produced in this simple way, you have only to compare the estimated taxable property in Pennsylvania and New York, when it was returned for direct taxation in 1799, with the returns of the same property for the same purpose in 1813, after an interval of only fourteen years†—you will see how it is that our people have been enriched by debt, and "by owing, owe not"—how, with a balance of payments almost continually against them from the first settlement of the country, they have grown in riches beyond all precedent or parallel. You will appreciate all the blessings of the credit system, and imagine, perhaps, how this wonderful progress could have been impeded and embarrassed by the difficulties of a metallic circulation.†

But the fluctuations of the currency—the ruinous irregularities of bank paper! Why, sir, I have already shown they belong to commerce itself; not to the means which it employs, and that there is no remedy for them. But, after all, what is the sum of the evil? Look again at general results. Tell me not that reactions produce fewer disasters, or less extensive derangements of money and circulation, in countries whose business is principally metallic. It may be so; but what does that prove? If you never soar, you will be in no danger of falling, certainly; but then,

Serpit humi tutus nimium timidus que procellæ.

A go-cart may be a very safe contrivance for the tottering footsteps of infancy; but is it thus that manly vigor is to be trained for the dust and heat of the Olympic race? Sir, it is the condition of all that is grand and awakening in nature, to be somewhat wild and irregular. In the moral world, especially, peril and difficulty are the price which Providence exacts of us for all great excellence and all eminent success. It is in struggling with them that the heroic virtues which elevate and purify humanity are called forth and disciplined; and it is precisely because our people have been trained in that stern school that they have effected more, and are now able to effect more, with equal means, than any other in the world. Sir, it is not our currency only that is obnoxious to the imputation of irregularity. What is Democracy; popular government itself? How often has it fallen to my lot to defend it by the very considerations which I now urge on a kindred topic, when foreigners have spoken to me of the disorders that have occasionally checkered our history. When they exaggerated the importance of such events, I have reminded them that all human institutions must have their imperfections; and that it is by their general effects in a long course of experience, not by occasional accidents, however striking and important, that they are to be judged. That the absence of restraint, which leads to occasional licentiousness, fosters that bold, robust, energetic, and adventurous spirit, and that habit of haughty self-reliance, and independent judgment, which are the very soul of Republican government; which have rendered that form of government, wherever it has existed, so illustrious for heroic achievements, and has made every era of liberty in the history of mankind, even in its most imperfect form, an era of flourishing prosperity and progress. Sir, such a people, as has been said of beings of a higher order, "live throughout, vital in every part."

† Mr. Gallatin's pamphlet, p. 68.

All head they live, all heart, all eye, all ear,
All intellect, all sense.

This is the great secret of our superiority, and of that of every free people; not the forms of a constitution, not the outlines of a system, not more organization, but the principle of life, the all pervading animation and vitality that informs the whole body politic, and gives it the warmth, and strength, and activity, the winning graces and expressive countenance of a man, instead of the cold and repulsive stillness of a painted corpse. Jury trial is another of these irregularities—liable, undoubtedly, to much criticism in detail, and scarcely susceptible, as a juridical institution, of a strict defence in theory—yet what should we think of a reformer that should propose to us the abolition of a system so full of practical good, because it was unknown until recently anywhere but in England, and often leads, as it certainly has often led, to great abuse and injustice?

But, then, it seems our banking system is an innovation, introduced only a century and a half ago, and deviates from the primitive model of the Bank of Amsterdam—the honest system, as it is called—and that, instead of lending money, it lends merely credit.

[Mr. L. here went at some length into an argument to show the futility of the suggestion of the banking system being an innovation; showing that it is one of those innovations which had their origin at that great epoch of human improvement, when mankind ceased to cut each other's throats for differences in religion, and began to make war for colonies and commerce, &c.]

With a population, then, increasing at the rate of four to five per cent. a year, and with an accumulation of capital and productive power proportionably greater, I hold it to be utterly absurd to talk of anything like a metallic currency in the United States. There is no possible means of procuring it; and, if by any means it could be procured, I venture to affirm that our people would get rid of it in the course of a few years, though all the penal laws of Spain against the exportation of gold and silver should be re-enacted here—laws which were passed with no other effect, even in that country, but to show the utter futility of such legislation. I say, sir, that, with their present habits of active enterprise and strict economy, the American people would export the precious metals as fast as they were imported, beyond any amount of them which might be absolutely necessary for the domestic exchanges of the country, and they would do so, because gold and silver would be of more use abroad in purchasing commodities, and would be wholly superfluous at home, where paper would do as well. If you put down "the banks," it would have no effect but to set up something worse in their place, in the shape of private paper. There are some things over which the most despotic lawgivers are unable to exercise any control; and one of them, as all experience shows, is this commerce in bullion.

Sir, it has been said that the only advantage of a paper currency consists in its cheapness. I am, by no means, as you may gather from what I have said, ready to admit this; but, supposing it to be true, is that saving really an unimportant matter? Mr. Gallatin, in a pamphlet of singular ability,‡ has, as I conceive, fallen into a grave error on this subject, which it is so much the more important to rectify, as I perceive that he has misled others more disposed than himself to turn a speculative error into a practical mischief. He states the whole benefit derived from the use of paper, instead of the precious metals, in the United States in 1830, including, under the name of circulation, private deposites in the banks, as they ought undoubtedly to be, at about five millions of dollars a year. It is true, that, according to principles admitted by Mr. Gallatin, the progress of the country, both in wealth and population, in the last seven years, would require a very considerable addition to be made to this estimate, in order to a correct application of it to our actual condition. But, sir, it appears to me that the estimate was made on data altogether erroneous. In the first place, the quantity of currency, if it were metallic, necessary to the circulation of this country, was prodigiously underrated. For reasons that need not be stated here, it is found that a given amount of metallic currency does not circulate as rapidly as an equal amount of paper, and, therefore, that more of it is, ceteris paribus, required to do the same business. But without going into such minute inquiry here, why should the United States, with sixteen millions of inhabitants, and relatively the most active trade, both foreign and domestic, in the world, and with extraordinary productive power of all sorts, not need at the very least half the circulation necessary in France, with only double their population, and not half their industry? The stress that ought to be laid on this latter circumstance may be illustrated by comparing Asia with Europe in this particular: double the population in the former, possessing, according to the most accurate researches, only one fifth the quantity of gold and silver, which, in addition to paper of all sorts, is required in the latter. Now, the circulation of France was, before the first revolution, set down by Neckar at £88,000,000;§ and Thiers, in his history of that event, makes a similar estimate.‖ Its present amount ought, in reference to the increase of her capital and population, to be at least 600,000 000 dollars; and, accordingly, as was observed by one of my colleagues, [Mr. THOMPSON,] it is stated at that, on good authority.¶ Mr. Rothschild, in his examination before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1832, mentions the paper circulation of the Bank of France as amounting to 750,000,000 francs. According to this, then, we should require, on the footing of population alone, at least 300,000,000 dollars. So much for the amount; now for the loss upon it.

Mr. Gallatin considers it only as so much interest on dead capital, and even the interest he puts at an exceedingly low rate. But I apprehend the difference to the country between having a vast inert mass of gold and silver as currency, and turning it into productive capital, must be determined, not in reference to interest merely, but to the profit of stock laid out in active industry, which is nowhere in this country less than ten per cent. and in the great majority of cases, the new States and all included, nearer double that amount on an average. You see, then, sir, what an enormous loss a metallic currency would be to the nation, without taking into account its wear and tear. Look back at the half century that has passed away, and say what that loss would have been, on principles of compound interest, from the beginning up to the present day. Why, sir, it exceeds all powers of calculation, nay, of imagination. Do not suppose for a moment, that so important, so palpable a truth, although never stated in abstract terms, or as a general proposition, has not occurred to the people of the United States. They have felt it, without perceiving it; they have acted on it, without reasoning about it; they have perfectly well comprehended the real uses of money, without studying the principles of currency; and they have preferred paper as a circulating medium, to gold and silver, because it was better for their purposes than gold and silver, on the simplest maxims of prudence and economy. You may depend upon it, this conclusion is as deeply rooted as it is just. You will never be able to shake it. All your policy will be of no avail, as all legislation will be for ever vain which comes into conflict with the genius of a people, especially in matters so deeply and visibly affecting their private interest. The barbarian, who, in his impotent rage, threw fetters into the Hellespont, and scourged its foaming billows, did not wage a more insane war against the nature of things.

But we are told that if it is an experiment, that has been proposed to us, we need not be alarmed at it, because we are accustomed to experiments, and successful ones; that our Constitution itself is a mere experiment. Sir, I deny it utterly, and he that says so shows me that he has either not studied at all, or studied to very little purpose, the history and genius of our institutions. The great cause of their prosperous results—a cause which every one of the many attempts since vainly made to imitate them on this continent or in Europe only demonstrates the more clearly—is precisely the contrary. It is because our fathers made no experiments, and had no experiment to make, that their work has stood. They were forced, by a violation of their historical hereditary rights under the old common law of their race, to dissolve their connection with the mother country. Their external, their federal relations were of course changed, and in that respect, and in that respect only, they were compelled to do their best in the novel situation in which they stood. What relates, therefore, merely to the union of the States is all that gives the least countenance to this superficial idea of an "experiment" which has done so much to misguide the speculations of some visionary minds upon these important matters. Even in this respect, however, an attentive study of our history will show that strong federal tendencies existed, and had, frequently, on former occasions, manifested themselves.* But the whole constitution of society in the States, the great body and bulk of their public law, with all its maxims and principles, all that is republican, in short, in our institutions, remained after the Revolution, and remains now, with some very subordinate modifications, what it was from the beginning. Our written constitutions do nothing but consecrate and fortify the "plain rules of ancient liberty," handed down with Magna Charta from the earliest history of our race. It is not a piece of paper, sir, it is not a few abstractions engrossed on parchment, that make free Governments. No, sir, the law of liberty must be inscribed on the heart of the citizen; the word, if I may use the expression without irreverence, must become flesh; you must have a whole people trained, disciplined, bred, yea, and born, as our fathers were, to institutions like ours. Before the colonies existed, the petition of right, that Magna Charta of a more enlightened age, had been presented in 1628 by Lord Coke and his immortal compeers. Our founders brought it with them, and we have not gone one step beyond them. They brought these maxims of civil liberty, not in their libraries, but in their souls; not as philosophical prattle—not as barren generalities, but as rules of conduct; as a symbol of public duty and private right, to be adhered to with religious fidelity; and the very first pilgrim that set his foot upon the rock of Plymouth stepped forth a LIVING CONSTITUTION! armed at all points to defend and to perpetuate the liberty to which he had devoted his whole being.

It only remains for me to advert briefly to one or two additional topics, and I have done. It has been argued as if the currency given to bank paper in this country were due almost exclusively to the countenance which Government affords it, by receiving it in payment of public dues. Certainly, sir, the patronage of Government is an important concurring cause of this credit, but it is not true that it is essential to it. What does the house of Rothchild owe to the Governments of Europe—that house to which all the Governments on the continent are obliged to have recourse in their financial exigencies? And here let me call the attention of those who declaim so vehemently against the agency of banking corporations, to the fact, that this mighty house, with its scarcely less than royal influence and splendor, like most of the other establishments of the same kind in Europe, is no corporation at all, but a mere private partnership; and to the additional fact, that this colossal fortune has been amassed in little more than a single generation, by an obscure person, born in a corner of the Judengasse of Frankfort on the Maine, and his four sons. Do you not see, then, sir, that the odious common places about "the money power," and "the political powers," either have no meaning, or apply with all their force to every accumulation of capital, and all the great results of modern commerce? The "money power," I presume, signifies "the power of money," which is widely diffused in this country, thanks to the protection of equal laws, and which will exist and continue to have its influence so long as those laws shall protect it from confiscation, whether it shall borrow the credit of the Government, or the Government shall borrow its credit. It is scarcely necessary to notice an idea, analogous to the last, which has been very much insisted on, and that is, that the commerce of New York has been built up by Government credits. Why, sir, this does appear to me too extravagant to need exposure. New York has been built up by her unquestionable natural advantages, and there is no measure of this Government—there is only one event that can possibly deprive her of her immense commercial ascendancy—the dissolution of the Union—that, and nothing but that, can do it. Commerce, as I have already remarked, leads every where to centralization: look at Liverpool—look at Havre, the last, in a hard money country. But on this head there is a very important consideration, which has been urged with all his admirable eloquence by one of my colleagues in the Senate, [Mr. PRESTON.] If this concentration of commercial business at that city be injurious to the others now, what will it become if, by collecting the revenue in gold and silver, and thus making gold and silver mere merchandise, you add to the disadvantages of centralization all the difficulties of procuring coin; make New York the great specie market; and render the whole country tributary to the money changers of Wall street?

Sir, a word more to the South, and for the South. When your system of protection was still in all its vigor, we (I mean the people of South Carolina) sent you a protest against its principles and tendency, which contained, among other objections to it, one that deserves to be repeated here. We told you that we depended absolutely upon commerce—commerce on the largest scale—commerce carried on as it has been for the last half century, with an ever-increasing production, provoking and creating an ever-increasing consumption, and permitting us to send a million (now a million and a half) of bales of cotton into the market, without any danger of a glut. We told you the staple commodities, especially the principal one which we produced, were among the very few in the production of which slave labor can enter into competition with free. We reminded you that great revulsions in trade sometimes arose from apparently slight causes, and that, however far it might be from your purpose, or even your apprehensions, it was possible that your legislation might occasion us the loss of our foreign market, our only resource; that the result of that loss to us would be poverty and utter desolation; that our people, in despair, would emigrate to more fortunate regions, and the whole frame and constitution of our society would be seriously impaired and endangered, if not dissolved entirely. And we adjured you not to persist in a course of legislation of which the benefits to yourselves, even were they unquestionable, were nothing in comparison of the danger to which they exposed us—a danger which, however contingent or remote, involved our whole existence, and could not be contemplated without well-founded alarm. Sir, I repeat to you now—I repeat to the representatives of the whole South on this floor—the words then addressed to the House on a different subject. Let well alone. Resist this uncalled-for innovation, of which no one can foresee the whole extent nor the ultimate results. Mark what your Secretary of the Treasury has told you in the very paper in which he reveals the project on the table—YOU PRODUCE TOO MUCH COTTON. Go home, gentlemen of the South, and tell your people that their successful industry is a vice; that the fertility of their soil is a curse; that their excessive production occasions disorders in the State; and that the remedy for our troubles is, that they should live on short commons. Let them co-operate with our political economy, by depriving themselves of the little mercantile capital they have; let them abolish those corporations to which people, who cannot themselves do business with the widow and the orphan, have contributed their means for the accommodation of commerce; let them but do this, and their docility will be admirable, and shall have our approbation.

Sir, before I take my seat, there is one other topic that I feel it my duty to advert to—I mean to the supposed injurious effects of banking institutions upon the laboring classes of society. Although I have no doubt but that there are many defects in the Constitution, as well as the management of those institutions in this country, and should be most willing to co-operate, if occasion served, in reforming them, I have no hesitation in acquitting them at least of this charge. Who that has ever heard of the relation between capital and labor, between wages and profits, but must see at once that it is unfounded; and, accordingly, Hume objects to banks that, by their issues, they raise wages, and so hurt the manufacturing interests of a nation. I have already remarked, that one of the effects of an increasing currency is to make a distribution of the wealth of society more favorable to the industrious classes of it—to confiscate, in a manner, the property of those who live on fixed incomes, for the benefit of those who produce the commodities on which those incomes are laid out. It is for this reason that the radicals of England—Mr. Atwood, for example—are all strenuous advocates of paper money, and even of inconvertible paper. The idea that the poor are to gain by a return to a metallic currency is, so far as I know, confined to their friends in this country, whose zeal is certainly greater than their knowledge.

It is true, sir, that among other disadvantages attending frequent fluctuations in the currency, it is said that wages are the last thing that rises in a case of expansion. And that may be so in countries where the supply of labor is greater than the demand, but the very reverse is most certainly the fact here, where the demand, especially when stimulated by any extraordinary increase, real or fictitious, of capital, is always greater than the supply. All price is a question of power, or relative necessity between two parties; and every body knows that, in a period of excitement here, wages rise immediately, and out of all proportion more than any thing else, because the population of the country is entirely inadequate to its wants. During the last year, for instance, the price of labor became so exorbitant, that some of the most fertile land in South Carolina, rice fields, which have been cultivated for a hundred years, were in danger of being abandoned, from the impossibility of paying for it. Sir, as a Southern man, I represent equally rent, capital, and wages, which are all confounded in our estates; and I protest against attempts to array, without cause, without a color of pretext or plausibility, the different classes of society against one another, as if, in such a country as this, there could be any natural hostility or any real distinction between them—a country in which all the rich, with hardly an exception, have been poor, and all the poor may one day be rich—a country in which banking institutions have been of immense service, precisely because they have been most needed by a people who all had their fortunes to make by good character and industrious habits. Look at that remarkable picture—remarkable not as the work of art, but as a monument of history—which you see in passing through the rotunda. Two out of five of that immortal committee were mechanics, and such men!* In the name of God, sir, why should any one study to pervert the natural good sense and kindly feelings of this moral and noble people—to infuse into their minds a sullen envy towards one another, instead of that generous emulation which every man in their situation is fitted to inspire—to breathe into them the spirit of Cain, muttering deep curses and meditating desperate revenge against his brother, because the smoke of his sacrifice has ascended to Heaven before his own! And do not they who treat our industrious classes as if they were in the same debased and wretched condition as the poor of Europe, insult them by such an odious comparison? Why, sir, you do not know what poverty is. We have no poor in this country, in the sense in which that word is used abroad. Every laborer, even the most humble, in the United States, soon becomes a capitalist, and even, if he choose, a proprietor of land; for the West, with all its boundless fertility, is open to him. How can any one dare to compare the mechanics of this land (whose inferiority in any substantial particular, in intelligence, in virtue, in wealth, to the other classes of our society, I have yet to learn) with that race of outcasts, of which so terrific a picture is presented by recent writers—the poor of Europe? a race, among no inconsiderable portion of whom famine and pestilence may be said to dwell continually; many of whom are without morals, without education, without a country, without a God! and may be said to know society only by the terrors of its penal code, and to live in perpetual war with it. Poor bondmen! mocked with the name of liberty, that they may be sometimes tempted to break their chains, in order that, after a few days of starvation in idleness or dissipation, they may be driven back to their prison house to take them up again, heavier and more galling than before; severed, as it has been touchingly expressed, from nature, from the common air, and the light of the sun; knowing only by hearsay that the fields are green, that the birds sing, and that there is a perfume in flowers.†

And is it with a race, whom the perverse institutions of Europe have thus degraded beneath the condition of humanity, that the advocates, the patrons, the protectors of our workingmen, presume to compare them? Sir, it is to treat them with a scorn at which their spirit should revolt, and does revolt. Just before I left Charleston, there was a meeting called for some purpose, which was regarded by the people of that city as unfavorable to public order. There was something, I suppose, in the proceedings which looked to the invidious distinction of which I have been speaking; for it led, as I have heard, to an expression of sentiment from one of our mechanics,‡ which struck me as noble beyond all praise. He said he wondered what could be meant by addressing to the industrious classes, particularly, all inflammatory appeals against the institutions of the country—as if they were not a part of the community as much interested in its order and peace as any other—as if they had no ties of sympathy or connection with their fellow citizens—above all, as if they had not intelligence or knowledge enough to take care of their own interests, but were reduced to a state of perpetual pupilage and infancy, and needed the official protection of self-constituted guardians! Sir, that was a sentiment worthy of a freeman, and which may be recorded, with honor, among the sayings of heroes.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for the attention with which it has honored me. I have detained it long; but I was full of the subject, which appears to me to be one of vast importance, in all its bearings. I have spoken what I felt and thought, without reference to party. But I will say one word to those with whom I have generally acted on this floor. I have hear I that some of them disapprove this measure, but are disposed to vote for it to oblige their friends. Sir, this is a strange and a great mistake. A true friend ought to be a faithful counsellor. Let them remember the deep reproach which the great poet puts in the mouth of one of his heroes:

> Had thou but shook thy head, or made a pause,
> When I spoke darkly what I purposed;
> Or turned an eye of doubt upon my face!

†Michelet. ‡Mr. Harby.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, January 31, 1838—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

"Let the Government attend to its own business, and let the people attend to theirs."

"Let the Government take care that it secures a sound currency for its own use, and let it leave all the rest to the States and to the people."

These ominous sentences, Mr. President, have been ringing in my ears ever since they were uttered yesterday by the member from New York. Let the Government take care of itself, and let the people take care of themselves. This is the whole principle and policy of the Administration at the present most critical moment, and on this great and all-absorbing question of the currency.

Sir, this is an ill-boding announcement. It has nothing of consolation, of solace, or of hope in it.

It will carry through all the classes of commerce and business nothing but more discouragement and deeper fears; and yet it is but repetition. It is only a renewed exhibition of the same spirit which was breathed by the Message and the bill of the last session, of which this bill is also full, and which has pervaded all the recommendations and all the measures of Government since May. Yet I confess that I am not, even yet, so familiar with it, so accustomed to hear such sentiments avowed, as that they cease to astonish me. I am either groping in thick and palpable darkness myself, in regard to the true objects of the Constitution, and the duties of Congress under it, or else these principles of public policy, thus declared, are at war with our most positive and urgent obligations.

The honorable member made other observations indicative of the same general tone of political feeling. Among his chosen topics of commendation of the bill before us, a prominent one was to shelter the Administration from that shower of imputations, as he expressed the idea, which would always beat upon it as it beats now, when disasters should happen to the currency. Indeed! And why should the Administration, now or ever, be sheltered from that shower? Is not currency a subject over which the power and duty of Government extend? Is not Government justly responsible for its condition? Is it not, of necessity, wholly and entirely under the control and regulation of political power? Is it not a matter, in regard to which, the people cannot, by any possibility, protect themselves, any more than they can, by their own individual efforts, supersede the necessity of the exercise by Government of any other political power? What can the people do for themselves, to improve the currency? Sir, the Government is justly answerable for the disasters of the currency, saving always those accidents which cannot at all times be foreseen or provided against. It is at least answerable for its own neglect, if it shall be guilty of it, in not exercising all its constitutional authority for the correction and restoration of the currency. Why does it, how can it, shrink from this responsibility? Why does it seek not the laurels of victory, not the reputation, even of manly contest, but the poor honors of studied and eager escape? Sir, it never can escape. The common sense of all men pronounces that the Government is, and ought to be, and must be, answerable for the regulation of the currency of the country; that it ought to abide, and must abide, the pelings of the storm of imputation, so long as it turns its back upon this momentous question, and seeks to shelter itself in the safes and the vaults, the cells and the caverns, of a Sub-Treasury system.

But of all Governments that ever existed, the present Administration has least excuse for withdrawing its care from the currency, or shrinking from its just responsibility in regard to it.

Its predecessor, in whose footsteps it professes to tread, has interfered, fatally interfered with that subject. That interference was, and has been, the productive cause of our disasters. Did the Administration disclaim power over the currency in 1833, when it removed the deposites? And what meant all its subsequent transactions, all its professions, and all its efforts, for that better currency which it promised if, in truth, it did not hold itself responsible to the people of the United States for a good currency? From the very first year of the late Administration to the last, there was hardly a session, if there was a single session, in which this duty of Government was not acknowledged, promises of high improvement put forth, or loud claims of merit asserted for benefits already conferred. It professed to erect the great temple of its glory on improvements of the currency.

And, sir, the better currency, which has been so long promised, was not a currency for the Government, but a currency for the people. It was not for the use of revenue merely, but for the use of the whole commerce, trade, and business of the nation. And now, when the whole industry, business, and labor of the country is harassed and distressed by the evils brought upon us by its own interference, Government talks with all possible coolness of the great advantage it will be to adopt a system which shall shield itself from a thick falling shower of imputations. It disclaims, it renounces, it abandons it duties, and then seeks an inglorious shelter in its professed want of power to relieve the people.

We demand the better currency; we insist on the fulfilment of the high and flattering promises; and surely there never was a Government on the face of the earth that could, with less propriety, resist the demand; yet we see it seek refuge in a bold, cold, and heartless denial of the competency of its own constitutional powers. It falls back from its own undertakings, and flatly contradicts its own pretensions. In my opinion, it can find no refuge where the public voice will not reach it. There can be no shelter, while these times last, into which Government can retreat; wherein it can hide, and screen itself from the loud voice of the country, calling upon it to come forth to fulfil its promises, or at least, now that these promises are all broken, to perform its duties. The evils of a disordered currency are evils which do not naturally correct or cure themselves. Nor does chance or good luck often relieve that community which is suffering under them. They require political remedy; they require provision to be made by Government; they demand the skilful hand of experienced statesmen. Until some just remedy be applied, they are likely to continue, with more or less of aggravation, and no man can tell when or how they will end. It is vain, therefore, quite vain, for Government to hope that it may retreat from this great duty, shield itself under a system no way agreeing either with its powers or its obligations, and thus escape reproaches, by attempting to escape responsibility.

Mr. President, there is fault and failure somewhere. Either the Constitution has failed, or its administration fails. The great end of a uniform and satisfactory regulation of commerce is not answered, because the national currency, an indispensable instrument of that commerce, is not preserved in a sound and uniform state.

Is the fault in the Constitution itself? Those who affirm that it is, must show how it was, if that be so, that other Administrations, in other times, have been able to give the people abundant satisfaction in relation to the currency. I suppose it will be said, in answer to this, that the Constitution has been violated; that it was originally misconstrued; that those who made it did not understand it; and that the sage and more enlightened politicians of our times see deeper and judge more justly of the Constitution than Washington and Madison. Certain it is, that they have more respect for their own sagacity than for all the wisdom of others, and all the experience of the country; or else they find themselves, by their party politics and party commitments, cut off from all ability of administering the Constitution according to former successful practice.

Mr. President, when I contemplate the condition of the country; when I behold this utter breaking down of the currency, this wide spread evil among all the industrious classes, this acknowledged inability of Government to pay its debts legally, this prostration of commerce and manufactures, this shocking derangement of internal exchange, and the general crash of credit and confidence; and when I see that three hundred representatives of the people are here assembled, to consult on the public exigency; and that, repudiating the wisdom of our predecessors, and rejecting all the lights of our own experience, nothing is proposed, for our adoption, to meet an emergency of this character, but the bill before us, I confess, sir, the whole seems to me some strange illusion. I can hardly persuade myself that we are all in our waking senses. It appears like a dream, like some phantasy of the night, that the opening light of the morning usually dispels.

There is so little of apparent relation of means to ends; the measure before us has so little to promise for the relief of existing evils; it is so alien, so outlandish, so abstracted, so remote from the causes which press down all the great public interests, that I really find it difficult to regard as real what is thus around me.

Sir, some of us are strangely in error. The difference between us is so wide, the views which we take of public affairs so opposite, our opinions, both of the causes of present evils and their appropriate remedies, so totally unlike, that one side or the other must be under some strange delusion. Darkness, thick darkness, hangs either over the supporters of this measure or over its opponents. Time, and the public judgment, I trust, will sooner or later disperse these mists, and men and measures will be seen in their true character. I think, indeed, that I see already some lifting up of the fog.

The honorable member from New York has said that we have now already existing a mode of conducting the fiscal affairs of the country, substantially such as that will be which this bill will establish. We may judge, therefore, he says, of the future by the present. A Sub-Treasury system, in fact, he contends, is now in operation, and he hopes the country sees so much good in it as to be willing to make it permanent and perpetual.

The present system, he insists, must at least be admitted not to have obstructed or impeded the beneficial action of the immense resources of the country. Sir, this seems to me a most extraordinary declaration. The operation and energy of the resources of the country not obstructed? The business of the community not impeded? Why, sir, this can only be true upon the supposition that the present evils are no way attributable to the policy of Government, that they all spring from some extraneous and independent cause. If the honorable member means that the disasters which have fallen upon us arise from causes which Government cannot control, such as overtrading or speculation, and that Government is answerable for nothing, I can understand him, though I do not at all concur with him. But that the resources of the country are not now in a state of great depression and stagnation is what I had supposed none would assert. Sir, what are the resources of the country? The first of all, doubtless, is labor. Does this meet no impediment? Does labor find itself rewarded, as heretofore, by high prices, paid in good money? The whole mass of industry employed in commerce and manufactures, does it meet with no obstruction, or hindrance, or discouragement? And commerce and manufactures, in the aggregate, embracing capital as well as labor, are they too in a high career of success? Is nothing of impediment or obstruction found connected with their present condition?

Again, sir; among our American resources, from the very first origin of this Government, credit and confidence have held a high and foremost rank. We owe more to credit, and to commercial confidence, than any nation which ever existed; and ten times more than any nation, except England. Credit and confidence have been the life of our system, and powerfully productive causes of all our prosperity. They have covered the seas with our commerce, replenished the Treasury, paid off the national debt, excited and stimulated the manufacturing industry, encouraged labor to put forth the whole strength of its sinews, felled the forest, and multiplied our numbers, and augmented the national wealth, so far beyond all example, as to leave us a phenomenon for older nations to look at with wonder. And this credit, and this confidence, are they now no way obstructed or impeded? Are they now acting with their usual efficiency, and their usual success, on the concerns of society?

The honorable member refers to the exchanges. No doubt, sir, the rate of foreign exchange has nothing in it alarming. Nor has it had, if our domestic concerns had been in a proper condition. But that the internal exchanges are in a healthful condition, as the honorable member alleges, is what I can by no means admit. I look upon the derangement of the internal exchanges as the precise form in which existing evils most manifestly exhibit themselves. Why, sir, look at the rates between large cities in the neighborhood of each other. Exchange between Boston and New York, and also between Philadelphia and New York, is 1½ to 2 per cent. This could never happen but from a deranged currency; and can this be called a healthful state of domestic exchange?

I understand that the cotton crop has done much towards equalizing exchange between New Orleans and New York; and yet I have seen, not many days since, that in other places of the South, I believe Mobile, exchange on New York was at a premium of five to ten per cent.

The manufacturers of the North can say how they have found, and how they now find, the facilities of exchange. I do not mean exclusively, or principally, the large manufacturers of cotton and woollen fabrics; but the smaller manufacturers, men who, while they employ many others, still bestow their own labor on their own capital; the shop manufacturers, such manufacturers as abound in New Jersey, Connecticut, and other parts of the North. I would ask the gentlemen from these States how these neighbors of theirs find exchanges, and the means of remittance, between them and their correspondents and purchasers in the South. The carriage makers, the furniture makers, the hatters, the dealers in leather, in all its branches, the dealers in domestic hardware; I should like to hear the results of the experience of all these persons, on the state of the internal exchanges, as well as the general question whether the industry of the country has encountered any obstacle in the present state of the currency.

Mr. President, the honorable member from New York stated correctly that this bill has two leading objects

The first is, a separation of the revenue, and the funds of Government, from all connection with the concerns of individuals, and of corporations; and especially a separation of these funds from all connection with any banks.

The second is, a gradual change, in our system of currency, to be carried on till we can accomplish the object of an exclusive specie or metallic circulation, at least in all payments to Government, and all disbursements by Government.

Now, sir, I am against both these propositions, ends as well as means.

I am against this separation of Government and people, as unnatural, selfish, and an abandonment of the most important political duties.

I am for having but one currency, and that a good one, both for the people and the Government.

I am opposed to the doctrines of the Message of September, and to every thing which grows out of these doctrines. I feel as if I were on some other sphere, as if I were not at home, as if this could not be America, when I see schemes of public policy proposed, having for their object the convenience of Government only, and leaving the people to shift for themselves, in a matter which naturally and necessarily belongs, and in every other country is admitted to belong, to the solemn obligations and the undoubted power of Government. Is it America, where the Government, and men in the Government, are to be better off than the people? Is it America, where Government is to shut its eyes and its ears to public complaint, and to take care only of itself? Is it America, Mr. President, is it your country, and my country, in which, at a time of great public distress, when all eyes are turned to Congress, and when most men feel that substantial and practical relief can come only from Congress, that Congress, nevertheless, has nothing on earth to propose but bolts and bars, safes and vaults, cells and hiding places, for the better security of its own money; and nothing on earth, not a beneficent law, not even a kind word, for the people themselves? Is it our country, in which the interest of Government has reached such an ascendancy over the interest of the people, in the estimate of the representatives of the people? Has this, sir, come to be the state of things in the old thirteen, with the new thirteen added to them? For one, I confess I know not what is American, in policy, in public interest, or in public feeling, if these measures be deemed American.

The first general aspect or feature of the bill, the character written broadly on its front, is this abandonment of all concern for the general currency of the country. This is enough for me. It secures my opposition to the bill in all stages. Sir, this bill ought to have had a preamble. It ought to have been introduced by a recital, setting forth, that whereas the currency of the country has become totally deranged; and whereas, it has heretofore been thought the bounden duty of this Government to take proper care of that great branch of the national interest; and whereas, that opinion is erroneous, obsolete, and heretical; and whereas, according to the true reading of the Constitution, the great duty of this Government, and its exclusive duty, so far as currency is concerned, is to take care of itself; and whereas, if Government can but secure a sound currency for itself, the people may very well be left to such a currency as the States, or the banks, or their own good fortune, or bad fortune, may give them; therefore, be it enacted, &c.

The very first provision of the bill is in keeping with its general objects and general character. It abandons all the sentiments of civilized mankind on the subject of credit and confidence, and carries us back to the dark ages. The first that we hear is of safes, and vaults, and cells, and cloisters. From an intellectual it goes back to a physical age. From commerce and credit, it returns to hoarding and hiding; from confidence and trust, it retreats to bolts and bars, to locks with double keys, and to pains and penalties for touching hidden treasure. It is a law for the times of the feudal system; or a law for the heads and governors of the piratical States of Barbary. It is a measure fit for times when there is no security in law, no value in commerce, no active industry among mankind. Here, it is altogether out of time and out of place. It has no sympathy with the general sentiments of this age, still less has it any congeniality with our American character, any relish of our hitherto approved and successful policy, or any agreement or conformity with the general feeling of the country.

The gentleman, in stating the provisions of the first section, proceeds to say, that it is strange that none of our laws heretofore has ever attempted to give to the Treasury of the United States a "local habitation." Hence it is the object of this first section of the bill to provide and define such local habitation. A local habitation for the Treasury of a great and growing commercial country, in the nineteenth century! Why, sir, what is the Treasury? The existing laws call it a "Department." They say, there shall be a Department, with various officers, and a proper assignment of their duties and functions; and that this shall be the Department of the Treasury. It is thus an organized part of Government, an important and indispensable branch of the general administration, conducting the fiscal affairs of the country, and controlling subordinate agents.

But this bill does away with all legal and political ideas, and brings this important Department down to a thing of bricks and mortar. It enacts that certain rooms in the new building, with their safes and vaults, shall constitute the Treasury of the United States! And this adoption of new and strange notions, and this abandonment of all old ideas, is all for the purpose of accomplishing the great object of separating the affairs of the Government from the affairs of the country. The nature of the means shows the nature of the object; both are novel, strange, untried, and unheard of. The scheme, sir, finds no precedent, either in our own history, or the history of any other respectable nation. It is admitted to be new, original, experimental; and yet its adoption is urged upon us as confidently as if it had come down from our ancestors, and had been the cherished policy of the country in all past times.

I am against it altogether. I look not to see whether the means be adapted to the end. That end itself is what I oppose, and I oppose all the means leading to it. I oppose all attempts to make a separate currency for the Government, because I insist upon it, and shall insist upon it, until I see and feel the pillars of the Constitution falling around me and upon my head, that it is the duty of this Government to provide a good currency for the country and for the people, as well as for itself.

I put it to gentlemen to say, whether currency be not a part of commerce, or an indispensable agent of commerce; and something, therefore, which this Government is bound to regulate, and to take care of? Gentlemen will not meet the argument. They shun the question. We demand that the just power of the Constitution shall be administered. We assert that Congress has power to regulate commerce, and currency as a part of commerce; we insist that the public exigency, at the present moment, calls loudly for the exercise of this power—and what do they do? They labor to convince us that the Government itself can get on very well without providing a currency for the people, and they betake themselves, therefore, to the Sub-Treasury system, its unassailable walls, its iron chests, and doubly secured doors. And having satisfied themselves that, in this way, Government may be kept going, they are satisfied. A sound currency for Government, a safe currency for revenue; these are the only things promised, the only things proposed. But these are not the old promise. The country, the country itself, and the whole people, were promised a better currency, for their own use; a better general currency; a better currency for all the purposes of trade and business. This was the promise, solemnly given by the Government in 1833, and so often afterwards renewed, through all successive years, down to May last. We heard nothing, all that time, of a separation between Government and people. No, sir, not a word. Both were to have an improved currency. Sir, I did not believe a word of all this; I thought it all mere pretence or empty boasting. I had no faith in these promises, not a particle. But the honorable member from New York was confident; confident, then, as he is now; confident of the success of the first scheme, which was plausible, as he is confident of this, which is strange, alien, and repulsive in its whole aspect. He was then as sure of being able to furnish a currency for the country, as he is now of furnishing a currency for Government. He told us, at that time, that he believed the system, adopted by the late Administration, was fully competetent to its object. He felt no alarm for the result; he believed all the President had done, from the removal of the deposites downwards, was constitutional and legal, and he was determined to place himself by the side of the President, and desired only to stand or fall, in the estimation of his constituents, as they should determine in the result. And that result has now come.

As I have said, sir, I had no faith at all in all the promises of the Administration, made before, and at that time, and constantly repeated. I felt no confidence, whatever, in the whole project; I deemed it rash, headstrong, and presumptuous, to the last degree. And, at the risk of the charge of some offence against good taste, I will read a paragraph from some remarks of mine, in February, 1834, which sufficiently show what my opinion and my apprehensions then were:

"I have already endeavored to warn the country against irredeemable paper; against bank paper, when banks do not pay specie for their own notes; against that miserable, abominable, and fraudulent policy, which attempts to give value to any paper of any bank, one single moment longer than such paper is redeemable on demand in gold and silver. And I wish, most solemnly and earnestly, to repeat that warning. I see danger of that state of things ahead. I SEE IMMINENT DANGER THAT MORE OR FEWER OF THE STATE BANKS WILL STOP SPECIE PAYMENTS. The late measure of the Secretary, and the infatuation with which it seems to be supported, tend directly and strongly to that result. Under pretence, then, of a design to return to a currency which shall be all specie, we are likely to have a currency in which there shall be no specie at all. We are in danger of being overwhelmed with irredeemable paper; mere paper, representing not gold or silver; no, sir, representing nothing but BROKEN PROMISES, BAD FAITH, BANKRUPT CORPORATIONS, CHEATED CREDITORS, AND A RUINED PEOPLE!"

And now, sir, we see the upshot of the experiment. We see around us bankrupt corporations and broken promises; but we see no promises more really and emphatically broken than all those promises of the Administration which gave us assurance of a better currency. These promises, now broken, notoriously and openly broken, if they cannot be performed, ought, at least, to be acknowledged. The Government ought not, in common fairness and common honesty, to deny its own responsibility, seek to escape from the demands of the people, and to hide itself, out of the way and beyond the reach of the process of public opinion, by retreating into this Sub-Treasury system. Let it, at least, come forth; let it bear a part of honesty and candor; let it confess its promises, if it cannot perform them; and, above all, now, even now, at this late hour, let it renounce schemes and projects, the inventions of presumption, and the resorts of desperation, and let it address itself, in all good faith, to the great work of restoring the currency by approved and constitutional means.

But, sir, so far is any such course from all probability of being adopted, so little ground of hope is there that this Sub-Treasury system will be abandoned, that the honorable member from New York has contended and argued in his place, that the public opinion is more favorable to this measure now proposed than to any other which has been suggested. He claims for it the character of a favorite with the people. He makes out this Sub-Treasury plan to be quite high in popular estimation. Certainly, sir, if the honorable member thinks so, he and I see with different eyes, hear with different ears, or gather the means of opinion from different sources. But what is the gentleman's argument? It is this: The two Houses of Congress, he says, reflect the wishes and opinions of the people; and with the two Houses of Congress this system, he supposes, is more acceptable than any other.

Now, sir, with the utmost respect for the two Houses of Congress, and all their members, I must be permitted to express a doubt, and, indeed, a good deal more than a doubt, whether, on this subject, and at the present moment, the two Houses do exactly reflect the opinions and wishes of the people. I should not have adverted to the state of opinion here, compared with the state of public opinion in the country, if the gentleman had not founded an argument on the supposed disposition of the two Houses, and on the fact that they truly set forth the public opinion. But, since he has brought such an argument, it is proper to examine its foundation.

In a general sense, undoubtedly, sir, the members of the two Houses must be understood to represent the sentiments of their constituents, the people of the United States. Their acts bind them, as their representatives, and they must be considered, in a legal sense, as conforming to the will of their constituents. But, owing to the manner of our organization, and to the periods and times of election, it certainly may happen that, at a particular moment, and on a particular subject, opinion out of doors may be one way, while opinion here is another. And how is it now, if we may judge by the usual indications? Does the gentleman hope for no vote, in this body, for this bill, but such as shall be, in his opinion, in strict accordance with the wishes, as generally understood, and most recently expressed in the State from which that vote shall come?

I shall be exceedingly sorry, sir, for instance, to see a vote from Maine given for this bill. I hope I may not. But if there should be such a vote, can the gentleman say that he believes, in his conscience, it will express the wishes of a majority of the people of that State? And so of New Jersey, and one, if not more States in the West. I am quite sure that gentlemen who may give their votes will discharge their duty according to their own enlightened judgments, and they are in no way accountable to me for the manner in which they discharge it; but when the honorable member from New York contends that this body now accurately represents the public opinion on the Sub-Treasury system, we must look at the facts. And with all possible respect for the honorable member, I must even take leave to ask him, whether, in his judgment, he, himself, is truly reflecting the opinions and wishes of a majority of the people of New York, while he is proposing and supporting this bill? Where does he find evidence of the favor of the people of that State towards this measure? Does he find it in the city? In the country? In the recently elected House of Assembly? In the recently elected members of the Senate? Can he name a place—can he lay a venue for the popularity of this measure in the whole State of New York? Between Montauk point and Cattaraugus, and between the mountains of Pennsylvania and the north end of Lake Champlain, can he any where put his finger on the map, and say, here is a spot where the Sub-Treasury is popular? He may find places, no doubt, though they are somewhat scarce, where his friends have been able to maintain their ascendancy, notwithstanding the unpopularity of the measure; but can he find one place, one spot, of any extent, in which this measure of relief is the choice, the favorite, of a majority of the people?

Mr. President, the honorable member has long been in public life, and has witnessed often the changes and fluctuations of political parties and political opinions. And I will ask him what he thinks of the hurricane which swept over New York in the first week of last November? Did he ever know the like? Has he before ever been called on to withstand such a whirlwind? or had he previously any suspicion that such an outbreak in the political elements was at hand? I am persuaded, sir, that he feared such a thing much less than I hoped for it; and my own hopes, although I had hopes, and strong hopes, I must confess, fell far short of the actual result. And to me, Mr. President, it seems perfectly plain, that the cause of this astonishing change in public opinion is to be found, mainly, in the message of September, and the Sub-Treasury bill of the last session. The message, with its anti-social, anti-commercial, anti-popular doctrines and dogmas—the message which set at naught all our own manners and usages, rejected all the teachings of experience, threatened the State institutions, and, anxious only to take good care of the Government, abandoned the people to their fate; the message—the message—it was, that did the great work in New York and elsewhere.

The message was that cave of Eolus, out of which the careering winds issued:

"Una Eurusque notusque ruunt creberque procellis Africus"——

mingling seas and skies, dispersing the most powerful political combinations, and scattering their fragments on the rocks and shores. I might quote the poet further, sir,

"et vastos volvunt ad littora fluctus."

The political deep seemed agitated to the very bottom, and its heaving bosom moved onward and forward the 'vastos fluctus," in nautical phrase, the big rollers of public opinion.

The honorable member may say, or may think, that all this was but the result of a transient impulse, a feverish ebullition, a sudden surprise, or a change superficial, and apparent only, not deep and real. Sir, I cannot say, but I must confess that if the movement in New York last fall was not real, it looked more like reality than any fanciful exhibition which I ever saw. If the people were not in earnest, they certainly had a very sober and earnest way of being in jest.

And now, sir, can the honorable member, can any man say, that in regard to this measure, even the House of Representatives is certain, at this moment, truly to reflect the public judgment? Though nearer to the people than ourselves, and more frequently chosen, yet it is known that the present members were elected, nearly all of them, before the appearance of the message of September. And will the honorable member allow me to ask, whether, if a new election of members of Congress were to take place in his own State, to-morrow, and the newly elected members should take their seats immediately, he should entertain the slightest expectation of the passage of this bill through the House?

Mr. President, in 1834 the honorable member presented to the Senate resolutions of the Legislature of New York, approving the previous course of the Administration in relation to the currency. He then urged strongly, but none too strongly, the weight due to those resolutions, because, he argued, they expressed the undoubted sense of the people, as well as that of the Legislature. He said there was not, at that time, a single member in the popular branch of the Legislature who was not in favor of those resolutions, either from the cities of Hudson, Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Utica, or an almost endless number of incorporated trading towns and villages, or the great city of New York itself, which he justly calls the commercial emporium of the country; all these cities and villages being surrounded, as he most justly said, by an intelligent population; and cities, villages, and country, altogether, comprising near two millions of souls. All this was very well. It was true. The facts were with the honorable member. And although I most exceedingly regretted and deplored that it was so, I could not deny it. And he was entitled to enjoy, and did enjoy, the whole benefit of this respectable support. But, sir, how stands the matter now? What say these two millions of souls to the Sub-Treasury? In the first place, what says the city of New York, that great commercial emporium, worthy the gentleman's commendation in 1834, and worthy of his commendation, and my commendation, and all commendation, at all times? What sentiments, what opinions, what feelings, are proclaimed by the thousands of her merchants, traders, manufacturers, and laborers? What is the united shout of all the voices of all her classes? What is it but that you will put down this new-fangled Sub-Treasury system, alike alien to their interests and their feelings, at once, and forever? What is it, but that in mercy to the mercantile interest, the trading interest, the shipping interest, the manufacturing interest, the laboring class, and all classes, you will give up useless and pernicious political schemes and projects, and return to the plain, straight course of wise and wholesome legislation? The sentiments of the city cannot be misunderstood. A thousand pens and ten thousand tongues, and a spirited press, make them all known. If we have not already heard enough, we shall hear more. Embarrassed, vexed, pressed and distressed, as are her citizens at this moment, yet their resolution is not shaken, their spirit is not broken; and, depend upon it, they will not see their commerce, their business, their prosperity and their happiness, all sacrificed to preposterous schemes and political empiricism, without another, and a yet more vigorous, struggle. And Hudson, and Albany, and Troy, and Schenectady, and Utica—pray, why may not the citizens of these cities have as much weight with the honorable member now, as they justly had in 1834? And does he; can he, doubt of what they think of his bill? Ay, sir, and Rochester, and Batavia, and Buffalo, and the entire western district of the State, does the honorable member suppose that, in the whole of it, he would be able, by careful search, to do more than to find, now and then, so rare a bird, as a single approver of this system?

Mr. President, if this system must come, let it come. If we must bow to it, why, then, put it upon us. Do it. Do it by the power of Congress, and the President. Congress and the President have the power. But spare us, I beseech you, spare the people from the imputation that it is done under clear proof and evidence of their own approbation. Let it not be said it is their choice. Save them, in all mercy, from that reproach.

Sir, I think there is a revolution in public opinion, now going on, whatever may be the opinion of the member from New York, or others. I think the fall elections prove this, and that other more recent events confirm it. I think it is a revolt against the absolute dictation of party, a revolt against coercion, on the public judgment; and, especially, against the adoption of new mischievous expedients on questions of deep public interest; a revolt against the rash and unbridled spirit of change; a revolution, in short, against further revolution. I hope, most sincerely, that this revolution may go on; not, sir, for the sake of men, but for the sake of measures, and for the sake of the country. I wish it to proceed, till the whole country, with an imperative unity of voice, shall call back Congress to the true policy of the Government.

The honorable member from New York is of opinion, sir, that there are only three courses open to us. We must, he urges, either adopt this measure, or return to a system of deposites with the State banks, or establish a National Bank. Now sir, suppose this to be as the gentleman states, then, I say, that either of the others is better than this. I would prefer doing almost any thing, and I would vastly prefer doing nothing, to taking this bill.

I need not conceal my own opinions. I am in favor of a national institution, with such provisions and securities as Congress may think proper, to guard against danger and against abuse. But the honorable member disposes of this at once, by the declaration, that he himself can never consent to a bank, being utterly opposed to it, both on constitutional grounds, and grounds of expediency. The gentleman's opinion, always respected, is certainly of great weight and importance, from the public situation he occupies. But although these are his opinions, is it certain that a majority of the people of the country agree with him in this particular? I think not. I verily believe a majority of the people of the United States are now of the opinion that a National Bank, properly constituted, limited, and guarded, is both constitutional and expedient, and ought now to be established. So far as I can learn, three-fourths of the Western people are for it. Their representatives here can form a better judgment; but such is my opinion upon the best information which I can obtain. The South may be more divided, or may be against a national institution; but, looking again to the centre, the North, and the East, and comprehending the whole in one view, I believe the prevalent sentiment is such as I have stated.

At the last session great pains were taken to obtain a vote of this and the other House against a bank, for the obvious purpose of placing such an institution out of the list of remedies, and so reconciling the people to the Sub-Treasury scheme. Well, sir, and did those votes produce any effect? None at all. The people did not, and do not, care a rush for them. I never have seen, or heard, a single man, who paid the slightest respect to those votes of ours. The honorable member, to-day, opposed as he is to a bank, has not even alluded to them. So entirely vain is it, sir, in this country, to attempt to forestall, commit, or coerce the public judgment. All those resolutions fell perfectly dead on the tables of the two Houses. We may resolve what we please, and resolve it when we please; but if the people do not like it, at their own good pleasure they will rescind it; and they are not likely to continue their approbation long, to any system of measures, however plausible, which terminates in deep disappointment of all their hopes, for their own prosperity.

I have said, sir, that in preference to this bill, I would try some modification of the State bank system; and I will cheerfully do so, although every body knows that I always opposed that system. Still, I think it less objectionable than this. Mr. President, in my opinion, the real source of the evil lies in the tone, and spirit, and general feeling, which have pervaded the Administration for some years past. I verily believe the origin is there. That spirit, I fully believe, has been deeply anti-commercial, and of late decidedly unfriendly to the State institutions. Do the leading presses in favor of the Administration speak its own sentiments? If you think they do, then look at the language and spirit of those presses. Do they not manifest an unceasing and bitter hostility to the mercantile classes, and to the institutions of the States? I certainly never supposed the State banks fit agents for furnishing or regulating a national currency; but I have thought them useful in their proper places. At any rate, the States had power to establish them, and have established them, and we have no right to endeavor to destroy them. How is it, then, that, generally, every leading press which supports the Administration joins in the general cry against these institutions of the States? How is it, if it be not that a spirit hostile to these institutions has come to pervade the Administration itself?

In my opinion, the State banks, on every ground demand other treatment; and the interest of the country requires that they should receive other treatment. The Government has used them, and why should it now not only desert, but abuse them? That some of the selected banks have behaved very unworthy, is no doubt true. The best behavior is not always to be expected from pets. But that the banks, generally, deserved this unrestrained warfare upon them, at the hands of Government, I cannot believe. It appears to me to be both ungrateful and unjust.

The banks, sir, are now making an effort, which I hope may be successful, to resume specie payments. The process of resumption works, and must work, with severity upon the country. Yet I most earnestly hope the banks may be able to accomplish the object. But, in all this effort, they get no aid from Government, no succor from Government, not even a kind word from Government. They get nothing but denunciation and abuse. They work alone, and therefore the attainment of the end is the more difficult. They hope to reach that end only, or mainly by reduction and curtailment. If, by these means, payment in specie can be resumed and maintained, the result will prove the existence of great solidity, both of the banks and of the mercantile classes. The Bank of England did not accomplish resumption by curtailment alone. She had the direct aid of Government. And the banks of the United States, in 1816, did not rely on curtailment, alone. They had the aid of the then new created Bank of the United States, and all the countenance, assistance, and friendly support which the Government could give them. Still, I would not discourage the efforts of the banks. I trust they will succeed, and that they will resume specie payments at the earliest practicable moment; but it is, at the same time, my full conviction, that, by another and a better course of public policy, the Government might most materially assist the banks to bring about resumption, and that, by Government aid, it might be brought about with infinitely less of public inconvenience and individual distress.

For an easy resumption of specie payments, there is mainly wanted a revival of trust, the restoration of confidence, and a harmonious action, between the Government and the moneyed institutions of the country. But, instead of efforts to inspire trust and create confidence, we see and hear nothing but denunciation; instead of harmonious action, we find nothing but unrelenting hostility.

Mr. President, you and I were in Congress, in 1816, during the time of the suspension of specie payments by the banks. What was the spirit of the Government at that time, sir? Was it hostile, acrimonious, belligerant towards the State institutions? Did it look on them only to frown? Did it touch them only to distress? Did it put them all under the scourge? You know, sir, it was far otherwise. You know that the Secretary of that day entered into friendly correspondence with them, and assisted them that he would second their efforts for resumption by all the means in his power. You know, sir, that, in fact, he did render most essential aid. And do you see, sir, any similar effort now? Do you behold, in the bill before us, any thing of the spirit or the policy of Mr. Madison, on an occasion very like the present. Mr. Madison was a man of such subdued self-respect, that he was willing to yield to experience and to the opinion of his country; a man, too, of so much wisdom and true patriotism, that nothing was allowed to stand between him, and his clear perception of the public good. Do you see, sir, any thing of this spirit, of the wisdom, of the mild, and healing, and restoring policy of Mr. Madison in this measure? Another illustrious man, now numbered with the dead, was then with us, and was acting an important part in the councils of the country. I mean Mr. Lowndes; a man not deficient in force and genius, but still more distinguished for that large and comprehensive view of things which is more necessary to make great men, and is also much rarer than mere positive talent; and for an impartial, well-balanced judgment, which kept him free from prejudice and error, and which gave great and just influence to all his opinions. Do you see, sir, any thing of the spirit, the temper, the cool judgment, or the long-sighted policy of Mr. Lowndes in all that is now before us? And Mr. Crawford, then at the head of the Treasury, arduously striving to restore the finances, to re-establish both public and private credit, and to place the currency, once more, upon its safe and proper foundation; do you see, sir, the marks of Mr. Crawford's hands in the measure now presented for our approbation?

Mr. President, I have little to say of the subordinate provisions of this bill, of the receivers-general, or of the dangerous power given to the Secretary, of investing the public money in State stocks of his own selection. My opposition to the bill is to the whole of it. It is general, uncompromising, and decided. I oppose all its ends, objects, and purposes; I oppose all its means, its inventions, and its contrivances. I am opposed to the separation of Government and People; I am opposed, now and at all times, to an exclusive metallic currency; I am opposed to the spirit in which the measure originates, and to all and every emanation and ebullition of that spirit. I solemnly declare that, in thus studying our own safety, and renouncing all care over the general currency, we are, in my opinion, abandoning one of the plainest and most important of our constitutional duties. If, sir, we were, at this moment, at war with a powerful enemy, and if his fleets and armies were now ravaging our shores, and it were proposed in Congress to take care of ourselves, to defend the Capitol, and abandon the country to its fate, it would be, certainly, a more striking, a more flagrant and daring, but, in my judgment, not a more clear and manifest dereliction of duty than we commit in this open and professed abandonment of our constitutional power and constitutional duty, over the great interest of the national currency. I mean to maintain that constitutional power, and that constitutional duty, to the last. It shall not be with my consent that our ancient policy shall be overturned. It shall not be with my consent that the country shall be plunged further and further into the unfathomed depths of new expedients.

It shall not be, without a vote of remonstrance from me, that one great and important purpose for which this Government was framed, shall now be surrendered and abandoned forever.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES, OF VIRGINIA,

In Senate, February 5 and 6—In opposition to the Sub-Treasury bill, and in support of his substitute.

MR. PRESIDENT: It would have been very gratifying to me if I had found the measure now under consideration such a one as I could conscientiously support. The question is one which every interest of the nation requires should be settled—promptly but wisely settled. It is time that the country were relieved from those anxieties and apprehensions in regard to the future, which, added to the embarrassments of the present, weigh like an incubus upon the national enterprise, and palsy all its faculties. I should have been most happy, therefore, if I could have seen in the measure recommended by the Committee on Finance, any of those healing and salutary tendencies which the circumstances of the times and the situation of the country so imperiously demand. I had hoped, indeed, at one time, that such a measure would have been presented to us. The President, in his Message to Congress at the commencement of the present session, while renewing the expression of his own opinions in favor of the financial project of the late called session, very properly invited the consideration of Congress to the manifestations of public sentiment which had, since then, taken place; and recognising "the national will as the supreme law of the Republic," plainly intimated that a measure which had proved unacceptable to the people, ought not to be again pressed on their adoption. I had hoped that the Committee on Finance, concurring in this Republican sentiment of the Chief Magistrate, and in the presence of the manifestations which the recent elections in the North and the South, the East and the West, had afforded of the national repugnance to the measure of the late session, would, in the resources of their wisdom and acknowledged abilities, have presented us some other, on which we might have rallied with more harmonious opinions. I am sorry to say that, in the examination of the bill on your table, I have found nothing to justify or sustain this hope. It is, in every essential respect, a reproduction of the condemned measure of the late session, with some superadded features, which only seem to aggravate its deformity and increase its dangers. It commits, as that did, the millions of public treasure to the hazardous and demoralizing possession of Executive agents; it levies that treasure from the pockets of the people, after a short period, in gold and silver only; it then disposes those collections in masses at a few important commercial points, to serve as a basis of operations, which must inevitably terminate in a great Government bank; and to take charge of and manage this machinery, it institutes a new corps of Executive officers, whose very name (Receivers General) calls up, by an indissoluble association, the extravagance, the peculation, the clumsy magnificence of that blasted and unwieldly system of French finance, which is the acknowledged prototype of this new scheme.

I propose, Mr. President, in as brief and rapid a manner as possible, to pass in review the principal points of this new financial project. Its fundamental and vital principle is to collect the public revenue in gold and silver only, out of a circulation consisting exclusively now, and mainly at all times, of bank paper for the common uses of the people. Of this invidious discrimination between the money of the Government and the money of the people, and its anti-republican and injurious tendencies, I had an opportunity of stating my views very fully during the late session of Congress. It was the subject of very thorough discussion on both sides, at that time; and for one I am perfectly content to abide the verdict of public opinion on the arguments, on the one side and the other, then presented. It was shown, in my judgment, most conclusively, that the effect of this principle would be permanently to create two currencies in the country—one, and that the "better" one, for the Government; another, the inferior, one, for the people—that it would thus separate the interests of the governors from those of the governed, destroying that bond of sympathy and common feeling between them, which is the best, if not the only, security for a sound administration of public affairs—that it would indefinitely protract the present derangement of the currency, and deliver it over finally to a state of hopeless and irremediable disorder—and that its operation upon the institutions of the States would be of the most hostile and destructive character. I should not now recur to those topics, having heretofore discussed them very fully, but that the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] has thought proper again to argue them, and I must say, with all his ingenuity, has failed. In my estimation, to shake a single position maintained by the opponents of this bill. It has been fashionable to denounce these objections as mere ad captandum arguments; but, sir, have they been answered? Can they be answered, otherwise than by returning epithets for arguments?

That the measure would establish a distinction, an odious distinction, between the currency of the Government and the currency of the people, cannot be denied, for such is the positive provision of the bill. It expressly requires, that after a certain time, the Government shall receive, in discharge of the public dues, and to pay its officers and other creditors, nothing but gold and silver, or its own paper, while the common currency in which the people transact their dealings, would still remain bank paper. The fact, then, is undeniable. But it is intimated that there is nothing wrong in this; and we who oppose it are asked if we would have the Government, in the present condition of things, for example, to receive its revenue in the various spurious substitutes for money, which now form so large a portion of the actual circulation of the country. The answer, sir, costs me no embarrassment. I say, no; but this is precisely a case in which the exception proves the rule. The present is a temporary and accidental state of things; and the refusal of the Government, under existing circumstances, to receive the degraded currency of the times in payment of the public revenue, so far from being founded on any permanent distinction between the currency of the Government and the currency of the people, is intended to do away that distinction, and to provide a sound convertible currency for the common use of both Government and people—for the joint resolution of 1816, which is still the law of the land, expressly declares that when the banks shall resume specie payments, and thus provide the people with a sound convertible currency, that currency shall be equally receivable by the Government in discharge of its dues. But the bill of the honorable Senator contemplates no such thing. It rejects the paper of the banks inexorably, under all circumstances whatever—even though convertible instantly into specie. It will have for the Government nothing but gold and silver, or its own paper. It demands, with Shylock severity, its "pound of flesh," and that, too, without the condition of humanity imposed on the Venitian Jew, "not to spill a drop of Christian blood" in the exaction.

The honorable Senator from New York seems, however, to have persuaded himself that the requisition of gold and silver in payment of the public dues would improve the general currency, by bringing into circulation a larger portion of the precious metals. But, sir, how can this be? It was shown, in the discussions of the late session of Congress, that when there are two currencies in a country, one answering all the purposes of the other, and a valuable purpose besides, that which answers the additional purpose would be at a premium, and, being so, would not enter into general circulation, but be bought and sold as an article of merchandise. According to this law of currency, it would follow, under the operation of the proposed system, that gold and silver only being applicable to revenue payments, they would, in general, command a premium, and would, consequently, be withdrawn from general circulation. They would be sold by the broker to the public debtor, who would pay them to the Government; by the Government they would be paid out to the public creditor, and the public creditor would go and sell them again to the broker. This would be the narrow and charmed circle of their movement. They could never enter into the general circulation under such circumstances; nor, indeed, under any circumstances, (as has been amply shown on another occasion,) without a previous suppression of the smaller denominations of bank notes, for which this bill contains no provisions.

The honorable Senator also argues that this policy would tend to secure soundness in the paper portion of the currency, by checking over-issues of the banks. But, instead of contributing to the soundness of the paper currency, it would necessarily increase its insecurity. The great source of insecurity in the banking system at present, as is well known, is the danger of a suspension of specie payments arising from a foreign drain of the precious metals. But this measure would superadd to the foreign and internal drain of specie, to be locked up in the vaults of the Government; and, from the nature of things, this internal and external drain would occur at the same moment, and exert together their destructive influence upon the banks. It would be in years of heavy importations that the balance of trade turning against the country, the foreign drain would be most sensibly felt; and it would be precisely under such circumstances that the demand for specie to pay the duties on these importations being greatly augmented, the internal drain would operate also with most severity. How, then, can the honorable Senator imagine that the security of the paper currency supplied by the banks is to be increased by exposing them to a double pressure, from within and from without, at so critical a moment?

In regard to the hostile operation of this measure on the State currencies and the credit institutions of the States, the honorable Senator has taken up the subject in far too narrow a point of view. He spoke as if the whole matter of complaint, in this respect, consisted in withholding the deposites of the public money from the banks. But, sir, the gist of the question does not lie here. This is a matter in which the convenience and the safety of the Government itself are concerned far more than any interest of the banks generally, or of the States by which they are created. The real grievance is in the stern exclusion by law of the sound convertible currencies of the States from all transactions of the Federal Government, (transactions in which they have been heretofore invariably admitted, from the origin of the Government to the present day,) the official discredit and protest, in advance, thus stamped upon those currencies by the unfriendly action of this Government, giving the signal for general distrust and want of confidence in regard to them. Sir, it will be no difficult matter to show that, under the blight of this legislative denunciation, and in the progressive working of the system now proposed, the State currencies will be finally broken down, and a National Government paper currency, resting on the same principles of our old continental money, be made to take their place. But the Senator from New York tells us that the State currencies will enjoy as much favor under the new policy as they did under the regime of the United States Bank; that that institution very rarely received the notes of the State banks in collection of the public revenue, and, when it did so, it promptly returned them for conversion into specie. I certainly had not expected, Mr. President, that the Bank of the United States would be held up, from that quarter, as a model for imitation, in regard to its policy toward the State institutions. But the Senator is mistaken in what he says of the course of that institution, and it will appear that even its policy was one of far more liberality toward the State institutions than that which the honorable Senator himself now proposes. It is officially stated in the triennial report of the president of that institution to the stockholders, in September, 1831, that the Bank of the United States was in the practice of "receiving freely the notes of the State banks, within convenient reach of the bank and its branches;" and this free reception of the notes of the State banks, and periodical "settlement of accounts" with them, were the boasted means on which that institution relied to regulate and perserve the soundness of the general currency of the country. It is farther shown, by the answer of that officer to certain interrogatories propounded to him by the Committee on Finance of this body, in March, 1830, that though frequent "settlements of accounts" were made by the Bank of the United States with the State banks, they were "rarely forced to pay specie" to any considerable amount for their notes, but payment was taken in their bills of exchange, or balances permitted to lie over, until melted down in the ordinary course of their business and mutual transactions. This statement is sustained, through a series of years, by the annual returns of the bank to Congress, exhibiting generally large balances due to it from the State banks. But, sir, even though the course of the United States Bank had been as unfriendly toward the State institutions as the gentleman from New York supposes, the law of the land, the legislation of Congress, made no attack on them, as is now proposed. On the country, their credit was cherished and sustained by the law; for the joint resolution of 1816 expressly declared that their notes, when convertible on demand into specie, should be receivable, equally with specie, in payment of public dues. This is the important consideration; for, in the law in the policy and language of the Government, abides mainly that principle of confidence on which all paper currency rests, and which is now proposed to be rudely withdrawn from the currencies of the States, however unquestionable their soundness and value.

But, Mr. President, without dwelling farther on these considerations, I beg leave to ask gentlemen who are so zealously patronizing the policy of this measure, if they can adduce to us, from ancient or modern times, from civilized or even barbarous communities, a solitary example of a Government demanding and collecting its revenue in a currency different from the common, actual currency of the country. If there be any such, it has escaped my researches. In countries where the public revenue may have been, or may now be, collected in gold and silver, it will be found that gold and silver constitute the common, actual currency of the people. Even in England and France, where the circulation consists in so large a proportion of the precious metals, the revenue payments are by no means confined to gold and silver; but bank notes are freely received in both, in discharge of the Government dues. It is, indeed, a fundamental maxim of taxation, laid down by all writers on political economy,* and respected in the practice of all Governments, that the mode of payment of the public contributions ought to be that most consistent with the convenience of the payers—the great body of the community. Is it reserved for the Government of the United States, in its theory the most popular on earth, and claiming the merit of the closest sympathy with the wants and interests of the people, to set the first example of a departure from this just and benignant rule of policy? and for what reason—for what purpose? I think I have shown that none of the great interests of the country are to be promoted by it. It may, it is true, be quite agreeable to the office holders, and other recipients of the bounty of the Government, to obtain their emoluments in a "better currency than the common currency of the people; but surely this will be held no legitimate consideration for legislators and statesmen. What end, then, is to be answered? what object to be promoted by the introduction of this anomaly in the history of legislation? Is it to carry out some theoretical dogma—some mere commonplace of party? Is it, in short, to satisfy the notions couched and propagated under the well-sounding phrase, constitutional currency?

I ask, then, what is meant by this phrase? Is it meant that no other currency is constitutional but gold and silver? If so, I deny the proposition. Bank notes, as currency, are as constitutional as gold and silver. The Constitution, it is true, declares that "no State shall make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." This was intended to establish an ultimate standard of value for the adjustment of contracts, where the parties choose to insist on the strictness of legal rights; but not to prevent the States from authorizing convertible representatives of that value to be used as currency, or a common medium of exchange and circulation, in the ordinary business of life. On the contrary, these representatives, in the shape of bank notes, were known and used as currency, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and nothing in that instrument prohibits them—the States have, constantly since, been in the habit of creating corporations, authorized to issue and circulate them—the power, thus exercised by the States, has been invariably acquiesced in and recognised by the General Government—and recently it has been determined by the solemn and unanimous judgment of the highest judicial tribunal in the country, (in the case of Briscoe vs. the Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky) that the States rightfully and constitutionally possess the power. I say, it was unanimously so decided by the Supreme Court, because, although a minority of that Court were of opinion that, where the State owned the entire stock of the bank, the exercise of the power would be an infringement of the constitutional prohibition on the States "to emit bills of credit," yet all the judges concurred that the authority of the States was unquestionable where the stock of the banks was owned either by individuals entirely, or by them in common with the State as a partial stockholder. State bank notes, then, being issued in pursuance of an unquestionable constitutional authority, are a constitutional currency, as well as gold and silver. It is true, a creditor cannot be compelled to accept payment of his debt in bank notes, if he object to do so; but this does not affect their character as currency as a common medium of exchange and circulation, or prevent a payment in bank notes from being a final and complete discharge of the debt, if accepted.

But, perhaps, by this oft repeated phrase, it is meant to be implied that there is some special constitutional obligation on the Government to demand its dues in gold and silver. There is as little foundation, however, for this notion as for that which I have just exposed. The Government is like every other creditor. It has the power, as every individual creditor has, (if it chooses wantonly to exert it, and to recur to the rigor of strict right,) to insist on the payment of its dues in gold and silver; but, as an individual creditor also, it may waive its strict right, the sternness of the summum jus, (which, we are told, is most frequently summa injuria,) and receive its dues in the same medium which individuals and the people, by common consent, use for the adjustment of their transactions. This it has done, from the adoption of the Constitution to the present day, and never, heretofore, with any question of the constitutionality of the procedure. It not only has the constitutional power which every other creditor has, to waive the strictness of its right in this respect, but it is especially incumbent on it, as the common agent of the people, guided by that fundamental and benignant maxim of taxation to which I have already adverted, to waive an extreme right which, in its exercise, would so seriously affect the convenience of its constituents—the great body of the people.

We must not, then, be led away, under the dominion of well-sounding phrases, of plausible or pompous commonplaces, to disregard the real interests of the country. As legislators and statesmen, we must emancipate our minds from the delusive authority of mere dogmas, and look to the consequences of our actions, the practical effects of our measures. If we trace this requisition of specie for the public dues in its effects on the actual business of society, we shall find that it is calculated to convulse the whole monetary system of the country, and to keep it in a state of ceaseless and distressing commotion. Under the operation of the banking system as it exists in this country, specie is to be regarded not so much a part of the currency as the basis or source of a far larger portion. For every dollar of hard money that is taken from the banks, four or five times its amount is withdrawn in another form from the actual circulation of the country. Bearing this in mind, let us see how the proposed system would work. In years of abundant importation, the circulation of the seaports being insufficient to furnish the requisite sums of specie to pay the duties, large amounts would be drawn from the South and West to meet the demands of the custom-house in the North and the East. The sections, thus stripped of their specie, would be, all at once, subjected to the greatest of all calamities in a pecuniary point of view—that of a deficient circulation, suddenly contracted, not in the ratio, merely, of the specie removed, but of four or five times its amount; for to that extent would the banks be compelled to call in their circulation, in order to meet the drafts upon them for the precious metals. Under this desolating process, the prices of property would be struck down, the relation of debtor and creditor violently disturbed, and every branch of industry paralyzed and withered. On the other hand, when the land sales became active, the current would be reversed, large masses of specie would be drawn from the North and the East to the South and the West, attended with the same distressing effets on the trade and industry of the country, and only shifting the theatre of their disastrous operation. What could result from this perpetual dragging, to and fro, of the specie of the country, contrary to the natural lawe of trade, and in obedience only to arbitrary governmental regulations, but incessant throes and convulsions in the whole system of its business and currency?

It would be some compensation, in a national point of view, if the specie, of which different portions of the country would, in their turn, be stripped, under the operation of this new system, were restored to active and beneficial use in those sections to which it would be transferred. But would this be the case? No, sir. The whole surplus, beyond the current disbursement of the Government, would rest in barren and unproductive idleness, in the "vaults and iron safes" of your Sub-Treasuries. It would be an annihilation of so much of the national capital, susceptible of multiplication, through conventional substitutes, to four times its nominal amount, and capable of fructifying and sustaining the national industry to a corresponding extent. I must confess, Mr. President, that this monopoly and hoarding of the precious metals by the Government does seem to me unworthy of the age in which we live. We may find examples of it among the nations of antiquity. But their circumstances were very different from ours. They were engaged in frequent wars, and they accumulated their treasure, in advance, as a provision for those national emergencies, always with them more or less near at hand. It may also deserve consideration whether the practice which prevailed among them of hoarding the public treasure was not the cause, fully as much as the effect, of the frequency of their wars; for the relief to industry from unlocking those vast hoards in time of war may well be conceived to have rendered the occurrence of war no unwelcome event to their crowded populations. If we descend to modern times, we find no instance of this national hoarding, but among rude and uncivilized communities—the Barbary Powers or the Tartar tribes, for example. The Dey of Algiers is said to have been the master of a large hoard of accumulated treasure, when he was expelled from his dominions by the French. So, also, was Mazeppa, the celebrated Cossack chieftain, the untutored ally of Charles the Twelfth. But, surely, we are not going to the banks of the Dnieper; or the shores of Africa, for lessons in policy and legislation. We shall not thus, I humbly trust, dishonor the spirit of the age, belie the genius of our free institutions, and mar the destinies of our great and glorious country.

But there are other aspects of this measure even more dangerous and alarming. In the remarks I had the honor to submit to the Senate, at the late session, I said that this scheme had a squinting, 'an awful squinting" towards a Treasury Bank. It now has that character boldly planted on its front. It is, to all intents and purposes, a great Government Bank; and of this I persuade myself I shall be able to satisfy every gentleman who will do me the honor to accompany me in the analysis I propose to make of its composition. In the first place, the national revenue, collected in gold and silver, is to be disposed of in masses at certain leading points, designated by their importance in a commercial, financial, or political view. The bill directs that there shall be a great central depot of it in the new Treasury building here, another depot in the mint at Philadelphia, a third in the branch mint at New Orleans, and four other similar depots of the national treasure, in gold and silver, at New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis. Buildings are to be erected (where they do not already exist) for the reception and security of these funds, fitted up with vaults, safes, and all the usual appendages of a banking establishment. The Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury are to preside, particularly over the central establishment here—the Treasurer of the mint and branch mint over the establishment in Philadelphia and New Orleans, and four Receivers General, with their clerks and assistants, over those of New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis. Thus you have the funds or capital to operate on placed in position at suitable points, and a complete organization of officers to manage and administer these funds. Nothing but the plastic hand of the Secretary of the Treasury will be wanting to mould these materials into a bank, and to give motion and direction to the machine. How will it be done? The modus operandi will be perfectly natural and simple.

The Government funds, compared with the disbursements to be made, will be in excess in some places, while they will be deficient in others. They must then be transferred from one place of deposite to another. This will hardly ever, it is to be presumed, be done by an actual transportation of specie. It will, doubtless, be generally done by the ordinary commercial means of drafts and bills of exchange. The bill most sedulously gives to the Secretary of the Treasury an unlimited discretionary authority to make and order these transfers from one place of deposite to another, and from one individual depositary to another. At a place, therefore, where the Government funds are in excess, and he wishes to transfer a portion of them to some other place where they are deficient, he will naturally direct a draft or bill of exchange on the latter place to be bought, paying for it out of the specie accumulated in excess at the place of the negotiation. On the other hand, when he wishes to draw funds from a distant place, where they are in excess, to a place where they are deficient, a bill on the former place will be sold, and the money received for it added to the deficient funds at the place of the negotiation. The officers of the Government thus operating on the public funds under this system, would become habitual dealers in exchange—a regular and acknowledged branch of the business of banking. In the exercise of these functions, the accommodation of individuals would come to be fully as much consulted as the wants of the Government. The Receiver General at St. Louis, for example, having an excess of the public moneys in his hands, and instructed to transfer that excess to the Sub-Treasury at New York, would naturally do so by buying drafts of merchants or other individuals on the latter place. But in this application of the public money to the purchase of drafts, what an endless field would there be for undue favors to individuals, as well in discriminating among those who might have drafts to sell, as in adjusting the price and other terms of the purchase. So, likewise, if we suppose the Receiver General at New York authorized to draw a surplus of public moneys from St. Louis, he would do so by selling drafts on the Receiver General at St. Louis; and, in this operation of selling, there would be nearly the same danger of abuse, and of the influence of personal consideration, as I have just shown to exist in that of buying exchange.

It is also very easy to perceive that, under the forms of buying selling bills of exchange by Government officers, real loans to individuals may be couched. If I buy, for example, a bill of exchange which has sixty or ninety days to run, and pay for it in cash, as I suppose to be done in the case, put above, of a receiver general purchasing bills to transfer an excess of public moneys in his hands, what is this, in fact, but a loan of money to be returned at the end of sixty or ninety days, at some other place, where the Government wants it? It is, indeed, except as to place, the ordinary form of discounting mercantile paper. In like manner, the sale of a bill of exchange, to be paid for at a future day, is a very convenient medium of a real loan. The purchaser immediately sells the bill he has bought, realizes it in money, the use of which he enjoys for the stipulated period, and then returns it with the rate of profit profit agreed upon in the nominal purchase. The transaction is, to every practical intent, a loan; and professional gentlemen, conversant with the devices practised to evade the statutes against usury, will tell you that nothing is more common than to make a real loan under this very form of selling a bill of exchange. We see, then, that the officers of the Treasury, under the organization provided by this bill, would not only be engaged in buying and selling bills of exchange, but they would have the power of discounting mercantile paper and making real loans. Thus the bill creates, in effect, a bank of discount.

It would, moreover, be a bank of deposite, for the 27th section of the bill expressly authorizes individuals to deposite money in the "Treasury, or at such other points as the Treasurer may designate," the receipts for which, it is declared, shall be current in the several land offices as cash. This, I am aware, is but a special and limited provision, confined at present to payments in advance for public lands. But the principle, being once introduced, will, from time to time, be extended to other cases. I shall hereafter have occasion to show that President Jackson, when he suggested the idea of a Government bank, of which this bill seems to be the development, expressly recommended that it should be based upon individual as well as the public deposites.

The organization instituted by this bill would also be a bank of circulation, for the drafts, receipts, and other paper authorized to be issued by the officers of the Treasury, under the provisions of the bill, would form a part of the actual currency and circulation of the country. That it is designed, through the medium of this machinery, to issue permanently a Government paper currency, under some form or other, is sufficiently evinced by the alternative clause of the bill relating to receipts and payments by the Government, which requires that all such receipts and payments, after a certain period, shall be in gold or silver, "or in notes, bills, or paper issued under the authority of the United States." The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] the patron and champion of this bill, and the author of the provision just referred to, is known to advocate a paper currency of that description, issued and resting exclusively on the credit of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, too, in his report on the finances, at the commencement of the present session, does not hesitate to ask Congress for the permanent grant of an authority to issue Treasury notes, (at his discretion, within a certain limit,) according to the varying wants of the Treasury. But the design of supplying a paper medium for general circulation, through the fiscal action of the Government, is more fully developed in the annual report of that officer at the last session, and from that document I beg leave to read to the Senate a few significant extracts:

"Should Congress, says the Secretary, "determine that it is proper to furnish, by its own authority, and for the purposes before mentioned, some paper medium of higher character, and other than what now exists in private bills of exchange, or notes of State banks, no doubt exists that any benefits which may occasionally be derived from its employment can be readily secured, without treading on the debateable ground of either the power or the policy of chartering a National Bank. Certificates, not on interest, but payable in specie to bearer or order, as well as being receivable for all public dues, could be authorized to be given in payment to the public creditor, whenever prefered by him, and sufficient specie existed in the Treasury. This kind of paper would be very convenient in form, and would differ little from the drafts now in use on banks, except being drawn on a known specie fund, and expressing on its face not only this, but its being receivable, in the first instance, for all public dues. It would possess the highest credit attainable in society." "The common drafts of this Department, in the present convenient form, possess one advantage, which could be imparted to the certificates. When used at places against which the balance of trade exists, but drawn on places in whose favor it is, the former do now, and may hereafter, not only facilitate essentially the domestic exchanges, but, at the same time, supersede numerous bank transfers, and the more expensive transportation of specie itself."

* Smith's Wealth of Nations, book v, chap. ii.

"The Mint certificates, heretofore given on the deposite of bullion and specie for coinage, might be easily made running to bearer or order, and receivable for all public dues; and, in that way, would contribute to the same desirable ends."

"It must be obvious that the paper of any bank would be less safe and useful in being received for public dues, in proportion as it may want such solid securities and foundations as the certificates before described."

My purpose is not now to discuss the supposed advantages of this Government paper currency, so much lauded by the Secretary. The great recommendation of it, in his eyes, is that it would rest upon a specie basis co-extensive with the issues. But as the certificates would be rarely returned for redemption, nothing would be more likely to happen than what occurred in the case of the Bank of Amsterdam: that, in the mean time, large portions of the specie would be withdrawn and diverted to other purposes. But my intention was simply to show that an issue of a Government paper currency, in some form or other, is one of the main objects of this new financial scheme. In looking at the passages above quoted, and others of similar import in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is impossible to wink so hard as not to see that the design is to supply a paper medium, through the fiscal operations of this Government, which, it is hoped, would ultimately supersede the State currencies; and the organization proposed in this bill is the instrument by which that design is to be accomplished. That it would be a bank of circulation is unquestionable; and I have already shown that it would be a bank both of discount and deposite.

The Secretary of the Treasury, however, seems to think there would be no Bank in all this, because there would be no incorporation. But incorporation is not necessary to constitute a bank, which derives its character wholly from the nature of its business and functions. The Government bank of Russia is not incorporated; neither is the Government bank of Austria. They are both constituted of and managed by officers of the Government, precisely as the machinery created by this bill is proposed to be managed and directed. So in regard to the private and joint stock banks of England. They are not incorporated; but nobody ever supposed them to be the less banks on that account. Some thirteen or fourteen years ago, the celebrated Mr. Ricardo proposed the plan of "a National Bank" in England, which, among other things, was to have the exclusive privilege of issuing the whole paper currency of the kingdom. It was to be a Government institution, consisting of five commissioners, residing in London, to be appointed by the Crown and removable by Parliament, and to be assisted by agents and officers established in the leading country towns. The plan of this bill bears, in some respects, so close a resemblance to that of Mr. Ricardo, that it is difficult to resist the impression that the one must have suggested the other. The organization proposed by Mr. Ricardo consisted, like that of this bill, of public officers, having certain duties and functions assigned to them, connected with the collection and management of the public revenue, as well as with the issue of a paper currency. No act of incorporation was proposed or deemed necessary; but he did not, on that account, the less consider his scheme a "National Bank," under which name it was expressly presented to his countrymen.

But there is another authority on this head still more in point. It remounts to the first suggestion ever made in this country of a Government or Treasury Bank, I allude, of course, to President Jackson, who, in his first annual message to Congress, (1829,) threw out the idea of a Bank, founded on the "credit and resources of the United States." This suggestion became the subject of very able and elaborate examination by the Committees on Finance, in this and the other House, by both of which, though consisting of warm friends of the President, the suggestion was repudiated and exploded. The President, in his Message at the commencement of the following session of Congress, (December, 1830,) thought proper to recur to the subject, and to define more precisely what he meant by a Bank founded on "the credit and resources of the United States." The scheme he then brought forward was identical, in every respect, with that contained in the present bill; and yet, with the soldierly frankness which characterized him, he did not hesitate to call it by its proper name—"a Bank of the United States." Let us see what he said on that occasion:

"In the spirit of compromise and improvement which distinguished our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present Bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections. It is thought practicable to organize such a Bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposites, (without power to make loans or purchase property,) which shall remit the funds of the Government, and the expenses of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals, at a moderate premium, &c. &c. In times of public emergency, the capacities of such an institution might be enlarged by legislative provisions."

The bank which General Jackson proposed was to be organized, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, to be based on the public and individual deposites, to remit the funds of the Government, and to deal in bills of exchange. The organization provided by the bill under consideration, is to possess every one of these attributes, and to perform other banking functions in addition, such as the issue of paper, which was not then contemplated. Yet, while the former plan was boldly avowed to be a bank, this is denied to be one. Gen. Jackson, with all his popularity and energy of purpose, was not able to commend his plan to the favor of the country, and even his volonte de fer, (iron will) as it was called by a foreign representative, on a memorable occasion, obeying the great law of Republicanism, bent beneath the force of public opinion, and abandoned the scheme. Yet the same scheme is now re-produced, amid the confusion of the times, in an aggravated form, but without the name.

It is a remarkable circumstance, Mr. President, that the most ancient and celebrated banking institutions of Europe have grown up from precisely such beginnings as are contained in this bill. The Bank of Venice, for example, the oldest and most celebrated bank in Europe, commenced as a fiscal institution. The Republic, pressed by its foreign wars, was compelled to resort to a forced loan. In order to secure the payment of the interest on this loan, it set apart certain branches of the public revenue, and instituted a board of commissioners called the Chamber of Loans, who were charged with the collection and management of those branches of the revenue, and the application of their proceeds to the punctual payment of the interest on the loan. In the transaction of the business confided to them, they had occasion sometimes to buy and sell bills of exchange, as I have shown the officers of the Treasury, under the organization of this bill, would do. Having frequently surplus funds on hand, they began at length to employ them more extensively in the operation of buying and selling exchange, and under this power actually advanced money on mercantile paper, or, in other words, became a bank of discount. The credit and responsibility of the institution being established, the merchants of Venice began to make use of it for the safe-keeping of their funds, and so it became a bank of deposite also. Finally, a credit on the books of the institution for money deposited being equivalent to cash, payments in the course of trade came to be made by transfers of these credits from one to another, or by what are now called checks, which performed the office, and preceded the introduction of notes, and so the Chamber of Loans became also a bank of circulation. We see, in this example, by what natural and easy gradations the most celebrated banking institution in Europe, that which has been the model of all the rest, grew out of the simple function of collecting and applying the public revenue, associating to itself a collateral and incidental action in the commerce and currency of the country; all of which functions, I have shown, are to be vested by the new financial scheme in the officers of the Treasury Department.

The same, in every material respect, were the origin and progress of the Bank of Genoa; which, next to that of Venice, was the oldest, and, in its day, the most accredited, banking institution in Europe. In England, too, the mint, at one time, in being made the depository of the funds of individuals, as the Secretary of the Treasury proposes that our mint and its branches should be, became virtually a bank—"the great centre of money transactions and remittances for England and foreign nations," till Charles I, in 1640, impelled by his necessities, violated the private funds deposited there, and "happily," as Burke says, put an end to both its credit and use as a banking establishment.

The testimony of history, then, as well as the nature of things, proves that the organization instituted by this bill would work as a great Government bank—buying and selling exchanges—under that form, at least, discounting mercantile paper, receiving deposites, public and private, and circulating a paper money of its own. Now, I appeal to every friend of the liberties of his country, and ask him if he would willingly see so formidable a union of the moneyed and political power consummated in the hands of the Government. Will he put so potent an engine, an instrument so efficacious of operating on the hopes and fears of men, of enlisting their interests, of controlling their fortunes, into the hands of a department of the Government, already armed with a patronage and power of fearful extent?

The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] in a portion of his remarks which seemed to be intended especially for the benefit of those of us who are still for employing the State banks as depositories, and whom he describes as a very small fraction, said that the real and only alternative before the country is the Sub-Treasury scheme or a National Bank. Now, sir, unless the observations I have made on the practical operation of the Sub-Treasury of the Sub-Treasury scheme are founded in the grossest delusion, that scheme, instead of being antagonistical to a National Bank, is, in every respect, identical with it. It would be a National Bank under the worst possible form—a National Bank in the hands of the Executive, controlled and managed exclusively by Executive agents. If, then, the honorable Senator will insist upon making up an issue, to which the ghost of that thrice slain monster, the Bank of the United States, must be a party, he must mend his pleadings, according to the real state of the case, and submit to the country this question: Will you have a great Government Bank in the hands and under the control of Executive officers, or will you have an incorporated National Bank, designed to be a business concern, and not a political engine? When this issue shall be presented, if, indeed, it ever shall be, let me tell the honorable Senator that there are those whose opposition to a National Bank is as true as his, or that of any other man, who would pause long before they would permit the terror of any alternative to drive them into the support of a scheme like that of the honorable Senator, which they believe to be fraught with the most serious danger to the liberties, and certain destruction to the best interests of their country. I shall hereafter endeavor to show that the true and only means of averting either an incorporated National Bank or a great Government Bank is to sustain the State institutions, and to employ their agency, with such modifications and securities as experience may have shown to either necessary or desirable.

I wish, however, for the present to pursue the remarks which the honorable Senator, with "so much charity," to use his own expressions, addressed to that small fraction of erring and obstinate brethren, sometimes ycleped Conservatives. The name, I believe, sir, has not been of their own choosing; but gentlemen who are well read in the history of parties will not fail to remember that the most odious and reproachful designations applied to them by their adversaries have become endeared by the persecutions of political intolerance, and those who at first felt injured and insulted by the application of a political nickname have at last proudly appropriated it, and come to glory in it as a memorial of their struggles and a symbol of their principles. Now, sir, I do not know that there is any thing in this name of Conservative, as applied to American institutions, which an American patriot ought to wish to disown. It implies devotion to the existing institutions of his country; a desire to preserve and defend them; a willingness, and even zeal, to reform, as the only effectual means of preserving; but an unconquerable resistance to schemes of wild innovation and destruction. If this is what is meant by a Conservative, (and such is the true and proper import of the term,) then, sir, I proudly avow myself a Conservative—a Conservative of Republican institutions, of Republican principles, of Republican practices, as illustrated and interpreted by the great champions of the Republican faith.

But, sir, to pursue the remarks of the honorable Senator, addressed to this small fraction of his political brethren. He tells them that their plan has very few supporters in either House of Congress; that there are two great parties in Congress, one for the Sub-Treasury scheme, and the other for a National Bank; and he sees, therefore, no prospect of success for any middle ground. He then assumes that the state of public sentiment among the people corresponds to this division of opinion in Congress. I must say, with all my respect for the gentleman's knowledge and skill in the statistics of party, that this assumption is not warranted under the circumstances of the case, nor does it seem to me to be sound in principle. It implies that the organization and array of parties here is to give law to public opinion, and that public opinion is not to shape and control the action of parties here. Sir, I go for the voice of the people, and the people have spoken for themselves. They have not left us to infer their sentiments from any accidental or temporary relation of parties here. They have pronounced judgment on the gentleman's scheme; and I should like to know where the honorable gentleman finds, in these expressions of public opinion, any evidence that there is a great party in this country in favor of the Sub-Treasury project. Never before has any proposition been so signally rebuked and condemned by the voice of the people. I refer to these things, Mr. President, with no pleasure. I contributed my best exertions to the election of the present Chief Magistrate, honestly anticipating from his prudence, his abilities, and his patriotism, a wise and successful administration of the public affairs. No one has felt a more sincere desire for his success than I have done. The unfavorable manifestations of public sentiment, therefore, upon the first leading measure of his administration, (though I foresaw and foretold them from the first moment that that measure was suggested,) have been to me the source of any thing rather than pleasure. They have now, however, become matters of public history; and as the Senator from New York seems disposed to confine our view here for second hand proofs of public opinion on the merits of the different financial measures which have been proposed, I must beg leave to invite his attention to those more majestic displays of public sentiment which have been presented on the great theatre of the nation. Let him look at the elections which have taken place in the several States since this fatal measure was first broached in the official journal, and say how many of them have eventuated in favor of the Administration. With one or two exceptions, they have all terminated against it; and mainly, there is reason to believe, on account of this very measure.

Where, then, does the honorable Senator find the evidence that there is any great body of popular sentiment in this country in favor of his scheme? The evidence is all the other way, and of the most overwhelming force. So as to the other great alternative of which the honorable Senator speaks, (a National Bank,) a large majority of the people have repeatedly declared against it; and without imputing to them a degree of fickleness, of which I, at least, do not suspect them, they must still be opposed to it. What plan, then, will they rally to, as a safe and practical substitute for the Sub-Treasury on the one hand, or a National Bank on the other? It is the employment of the State banks; institutions intimately connected with their domestic interests, responsible to, and supervised by, their domestic authorities, and exempt from all danger of political combination; the employment of these institutions under regulations which shall, at the same time, secure their efficiency and guard against abuse. Such, I am firmly persuaded, would be, at this moment, the unbiassed decision of a large majority of the American people. And even if we appeal to the criterion set up by the honorable Senator from New York—the state of parties in Congress—I think we may deduce from that, conclusions far more favorable to the State bank deposite system than he has drawn. If there be but a small party in Congress, with whom the State bank deposite system is a first choice, he must admit that it is the second choice of a large majority. The Sub-Treasury party would, I presume, prefer it to a National Bank, and the National Bank party would prefer it to the Sub-Treasury. Now, sir, the honorable gentleman will permit me to refresh his early reading, by reminding him of an incident related by Plutarch. After the battle of Salamis, in which the power of the Persian monarch was crushed by the combined Grecian fleet, the different commanders of the squadron repaired to the altar of Neptune, and, according to a custom of the country and the times, each one put on a ticket the names of those who had rendered the most important service in the action. Every officer put upon his ticket his own name first, but all put the name of Themistocles next. This has been held, in all future times, as conclusive proof of the superiority of Themistocles above all his competitors; and the State bank deposite system may adduce the same evidence of its merit in being the second choice of both of the parties which respectively advocate the Sub-Treasury and a National Bank. The fraction, therefore, in Congress, who still adhere to that system, however small they may appear in the eyes of the honorable Senator, can see nothing in this state of things which calls upon either their patriotism or their prudence to abandon a policy which they believe to be sanctioned by the sentiments, and demanded by the interests, of the great body of the people.

But, sir, to return from this digression; let us see what additions are made to the official as well as pecuniary patronage of the Executive, by the provisions of this bill. When I had the honor of addressing the Senate, at the last session, I spoke of the bill then under consideration as the "grain of mustard seed," which would grow up into a large tree, and cover the land with its branches. But I was told by the honorable Senator from New York and others, that the bill did not create a single new officer, and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] complimented me, as well as I remember, for my vivid imagination, to the account of which alone he set down the apprehensions I had expressed. But what do we now see? In three short months, the tree, which has already grown up from this grain of mustard seed, has thrown out four large branches, in the form of Receivers General, each of which will have its dependent ramifications, in the form of cashiers, tellers, clerks, &c. The Treasurer also is to have his "assistants;" and an indefinite brood of clerks is provided for all the officers made depositories of the public moneys under the bill, to assist in the discharge of the new duties devolved on them. Finally, a number of missionaries are to be appointed, from time to time, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to visit and inspect the various fiscal agencies created by the bill. Now, here is a cloud of new Executive officers at once, which bids defiance to calculation. But if their present number could be estimated, (as the Senator from New York has attempted to do,) it would be altogether useless, for they must, from the nature of things, be constantly and rapidly multiplying. Would the honorable Senator attempt to measure the rising cloud, which threatens to overspread and blacken the whole face of the heavens, by the speck, "no bigger than a man's hand," which has just appeared on the edge of the horizon? This is but the beginning; and we all know with what vigor and fruitfulness every things grows on American soil. Receivers General are allowed by the bill, at present, only to Massachusetts, New York, South Carolina, and Missouri. But will not Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, demand their Receivers General as well as Massachusetts? Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, as well as South Carolina? Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, as well as Missouri? And so in regard to all the other States that are now pretermitted in the bill. If we have Receivers General, we must finally have Payers General; for this is an integral part of the system in France, from which we borrow the scheme proposed by the bill. In adopting a system, it is fair to presume we mean to adopt its usual and ordinary concomitants. Indeed, an honorable member of the other House, who is well skilled in questions of finance, expressed the opinion to me, only the other day, that the functions of paying and receiving ought to be separated, so as to form checks on each other; and thus we shall have the French system, in both its branches, at once. On the question of introducing a new system of policy, we ought never to forget the old adage, which we derive from France also—c'est le premier pas qui coute—It is the first step which is decisive, and that taken, all the rest follow.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT,] has likewise attempted an estimate of the expense of this new system. But this, also, in my opinion, is a vain thing. The first modest beginnings of a system furnish no standard by which its ultimate expense can be measured. The Senator's estimate makes the annual expense (exclusive of what may be called the outfit in the cost of buildings, &c.) somewhere about $20,000, (twenty thousand dollars.) But this is greatly below the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report at the last session; and in recommending a favorite scheme, the author of it is rarely found to over-estimate its expense. That officer set down the annual expense at $60,000, (sixty thousand dollars.) This, in my opinion, is very far below the ultimate permanent expense. An able and experienced gentleman in my own State, practically versed in these questions, and a zealous and decided advocate, withal, of the new system, in setting forth its advantages, and defending it from the objections which had been urged against it, met this very one of expense, by giving it as his opinion, formed upon deliberate and careful reflection, that the annual expense would not exceed $600,000, (six hundred thousand dollars.) Now, sir, when I arrived here, at the extra session of Congress, and read the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, I could not but suppose, at first, that there was an accidental mistake in his figures, by the omission of a cipher, and that he intended to have put down the expense at $600,000 (at six hundred thousand dollars) instead of $60,000, (sixty thousand dollars.)

But, however this may be, nothing can be more certain than that the expense of this system, when fully developed, must, from its complexity, and the number of officers it will call for, be very great. We have a standard to appeal to, on this question, which is worth far more than any a priori reasonings. The system has been long established and fully tried in France, and we know its actual results there. On the other hand, in England the agency of banks has been extensively used in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, instead of the individual agencies which are employed in France, and are contemplated by this bill. It will be a good test, therefore, of this question to look at the relative expenses of the revenue systems of France and England. I will read to the Senate a comparative statement on the subject, which I have taken from the work of a highly respectable American traveller, vouched by original authorities, to which he refers. From this statement it appears that the cost of collecting the revenue in England is, under the respective heads of taxation, as follows: Customs, 7 per cent.; excise, 4 per cent.; recording and stamps, 7 per cent.; post office, 11 per cent.; and direct taxes, 2 per cent.; averaging, upon the whole, 6 1-5 per cent. In France, under the same heads, the cost of collecting the revenue is as follows: Customs, 33 per cent.; excise, 20 per cent.; recording and stamps, 9 per cent.; post office, 45 per cent.; direct taxes, 15 per cent.; averaging, upon the whole, 24 2-5 per cent.! I am well aware that divers circumstances are to be taken into consideration, in explaining this enormous difference of expense between the French and English fiscal systems; but one of the principal causes of that difference (and it is so considered by the writer to whom I have referred) will, at last, be found in the fact of the extensive use of banking agency in the collection of the revenue in England, and the exclusive employment of individual agency for that purpose in France.

But it is not merely by the multiplication of officers and the increase of expenditure that the influence of the Executive branch of the Government is fearfully extended by this bill. That influence is greatly augmented by certain new regulations it introduces in regard to the tenure of office, the compensation of officers, and the forms and usages of fiscal administration. In the first place, the Treasurer, the Receivers General, and all the other officers, from the highest to the lowest, employed in the fiscal service, may be required at any time, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to give new official bonds, in increased sums, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, "any law in reference to any of the official bonds of any of the said officers to the contrary notwithstanding;" and in default of giving such new bond, the officer would, of course, be deprived of his office. Now, it is evident that, under such a power possessed by the Secretary of the Treasury, all the officers connected with the operations of the Treasury would be converted into the trembling vassals of the Executive. A direct removal from office is a measure of more than ordinary energy, and involves responsibility. Cases might exist in which the Secretary of the Treasury would be unwilling to take the responsibility of a direct removal from office, and yet would accomplish the same object by a vexatious requisition of a new bond, in so large a sum that the officer could not, or would not, find sureties in the increased amount. Who does not see that, under such a regulation, the officers of the Treasury would lose all sense of independence; and that those who could consent to hold office on such terms must be prepared to become the passive and unresisting tools of power? Heretofore, it has been the wise policy of our legislation to fix by law the sum in which official bonds are to be given, and to leave nothing in that respect, or as little as possible to Executive discretion. Again, it will be seen, from an examination of the bill, that the compensation of several of the officers to be appointed under it, such as visiting agents, clerks, &c. is to be fixed by the Secretary, at his discretion, and not by law. Here is another source of servile dependence on the one hand, and of increased Executive influence on the other, which is not in harmony with the general spirit and maxims of our legislation.

My attention has also been attracted by a provision of the bill which seems to me to introduce a most dangerous innovation in the established forms and usages of the Treasury. It has heretofore been a fixed principle of fiscal responsibility that no money should be drawn from the Treasury but upon a warrant of the Secretary drawn on the Treasurer, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded by the Register, and upon that warrant, when it reaches the hands of the Treasurer thus authenticated, the Treasurer draws his draft on the depositary of the public money for payment. These forms have always been held to be very important checks and indispensable preliminaries to any money being drawn out of the Treasury, or, in other words, paid by the depositary of the public moneys. The Secretary draws his warrant upon the Treasurer, subject to the checks before mentioned, and then the Treasurer draws upon the depositary who is to make the payment. But in no instance does the Secretary draw directly upon the depositary, because that would be to lose the security of the intermediate checks of the Comptroller and the Register. By the 10th section of this bill, however, in contravention of these established principles and checks, it is expressly provided, that "for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interest, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both." Under this provision the Secretary of the Treasury could draw out all the money in the Treasury, or, which is the same thing in the hands of the depositaries, without any check whatsoever. The effect of it, whether so intended or not, is to place the whole public treasure at his unchecked and absolute disposal.

Now, sir, is not the effect of these various provisions, and of the whole scope and tenor of of this bill, to concentrate, at last, the entire control of the public moneys in the hands of the President: for the Secretary of the Treasury, and all the other fiscal officers are but his agents, appointed by him and removable at his pleasure? But the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] contends that the President would have no more control over the public moneys under the proposed system than if they were deposited in banks; that the same legal formalities must be gone through to touch the public moneys in the one case as in the other. It may be true that the President has no more legal control over the public money in the one case than in the other; but has he not a greater practical control? In the one case, the depositaries of the public money would be his agents, subject to his authority, the creatures of his will, dependant upon his pleasure for their continuance in office, and made, by the peculiar provisions of this bill, as I have already shown, especially and habitually sensible of that dependence. In possessing so complete a control over the keepers of the public money, he would possess, virtually, a control over the public money itself. But, in the case of the employment of banks, the depositories of the public money are institutions not created by the President—not dependent on him for their continued existence; on the contrary, they hold their charters, and the advantages they confer, from a distinct authority, to which they are at all times responsible, and are thus guarded against any undue influences from other quarters which might warp them from their integrity and their duties.

In making these remarks, sir, I speak in no spirit of captious jealousy as to the highest Executive trust of the Government, or of its actual incumbent; but I speak in the spirit of the Constitution, which anticipates the danger and supposes the possibility of the abuse of power, and inculcates the necessity of guarding against it. The system organized by this bill is one of the most thorough centralization. It rides over the institutions of the States, prostrates their credit and usefulness, brings patronage and power to the General Government, concentrates them in the hands of the Executive, to whom it gives an unlimited control over the public moneys, and, through the banking operations to be founded on them, an extensive and paramount influence upon the moneyed concerns of the whole country. It is fitting that such a system should be borrowed from France, the country whose institutions exhibit the most unqualified example extant of centralization, under which the capital has swallowed up the provinces, and Paris has become synonymous with France. But it is equally fitting that such a system should be resisted, to the last extremity, in this land of Republican freedom, by all who are attached to the rights of the States, by all who are opposed to the enlargement of Federal and Executive power, and by all who watch with jealousy, and view with alarm, every tendency to consolidation.

I will now, Mr. President, follow the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] in the remarks he made on the comparative safety of the two systems proposed for keeping and disbursing the public moneys. Although experience, the only safe arbiter, has long since settled this question, the honorable Senator argued it as if it were still open to doubt, and made, I am free to admit, an exceedingly ingenious and plausible argument. He instituted a parallel between the two systems in regard to the great leading points on which their safety is supposed to depend, and in each instance brought out a substantial equality. First, as to officers, he said it would be fair to presume that the officers of the Government and the officers of the banks would be equally trustworthy. Then, as to sureties, he said both the banks and the Government officers are equally required to give sureties, if deemed necessary. So, likewise, as to vaults: the Government officers, he said, are to be provided with vaults as well as the banks. The only particular then in which the banks, as he alleged, could be supposed to present a better guaranty for the safety of the public funds, is, that their capital stock is pledged for the reimbursement of the public moneys committed to them; but this advantage in favor of the banks he very adroitly balanced by what he represented to be the risk of mingling the Government funds with those of trading corporations. Now all this is very fair and plausible on the surface; but what is the fact—what is the testimony of experience?

While the honorable gentleman was running this parallel in theory between the two systems, there was a document lying on the table of the other House which had run the same parallel on the surer foundations of practice. I allude to a recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a call of that House, at the extra session, made on the motion of an honorable friend of mine, [Mr. GARLAND of Virginia,] containing a list of all "the receivers, collectors, or depositories of the public money, who are in default to the Government, with the amount of their respective defaults," &c. What, sir, does this document, which I now have before me, show? That the whole amount of balances due from the banks, which are deemed unavailable, is a little more than one million of dollars, (1,046,649;) and these balances go back to a period long past, when the extraordinary embarrassments consequent on the war involved banks and individuals in difficulties beyond any former or subsequent example. In relation to the banks which have been recently employed as depositories, it appears that they have either paid up all they owed the Government, or are in the course of paying it up as called for by the wants of the public service, without any apprehension of default on their part, or availing themselves of the indulgence of the act passed at the late session of Congress, have either secured or are expected to secure satisfactorily the payment of the whole balances due from them, according to the terms of that act. Only eleven of them, it appears, out of near ninety employed as depositories, have even asked indulgence under the act here referred to, and but a single one of them has been ordered to be sued. Now, sir, when we look to the list of individual collectors and receivers, what do we see? An aggregate default of about three millions! And though some of the more recent balances appearing on the list may be reduced by future collections, yet, from the long standing of most of them, there is no reason to believe that the aggregate amount of the entire list will be affected in any sensible degree by these partial recoveries. It is to be remarked too that this list does not include disbursing officers, "whose indebtedness," is stated by the Secretary "to be very great," and the actual losses by whom I showed, during the late session of Congress, from a report of Mr. Crawford, to have "greatly exceeded" a million and a half of dollars, from 1789 to 1819, and by this time have grown up, in all probability, to another aggregate sum of three millions! Neither does this list include officers of the Post Office Department, among whom it was shown by official documents, at the last annual session of Congress, that there were as many as eighteen hundred and thirty-two defaulters! It is to be observed also that this list is confined to public agents "who were out of office on the twelfth day of October, 1837."

Now, sir, if the honorable Senator from New York had taken the trouble to look at this document, before he made his speech, he might have saved himself the labor of a great deal of superfluous ingenuity. In contrasting the ingenuity of his argument with the blunt contradiction of facts which this document presents, I was strongly reminded of an anecdote I have often heard of the late venerable Bishop Madison, of Virginia. That excellent prelate was also a profound philosopher, and much addicted to philosophizing. On one occasion, he undertook to explain why the shade of a lamp, almost in contact with the flame of the candle beneath, was not, in any degree, heated by it. This he did by a learned dissertation the laws of caloric, and all the other scientific data which could be brought to bear on the subject. Having completely satisfied himself, and the admiring audience which surrounded him, of the truth of his theory, he could not avoid, in the consciousness of his triumph, putting his hand on the lamp shade, which had been the subject of his disquisition, when an exclamation of acute pain disclosed the fact that his hand had been severely burnt in the application. Nature, thus, contradicted the philosopher, and so stubborn facts will sometimes confute the most astute logician. I cannot but think that if the honorable Senator from New York, at the close of his very ingenious argument, had laid his hand upon this document, he must have felt his fingers, at least, a little scorched.

Has the honorable Senator forgotten the emphatic testimony, deduced from a careful collation of facts, borne by the present Secretary of the Treasury, only three years ago, to the superior safety of banks as depositories of the public money? Let me, then, refresh his recollection by reading to him and the Senate an extract from the able report of that officer, made to Congress in December, 1834, on the system of keeping and disbursing the public money:

"It is a singular fact," says the Secretary, "in praise of this description of public debtors, the selected banks, that there is not now due on deposites, from the whole of them which have now stopped payment, from the establishment of the Constitution to the present moment, a sum much beyond what is now due to the United States from one mercantile firm that stopped payment in 1825 or 1826, and of whom ample security was required and supposed to be taken under the responsibility of an oath. If we include the whole present dues to the Government from discredited banks, at all times and of all kinds, whether as depositories or not, and embrace even counterfeit bills and every other species of unavailable funds in the Treasury, they will not exceed what is due from two such firms."

He then continues—

"If our former small losses by them, (the banks,) in keeping and paying over the public revenue, under circumstances so very adverse, are compared with our large losses either in collecting or disbursing that revenue, their present safety seems to be as great as is consistent with the usual operations of the paper system, or with the credit which must always be entrusted by Government, in some way or other, to agents of some kind in keeping the public money. In considering their safety, it should be constantly recollected that the owners and managers of banks, when properly regulated by legislative provisions in their charters, are, like other individuals, interested to transact business securely; are desirous of making and not losing money; and that these circumstances, with the preference, in case of failure, belonging to depositors and holders of their bills over the stockholders, united with the security, if not priority, given to the Government, render them, in point of safety, generally, much superior to individual agents of the United States."

If there be any fact incontestably established in our history, and by the experience of all other Governments, it is the superior safety of banks as depositories over any individual cusbody. The reason of it is obvious. The more complex organization of banks, the number of their officers acting as mutual checks on each other, the daily supervision to which they are subjected, their forms of doing business, all furnish securities, which can never be had in case of the isolated possession of money by an individual, whatever responsibilities he may be bound by. And if a loss of the moneys committed to them should occur either by accident, fraud, or violence, the capital of the bank stands pledged for the security of the depositor. This is, after all, the only kind of security that can be relied on with confidence. If any gentleman will take the trouble to read the notes and remarks annexed to the various cases of default, presented in the document from the House of Representatives to which I have referred, he will see how utterly worthless and illusory is the personal security on which we have heretofore relied. The instances in which any thing has been obtained from sureties, to make good the default of their principal, are like angels' visits—"few and far between." The general return is, "the securities insolvent," "conveyed away their property," "not found, "residences not known," or some other equally unavailable return.

In England and France, as well as here, this species of security has been found either nominal or mischievous; and in France it has, for many years, been wholly given up. The only kind of security that is recognised there is like that which the banks give in the responsibility of their stock. Every person who receives an appointment, connected with the collection or disbursement of the revenue, is required, before he enters on the duties of his office, to deposite with the Government, as security, an amount of money, proportioned to the probable amount of the public treasure that will pass through his hands. This money is held by the Government as a guaranty for the faithful administration of the trust conferred, and forms, at the same time, a part of its financial resources, on which it pays an interest of 4 per cent. till restored to the officer on his satisfactorily acquitting himself of his responsibilities, or till it be otherwise forfeited by his default. The moneys thus deposited with the Government, by public officers, as guaranties for the faithful performance of their duties, are denominated Cautionnemens, and amount to a very large sum. I happen to have in my possession the report made by the French Minister of Finance, Count Chabrol, to the King in March, 1830, from which it appears that the Cautionnemens, on the 1st day of January of that year, amounted to the enormous sum of 226,483,973 francs, (two hundred and twenty-six million four hundred and eighty-three thousand nine hundred and seventy-three francs,) at a time when the whole revenue of the kingdom did not exceed 900,000,000 francs, (nine hundred million francs.) Now, sir, if gentlemen mean to introduce here the system of individual depositories of the public moneys, let them be warned by the experience of the country from which they borrow that system, that it can be made safe only by the precautionary device of Cautionnemens, the effect of which would be to give to the millionaires of our cities the monopoly of all fiscal employments.

But, sir, great as is the danger of heavy pecuniary losses to the Government under this system, I regard even that as a trifle compared with the extensive demoralization it would produce in the country by the temptation held out to peculation, to private cupidity, to political corruption, in the large sums of money lying idle in the hands of the public officers.

I have now, Mr. President, gone through my objections to this bill on account of what it contains. I object to it also, and not less earnestly, on account of what it does not contain. It contains no provision for the relief of the country. It "takes no thought" for the public. It looks only to the ease and comfort of the Government. The most urgent want of the country, the highest interest of all, is a speedy restoration of specie payments by the banks. Now, too, is the critical and decisive moment. The banks have been, hitherto, diligently and steadily curtailing their discounts and circulation, with a view to that resumption, till they have brought their business with such safe limits that they might now easily resume with a little encouragement. But if they are once again let loose from these salutary bounds; if, despairing of a general resumption, and yielding to the strong temptations of irredeemable issues, they should again expand, all hope will be lost of recalling them to a specie standard, and the disastrous reign of an inconvertible paper currency will be indefinitely prolonged. Now, then, is the moment to join in this great work of effecting a restoration of specie payments. But does this bill do any thing toward its accomplishment? On the contrary, it does every thing it can to retard and obstruct it. In the run it would create on the banks for specie, both by the demand it makes for it for the uses of the Government, and by the general discredit which the high example of the Government would stamp on bank paper, it throws new and insurmountable obstacles in the way of resumption.

But the honorable Senator from New York says that the resumption of specie payments by the banks is no concern of this Government—that it is exclusively an affair of the States, and of the banks themselves—and we, who urge the necessity of promoting, by every proper and practicable means, the accomplishment of this great object, are reproached with using an argument, which, he tells us, belongs to the friends of a National Bank. Now, sir, I beg leave to say to the honorable Senator, that both reason and experience prove that the only effectual means of preventing a National Bank is to bring about a resumption of specie payments by the State banks, and that nothing is more directly calculated to lead to the re-establishment of a Bank of the United States than the course of those who would do nothing toward effecting that resumption. Let the honorable Senator look back to that most instructive period, rich in lessons for the present times—the former suspension of specie payments by the banks from 1814 to 1817—and he will see that it was the unwillingness or the inability of the State banks then to resume specie payments which alone led to the establishment of a National Bank. Let him read the official correspondence of Mr. Dallas—the numerous reports and communications of that able and patriotic man, worthy of him and of the country—and he will find, throughout, an explicit recognition of, and unvarying testimony to, this great truth—that if the State banks could have been induced more promptly to resume specie payments at that time, there would have been no occasion for a National Bank, and that that institution would not have existed. The true means of preventing its establishment now is by the instrumentality of the State banks, under the lead and encouragement of the Government, to restore to the country a sound, convertible currency.

This Government can and ought to aid in this great work. Its vast revenue power, and its pervading action, co-extensive with the whole Union, give it means and influences which the States do not possess. It holds, indeed, through that power, a lever of the greatest efficacy for controlling the entire currency of the country. Through its collections and disbursements, it can hold out inducements of the most influential character to sway the course of the banks. In the mode of conducting its receipts and payments, it has it in its power to set an example of the most persuasive influence toward the restoration of general confidence. In a disturbed state of the currency like the present, these are powers to be exercised in a spirit of liberality and benignity—not of menace, denunciation, or vengeance. The occasion demands the language of encouragement and support, not of severity and sternness. Look at the communications of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Crawford with the banks during the former suspension of specie payments, and it will be seen in what spirit the influence of the Government was then exerted, and effectually exerted, in the end, to accomplish a return to specie payments. The banks were not then outlawed by the official press—they were not then put under the ban of the Government—they were not then pursued as conspirators, but were treated as institutions having themselves a stake in the common weal, and with which the common interests of the whole country were identified. It will be edifying, for a moment, to look back to the manner in which the Government then conducted its relations with the banks: and I must say that if the exertions of the banks, generally, since the recent suspension of specie payments, to prepare themselves for a resumption by a steady and persevering curtailment of their business and profits, be compared with the course of the banks on the former occasion, in taking advantage of the suspension to enlarge their issues to a most extravagant extent, and in obstinately refusing to apply the valuable public stocks held by them to acquiring the ability to resume, the banks now are entitled, at least, to as much liberality and favor as were shown to them then.

By the joint resolution of April, 1816, which has been so often referred to, it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to take such measures as he should deem necessary to effect a collection of the revenue in gold and silver, Treasury notes, or the notes of specie paying banks. In the discharge of this duty, Mr. Dallas very soon opened a correspondence with the State banks, to induce them to return to specie payments. In a circular which he addressed to them on the 22d of July, 1816, he used this language:

"From the State banks, a sincere and effectual exertion, in the common cause of restoring the legal currency, is certainly expected and required; but in return they will merit and receive the confidence of the Treasury and of the National Bank; the transfer of the public funds from the State banks to the National Bank and its branches will be gradual, and the notes of the State banks will be freely circulated by the Treasury and the National Bank."

In a preceding part of the same letter, he says:

"The present opportunity is embraced to repeat the assurances which have been uniformly given and maintained, that this Department feels the fiscal interest of the Government, and the successful operations of the Bank of the United States, to be intimately connected with the credit and prosperity of the State Banks."

Here we see the language of the Government toward the banks was that of encouragement and confidence. They were assured in advance of the friendship, and even of the support of the Government, if they would faithfully co-operate in the common cause of restoring the legal currency.

The communications of Mr. Crawford, the able and distinguished successor of Mr. Dallas, were in the same spirit. You, Mr. President, and those who acted with you in those difficult times, will recollect that, although the joint resolution of April, 1816, indicated the 20th of February following as the day for a general resumption of specie payments, the banks determined, in a convention held by them for the purpose of deliberating on the subject, not to resume till the 1st of July, 1817. In order to induce them to change that determination, Mr Crawford made a formal proposition to them, that if they would resume on the 20th of February, the public money then in their vaults should not be transferred at all to the Bank of the United States, (constituted by its charter the general depository of the national funds,) and that between that day and the 1st of July, no portion of the public money should be drawn from them for any purpose whatever, unless the necessities of the public service imperiously required it. I beg leave to read to the Senate the following extracts from his circular to the banks, of 20th December, 1816, submitting that proposition:

"The means of the Treasury to aid the operations of the banks in effecting a revolution in the state of the currency, so imperiously necessary to the public interest, are considered ample, and the strongest disposition exists to apply them, so as to produce the most beneficial results."

"In making the above proposition to the State banks, the strongest reliance is placed in their disposition to join in the efforts necessary to relieve the community from the evils to which it has been subjected, by the disordered state of the circulating medium. It is confidently believed that the interests of the banks and of the community are not in opposition to each other, and that any sacrifice which the effort may cost them, will be compensated by the advantages and facilities which it is in the power of the Treasury to afford them."

"The deep interest which the Treasury has in the support of bank credit, and the connection it has with the Bank of the United States, would, independent of the known disposition of that institution to conciliate the State banks, be sufficient to protect them against an illiberal policy on its part."

In this communication, it will be perceived that Mr. Crawford felt and avowed that the means of the Treasury to aid in the restoration of specie payments, were ample. He freely proffered that aid to the State banks. He not only made them the most liberal propositions for their own advantage, but he gave them a specific pledge of protection and support against any illiberal policy on the part of the Bank of the United States. An appeal thus urged to both the interests and patriotism of the State banks, could not fail to be effectual. It accomplished its object. The banks changed their original determination, and did resume specie payments on the 20th of February, 1817.

Now, sir, can any one doubt that if the same spirit had actuated the Treasury Department in its relations with the banks recently—if, especially, when a majority of the banks, represented in the bank convention, assembled in New York, in November last, manifested a strong desire to fix an early day for the resumption of specie payments, and were prevented from doing so only by the influence of a powerful and overshadowing institution—if, I say, sir, the Treasury Department had shown, on that occasion, the same disposition which animated Mr. Crawford in 1816, and had come forward and given assurances of support to that portion of the banks who were anxious to return to specie payments, against the "illiberal policy" of the Bank of the United States, can there be a doubt that, at this moment, we should be in sight of a fixed period for the termination of the present calamitous and disordered state of the currency? But, unfortunately, the policy has been to stand entirely aloof from the banks, after having contributed, it is admitted on all hands, by the measures of the Government, in some one or other of its branches, to the embarrassments by which they were overthrown. No aid, no encouragement has been given; not even a voice of cheering has been uttered amid the general distress. On the contrary, odium and prejudice have been extensively invoked through the press, at least, to render more complete that want of confidence which is the sole obstacle to the re-establishment of both the credit and ability of the banks. And now, in the sequel, comes this fatal Sub-Treasury bill to deal them the last blow in their prostrate condition. The great interests of the country, connected with the restoration of the credit of the banks, and of the currency which they supply, have been overlooked or unappreciated; and the whole object seems to have been to devise some plan by which the Government could, in future, get along in the smoothest way; by which it could be relieved from those responsibilities, and protected from that "shower of imputations" in the discharge of its duties, which the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] so pathetically deprecates.

What, then, I would ask, are Governments instituted for, if it is not to meet difficulties in the public cause; to meet and overcome them; to encounter responsibilities; to endure a shower of imputations, yea, "the pelting of the pitiless storm," if duty to the country demand? And an able man and a patriot need not repine at these trials of his virtue and talents. The ultimate gratitude of his country will ever be in proportion to the temporary injustice he may sustain by the bitterness of enemies or the persecutions of faction. How enviable, at this moment, the fame of Mr. Crawford, than whom no man, in his day, encountered more responsibilities by the bold and fearless manner in which he met the duties of his station, or sustained more unfounded imputations. But truth has triumphed over prejudice and error, and he now lives, and will forever live, in the grateful memory of his country. This desire to avoid difficulties and their attendant responsibilities, founded, as I think I have shown it to be, in mistake as to the true interests of public men, is the source of still greater calamities to the country. It is the natural parent, strange as it may seem at first sight, of all schemes of strong Governments, and is not unsuitably avowed by the honorable Senator from New York as a consideration in favor of a measure, the effect of which, in my humble judgment, would be to render this Republican Government of ours one of the strongest on the face of the earth. On this subject, sir, I beg leave to read to the Senate the remarks of the profoundest observer, perhaps, of human affairs that ever lived. They are full of instruction, and cannot be too well weighed by public men. In speaking of the National Assembly of France, Burke makes use of these words:

"Their purpose every where seems to have been to evade and slip aside from difficulty. This it has been the glory of the great masters, in all the arts, to confront and overcome; and, when they had overcome the first difficulty, to turn it into an instrument for new conquests over new difficulties." "This amicable conflict with difficulty obliges us to an intimate acquaintance with our object, and compels us to consider it in all its relations. It will not suffer us to be superficial. It is the want of nerves for such a task; it is the fondness for shortcuts and fallacious facilities that has, in so many parts of the world, created governments with arbitrary powers." "It is this unwillingness to wrestle with difficulty which has schemes of reform with abolition and total destruction."

The disposition to evade difficulty, the policy of short cuts, we are told by this great master of political wisdom, has, in every part of the world, "created Governments with arbitrary powers;" and was what in France led the National Assembly "to commence their schemes of reform with abolition and total destruction." Now, sir, if this had been specially written for our warning, and with express reference to the question before us, it could not have been more apposite or more instructive. Every summary invention, in a free country, suggested by the ease of Government, however intended, will be found, at last, to carry with it the deepest dangers to the liberties and happiness of the people. The honorable Senator from New York, too, should remember that it was to him who should untie, and not to him who should cut the Gordian knot, that the ancient oracle promised the glories of empire. The first is the achievement of skill and industry, and its fruits are peace, liberty and happiness. The second is the achievement of power, and its result is the establishment of power. Let the honorable Senator from New York untie the knot, by leading the banks to a resumption of specie payments, (as, I am sure, by proper means, he could easily do,) and not cut it by the Sub-Treasury scheme, and I will be among the first to award him the civic wreath. With Mr. Jefferson, in his memorable letter to Mr. Madison, while the Federal Constitution was under consideration, I say, "I am no friend to strong Government. It is always oppressive. It puts the Governors at their ease, but at the expense of the people." Here lies the fatal objection to the Sub-Treasury scheme. It puts the "Governors at their ease," but is dangerous and "oppressive" to the people.

What system of policy, then, it will be asked, would I pursue? The same great authority, whose words I have already quoted, says, "a good patriot and a true politician will always consider how to make the most of the existing materials of his country." This is the foundation principle on which I would build. Experience has shown, in the language used by the present Secretary of the Treasury in 1824, that banks are the most "responsible, safe, convenient, and economical" fiscal agents for the Government. The State banks are institutions now existing. I would "make the most" of them for the public service. There is no national banking institution in existence; and the condition of the country, already surcharged with banks, the state of public opinion, the known sentiments and pledges of those charged with the public Administration, all conspire to render it very unlikely that there will be any such institution at least for years to come. I say further, in my humble opinion, there ought to be no such institution; first, because there is no constitutional authority to create it, and, secondly, because its political dangers, in any form in which it has heretofore existed, have been found to more than counterbalance its supposed advantages, in other respects. Then, as to the Sub-Treasury scheme, it is a novelty utterly unknown to our laws and usages which could not be brought into existence without violating all the habitudes of our people, deranging the operations of business, and hazarding the most cherished principles of our political institutions. What, then, ought to be done? Recur to the "existing materials of the country," the State banks—"make the most" of them for the conveyance of the Government as well as for the general good—reform their abuses, correct their defects, and adopt every precaution which may be necessary to ensure their fidelity and efficiency.

These institutions, it is true, have recently, in common with every other interest in the country, and with the whole commercial world, been subjected to serious embarrassments. All agree, however, though differing as to the particular causes which produced them, that those embarrassments have been the result of very peculiar and extraordinary circumstances. The banks, too, which were employed as the depositories and fiscal agents of the Government, have, for the most part, amid circumstances of the greatest difficulty, actually discharged all their engagements to the Government, enormously heavy as they were, in consequence of the large surplus revenue; or the few who have not yet done so, have satisfactorily secured the comparatively small balances due from them, to be paid at short periods, according to an indulgence voluntarily granted to them by Congress. The past, therefore, candidly considered, furnishes no ground against the renewed employment of the State banks as fiscal agents of the Government. Experience may have, and doubtless has, disclosed defects and errors in the particular plan upon which they have been heretofore employed. Correct, then, those errors, supply those defects, but do not reject their employment altogether. This, sir, is the general principle on which I have bottomed the proposition I have submitted as a substitute for the bill reported by the honorable Senator from New York; and I will now proceed to explain, in detail, those provisions of the substitute which distinguish it from the State bank deposite system as heretofore organized.

It is now generally acknowledged that one of the principal circumstances which contributed to embarrass the operations of the late deposite system, was the large number of banks employed as depositories, amounting, in the end, I believe, to near ninety. This increase of number, in part, was rendered necessary by that provision in the act of June, 1836, which required that, where the amount of public deposites in any bank exceeds three-fourths of its capital actually paid in, the surplus should be transferred to some other bank. In the execution of the act, however, (from considerations which I am not able to explain,) there was a still farther increase in the number of depositories, not called for by the requirements of this provision. It is obvious how the whole play of the machinery must have been weakened and obstructed by this needless complexity of its parts. I am satisfied that twenty banks, judiciously selected and properly located, would be competent to do the whole business of the Treasury Department, with much less danger of embarrassment to the banks, and a far more easy and effectual supervision on the part of the Secretary. The substitute, therefore, provides that the number of banks to be employed as public depositories shall, in no case, exceed twenty-five, to be chosen from among the most solid and respectable banks in the respective States, and their location, as well as number, to be determined solely with reference to the wants and convenience of the Treasury in conducting its fiscal operations.

The substitute also proposes an important change in the mode of selecting the deposite banks. Heretofore they were chosen by the Secretary of the Treasury, at his will and pleasure alone. This sole agency of the Executive will, in designating the depositories of the public money, exposed the late system to a suspicion of favoritism and a want of confidence in general, which greatly impaired its moral force, and admitted a possibility of abuses, which, it is certainly proper, should be guarded against. It was this which caused it to be characterized as the pet bank system I propose to divest it of this character, by subjecting the selection of the Secretary of the Treasury, in every case, to the supervision and control of Congress. If the selection be made during the session of Congress, it is to be immediately submitted for the approval of the two Houses; if during the recess, it is to be laid before them at the commencement of the next session, to be in like manner confirmed or annulled by them. The effect of this provision will be to bring every thing relating to the public moneys under the direct and efficient control of the representatives of the people and the States, and, in so delicate and important a matter, to leave as little as possible to Executive discretion.

Another leading provision in the substitute is one which requires the deposite banks to have weekly settlements with the banks in their vicinity, with which they have business transactions, and to call for balances in specie, whenever and to whatever extent it may be necessary to check over-issues and to preserve the soundness of the currency. In the adoption of this practice by the late Bank of the United States consisted its boasted power and influence as a regulator of the currency. There is no reason why the same salutary control should not be exercised by the deposite banks, and with even greater effect, inasmuch as their aggregate capital and presumed amount of transactions with other banks would, no doubt, exceed those of the late National Bank. It will be perceived, from the terms of this provision in the substitute, that it is not contemplated to enjoin on the deposite banks a fixed and inexorable requisition of balances from the other banks in specie, under all circumstances whatever; for, considering the large balances that would be habitually accumulated by them against the other banks in the process of collecting the public revenue, such a requisition would be destructive in many cases to institutions of unquestionable soundness. It is contemplated, therefore, that this power should be exercised under proper safeguards, and only to the extent that may be necessary to restrain imprudences or excesses, endangering the general currency. It was to this extent only, as I have shown in a previous part of these remarks, that the power was exercised by the late Bank of the United States.

The substitute likewise makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to use his influence to bring about an arrangement (as no doubt is entertained he could do) among the several deposite banks to receive and credit, as cash, the notes of each other in payment of the public revenue, wherever so tendered. The effect of this arrangement would be to put the notes of the deposite banks practically on the same footing as the branch notes of the late Bank of the United States—every where receivable in payment of public dues, and enjoying, consequently, a general credit and circulation throughout the Union. It would give to the country, to a great extent, the advantages of a uniform paper currency, as the preceding provision would secure to it a sound one; and the two together, in supplying, practically, the benefits promised by a National Bank, would supersede the strongest arguments now urged in favor of such an institution.

In regard to the kinds of money in which the public revenue is to be collected, the substitute adopts, with slight modifications, the provision of the currency bill of the last session of Congress. It declares that the public dues, of every description, for lands as well as customs, shall be received in gold or silver, or Treasury notes, or such notes of specie paying banks (under certain restrictions, intended to promote the suppression of small notes) as the deposite banks, subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall agree to credit to the United States as cash. It will be perceived that in the proposition now submitted, I have postponed for one year the exclusion of the notes of banks which issue bills or notes under five dollars. It is known that many of the States authorize notes under that denomination; and some who have heretofore prohibited them will, it is supposed, authorize the issuing of them under existing circumstances and for a limited period. It is evident that the use of this description of notes, in supplying the place of, and consequently limiting the demand for, specie in small dealings, would tend materially to facilitate the resumption of specie payments by the banks. This consideration has induced me, under the peculiar circumstances of the times, to adjourn, for one year, the period of excluding the notes of banks issuing bills or notes under five dollars; and the same consideration has prevailed with me, for the present, to limit the farther exclusion of bank notes to the issues of such banks as shall, after the expiration of two years, continue to issue bills or notes under ten dollars. In doing this, under the exigencies of the times, I wish to be understood as not abandoning my original opinions, which remain unchanged, in favor of extending the prohibition of small notes ultimately to all under the denomination of twenty dollars.

Finally, the substitute, in furtherance of the great policy of fixing a period to the present disastrous reign of irredeemable paper, provides that, after the first day of July next, the notes of no bank which shall not then have bona fide resumed specie payments shall, at any time thereafter, be received in payment of the public dues. This, in connection with the liberal provisions made by the substitute, in other respects, for re-establishing the credit of convertible bank paper, will, I am persuaded, bring about a general resumption of specie payments at the time designated. The mere fixation of a day by Congress will exercise a powerful moral influence; and not the less so, as the day fixed corresponds with that indicated by a majority of the banks in the Bank Convention held in New York in November last.

These, Mr. President, are the leading provisions of the measure I have submitted, which distinguish it from the system heretofore adopted for the employment of State banks as depositories of the public money. In many respects, they make of it a new system, obviating some of the strongest objections which have been hitherto urged against it, providing new guards against abuses, and containing new provisions for extending its usefulness and efficiency. Under an able and not unfriendly direction, I feel every confidence that it would meet both the wants of the Government and the wishes of the country.

I shall, doubtless, be asked, what arrangement I propose in regard to the banks discounting on the public deposites. There is no absolute interdiction of their doing so, in the measure I propose, (for to this, I think, I shall be able to show there are insuperable obstacles,) but it carefully withdraws the stimulus to the use of that power which has heretofore been applied, and it moreover furnishes a positive security, of an important character, against the excessive use of it. It will be recollected by the Senate that the law of June, 1836, which organized the late deposite system, (besides requiring of the banks very important and onerous services,) required them to pay an interest of two per cent. on all the public deposites in their possession exceeding one-fourth of their capital actually paid in. Now, this not merely authorized, but compelled the banks to discount on the public moneys, whether they willed it or not, in order to enable them to pay the interest charged. It was a stimulus administered by the Government to the use of the power. This stimulus, this compulsion rather, I propose to withdraw, by repealing that clause of the law of 1836 which charged the banks interest on the public moneys; for the important services to be rendered by them as fiscal agents of the Government are the fair and proper equivalent of any legitimate advantage to be incidentally derived by them from the custody of the public moneys.

In the limitation of the number of deposite banks to twenty-five, as proposed by the measure I have had the honor to submit, there is an important security against the public deposites being made the basis of bank discounts to any great extent. It must not be forgotten that the charters of all the State banks fix a general limit, beyond which they are not permitted to extend their discounts. That limit is, I believe, ordinarily twice, or twice and a half, the amount of their capitals paid in. As the public deposites, under the measure I propose, would be confined to twenty-five banks, it is evident that they could not be used, to any great extent, (relatively to their amount) by those banks to enlarge their discounts, before they would encounter an impassable barrier in the limit of their charters. This, it is well known, occurred in several cases, (particularly in New York) under the operation of the late system, notwithstanding the greater number of banks then employed as depositories; and, in those cases, authority was given to the banks which had thus exhausted their chartered powers of discounting on the public deposites to turn over the surplus, on which they could no longer discount under the limitations of their charters, to other banks, that they might discount upon them. To any arrangement of this sort for multiplying bank discounts on the public deposites, the measure I have submitted would oppose an insuperable obstacle, as it inflexibly fixes, under all circumstances whatever, the number of banks to be employed as depositories of the public moneys; and, in fixing that number at twenty-five, the salutary charter limitation upon the power of discounting would, as I have just shown, soon be brought into action to prevent excess by them.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that, under the provisions of the substitute I have proposed for the consideration of the Senate, there would be no danger of any unreasonable extension of discounts on the public deposites. I know, however, there are gentlemen of great intelligence and patriotism who are for an absolute prohibition of the banks discounting, to any extent, however moderate, on the public deposites, and who favor, as the means of carrying out that prohibition, a system of special deposites. The high respect I entertain for the opinions of those gentlemen has induced me to consider their suggestion, with more than ordinary anxiety to come to the same conclusions; but, after thorough examination and reflection, according to the best lights of my understanding, I am satisfied that no system of special deposites, however specious in theory, could be worked out in practice, without involving consequences which they themselves (or at least a large majority of them) would promptly repudiate. In the first place, it is demonstrable, I humbly conceive, that any system of special deposites, to be practical and efficient, must lead to a collection of the revenue, directly or indirectly, in specie; and this they oppose as earnestly as I do. The Government must always hold itself ready to pay its creditors in the lawful currency of the country, if demanded. This the banks are bound to do, on behalf of the Government, under the general deposite system. But if you adopt the special system, and collect the revenue, at the same time, in bank notes, the banks would be bound to pay out to the public creditor only the identical notes deposited with them; for this is the fundamental and immutable idea of a special deposite. How, then, would such a system work? The public creditor would present his warrant to a deposite bank; the bank would offer him, in payment, first this note, and then that, which had been specially deposited with it; but none of these notes suiting the convenience of the creditor, and the bank being bound to pay no other, the public claimant would go unpaid, and the engagements of the Government dishonored. To avoid the danger of such a result, the Government, if it adopted a system of special deposites, would be driven, of necessity, to a collection of the revenue in gold and silver; or, otherwise receiving the notes of specie paying banks pro forma, collect the specie for them from the banks by which they were issued, and place that specie on special deposite. But where would be the difference, in the practical effects on the banks and the business and interests of the community connected with them, between collecting the revenue, in the first instance, in gold and silver, and collecting it in the notes of specie paying banks, to be converted into gold and silver by demand upon the banks? The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] expressed the opinion that the latter mode of operation would be the harshest: and when it is considered that this periodical conversion of bank notes would be in large masses, and attended, consequently, with periodical and distressing contractions of the currency, I cannot but agree with him. At all events, there are but these two modes of working out a special deposite system in practice, and neither the one nor the other, it seems to me, can be made acceptable to those who oppose the Sub-Treasury scheme, on account of its tendency to create two currencies in the country—gold and silver for the Government; paper for the people.

There are subsidiary objections to this special deposite system, which, although not of so much weight as that which I have just stated, cannot be overlooked in a just and comprehensive estimate of it. If you adopt it, you renounce, at once, all means of engaging the interests and enlisting the co-operation of the banks to carry out any of those reforms in the paper currency which have heretofore been so favorite an object of the policy of the country. You must also pay them, and pay them, too, no inconsiderable sum for their services to the Government, and thus abandon one of the strong grounds (that of economy) on which bank agency has heretofore been preferred to individual agency, in conducting the operations of the Treasury.

But, to take up the subject in a more enlarged view, is there any valid reason why banks should not be permitted to discount, to a moderate extent, on average balances of public money in their possession, as well as on individual deposites? Wherever banks exist, to receive deposites, public or private, is a regular branch of their business; and to discount upon the average balances of those deposites, which experience shows are not likely to be drawn out by the depositors, is as legitimate and acknowledged an operation of banking as to discount upon their capitals. Is it not for the interest of all that this should be done; that no portion of the national capital should be annihilated by being locked up from use, but that the whole should be made tributary, in some way or other, to the invigoration and support of the national industry? No just distinction can be shown, in this respect, between public and private deposites. Accordingly, in all countries where banks exist, and where the public moneys are deposited in those institutions, deposites of that kind have been invariably recognised, within proper limits, as a perfectly legitimate source of discounts and accommodation to the community. It is admitted that it has been uniformly the case in this country in regard to the public funds both of the General Government and of the States, from the adoption of the Constitution down to the present day. What new light, then, has broken in upon us, that we are, all at once, grown so much wiser than our fathers? In England, the practice is, and has been invariably the same; and here I take upon me to confront a statement which I have repeatedly seen made to the contrary, to wit, that the balances of the public moneys in the hands of the Bank of England were not discounted upon, but were regularly and habitually applied to the purchase of exchequer bills on behalf of the Government. The fact is otherwise; the Bank of England has the use of these balances, for banking purposes; and this use of them is so well understood and avowed, that, in some instances, where the balances have risen to a very great amount, (as, for a series of years after 1806, they did to between £11,000,000 and £12,000,000, equal to near sixty millions of dollars of our money,) the bank has been required to pay a special compensation to the Government for that use. But the ordinary balances of public money in the Bank of England range from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 pounds sterling—about twenty millions of dollars of our money—the use of which is permitted to the bank without any compensation. In like manner, the balances of public money in France, which are occasionally transferred to the Bank of France, are permitted to be used as a source of extended discounts, and, I am informed by an enlightened correspondent in that country, were actually so used, to the great relief of industry and trade, during the late commercial crisis.

Shall a less beneficent use be made of the public moneys not called for by the necessities of the Government, in this Republic of ours, than in the monarchies of Europe? Shall we alone, of all the great family of modern civilized communities, revert to the barbarous practice of hoarding (and that, too, in specie) the occasional surpluses which, from the nature of our revenue system, can neither be foreseen nor guarded against? A most able and eloquent friend in the other House [Mr. LEGARE] has justly characterized the process of taxation as a species of confiscation. It is so, sir. Is it not incumbent upon us, then, when, by so harsh a process, we have undesignedly levied upon the people more than is necessary for the wants of the Government, to mitigate the exaction as much as possible, by restoring the overplus to their use through the channels of business and commerce? Why should the Government play the dog in the manger, neither using its idle hoards itself, nor permitting any body else to use them? Efforts have been made to render the practice of discounting upon the public deposites odious, be representing it as a thing for the benefit of the banks alone. But is it so? Does not every class of the community experience the benefit, and none more so than the great agricultural class, the price of whose products depends mainly on the facilities of sound credit, and the abundance of active capital diffused among the merchants—the more immediate customers of the banks?

It has been sometimes said, also, that the practice of discounting on the public deposites adds to the fluctuations of the currency. But the reverse is demonstrably true. When a large amount of revenue is collected by the Government, and is neither disbursed in the public service, nor returned to the community through the medium of discounts, a sudden and distressing contraction of the currency necessarily ensues. If, however, that portion of the public money not required for the public service, is permitted to be used in the way of discounts for short periods, by the banks, the circulation, through the double process of Government disbursements and bank issues, is maintained at a uniform level, without sensible contraction or expansion. The banks being enabled to foresee at what periods the funds issued by them will be required for occasions of public expenditure, call them in as they are wanted for disbursement—what is drawn in by the hand of the banks is immediately let out by the hand of the Government—and thus the current of circulation is kept steady and full.

These truths have, until lately, been universally felt and acknowledged; and by none more emphatically, or with greater weight of authority, than the distinguished individual "in whose footsteps" the present Administration was expected to tread. It is, doubtless, recollected by the Senate that, on the occasion of the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States, President Jackson, in the able and memorable paper which he presented to his cabinet, stated that the funds thus removed were not to be "annihilated"—that they "would be again issued for the benefit of the trade" by the institutions to which they were transferred. This was, then, considered a trait of liberal, beneficent, and statesmanlike policy, on which the Chief Magistrate and his act were triumphantly sustained and vindicated by his friends before the people. The same distinguished individual, in his very last Message to Congress, declared "it was contrary to the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation." Now the highest ambition of statesmanship seems to be to contrive these self-same "vaults," in which the funds of the nation are to be sent to their "long repose," as "dead men's bones;" for, once there, all that remain, beyond the wants of the Government, are to be buried, annihilated, destroyed, to every purpose of useful existence. What has produced these sudden and singular revolutions of policy and doctrine? Is it because an extraordinary and accidental state of things, the result of peculiar and anomalous causes, has involved the banks, individuals, and the Government, in temporary embarrassment? Then I say nothing is more unsafe than for statesmen to found general and permanent rules of policy on isolated and exceptional cases. We must look to the habitual and ordinary course of human affairs, collect from them the average results of experience and observation, and guide our action by those results. Because the Commonwealth Bank of Massachusetts has failed, because it suits the purpose even of grave Senators to use it daily as a stalking-horse on this floor, are we to be "frighted from our propriety," and therefore distrust and denounce the whole banking system of the country? Are we to take advantage of temporary and factitious excitements, to get up and foster a popular prejudice against banks as a fund for political speculation, at the expense of all the "sober realities of life," and the practical, pervading, home-bred, interests of the country?

As I said, on a former occasion, Mr. President, I stand here as no advocate of the banks. I have not the slightest interest in, nor connection with them, direct or indirect, present or prospective. I am as sensible as any man of the dangers and abuses to which they are liable; and I will go, hand in hand, with any man in devising securities against the one, and applying correctives to the other. But, as a practical legislator and a patriot, I am bound to look to the actual interests of society; and in that view I cannot fail to see that any violent shock given to the established system of business and credit in the country must produce a wide-spread scene of confusion and distress, involving, in its destructive visitation, every class of the community.

In offering the measure I have submitted to the Senate, I have discharged what I consider to be my duty to the country. That country is now in a state of suffering and distress, aggravated by deep anxieties and apprehensions in regard to the future. The measure I propose would, I firmly believe, give relief for the present and hope for the future. It could not fail to restore confidence; and, in doing that, to revive the languishing energies of trade, to quicken the labors and the hopes of the husbandman, the manufacturer, and the mechanic, to raise enterprise again upon its feet, and, above all, to put an end to that unnatural and suicidal war, which, for the last eighteen months, has grown up between the Government of the country and its business and industry. In presenting such a measure, I cannot but regret that I shall be deprived of the support of many members of this body with whom I have lately stood, side by side, in upholding and defending the principles on which it rests. My consolation, however, is, that I stand now where I stood then. On the other hand, the measure they bring forward and patronize is one which, three years ago, we all united in opposing, and which was then denounced, in the name of the Administration and its friends, as a "dangerous enlargement of Executive power, and putting into its hands the means of corruption." This measure cannot have changed its character by mere efflux of time; and, thinking of it now as I thought of it then, I still oppose it.

In taking this course, I know full well, Mr. President, I am to incur the anathemas of party. But I can never forget that I have a country to serve, as well as a party to obey. "'Tis Rome demands our help;" and for one she shall have mine, according to the humble measure of my abilities and the best lights of my understanding. The zealots of both parties may denounce and condemn me, as they have heretofore denounced and condemned me; but, sustained by the consciousness of upright intentions and a faithful devotion to the interests of my country, I shall hold my course unfaltering; and even with the terror before my eyes of sinking into that small minority of which the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] so charitably warned us, I shall yet, animated by a sense of duty, "find in my soul one drop of patience."

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,
OF KENTUCKY,

In Senate, February 19, 1838—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. CLAY rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

I have seen some public service, passed through many troubled times, and often addressed public assemblies, in this Capitol and elsewhere; but never before have I risen in a deliberative body, under more oppressed feelings, or with a deeper sense of awful responsibility. Never before have I risen to express my opinions upon any public measure, fraught with such tremendous consequences to the welfare and prosperity of the country, and so perilous to the liberties of the people, as I solemnly believe the bill under consideration will be. If you knew, sir, what sleepless hours reflection upon it has cost me; if you knew with what fervor and sincerity I have implored Divine assistance to strengthen and sustain me in my opposition to it, I should have credit with you, at least, for the sincerity of my convictions, if I shall be so unfortunate as not to have your concurrence as to the dangerous character of the measure. And I have thanked my God that he has prolonged my life until the present time, to enable me to exert myself in the service of my country, against a project far transcending in pernicious tendency any that I have ever had occasion to consider. I thank him for the health I am permitted to enjoy; I thank him for the soft and sweet repose which I experienced last night; I thank him for the bright and glorious sun which shines upon us this day.

It is not my purpose, at this time, Mr. President, to go at large into a consideration of the causes which have led to the present most disastrous state of public affairs. That duty was performed by others, and myself, at the extra session of Congress. It was then clearly shown that it sprung from the ill-advised and unfortunate measures of Executive administration. I now will content myself with saying that, on the 4th day of March, 1829, Andrew Jackson, not by the blessing of God, was made President of these United States; that the country then was eminently prosperous; that its currency was as sound and safe as any that a people were ever blessed with; that, throughout the wide extent of this whole Union, it possessed a uniform value; and that exchanges were conducted with such regularity and perfection, that funds could be transmitted from one extremity of the Union to the other, with the least possible risk or loss. In this encouraging condition of the business of the country it remained for several years, until after the war, wantonly waged against the late Bank of the United States, was completely successful, by the overthrow of that invaluable institution. What our present situation is, it is as needless to describe as it is painful to contemplate. First felt in our great commercial marts, distress and embarrassment have penetrated into the interior, and now pervade almost the entire Union. It has been justly remarked by one of the soundest and most practical writers that I have had occasion to consult, that "all convulsions in the circulation and commerce of every country must originate in the operations of the Government, or in the mistaken views and erroneous measures of those possessing the power of influencing credit and circulation; for they are not otherwise susceptible of convulsion, and, if left to themselves, they will find their own level, and flow nearly in one uniform stream."

Yes, Mr. President, we all have but too melancholy a consciousness of the unhappy condition of our country. We all too well know that our noble and gallant ship lies helpless and immoveable upon breakers, dismasted, the surge beating over her venerable sides, and the crew threatened with instantaneous destruction. How came she there? Who was the pilot at the helm when she was stranded? The party in power! The pilot was aided by all the science and skill, by all the charts and instruments of such distinguished navigators as Washington, the Adamses, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe; and yet he did not, or could not, save the public vessel. She was placed in her present miserable condition by his bungling navigation, or by his want of skill and judgment. It is impossible for him to escape from one or the other horn of that dilemma. I leave him at liberty to choose between them.

I shall endeavor, Mr. President, in the course of the address I am about making, to establish certain propositions, which I believe to be incontestable; and, for the sake of perspicuity, I will state them severally to the Senate. I shall contend—

1st. That it was the deliberate purpose and fixed design of the late Administration to establish a Government bank—a Treasury bank—to be administered and controlled by the Executive Department.

2d. That, with that view, and to that end, it was its aim and intention to overthrow the whole banking system, as existing in the United States when that Administration came into power, beginning with the Bank of the United States, and ending with the State banks.

3d. That the attack was first confined, from considerations of policy, to the Bank of the United States; but that, after its overthrow was accomplished, it was then directed, and has since been continued, against the State banks.

4th. That the present Administration, by its acknowledgments, emanating from the highest and most authentic source, has succeeded to the principles, plans, and policy, of the preceding Administration, and stands solemnly pledged to complete and perfect them.

And 5th. That the bill under consideration is intended to execute the pledge, by establishing, upon the ruins of the late Bank of the United States, and the State banks, a Government bank, to be managed and controlled by the Treasury Department, acting under the commands of the President of the United States.

I believe, solemnly believe, the truth of every one of these five propositions. In the support of them, I shall not rely upon any gratuitous surmises or vague conjectures, but upon proofs, clear, positive, undeniable, and demonstrative. To establish the first four, I shall adduce evidence of the highest possible authenticity, or facts admitted or undeniable, and fair reasoning founded on them. And as to the last, the measure under consideration, I think the testimony, intrinsic and extrinsic, on which I depend, stamps, beyond all doubt, its true character as a Government bank, and ought to carry to the mind of the Senate the conviction which I entertain, and in which I feel perfectly confident the whole country will share.

1. My first proposition is, that it was the deliberate purpose and fixed design of the late Administration to establish a Government bank—a Treasury bank—to be administered and controlled by the Executive Department. To establish its truth, the first proof which I offer is the following extract from President Jackson's Annual Message, of December, 1829.

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy, in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency.

"Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature, whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the Government and the country that were expected to result from the present bank."

This was the first open declaration of that implacable war against the late Bank of the United States, which was afterwards waged with so much ferocity. It was the sound of the distant bugle, to collect together the dispersed and scattered forces, and prepare for battle. The country saw with surprise the statement that "the constitutionality and expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow citizens," when, in truth and in fact, it was well known that but few then doubted the constitutionality, and none the expediency of it. And the assertion excited much greater surprise, that "it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency." In this message, too, whilst a doubt is intimated as to the utility of such an institution, President Jackson clearly first discloses his object to establish a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues. His language is perfectly plain and unequivocal. Such a bank, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, would secure all the advantages to the Government and the country, he tell us, that were expected to result from the present bank.

In his annual message of the ensuing year, the late President says:

"The importance of the principles involved in the inquiry, whether it will be proper to recharter the Bank of the United States, requires that I should again call the attention of Congress to the subject. Nothing has occurred to lessen in any degree the dangers which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution, as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it become us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles as to obviate constitutional and other objections.

"It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposites, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the Government; and the expense of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange, to private individuals, at a moderate premium. Not being a corporate body, having no stockholders, debtors, and property, and but few officers, it would not be obnoxious to the constitutional objections which are urged against the present bank; and having no means to operate on the hopes, fears, or interests of large masses of the community, it would be shorn of the influence which makes that bank formidable."

In this message, President Jackson, after again adverting to the imaginary dangers of a Bank of the United States, recurs to his favorite project, and inquires "whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, though the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections." And to dispel all doubts of the timid, and to confirm the wavering, he declares that it is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department. As a branch of the Treasury Department! The very scheme now under consideration. And, to defray the expenses of such an anomalous institution, he suggests that the officers of the Treasury Department may turn bankers and brokers, and sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium!

In his annual message of the year 1831, upon this subject, he was brief and somewhat covered in his expressions. But the fixed purpose which he entertained is sufficiently disclosed to the attentive reader. He announces that,

"Entertaining the opinions heretofore expressed in relation to the Bank of the United States, as at present organized, I felt it my duty, in my former messages, frankly to disclose them, in order that the attention of the Legislature and the people should be seasonably directed to that important subject, and that it might be considered, and finally disposed of, in a manner best calculated to promote the ends of the Constitution, and subserve the public interests."

What were the opinions "heretofore" expressed we have clearly seen. They were adverse to the Bank of the United States, as at present organized, that is to say, an organization with any independent corporate Government; and in favor of a National Bank which should be so constituted as to be subject to exclusive Executive control.

At the session of 1831–32, the question of the recharter of the Bank of the United States came up; and although the attention of Congress and the country had been repeatedly and deliberately before invited to the consideration of it by President Jackson himself, the agitation of it was now declared by him and his partisans to be precipitate and premature. Nevertheless, the country and Congress, conscious of the value of a safe and sound uniform currency, conscious that such a currency had been eminently supplied by the Bank of the United States, and unmoved by all the outcry raised against that admirable institution, the recharter commanded large majorities in both Houses of Congress. Fatally for the interests of this country, the stern self-will of General Jackson prompted him to risk every thing upon its overthrow. On the 10th of July, 1832, the bill was returned with his veto; from which the following extract is submitted to the attentive consideration of the Senate:

"A Bank of the United States is, in many respects, convenient for the Government and useful to the people. Entertaining this opinion, and deeply impressed with the belief that some of the powers and privileges possessed by the existing Bank are unauthorized by the Constitution, subversive of the rights of the States, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, I felt it my duty, at an early period of my Administration, to call the attention of Congress to the practicability of organizing an institu- tion, combining all its advantages, and obviating these objections. I sincerely regret that, in the act before me, I can perceive none of those modifications of the bank charter which are necessary, in my opinion, to make it compatible with justice, with sound policy, or with the Constitution of our country."

"That a Bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by Government, might be so organized as not to infringe upon our own delegated powers, or the reserved rights of the States, I do not entertain a doubt. Had the Executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed. In the absence of such a call, it is obviously proper that he should confine himself to pointing out those prominent features in the act presented, which, in his opinion, make it incompatible with he Constitution and sound policy."

President Jackson admits, in the citation which has just been made, that a Bank of the United States is, in many respects, convenient for the Government, and reminds Congress that he had, at an early period of his administration, called its attention to the practicability of so organizing such an institution as to secure all its advantages, without the defects of the existing Bank. It is perfectly manifest that he alludes to his previous recommendations of a Government—a Treasury bank. In the same Message he tells Congress that if he had been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed. Thus it appears that he had not only settled in his mind the general principle, but had adjusted the details of a Government bank, to be subjected to Executive control; and Congress is even chided for not calling upon him to present them. The bill now under consideration, beyond all controversy, is the very project which he had in view, and is to consummate the work which he began. I think, Mr. President, that you must now concur with me in considering the first proposition as fully maintained. I pass to the second and third, which, on account of their intimate connection, I will consider together.

2. That, with a view of establishing a Government bank, it was the settled aim and intention of the late administration to overthrow the whole banking system of the United States, as existing in the United States when that administration came into power, beginning with the Bank of the United States, and ending with the State banks.

3. That the attack was first confined, from considerations of policy, to the Bank of the United States; but that, after its overthrow was accomplished, it was then directed, and has since been continued, against the State banks.

We are not bound to inquire into the motives of President Jackson for desiring to subvert the established monetary and financial system which he found in operation; and yet some examination into those which probably influenced his mind, is not without utility. These are to be found in his peculiar constitution and character. His egotism and vanity prompted him to subject every thing to his will; to change, to remould, and retouch every thing. Hence the proscription which characterized his administration, the universal expulsion from office, at home and abroad, of all who were not devoted to him, and the attempt to render the Executive Department of Government, to use a favorite expression of his own, a complete "unit." Hence his seizure of the public deposites in the Bank of the United States, and his desire to unite the purse with the sword. Hence his attack upon all the systems of policy which he found in practical operation—on that of internal improvements, and on that of the protection of national industry. He was animated by the same sort of ambition which induced the master mind of the age, Napoleon Bonaparte, to impress his name upon every thing in France. When I was in Paris, the sculptors were busily engaged chiselling out the famous N, so odious to the Bourbon line, which had been conspicuously carved on the palace of the Tuilleries, and on other public edifices and monuments in the proud capital of France. When, Mr. President, shall we see effaced all traces of the ravages committed by the administration of Andrew Jackson? Society has been uprooted, virtue punished, vice rewarded, and talents and intellectual endowments despised; brutality, vulgarism, and loco focoism upheld, cherished, and countenanced. Ages will roll around before the moral and political ravages which have been committed will, I fear, cease to be discernible. General Jackson's ambition was to make his administration an era in the history of the American Government, and he has accomplished that object of his ambition; but I trust that it will be an era to be shunned as sad and lamentable, and not followed and imitated as supplying sound maxims and principles of administration.

I have heard his hostility to banks ascribed to some collision which he had with one of them, during the late war, at the city of New Orleans; and it is possible that may have had some influence upon his mind. The immediate cause, more probably, was the refusal of that perverse and unaccommodating gentleman, Nick Biddle, to turn out of the office of President of the New Hampshire branch of the Bank of the United States, at the instance of his Excellency Isaac Hill, in the summer of 1829, that giant-like person, Jeremiah Mason—giant in body, and giant in mind. War and strife, endless war and strife, personal or national, foreign or domestic, were the aliment of the late President's existence. War against the Bank, war against France, and strife and contention with a countless number of individuals. The wars with Black Hawk and the Seminoles were scarcely a luncheon for his voracious appetite. And he made his exit from public life, denouncing war and vengeance against Mexico and the State banks.

My acquaintance with that extraordinary man commenced in this city, in the fall of 1815 or 1816. It was short, but highly respectful, and mutually cordial. I beheld in him the gallant and successful general, who, by the glorious victory of New Orleans, had honorably closed the second war of our independence, and I paid him the homage due to that eminent service. A few years after, it became my painful duty to animadvert, in the House of Representatives, with the independence which belongs to the representative character, upon some of his proceedings in the conduct of the Seminole war, which I thought illegal and contrary to the Constitution and the law of nations. A non-intercourse between us ensued, which continued until the fall of 1824, when, he being a member of the Senate, an accommodation between us was sought to be brought about by the principal part of the delegation from his own State. For that purpose, we were invited to dine with them at Claxton's boarding-house, on Capitol hill, where my venerable friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] and his colleague on the Spanish commission, were both present. I retired early from dinner, and was followed to the door by General Jackson and the present minister of the United States at the Court of Madrid. They pressed me earnestly to take a seat with them in their carriage. My faithful servant and friend, Charles, was standing at the door, waiting for me, with my own. I yielded to their urgent politeness, directed Charles to follow with my carriage, and they sat me down at my own door. We afterwards frequently met, with mutual respect and cordiality; dined several times together, and reciprocated the hospitality of our respective quarters. This friendly intercourse continued until the election, in the House of Representatives, of a President of the United States came on in February, 1825. I gave the vote which, in the contingency that happened, I told my colleague, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] who sits before me, prior to my departure from Kentucky, in November, 1824, and told others, that I should give. All intercourse ceased between General Jackson and myself. We have never since, except once accidentally, exchanged salutations, nor met, except on occasions when we were performing the last offices towards deceased members of Congress or other officers of Government. Immediately after my vote, a rancorous war was commenced against me, and all the barking dogs let loose upon me. I shall not trace it during its ten years' bitter continuance. But I thank my God that I stand here, firm and erect, unbent, unbroken, unsubdued, unawed, ready to denounce the mischievous measures of his Administration, and ready to denounce this, its legitimate offspring, the most pernicious of them all.

His administration consisted of a succession of astounding measures, which fell on the public ear like repeated bursts of loud and appalling thunder. Before the reverberations of one peal had ceased, another and another came, louder and louder, and more terrifying. Or rather, it was like a volcanic mountain, emiting frightful eruptions of burning lava. Before one was cold and crusted; before the voices of the inhabitants of buried villages and cities were hushed in eternal silence, another, more desolating, was vomited forth, extending wider and wider the circle of death and destruction.

Mr. President, this is no unnecessary digression. The personal character of such a chief as I have been describing, his passions, his propensities, the character of his mind, should be all thoroughly studied, to comprehend clearly his measures and his administration. But I will now proceed to more direct and strict proofs of my second and third propositions. That he was resolved to break down the Bank of the United States, is proven by the same citations from his messages which I have made, to exhibit his purpose to establish a Treasury bank, is proven by his veto message, and by the fact that he did destroy it. The war against all other banks was not originally announced, because he wished the State banks to be auxiliaries in overthrowing the Bank of the United States, and because such an annunciation would have been too rash and shocking upon the people of the United States for even his tremendous influence. It was necessary to proceed in the work with caution, and to begin with that institution against which could be embodied the greatest amount of prejudice. The refusal to recharter the Bank of the United States was followed by a determination to remove from its custody the public money of the United States. That determination was first whispered in this place, denied, again intimated, and finally, in September, 1833, executed. The agitation of the American public which ensued, the warm and animated discussions in the country and in Congress, to which that unconstitutional measure gave rise, are all fresh in our recollection. It was necessary to quiet the public mind, and to reconcile the people to what had been done, before President Jackson seriously entered upon his new career of hostility to the State banks. At the commencement of the session of Congress in 1834, he imagined a sufficient calm had been produced, and, in his annual message of that year, the war upon the State banks was opened. In that message he says:

"It seems due to the safety of the public funds remaining in that bank, and to the honor of the American people, that measures be taken to separate the Government entirely from an institution so mischievous to the public prosperity, and so regardless of the Constitution and laws. By transferring the public deposites, by appointing other pension agents, as far as it had the power, by ordering the discontinuance of the receipt of bank checks in payment of the public dues after the first day of January next, the Executive has exerted all its lawful authority to sever the connection between the Government and this faithless corporation."

In this quotation it will be seen that the first germ is contained of that separation and divorce of the Government from banks, which has recently made such a conspicuous figure. It relates, it is true, to the late Bank of the United States, and he speaks of separating and severing the connection between the Government and that institution. But the idea, once developed, was easily susceptible of application to all banking institutions. In the message of the succeeding year, his meditated attack upon the State banks is more distinctly disclosed. Speaking of a sound currency, he says:

"In considering the means of obtaining so important an end, [that is, a sound currency,] we must set aside all calculations of temporary convenience, and be influenced by those only that are in harmony with the true character and permanent interests of the Republic. We must recur to first principles, and see what it is that has prevented the legislation of Congress and the States on the subject of currency from satisfying the public expectation, and realizing results corresponding to those which have attended the action of our system when truly consistent with the great principle of equality upon which it rests, and with that spirit of forbearance and mutual concession and generous patriotism which was originally, and must ever continue to be, the vital element of our Union.

"On this subject, I am sure that I cannot be mistaken in ascribing our want of success to the undue countenance which has been afforded to the spirit of monopoly. All the serious dangers which our system has yet encountered may be traced to the resort to implied yowers, and the use of corporations clothed with privileges, the effect of which is to advance the interests of the few at the expense of the many. We have felt but one class of these dangers, exhibited in the contest waged by the Bank of the United States against the Government for the last four years. Happily, they have been obviated for the present by the indignant resistance of the people; but we should recollect that the principle whence they sprang is an ever-active one, which will not fail to renew its efforts in the same and in other forms, so long as there is a hope of success, founded either on the inattention of the people, or the treachery of their representatives to the subtle progress of its influence."

* * * * "We are now to see whether, in the present favorable condition of the country, we cannot take an effectual stand against this spirit of monopoly, and practically prove, in respect to the currency, as well as other important interests, that there is no necessity for so extensive a resort to it as that which has been heretofore practised."

* * * * "It has been seen that without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of the different States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills; and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress, to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium."

As in the instance of the attack upon the Bank of the United States, the approach to the State banks is slow, cautious, and insidious. He reminds Congress and the country that all calculations of temporary convenience must be set aside; that we must recur to first principles; and that we must see what it is that has prevented the legislation of Congress and the States on the subject of the currency from satisfying public expectation. He declares his conviction that the want of success has proceeded from the undue countenance which has been afforded to the spirit of monopoly. All the serious dangers which our system has yet encountered may be traced to the resort to implied powers, and to the use of corporations. We have felt, he says, but one class of these dangers in the contest with the Bank of the United States, and he clearly intimates that the other class is the State banks. We are now to see, he proceeds, whether in the present favorable condition of the country, we cannot take an effectual stand against the spirit of monopoly. Reverting to his favorite scheme of a Government bank, he says it is ascertained that, instead of being made necessary to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which he is desirous to introduce. The designs of President Jackson against the State banks are more fully developed and enlarged upon in his annual message of 1836, from which I beg leave to quote the following passages:

"I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associately with the preceding one—the currency of the country.

"It is apparent, from the whole context of the Constitution, as well as the history of the times that gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard, in reference to foreign countries, by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognised by the statutes of some States as a tender for debts, or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency."

"Variableness must ever be the characteristic of a currency of which the precious metals are not the chief ingredient, or which can be expanded or contracted without regard to the principles that regulate the value of those metals as a standard in the general trade of the world. With us, bank issues constitute such a currency, and must ever do so, until they are made dependent on those just proportions of gold and silver, as a circulating medium, which experience has proved to be necessary, not only in this, but in all other commercial countries. Where those proportions are not infused into the circulation, and do not control it, it is manifest that prices must vary according to the tide of bank issues, and the value and stability of property must stand exposed to all the uncertainty which attends the administration of institutions that are constantly liable to the temptations of an interest distinct from that of the community in which they are established."

"But although various dangers to our Republican institutions have been obviated by the failure of that bank to extort from the Government a renewal of its charter, it is obvious that little has been accomplished, except a salutary change of public opinion, towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the Constitution. In the acts of several of the States prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of Congress at the last session, forbidding their reception or payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger portion of the precious metals infused into our circulating medium. These measures will probably be followed up in due time by the enactment of State laws, banishing from circulation bank notes of still higher denominations; and the object may be materially promoted by further acts of Congress, forbidding the employment, as fiscal agents, of such banks as issue notes of low denominations, and throw impediments in the way of the circulation of gold and silver.

"The effects of an extension of bank credits and over-issues of bank paper have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various registers and receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amount to nothing more than credits in banks. The banks lent out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be lent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the Government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the Western banks, usually called deposites, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed, each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in the notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose; and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether these bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the Government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposite banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the Union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil.

"The safety of the public funds, and the interest of the people generally, required that these operations should be checked; and it became the duty of every branch of the General and State Governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order, which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring payment of the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the 15th of the present month in favor of actual settlers. This mea sure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our Eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the expansion of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded it progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new States from a non-resident proprietorship—one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants at Government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or treble prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find, in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which have ensued, much to commend and nothing to condemn."

It is seen that he again calls the attention of Congress to the currency of the country, alleges that it was apparent from the whole context of the Constitution, as well as the history of the times that gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals; imputes variableness and a liability to inordinate contraction and expansion to the existing paper system, and denounces bank issues as being an uncertain standard. He felicitates himself upon the dangers which have been obviated by the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, but declares that little has been yet done, except to produce a salutary change of public opinion towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the Constitution. I will here say, in passing, that all this outcry about the precious metals, gold, and the constitutional currency, has been put forth to delude the people, and to use the precious metals as an instrument to break down the banking institutions of the States, and to thus pave the way for the ultimate establishment of a great Government bank. In the present advanced state of civilization, in the present condition of the commerce of the world, and in the actual relations of trade and intercourse between the different nations of the world, it is perfectly chimerical to suppose that the currency of the United States should consist exclusively, or principally, of the precious metals.

In the quotations which I have made from the last annual message of General Jackson, he speaks of the extension of bank credits, and the over-issues of bank paper, in the operations upon the sales of public lands. In his message of only the preceding year, the vast amount of those sales had been dwelt upon with peculiar complaisance, as illustrating the general prosperity of the country, and as proof of the wisdom of his administration. But now that which had been announced as a blessing is deprecated as a calamity. Now, his object being to assail the banking institutions of the States, and to justify that fatal Treasury order, which I shall hereafter have occasion to notice, he expresses his apprehension of the danger to which we are exposed of losing the public domain, and getting nothing for it but bank credits. He describes, minutely, the circular process by which the notes of the banks passed out of those institutions to be employed in the purchase of the public lands, and returned again to them in the form of credits to the Government. He forgets that Mr. Secretary Taney, to reconcile the people of the United States to the dastard measure of removing the public deposites, had stimulated the banks to the exercise of great liberality in the grant of loans. He informs us, in that message, that the safety of the public funds, and the interests of the people generally, required that these copious issues of the banks should be checked, and that the conversion of the public lands into mere bank credits should be arrested. And his measure to accomplish these objects was the famous Treasury order, already adverted to. Let us pause here for a moment, and contemplate the circumstances under which it was issued. The principle of the order had been proposed and discussed in Congress. But one Senator, as far as I know, in this branch of the Legislature, and not a solitary member, within my knowledge, in the House of Representatives, was in favor of it. And yet, in about a week after the adjournment of Congress, the principle, which met with no countenance from the legislative authority, was embodied in the form of a Treasury edict, and promulgated under the Executive authority, to the astonishment of the people of the United States!

If we possessed no other evidence whatever of the hostility of of President Jackson to the State banks of the United States, that order would supply conclusive proof. Bank notes, bank issues, bank credits, were distrusted and denounced by him. It was proclaimed to the people that they were unworthy of confidence. The Government could no longer trust in their security. And at a moment when the banking operations were extended, and stretched to their utmost tension; when they were almost all tottering and ready to fall, for the want of that metallic basis on which they all rested, the Executive announces its distrust, issues the Treasury order, and enters the market for specie, by a demand of an extraordinary amount to supply the means of purchasing the public lands. If the sales had continued in the same ratio they had been made during the previous year, that is, at about the rate of twenty-four millions per annum, this unprecedented demand created by Government for specie must have exhausted the vaults of most of the banks, and produced much sooner the catastrophe which occurred in May last. And, what is more extraordinary, this wanton demand for specie upon all the banks of the commercial capitals, and in the busy and thickly peopled portions of the country, was that it might be transported into the wilderness, and, after having been used in the purchase of public lands, deposited to the credit of the Government in the books of Western banks, in some of which, according to the message, there were already credits to the Government "greatly beyond their immediate means of payment." Government, therefore, did not itself receive, or rather did not retain, the very specie which it professed to demand as the only medium worthy of the public lands. The specie, which was so uselessly exacted, was transferred from one set of banks, to the derangement of the commerce and business of the country, and placed in the vaults of another set of banks in the interior, forming only those bank credits to the Government upon which President Jackson placed so slight a value.

Finally, when General Jackson was about to retire from the cares of Government, he favored his countrymen with a farewell address. The solemnity of the occasion gives to any opinions which he has expressed in that document a claim to peculiar attention. It will be seen on perusing, it, that he denounces, more emphatically than in any of his previous addresses, the bank paper of the country, corporations, and what he chooses to denominate the spirit of monopoly. The Senate will indulge me in calling its attention to certain parts of that address, in the following extracts:

"The Constitution of the United States unquestionably intended to secure to the people a circulating medium of gold and silver. But the establishment of a National Bank by Congress, with the privilege of issuing paper money receivable in payment of the public dues, and the unfortunate cause of legislation in the several States upon the same subject, drove from general circulation the constitutional currency, and substituted one of paper in its place."

"The mischief springs from the power which the moneyed interest derives from a paper currency, which they are able to control; from the multitude of corporations, with exclusive privileges, which they have succeeded in obtaining in the different States, and which are employed altogether for their benefit; and unless you become more watchful in your States, and check this spirt of monopoly and thirst for exclusive privileges, you will, in the end, find that the most important powers of Government have been given or bartered away, and the control over your dearest interests has passed into the hands of these corporations."

"But it will require steady and persevering exertions on your part to rid yourselves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirits of monopoly and other abuses which have sprung up with it, and of which it is the main support. So many interests are united to resist all reform on this subject, that you must not hope that the conflict will be a short one, nor success easy. My humble efforts have not been spared, during my administration of the Government, to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and something, I trust, has been done towards the accomplishment of this most desirable object. But enough yet remains to require all your energy and perseverance. The power, however, is in your hands, and the remedy must and will be applied, if you determine upon it."

The mask is now thrown off, and he boldly says that the Constitution of the United States unquestionably intended to secure to the people a circulating medium of gold and silver. They have not enjoyed, he says, that benefit, because of the establishment of a National Bank, and the unfortunate course of legislation in the several States. He does not limit his condemnation of the past policy of his country to the Federal Government, of which he had just ceased to be the chief, but he extends it to the States also, as if they were incompetent to judge of the interests of their respective citizens. He tells us that the mischief springs from the power which the moneyed interest derives from a paper currency, which they are able to control, and the multitude of corporations; and he stimulates the people to become more watchful in their several States, to check this spirit of monopoly. To invigorate their fortitude, he tells the people that it will require steady and perseverng exertions on their part, to rid themselves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly. They must not hope that the conflict will be a short one, nor success easy. His humble efforts have not been spared during his administration, to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and although he has been able to do something towards the accomplishment of that object, enough yet remains to require all the energy and perseverance of the people.

Such, Mr. President, are the proofs and the argument on which I rely to establish the second and third propositions which I have been considering. Are they not successfully maintained? Is it possible that anything could be more conclusive on such a subject?

I pass to the consideration of the fourth proposition.

4. That the present Administration, by acknowledgements emanating from the highest and most authentic source, has succeeded to the principles, plans, and policy of the preceding Administration, and stands solemnly pledged to complete and perfect them.

The proofs on this subject are brief; but they are clear, direct, and plenary. It is impossible for any unbiassed mind to doubt for a moment about them. You, sir, will be surprised, when I shall array them before you, at their irresistible force. The first that I shall offer is an extract from Mr. Van Buren's letter of acceptance of the nomination of the Baltimore convention, dated May 23d, 1835. In that letter he says:

"I content myself, on this occasion, with saying that I consider myself the honored instrument, selected by the friends of the present Administration, to carry out its principles and policy; and that as well from inclination as from duty, I shall, if honored with the choice of the American people, endeavor generally to follow in the footsteps of President Jackson, happy if I shall be able to perfect the work which he has so gloriously begun."

Mr. Van Buren announces that he was the honored instrument selected by the friends of the present Administration, to carry out its principles and policy. The honored instrument! That word, according to the most approved definition, means tool. He was, then, the honored tool—to do what? to promote the honor and advance the welfare of the people of the United States, and to add to the glory of his country? No, no; his country was not in his thoughts. Party, party, filled the place in his bosom which country should have occupied. He was the honored tool to carry out the principles and policy of General Jackson's administration; and, if elected, he should, as well from inclination as from duty, endeavor, generally, to tread in the footsteps of General Jackson—happy if he should be able to perfect the work which he had so gloriously begun. Duty to whom? to the country, to the whole people of the United States? No such thing; but duty to the friends of the then Administration; and that duty required him to tread in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, and to perfect the work which he had begun! Now, the Senate will bear in mind that the most distinguishing features of General Jackson's administration related to the currency; that he had denounced the banking institutions of the country; that he had overthrown the Bank of the United States; that he had declared, when that object was accomplished, only one-half the work was completed; that he then commenced war against the State banks, in order to finish the other half; that he constantly persevered in, and never abandoned, his favorite project of a great Government Treasury bank; and that he retired from the office of Chief Magistrate, pouring out, in his farewell address, anathemas against paper money, corporations, and the spirit of monopoly. When all these things are recollected, it is impossible not to comprehend clearly what Mr. Van Buren means by carrying out the principles and policy of the late Administration. No one can mistake that those principles and that policy require him to break down the local institutions of the States, and to discredit and destroy the paper medium which they issue. No one can be at a loss to understand that, in following in the footsteps of President Jackson, and in perfecting the work which he begun, Mr. Van Buren means to continue attacking, systematically, the banks of the States, and to erect on their ruins that great Government bank begun by his predecessor, and which he is the honored instrument selected to complete.

The next proof which I shall offer is supplied by Mr. Van Buren's inaugural address, from which I request permission of the Senate to read the following extract:

"In receiving from the people the sacred trust twice confided to my illustrious predecessor, and which he has discharged so faithfully and so well, I know that I cannot expect to perform the arduous task with equal ability and success. But, united as I have been in his counsels, a daily witness of his exclusive and unsurpassed devotion to his country's welfare, agreeing with him in sentiments which his countrymen have warmly supported, and permitted to partake largely of his confidence, I may hope that somewhat of the same cheering approbation will be found to attend upon my path."

Here we find Mr. Van Buren distinctly avowing, what the American people well knew before, that he had been united in the counsels of Gen. Jackson; that he had agreed with him in sentiments, and that he had partaken largely of his confidence. This intimacy and confidential intercourse could not have existed without the concurrence of Mr. Van Buren in all those leading and prominent measures of his friend, which related to the establishment of a Government Bank, the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, the attack upon the State institutions, and the denunciation of the paper currency, the spirit of monopoly, and corporations. Is it credible that General Jackson should have aimed at the accomplishment of all those objects, and entertained all these sentiments, without Mr. Van Buren's participation?

I proceed to another point of powerful evidence, in the conduct of Mr. Van Buren in respect to the famous Treasury order. That order had been promulgated, originally, in defiance of the opinion of Congress, had been continued in operation in defiance of the wishes and will of the people, and had been repealed by a bill passed at the last ordinary session of Congress, by overwhelming majorities. The fate of that bill is well known. Instead of being returned to the House in which it originated, according to the requirement of the Constitution, it was sent to one of the pigeon-holes of the Department of State, to be filed away with an opinion of a convenient Attorney General, always ready to prepare one in support of Executive encroachment. On the 5th of March last, not a doubt was entertained, as far as my knowledge or belief extends, that Mr. Van Buren would rescind the obnoxious order. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri, who sits near me, [Mr. LINN.] to the Senator from Mississippi, who sits farthest from me, [Mr. WALKER,] to the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] and to the whole of the Administration Senators, if such was not the expectation of all of them. Was there ever an occasion in which a new Administration had so fine an opportunity to signalize its commencement by an act of grace and wisdom, demanded by the best interests and most anxious wishes of the people? But Mr. Van Buren did not think proper to embrace it. He had shared too largely in the confidence of his predecessor, agreed too fully with him in sentiments, had been too much united with him in his counsels, to rescind an order which constituted so essential a part of the system which had been deliberately adopted to overthrow the State banks.

Another course pursued by the administration, after the catastrophe of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, demonstrates the hostile purposes towards them of the present Administration. When a similar event had occurred during the Administration of Mr Madison, did he discredit and discountenance the issues of the banks, by refusing to receive them in payment of the public dues? Did the State Governments, upon the former or the late occasion, refuse to receive them in payment of the dues to them, respectively? And if irredeemable bank notes are good enough for State Governments and the people, are they not good enough for the Federal Government of the same people? By exacting specie, in all payments to the General Government, that Government presented itself in the market as a powerful and formidable competitor with the banks, demanding specie at a moment when the banks were making unexampled struggles to strengthen themselves, and prepare for the resumption of specie payments. The extent of this Government demand for specie does not admit of exact ascertainment; but when we reflect that the annual expenditures of the Government were at the rate, including the Post Office Department, of about thirty-three millions of dollars, and that its income, made up either of taxes or loans, must be an equal sum, making together an aggregate of sixty-six millions, it will be seen that the amount of specie required for the use of Government must be immensely large. It cannot be precisely determined, but would not be less probably than fifteen or twenty millions of dollars per annum. Now, how is it possible for the banks, coming into the specie market in competition with all the vast power and influence of the Government, to provide themselves with specie in a reasonable time to resume specie payments? That competition would have been avoided, if, upon the stoppage of the banks, the notes of those of whose solidity there was no doubt, had been continued to be received in payment of the public dues, as was done in Mr. Madison's administration. And why, Mr. President, should they not have been? Why should not this Government receive the same description of medium which is found to answer all the purposes of the several State Governments? Why should they have resorted to the expedient of issuing an inferior paper medium, in the form of Treasury notes, and refusing to receive the better notes of safe and solid banks? Do not misunderstand me, Mr. President. No man is more averse than I am to a permanent inconvertible paper medium. It would have been as a temporary measure only that I should have thought it expedient to receive the notes of good local banks. If, along with that measure, the Treasury order had been repealed, and other measures adopted to encourage and coerce the resumption of specie payments, we should have been much nigher that desirable event than, I fear, we now are. Indeed, I do not see when it is possible for the banks to resume specie payments, as long as the Government is in the field making war upon them, and in the market demanding specie.

Another conclusive evidence of the hostility to the State banks on the part of Mr. Van Buren, is to be found in that extraordinary recommendation of a bankrupt law, contained in his Message at the extra session. According to all the princi ples of any bankrupt sytem with which I am acquainted, the banks, by the stoppage of specie payment, had rendered themselves liable to its operation. If the recommended law had been passed, commissions of bankruptcy could have been immediately sued out against all the suspended banks, their assets seized, and the administration of them transferred from the several corporations to which it is now entrusted, to commissioners appointed by the President himself. Thus, by one blow, would the whole of the State banks have been completely prostrated, and the way cleared for the introduction of the favorite Treasury bank; and is it not in the same spirit of unfriendliness to those banks, and with the same view of removing all obstacles to the establishment of a Government bank, that the bill was presented to the Senate a few days ago by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] against the circulation of the notes of the old Bank of the United States? At a time when there is too much want of confidence, and when every thing that can be done should be done to revive and strengthen it, we are called upon to pass a law denouncing the heaviest penalty and ignominious punishment against all who shall reissue the notes of the old Bank of the United States, of which we are told that about seven millions of dollars are in circulation, and they constitute the best portion of the paper medium of the country; the only portion of it which has a credit every where, and which serves the purpose of a general circulation; the only portion with which a man can travel from one end of the continent to the other; and I do not doubt that the Senator who has fulminated these severe pains and penalties against that best part of our paper medium, provides himself with a sufficient amount of it, whenever he leaves Nashville, to take him to Washington.

[Here Mr. GRUNDY rose, and remarked, "No, sir; I always travel on specie."]

Ah! (continued Mr. CLAY,) my old friend is always specieous. I am quite sure that members from a distance in the interior generally find it indispensable to supply themselves, on commencing their journey, with an adequate amount of these identical notes, to defray its expenses. Why, sir, will any man in his senses deny that these notes are far better than those which have been issued by that Government banker, Mr. Levi Woodbury, aided though he be by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, (I beg his pardon, I mean the ex-Chancellor, the Senator from New York, Mr. WRIGHT?) I am not going to stop here to inquire into the strict legality of the reissue of these notes: that question, together with the power of the Government to pass the proposed bill, will be taken up when it is considered. I am looking into the motive of such a measure. Nobody doubts the perfect safety of the notes; no one can believe that they will not be fairly and fully paid. What, then, is the design of the bill? It is to assail the only sure general medium which the people possess. It is because it may come in competition with Treasury notes or other Government paper. Sir, if the bill had not been proposed by my old friend from Tennessee, I would say its author better deserved a penitentiary punishment than those against whom it is directed. I remember to have heard of an illustrious individual, now in retirement, having, on some occasion, burst out into the most patriotic indignation, because of a waggish trick played off upon him, by putting a note of the late Bank of the United States into his silk purse with his gold.

But it is unnecessary to dwell longer on the innumerable proofs of the hostility against the State banks, and the deliberate purpose of those in power to overthrow them. We hear and see daily, throughout the country, among their partisans and presses, denunciations against banks, corporations, rag barons, the spirit of monopoly, &c.; and the howl for gold, hard money, and the constitutional currency; and no one can listen to the speeches of honorable members, friends of the Administration, in this House and the other, without being impressed with a perfect conviction that the destruction of the State banks is meditated.

I have fulfilled my promise, Mr. President, to sustain the first four propositions with which I set out. I now proceed to the fifth proposition:

5. That the bill under consideration is intended to execute Mr. Van Buren's pledge, to complete and perfect the principles, plans and policy of the past Administration, by establishing, upon the ruins of the late Bank of the United States and the State banks, a Government bank, to be managed and controlled by the Treasury Department, acting under the commands of the President of the United States.

The first impression made by the perusal of the bill, is the prodigal and boundless discretion which it grants to the Secretary of the Treasury, irreconcilable with the genius of our free institutions, and contrary to the former cautious practice of the Government. As originally reported, he was authorized by the bill to allow any number of clerks he thought proper to the various receivers general, and to fix their salaries. It will be borne in mind that this is the mere commencement of a system; and it cannot be doubted that, if put into operation, the number of receivers general and other depositaries of the public money would be indefinitely multiplied. He is allowed to appoint as many examiners of the public money, and to fix their salaries, as he pleases; he is allowed to erect at pleasure costly buildings; there is no estimate for any thing, and all who are conversant with the operations of the Executive branch of the Government know the value and importance of previous estimates. There is no other check upon wasteful expenditure but previous estimates; and that was a point always particularly insisted upon by Mr. Jefferson. The Senate will recollect that, a few days ago, when the salary of the receiver general at New York was fixed, the chairman of the Committee on Finance rose in his place and stated that it was suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury that it should be placed at $3,000; and the blank was accordingly so filled. There was no statement of the nature or extent of the duties to be performed, of the time that he would be occupied, of the extent of his responsibility, or the expense of living at the several points where they were to be located; nothing but the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that was deemed all-sufficient by a majority. There is no limit upon the appropriation which is made to carry into effect the bill, contrary to all former usage, which invariably prescribed a sum not to be transcended.

A most remarkable feature in the bill is that to which I have already called the attention of the Senate, and of which no satisfactory explanation has been given. It is that which proceeds upon the idea that the Treasury is a thing distinct from the treasure of the United States, and gives to the Treasury a local habitation and a name, in the new building which is being erected for the Treasury Department in the city of Washington. In the Treasury, so constituted, is to be placed that pittance of the public revenue which is gleaned from the District of Columbia. All else, that is to say, nine hundred and ninety-nine hundredths of the public revenue of the United States, is to be placed in the hands of the receivers general, and the other depositaries beyond the District of Columbia. Now, the Constitution of the United States provides that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury but in virtue of a previous appropriation by law. That trifling portion of it, therefore, which is within the District of Columbia, will be under the safeguard of the Constitution, and all else will be at the arbitrary disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury.

It was deemed necessary, no doubt, to vest in the Secretary of the Treasury this vast and alarming discretionary power. A new and immense Government bank is about to be erected. How it would work in all its parts could not be anticipated with certainty; and it was thought proper, therefore, to bestow a discretion commensurate with its novelty and complexity, and adapted to any exigencies which might arise. The 10th section of the bill is that in which the power to create a bank is more particularly conferred. It is short, and I will read it to the Senate:

"Sec 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary hereby constituted, to the Treasury of the United States; to the Mint at Philadelphia; to the Branch Mint at New Orleans; or to the officers of either of the receivers general of public moneys, by this act directed to be appointed; to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary constituted by this act to any other depositary constituted by the same, AT HIS DISCRETION, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service, shall seem to him to require. And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both."

It will be seen that it grants a power, perfectly undefined, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to shift and transfer the public money, from depositary to depositary, as he pleases. He is expressly authorized to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary, constituted by the act, to any other depositary constituted by it, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service, shall seem to him to require. There is no specification of any contingency or contingencies on which he is to act. All is left to his discretion. He is to judge when the public service (and more indefinite terms could not have been employed) shall seem to him to require it. It has been said that this is nothing more than the customary power of transfer, exercised by the Treasury Department from the origin of the Government. I deny it, utterly deny it. It is a totally different power from that which was exercised by the cautious Gallatin, and other Secretaries of the Treasury—a power, by-the-by, which on more than one occasion has been controverted, and which is infinitely more questionable than the power to establish a Bank of the United States. The transfer was made by them rarely, in large sums, and were left to the banks to remit. When payments were made, they were effected in the notes of banks with which the public money was deposited, or to which it was transferred. The rates of exchange were regulated by the state of the market, and under the responsibility of the banks. But here is a power given to transfer the public moneys without limit, as to sum, place, or time, leaving every thing to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, the receivers general, and other depositaries. What a scope is allowed in the fixation of the rates of exchange, whether of premium or discount, to regulate the whole domestic exchanges of the country, to exercise favoritism! These former transfers were not made for disbursement, but as preparatory to disbursement: and when disbursed, it was generally in bank notes. The transfers of this bill are immediate payments, and payments made not in bank notes, but specie.

The last paragraph in the section provides that, for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Secretary to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interest, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both. It will be seen that no limit whatever is imposed upon the amount or form of the draft, or as to the depositary upon which it is drawn. He is made the exclusive judge of what is "most conducive to the public interest." Now, let us pause a moment, and trace the operation of the powers thus vested. The Government has a revenue of from twenty to thirty millions. The Secretary may draw it to any one or more points, as he pleases. More than a moiety of the revenue arising from customs is receivable at the port of New York, to which point the Secretary may draw all portions of it, if he think it conducive to the public interest. A man has to receive, under an appropriation law, $10,000, and applies to Mr. Secretary for payment? Where will you receive it? he is asked. On New York. How? In drafts from $5 to $500. Mr. Secretary will give him these drafts accordingly, upon bank note paper, impressed like and simulating bank notes, having all suitable embla zonry, signed by my friend the Treasurer, (whose excellent practical sense, and solid and sound judgment, if he had been at the head of the Treasury, instead of Mr. Levi Woodbury, when the suspension of specie payments took place, would have relieved and mitigated the pecuniary embarrassments of the Government and the people,) countersigned by the Comptroller, and filled up in the usual way of bank notes. Here is one of them, said Mr. CLAY. [He here held up to the gaze of the Senate a Treasury note, having all the appearance of a bank note, colored, engraved, and executed like any other bank note, for $50.] This, continued Mr. CLAY, is a Government post note, put into circulation, paid out as money, and prepared and sent forth, gradually to accustom the people of this country to Government paper.

I have supposed $10,000 to be received in the mode stated by a person entitled to receive it under an appropriation law. Now let us suppose what he will do with it. Any where to the South or West it will command a premium of from two to five per cent. Nowhere in the United States will it be under par. Do you suppose that the holder of these drafts would be fool enough to convert them into specie, to be carried and transported at his risk? Do you think that he would not prefer that this money should be in the responsible custody of the Government, rather than in his own insecure keeping? Do you think he will deny to himself the opportunity of realizing the premium of which he may be perfectly sure? The greatest want of the country is a medium of general circulation, and of uniform value every where. That, especially, is our want in the Western and interior States. Now, here is exactly such a medium; and, supposing the Government bank to be honestly and faithfully administered, it will, during such an administration, be the best convertible paper money in the world, for two reasons: The first is, that every dollar of paper out will be the representative of a dollar of specie in the hands of the receivers general, or other depositaries; and, secondly, if the receivers general should embezzle the public money, the responsibity of the Government to pay the drafts issued upon the basis of that money would remain unimpaired. The paper, therefore, would be as far superior to the paper of any private corporation as the ability and resources of the Government of the United States are superior to those of such corporations.

The banking capacity may be divided into three faculties; deposites, discount of bills of exchange, and promisory notes, or either, and circulation. This Government bank would combine them all, except that it will not discount private notes, nor receive private deposites. In payments for the public lands, indeed, individuals are allowed to make deposites, and to receive certificates of their amount. To guard against their negotiability, a clause has been introduced to render them unassignable. But how will it be possible to maintain such an inconvenient restriction, in a country where every description of paper imposing an obligation to pay money or deliver property is assignable, at law or in equity, from the commercial nature and trading character of our people?

Of all the faculties which I have stated of a bank, that which creates a circulation is the most important to the community at large. It is that in which thousands may be interested, who never obtained a discount, or made a deposite with a bank. Whatever a Government agrees to receive in payment of the public dues is a medium of circulation, is money, current money, no matter what its form may be, Treasury notes, drafts drawn at Washington, by the Treasurer, on the receiver general at New York, or, to use the language employed in various parts of this bill, "such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States." These various provisions were probably inserted not only to cover the case of Treasury notes, but that of these drafts in due season. But if there were no express provision of law, that these drafts should be receivable in payment of public dues, they would, necessarily, be so employed, from their own intrinsic value.

The want of the community of a general circulation of uniform value everywhere in the United States would occasion vast amounts of the species of drafts which I have described to remain in circulation. The appropriations this year will probably fall not much short of thirty millions. Thirty millions of Treasury drafts on receivers general, of every denomination, and to any amount, may be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. What amount would remain in circulation cannot be determined a priori, I suppose not less than ten or fifteen millions; at the end of another year, some ten or fifteen millions more; they would fill all the channels of circulation. The war between the Government and State banks continuing, and this mammoth Government bank being in the market, constantly demanding specie for its varied and ramified opperations, confidence would be lost in the notes of the local banks, their paper would gradually cease to circulate, and the banks themselves would be crippled and broken. The paper of the Government bank would ultimately fill the vacuum, as it would instantly occupy the place of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

I am aware, Mr. President, that by the 25th section of the bill, in order to disguise the purpose of the vast machinery which we are about constructing, it is provided that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payments at the place where payable, &c. Now, what a tremendous power is here vested in the Secretary! He is to prescribe rules and regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable. The speedy presentation! In the case I have supposed, a man has his $10,000 in drafts on the Receiver General at New York. The Secretary is empowered to enact regulations requiring him speedily to present them, and, if he do not, the Secretary may order them to be paid at St. Louis. At New York they may be worth a premium of five per cent.; on St. Louis they may be liable to a discount of five per cent. Now, in a free Government, who would ever think of subjecting the property or money of a citizen to the exercise of such a power by any Secretary of the Treasury? What opportunity does it not afford to reward a partisan, or punish an opponent! It will be impossible to maintain such an odious and useless restriction for any length of time. Why should the debtor (as the Government would be in the case of such drafts as I have supposed) require his creditor (as the holder of the draft would be) to apply within a prescribed time for his payment? No, sir: the system would control you; you could not so control the system. But if such a ridiculous restriction could be so continued, the drafts would, nevertheless, whilst they were out, be the time long or short, perform the office of circulation and money.

Let us trace a little further the operation of this Government Bank, and follow it out to its final explosion. I have supposed the appropriation of some thirty millions of dollars annually by the Government, to be disbursed in the form of drafts, issued at Washington by the Treasury Department, upon the depositaries. Of that amount, some ten or fifteen millions would remain, the first year, in circulation; at the end of another year, a similar amount would continue in circulation; and so on, from year to year, until, at the end of a series of some five or six years, there would be in circulation, to supply the indispensable wants of commerce and of a general medium of uniform value, not less than some sixty or eighty millions of drafts issued by the Government. These drafts would be generally upon the receiver general at New York, because, on that point, they would be preferred over all others, as they would command a premium, or be at par, throughout the whole extent of the United States; and we have seen that the Secretary of the Treasury is invested with ample authority to concentrate at that point the whole revenue of the United States.

All experience has demonstrated that in banking operations a much larger amount of paper can be kept out in circulation than the specie which it is necessary to retain in the vaults to meet it when presented for payment. The proportions which the same experience has ascertained to be entirely safe are one of specie to three of paper. If, therefore, the Executive Government had sixty millions of dollars accumulated at the port of New York, in the hands of the receiver general, represented by sixty millions of Government drafts in circulation, it would be known that twenty of that sixty million would be sufficient to retain to meet any amount of drafts which, in ordinary times, would be presented for payment. There would then remain forty millions in the vaults, idle and unproductive, and of which no practical use could be made. Well: a great election is at hand in the State of New York, the result of which will seal the fate of an existing administration. If the application of ten millions of that dormant capital could save, at some future day, a corrupt Executive from overthrow, can it be doubted that the ten millions would be applied to preserve it in power? Again: let us suppose some great exigency to arise, a season of war, creating severe financial pressure and embarrassment. Would not an issue of paper, founded upon and exceeding the specie in the vaults, in some such proportions as experience had demonstrated might be safely emitted, be authorized? Finally, the whole amount of specie might be exhausted, and then, as it is easier to engrave and issue bank notes than to perform the unpopular office of imposing taxes and burdens, the discovery would be made that the credit of the Government was a sufficient basis whereupon to make emissions of paper money, to be redeemed when peace and prosperity returned. Then we should have the days of continental money, and of assignats, restored! Then we should have that Government paper medium, which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] considers the most perfect of all currency!

Meantime, and during the progress of this vast Government machine, the State banks would be all prostrated. Working well, as it may, if honestly administered, in the first period of its existence, it will be utterly impossible for them to maintain the unequal competition. They could not maintain it, even if the Government were actuated by no unfriendly feelings towards them. But when we know the spirit which animates the present Executive towards them, who can doubt that they must fall in the unequal contest? Their issues will be discredited and discountenanced; and that system of bankruptcy which the President would even now put into operation against them, will, in the sequel, be passed and enforced without difficulty.

Assuming the downfall of the local banks, the inevitable consequence of the operations of this great Government bank; assuming, as I have shown would be the case, that the Government would monopolize the paper issues of the country, and obtain the possession of a great portion of the specie of the country, we should then behold a combined and concentrated moneyed power equal to that of all the existing banks of the United States, with that of the late Bank of the United States superadded. This tremendous power would be wielded by the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the immediate commands of the President of the United States. Here would be a perfect union of the sword and the purse; here would be no imaginary, but an actual, visible, tangible, consolidation of the moneyed power. Who or what could withstand it? The States themselves would become suppliants at the feet of the Executive for a portion of those paper emissions, of the power to issue which they had been stripped, and which he now exclusively possessed.

Mr. President, my observation and experience have satisfied me that the safety of liberty and prosperity consists in the division of power, whether political or pecuniary. In our Federative system, our security is to be found in that happy distribution of power which exists between the Federal Government and the State Governments. In our monetary system, as it lately existed, its excellence resulted from that beautiful arrangement, by which the States had their institutions for local purposes, and the General Government its institution for the more general purposes of the whole Union. There existed the greatest congeniality between all the parts of this admirable system. All was homogeneous. There was no separation of the Federal Government from the States or from the people. There was no attempt to execute practically that absurdity of sustaining, among the same people, two different currencies of unequal value. And how admirably did the whole system, during the forty years of its existence, move and work! And on the two unfortunate occasions of its ceasing to exist, how quickly did the business and transactions of the country run into wild disorder and utter confusion!

Hitherto, I have considered this new project as it is, according to its true nature and character, and what it must inevitably become. I have not examined it as it is not, but as its friends would represent it to be. They hold out the idea that it is a simple contrivance to collect, to keep, and to disburse the public revenue. In that view of it, every consideration of safety and security recommends the agency of responsible corporations, rather than the employment of particular individuals. It has been shown, during the course of this debate, that the amount which has been lost by the defalcation of individuals has exceeded three or four times the amount of all that has been lost by the local banks, although the sums confided to the care of individuals have not been probably one-tenth part of the amount that has been in the custody of the local banks. And we all know that, during the forty years of the existence of the two Banks of the United States, not one cent was lost of the public revenue.

I have been curious, Mr. President, to know whence this idea of receivers generally was derived. It has been supposed to have been borrowed from France. It required all the power of that most extraordinary man that ever lived, Napoleon Bonaparte, when he was in his meridian greatness, to displace the farmers general, and to substitute in their place the receivers general. The new system requires, I think I have heard it stated, something like 100,000 employees to have it executed. And, notwithstanding the modesty of the infant promises of this new project, I have no doubt that ultimately we shall have to employ a number of persons approximating to that which is retained in France. That will undoubtedly be the case whenever we shall revive the system of internal taxation. In France, what reconciled them to the system was, that Napoleon first, and the Burbons afterwards, were pleased with the immense patronage which it gave them. They liked to have 100,000 dependents to add strength to the throne, which have been recently constructed or reascended. I thought, however, that the learned chairman of the Committee on Finance must have had some other besides the French model for his receivers general; and, accordingly, upon looking into Smith's history of his own State, I found that, when it was yet a colony, some century and a half ago, and when its present noble capital still retained the name of New Amsterdam, the historian says: "Among the principal laws enacted at this session, we may mention that for establishing the revenue, which was drawn into precedent. The sums raised by it were made payable into the hands of receivers general, and issued by the Governor's warrant. By this means the Governor became, for a season, independent of the people, and hence we find frequent instances of the Assemblies contending with him for the discharge of debts to private persons, contracted on the faith of the Government" The then Governor of the colony was a man of great violence of temper, and arbitrary in his conduct. How the Sub-Treasury system of that day operated, the same historian informs us in a subsequent part of his work. "The revenue," he says, "established the last year, was at this session continued five years longer than was originally intended. This was rendering the Governor independent of the people. For, at that day, the Assembly had no treasure, but the amount of all taxes went, of course, into the hands of the receiver general, who was appointed by the Crown. Out of this fund, moneys were only issuable by the Governor's warrant, so that every officer in the Government, from Mr. Blaithwait, who drew annually five per cent. out of the revenue, as auditor general, down to the meanest servant of the public, became dependent, solely, of the Governor. And hence we find in the House, at the close of every session, humbly addressing his excellency for the trifling wages of their own clerk." And, Mr. President, if this measure should unhappily pass, the day may come when the Senate of the United States will have humbly to implore some future President of the United States to grant it money to pay the wages of its own sergeant-at arms and doorkeeper.

Who, Mr. President, are the most conspicuous of those who perseveringly pressed this bill upon Congress and the American people? Its drawer is the distinguished gentleman in the white house not far off; its endorser is the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, here present. What the drawer thinks of the endorser, his cautious reserve and stifled enmity prevent us from knowing. But the frankness of the endorser has not left us in the same ignorance with respect to his opinion of the drawer. He has often expressed it upon the floor of the Seante. On an occasion not very distant, denying to him any of the nobler qualities of the royal beast of the forest, he attributed to him those which belong to the most crafty, most skulking, and one of the meanest of the quadruped tribe. Mr. President, it is due to myself to say that I do not altogether share with the Senator from South Carolina in this opinion of the President of the United States. I have always found him, in his manners and deportment, civil, courteous, and gentlemanly; and he dispenses, in the noble mansion which he now occupies, one worthy the residence of the Chief Magistrate of a great people, a generous and liberal hospitality. An acquaintance with him of more than twenty years' duration has inspired me with a respect for the man, although, I regret to be compelled to say, I detest the magistrate.

The eloquent Senator from South Carolina has intimated the course of my friends and myself, in opposing this bill, was unpatriotic, and that we ought to have followed in his lead; and, in a late letter of his, he has spoken of his alliance with us, and of his motives for quitting it. I cannot admit the justice of his reproach. We united, if, indeed, there were any alliance in the case, to restrain the enormous expansion of Executive power; to arrest the progress of corruption; to rebuke usurpation; and to drive the Goths and Vandals from the capital; to expel Brennus and his horde from Rome, who, when he threw his sword into the scale, to augment the ransom demanded from the Mistress of the world, showed his prefereuce for gold; that he was a hard-money chieftain. It was by the much more valuable metal of iron that he was driven from her gates. And how often have we witnessed the Senator from South Carolina, with woful countenance, and in doleful strains, pouring forth touching and mournful eloquence on the degeneracy of the times, and the downward tendency of the Republic? Day after day, in the Senate, have we seen the displays of his lofty and impassioned eloquence. Although I shared largely with the Senator in his apprehension for the purity of our institutions, and the permanency of civil liberty, disposed always to look at the brighter side of human affairs, I was sometimes inclined to hope that the vivid imagination of the Senator had depicted the dangers by which we were encompassed in somewhat stronger colors than they jusified. The arduous contest in which we were so long engaged was about to terminate in a glorious victory. The very object for which the alliance was formed was about to be accomplished. At this critical moment the Senator left us; he left us for the very purpose of preventing the success of the common cause. He took up his musket, knapsack, and shot-pouch, and joined the other party. He went, horse, foot, and dragoon, and he himself composed the whole corps. He went, as his present most distinguished ally commenced with his expunging resolution, solitary and alone. The earliest instance recorded in history, within my recollection, of an ally drawing off his forces from the combined army, was that of Achilles at the siege of Troy. He withdrew with all his troops, and remained in the neighborhood, in sullen and dignified inactivity. But he did not join the Trojan forces; and when, during the progress of the siege, his faithful friend fell in battle, he raised his avenging arm, drove the Trojans back into the gates of Troy, and satiated his vengeance by slaying Priam's noblest and dearest son, the finest hero in the immortal Iliad. But Achilles had been wronged, or imagined himself wronged, in the person of the fair and beautiful Briseis. We did no wrong to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. On the contrary, we respected him, confided in his great and acknowledged ability, his uncommon genius, his extensive experience, his supposed patriotism; above all, we confided in his stern and inflexible fidelity. Nevertheless, he left us, and joined our common opponents, distrusting and distrusted. He left us, as he tells us in his Edgefield letter, because the victory which our common arms were about to achieve, was not to enure to him and his party, but exclusively to the benefit of his allies and their cause. I thought that, actuated by patriotism, (that noblest of human virtues,) we had been contending together for our common country, for her violated rights, her threatened liberties, her prostrate Constitution. Never did I suppose that personal or party considerations entered into our views. Whether, if victory shall ever again be about to perch upon the standard of the spoils party, (the denomination which the Senator from South Carolina has so often given to his present allies,) he will not feel himself constrained, by the principles on which he has acted, to leave them, because it may not enure to the benefit of himself and his party, I leave to be adjusted between themselves.

The speech of the Senator from South Carolina was plausible, ingenious, abstract, metaphysical, and generalizing. It did not appear to me to be adapted to the bosoms and business of human life. It was aerial, and not very high up in the air, Mr. President, either; not quite as high as Mr Clayton was in his last ascension in his balloon. The Senator announced that there was a single alternative, and no escape from one or the other branch of it. He stated that we must take the bill under consideration, or the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia. I do not concur in that statement of the case. There is another course embraced in neither branch of the Senator's alternative; and that course is to do nothing: always the wisest when you are not certain what you ought to do. Let us suppose that neither branch of the alternative is accepted, and that nothing is done: what, then, would be the consequence? There would be a restoration of the law of 1789, with all its cautious provisions and securities, provided by the wisdom of our ancestors, which has been so trampled upon by the late and present Administrations. By that law, establishing the Treasury Department, the treasure of the United States is to be received, kept, and disbursed by the Treasurer, under a bond with ample security, under a large penalty fixed by law, and not left, as this bill leaves it, to the uncertain discretion of a Secretary of the Treasury. If, therefore, we were to do nothing, that law would be revived; the Treasurer would have the custody, as he ought to have, of the public money, and doubtless he would make special deposites of it in all instances with safe and sound State banks, as in some cases the Secretary of the Treasury is now obliged to do. Thus, we should have in operation that very special deposite system, so much desired by some gentlemen, by which the public money would remain separate and unmixed with the money of banks. There is yet another course, unembraced by either branch of the alternative presented by the Senator from South Carolina; and that is to establish a Bank of the United States, constituted according to the old and approved method of forming such an institution, tested and sanctioned by experience; a Bank of the United States which should blend public and private interests, and be subject to public and private control, united together in such manner as to present safe and salutary checks against all abuses. The Senator mistakes his own abandonment of that institution as ours. I know that the party in power has barricaded itself against the establishment of such a bank. It adopted, at the last extra session, the extraordinary and unprecedented resolution, that the people of the United States should not have such a bank, although it might be manifest that there was a clear majority of them demanding it. But the day may come, and I trust is not distant, when the will of the people must prevail in the councils of their own Government; and when it does arrive, a bank will be established.

The Senator from South Carolina reminds us that we denounced the pet bank system; and so we did, and so we do. But does it therefore follow that, bad as that system was, we must be driven into the acceptance of a system infinitely worse? He tells us that the bill under consideration takes the public funds out of the hands of the Executive, and places them in the hands of the law. It does no such thing. They are now without law, it is true, in the custody of the Executive; and the bill proposes by law to confirm them in that custody, and to convey new and enormous powers of control to the Executive over them. Every custodary of the public funds provided by the bill is a creature of the Executive, dependent upon his breath, and subject to the same breath for removal, whenever the Executive, from caprice, from tyranny, or from party motives, shall choose to order it. What safety is there for the public money, if there were a hundred subordinate executive officers charged with its care, whilst the doctrine of the absolute unity of the whole Executive power, promulgated by the last Administration, and persisted in by this, remains unrevoked and unrebuked?

Whilst the Senator from South Carolina professes to be the friend of State banks, he has attacked the whole banking system of the United States. He is their friend; he only thinks they are all unconstitutional! Why? Because the coining power is possessed by the General Government, and that coining power, he argues, was intended to supply a currency of the precious metals, but the State banks absorb the precious metals, and withdraw them from circulation, and, therefore, are in conflict with the coining power. That power, according to my view of it, is nothing but a naked authority to stamp certain pieces of the precious metals, in fixed proportions of alloy and pure metal, prescribed by law, so that their exact value may be known. When that office is performed, the power is functus officio; the money passes out of the Mint, and becomes the lawful property of those who legally acquire it. They may do with it as they please, throw it into the ocean, bury it in the earth, or melt it in a crucible, without violating any law. When it has once left the vaults of the mint, the law-maker has nothing to do with it, but to protect it against those who attempt to debase or counterfeit, and, subsequently, to pass it as lawful money. In the sense in which the Senator supposes banks to conflict with the coining power, foreign commerce, and especially our commerce with China, conflicts with it much more extensively. That is the great absorbent of the precious metals, and is, therefore, much more unconstitutional than the State banks. Foreign commerce sends them out of the country; banks retain them within it. The distinguished Senator is no enemy to the banks; he merely thinks them injurious to the morals and industry of the country. He likes them very well, but he nevertheless believes that they levy a tax of twenty-five millions annually on the industry of the country! Let us examine Mr. President, how this enormous and iniquitous assessment is made, according to the argument of the Senator from South Carolina. He states that there is a mass of debt due from the community to the banks, amounting to $475,000,000, the interest upon which, constituting about that sum of $25,000,000, forms the exceptionable tax. Now, this sum is not paid by the whole community, but only by those individuals who obtain discounts from the banks. They borrow money at six per cent. interest, and invest it in profitable adventures, or otherwise employ it. They would not borrow it if they did not suppose they could make profit by it; and the probability is that they do make profit by it. Instead, therefore, of their being any loss in the operation, there is an actual gain to the community, by the excess of profit made beyond six per cent. interest, which they pay. What are banks? They are mere organized agencies for the loan of money and the transaction of monetary business; regulated agencies acting under the prescriptions of law, and subject to a responsibility, moral and legal, far transcending that under which any private capitalist operates. A number of persons, not choosing to lend out their money privately, associate together, bring their respective capitalist into a common stock, which is controlled and managed by the corporate government of a bank. If no association whatever had been formed, a large portion of this capital, a large portion, therefore, of that very debt of $475,000,000, would still exist, in the shape of private loans. The Senator from South Carolina might as well collect the aggregate amount of all the mortgages, bonds, and notes, which have been executed in the United States for loans, and assert that the interest paid upon the total sum constituted a tax levied upon the community.

In the liquidation of the debt due to the banks from the community, and from the banks to the community, there would not be as much difficulty as the Senator seems to apprehend. From the mass of debts due to the banks are to be deducted, first, the amount of subscriptions which constitute their capitals; secondly, the amount of deposites to the credit of individuals in their custody; and, thirdly, the amount of their notes in circulation. How easily will these mutual debts neutralize each other! The same person, in numberless instances, will combine in himself the relations both of creditor and debtor.

The only general operation of banks beyond their discounts and deposites, which pervades the whole community, is that of furnishing a circulation in redeemable paper, beyond the amount of specie to redeem it in their vaults. And can it be doubted that this additional supply of money furnishes a powerful stimulus to industry and production, fully compensating any casual inconveniences, which sometimes, though rarely, occur? Banks reduce the rate of interest, and repress inordinate usury. The salutary influence of banking operations is demonstrated in countries and sections of country where they prevail, when contrasted with those in which they are not found. In the former, all is bustle, activity, general prosperity. The country is beautified and adorned by the noble works of internal improvement; the cities are filled with splendid edifices, and the wharves covered with the rich productions of our own or of foreign climates. In the latter, all is sluggishness, slothfulness, and inactivity. England, in modern times, illustrates the great advantages of banks, of credit, and of stimulated industry. Contrast her with Spain, destitute of all those advantages. In ancient times, Athens would present an image of full and active employment of all the energies of man, carried to the highest point of civilization, whilst her neighbor, Sparta, with her iron money, affords another of the boasted benefits of metallic circulation.

The Senator from South Carolina would do the banks no harm; but they are deemed by him highly injurious to the planting interest! According to him, they inflate prices, and the poor planter sells his productions for hard money, and has to purchase his supplies at the swoln prices produced by a paper medium. Now, I must dissent altogether from the Senator's statement of the case. England, the principal customer of the planter, is quite as much, if not more, a paper country than ours. And the paper-money prices of the one country are neutralized by the paper-money prices of the other country, if the argument were true, that a paper money country trades disadvantageously with a hard-money country, we ought to continue to employ a paper medium, to counterbalance the paper medium of England. And if we were to banish our paper, and substitute altogether a metallic currency, we should be exposed to the very inequality which has been insisted upon. But there is nothing in that view of the matter which is presented by the Senator from South Carolina. If, as he asserts, prices were always inflated in this country beyond their standard in England, the rate of exchange would be constantly against us. An examination, however, into the actual state of exchange between the two countries, for a long series of years, evinces that it has generally been in our favor. In the direct trade between England and this country, I have no doubt, there is a large annual balance against us; but that balance is adjusted and liquidated by balances in our favor in other branches of our foreign trade, which have finally concentrated in England, as the great centre of the commercial world.

Of all the interests and branches of industry in this country, none has profited more by the use and employment of credit and capital derived from banks and other sources, than the planting interest. It habitually employs credit in all countries where planting agriculture prevails. The States of Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, have almost sprung into existence, as it were, by magic, or, at least, have been vastly improved and extended under the influence of the credit system. Lands, slaves, utensils, beasts of burden, and other supplies, have been constantly bought, and still continue to be purchased, upon credit; and bank agency is all-essential to give the most beneficial operation to these credits. But the argument of the Senator from South Carolina, which I am combating, would not be correct, if it were true that we have inflated prices on this side of the Atlantic, without a corresponding inflation of price on the other side; because the planter generally selling at home, and buying at home, the proceeds of his sale, whatever they may be, constitute the means by which he effects his purchases, and consequently neutralize each other. In what do we of the West receive payment for the immense quantity of live stock and other produce of our industry, which we annually sell to the South and Southwest, but that paper medium now so much decried and denounced? The Senator from South Carolina is very fond of the State banks; but he thinks there is no legitimate currency except that of the Constitution. He contends that the power which the Government possesses to impose taxes restricts it, in their payment, to the receipt of the precious metals. But the Constitution does not say so. The power is given in broad and unrestricted terms; and the Government is left at liberty to collect the taxes in whatever medium or commodity, from the exigencies of the case, it can collect them. It is, doubtless, much the most convenient to collect them in money, because that represents, or can command, every thing, the want of which is implied by the power of taxation. But suppose there was no money in the country, none whatever, to be extorted by the tax-gatherers from an impoverished people: is the power of Government to cease, and the people to be thrown back into a state of nature? The Senator asks if taxes could be levied and collected in tobacco, in cotton, and other commodities? Undoubtedly they could, if the necessity existed for such an inconvenient imposition. Such a case of necessity did exist in the colony of Virginia, and other colonies, prior to the Revolution, and taxes were accordingly levied in tobacco or other commodities, as wolf-scalps, even at this day, compose a part of the revenue of more than one State.

The argument, then, of the Senator against the right of the Government to receive bank notes in payment of public dues, a practice coeval with the existence of the Government, does not seem to me to be sound. It is not accurate, for another reason. Bank notes, when convertible at the will of the holder into specie, are so much counted or told specie, like the specie which is counted and put in marked kegs, denoting the quantity of their contents. The Senator tells us that it has been only within a few days that he has discovered that it is illegal to receive bank notes in payment of public dues. Does he think that the usage of the Government under all its administrations, and with every party in power, which has prevailed for nigh fifty years, ought to be set aside by a novel theory of his, just dreamed into existence, even if it possesses the merit of ingenuity? The bill under consideration, which has been eulogized by the Senator as perfect in its structure and details, contains a provision that bank notes shall be received in diminished proportions, during a term of six years. He himself introduced that identical principle. It is the only part of the bill that is emphatically his. How, then, can he contend that it is unconstitutional to receive bank notes in payment of public dues? I appeal from himself to himself. The Senator further contends, that general deposites cannot be made with banks, and be thus confounded with the general mass of the funds on which they transact business. The argument supposes that the money collected for taxes must be preserved in identity; but that is impossible, often, to do. May not a collector give the small change which he has received from one tax-payer to another tax-payer, to enable him to effect his payment? May he not change gold for silver, or vice versa, or both, if he be a distant collector, to obtain an undoubted remittance to the public Treasury? What, Mr. President, is the process of making deposites with banks? The deposite is made, and a credit is entered for its amount to the Government. That credit is supposed to be the exact equivalent of the amount deposited, ready and forthcoming to the Government whenever it is wanted for the purposes of disbursement. It is immaterial to the Government whether it receives back again the identical money put in, or other money of equal value. All that it wants is what it put in the bank, or its equivalent; and that, in ordinary times, with such prudent banks as alone ought to be selected, it is sure of getting. Again: the Treasury has frequently to make remittances to foreign countries, to meet the expenditure necessary there for our naval squadrons, and other purposes. They are made to the bankers, to the Barings or the Rothschilds, in the form of bills of exchange purchased in the market by the agents of the Government here, with money drawn out of the Treasury. Here is one conversion of the money received from the tax gatherer into the Treasury. The bills are transmitted to the bankers, honored, paid, and the amount credited by them to the United States. Are the bankers bound to retain the proceeds of the bills in identity? Are they bound to do more than credit the Government for an equal amount, for which they stand responsible whenever it is wanted? If they should happen to use any portion of those very proceeds of bills remitted to them in their banking operations, would it be drawing money from the Treasury, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution?

The Senator from South Carolina contends that there is no constitutional power to contract with the twenty-five selected banks, as proposed in the substitute; yet the deposite act of 1836, which obtained the hearty approbation of that Senator, contained a similar provision; and the very bill under consideration, so warmly supported by him, provides, under certain contingencies, for contracts to be made with State banks, to receive deposites of the public money upon compensation. He objects to the substitute, that it converts twenty-five State banks into a system of Federal institutions; but the employment of State institutions by the Federal authority no more makes them Federal, than the employment of Federal institutions by the States converts them into State institutions. This mutual aid, and this reciprocal employment of the several institutions of the general and particular Governments, is one of the results and beauties of our admirable though complex system of government. The General Government has the use of the capital, court-houses, prisons and penitentiaries in the several States. Do they, therefore, cease to appertain to the States? It is to be borne in mind that, although the State banks may occasionally be used by the Federal authority, their legal responsibility to the several States remains unimpaired. They continue to be accountable to them, and their existence can only be terminated or prolonged by the State authority. And being governed, as they are, by corporate authority emanating from, and amenable to, State jurisdiction, and not under the control of the Executive of the United States, constitutes at once a greater security for the public money, and more safety to the public liberty. It has been argued that a separation of the Government from the banks will diminish the Executive power. It must be admitted that the custody of the public money in various banks, subject to the control of State authority, furnishes some check upon the possible abuses of the Executive Government. But the argument maintains that the Executive has least power when it has most complete possession of the public Treasury! The Senator from South Carolina contends that the separation in question being once effected, the relation of the Federal Government and the State banks will be antagonistical. I believe so, Mr. President. That is the very thing I wish to prevent. I want them to live in peace, harmony, and friendship. If they are antagonists, how is it possible that the State banks can maintain their existence against the tremendous influence of this Government? Especially, if this Government should be backed by such a vast Treasury bank as I verily believe this bill is intended to create? And what becomes of the argument urged by the Senator from South Carolina, and the abolition resolutions offered by him at an early period of the session, asserting that the General Government is bound to protect the domestic institutions of the several States?

The substitute is not, I think, what the welfare of the country requires. It may serve the purpose of a good half-way house. Its accommodations appear fair, and, with the feelings of a wearied traveller, one may be tempted to stop awhile and refresh himself there. I shall vote for it as an amendment to the bill, because I believe it the least of two evils, if it should, indeed, inflict any evil; or rather, because I feel myself in the position of a patient to whom the physician presents in one hand a cup of arsenic, and in the other a cup of ptisan: I reject the first, because of the instant death with which it is charged; I take the latter, as being, at the most, harmless, and depend upon the vis medicatrix naturæ. It would have been a great improvement, in my opinion, if the mode of bringing about the resumption of specie payments, contained in the substitute, were reversed: that is to say, if, instead of fixing on the 1st of July for resumption, it had provided that the notes of a certain number of safe, sound, and unquestionable banks to be selected, should be forthwith received, by the General Government, in payment of all public dues; and that, if the selected banks did not resume, by a future designated day, their notes should cease to be taken. Several immediate effects would follow: 1st. The Government would withdraw from the market as a competitor with the banks for specie, and they would be left undisturbed to strengthen themselves. And, 2dly, confidence would be restored by taking off the discredit and discountenance thrown upon all banks by the Government. And why should these notes not be so received? They are as good as Treasury notes, if not better. They answer all the purposes of the State Governments and the people. They now would buy as much as specie could have commanded at the period of suspension. They could be disbursed by the Government. And, finally, the measure would be temporary.

But the true and only efficacious and permanent remedy, I solemnly believe, is to be found in a Bank of the United States, properly organized and constituted. We are told that such a bank is fraught with indescribable danger; and that the Government must, in the sequel, get possession of the Bank, or the bank of the Government. I oppose to these imaginary terrors the practical experience of forty years. I oppose to them the issue of the memorable contest, commenced by the late President of the United States, against the late Bank of the United States. The administration of that Bank had been without serious fault. It had given no just offence to the Government, towards which it had faithfully performed every financial duty. Under its able and enlightened president, it had fulfilled every anticipation which had been formed by those who created it; President Jackson pronounced the edict that it must fall, and it did fall, against the wishes of an immense majority of the people of the United States; against the convictions of its utility entertained by a large majority of the States; and to the prejudice of the best interests of the whole country. If an innocent, unoffending, and highly beneficial institution could be thus easily destroyed by the power of one man, where would be the difficulty of crushing it, if it had given any real cause for just animadversion? Finally, I oppose to these imaginary terrors the example deducible from English history. There a bank has existed since the year 1694, and neither has the bank got possession of the Government, nor the Government of the bank. They have existed in harmony together, both conducing to the prosperity of that great country; and they have so existed, and so contributed, because each has avoided cherishing towards the other that wanton and unnecessary spirit of hostility which was unfortunately engendered in the bosom of the late President of the United States.

I am admonished, sir, by my exhausted strength, and by, I fear, your more exhausted patience, to hasten to a close. Mr. President, a great, novel, and untried measure is perseveringly urged upon the acceptance of Congress. That it is pregnant with tremendous consequences, for good or evil, is undeniable, and admitted by all. We firmly believe that it will be fatal to the best interests of this country, and ultimately subversive of its liberties. You, who have been greatly disappointed in other measures of equal promise, can only hope, in the doubtful and uncertain future, that its operation may prove salutary. Since it was first proposed at the extra session, the whole people have not had an opportunity of passing in judgment upon it at their elections. As far as they have, they have expressed their unqualified disapprobation. From Maine to the State of Mississippi, its condemnation has been loudly thundered forth. In every intervening election, the Administration has been defeated, or its former majorities neutralized. Maine has spoken; New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Rhode Island, Mississippi, and Michigan, all these States, in tones and terms not to be misunderstood, have denounced the measure. The Keystone State (God bless her) has twice proclaimed her rejection of it; once at the polls, and once through her Legislature. Friends and foes of the Administration have united in condemning it. And, at the very moment when I am addressing you, a large meeting of the late supporters of the Administration, headed by the distinguished gentleman who presided in the electoral college which gave the vote of that patriotic State to President Van Buren, are assembling in Philadelphia, to protest solemnly against the passage of this bill. Is it right that, under such circumstances, it should be forced upon a reluctant, but free and intelligent People? Is it right that this Senate, constituted as it now is, should give its sanction to the measure? I say it in no disrespectful or taunting sense, but we are entitled, according to the latest expressions of the popular will, and in virtue of manifestations of opinion deliberately expressed by State Legislatures, to a vote of thirty-five against the bill; and I am ready to enter, with any Senator friendly to the Administration, into details to prove the assertion. Will the Senate, then, bring upon itself the odium of passing this bill? I implore it to forbear, forbear, forbear! I appeal to the instructed Senators. Is this Government made for us, or for the people and the States whose agents we are? Are we not bound so to administer it as to advance their welfare, promote their prosperity, and give general satisfaction? Will that sacred trust be fulfilled, if the known sentiments of large and respectable communities are despised and contemned by those whom they have sent here? I call upon the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] with whom I have so long stood in the public councils, shoulder to shoulder, bearing up the honor and the glory of this great people, to come now to their rescue. I call upon all the Senators; let us bury, deep and forever, the character of the partisan, rise up patriots and statesmen, break the vile chains of party, throw the fragments to the winds, and feel the proud satisfaction that we have made but a small sacrifice to the paramount obligations which we owe our common country.

SPEECH OF MR. TALLMADGE, OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, February 8, 1838—The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill (the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute) imposing additional duties, as depositaries in certain cases, on public officers, &c.

Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD,] who has just taken his seat, introduced in the course of his remarks the subject of the late elections. He read, with approbation, that portion of the President's Message which charged the result of those elections to the interference or the influence of the banks; and he undertook, by this means, to explain the result in New York. Sir, I am not in the habit of interfering with the concerns of other States, or of attempting to explain the causes of political movements in them. But, when I find one "poaching upon my manor," and endeavoring to account for matters which he can but ill comprehend, I feel it my duty to interfere.

I rise, therefore, not to enter upon the immediate merits of this Sub-Treasury scheme, but for the sole purpose of setting the gentleman and the country right, upon this allegation of bank interference or bank influence in the recent election of the State of New York.

Sir, I saw with pain this charge in the President's Message. I felt humiliated that it should emanate from him. I felt that the honor of my native State was wounded, and that the wound was inflicted by one of her own sons. Had any other man occupied the Executive chair, I would have lost no time, after the delivery of the Message containing that unwelcome and unmerited aspersion, in repelling it in a manner and with a spirit becoming the occasion. But, sir, the relations which have always existed between the President and myself rendered the task one of reluctance and of delicacy; and but for the introduction of it into this debate, by the Senator from New Hampshire, I might have submitted to the mortification of the charge, from my unwillingness to encounter it from such a source. As it has been thus introduced, I will endeavor to show that it has been made without the slightest possible foundation, and wholly unjustifiable, let it come from what quarter it may, or let its endorsers be whom they may. In saying this, I speak from my own personal knowledge and observation to a great extent, and from an intimate acquaintance with the concerns of the State, and the causes which influence the minds of her citizens in political matters. Previous to the extra session of Congress, when the Globe, the reputed organ of the Administration, put forth Gouge's Sub-Treasury scheme, with his money drawers and hydrostatic balance, and all the other paraphernalia which accompanied it, and seriously recommended it to the public consideration, it was received and treated as a mere matter of burlesque—as the dream of a visionary. No one, for a single moment, supposed that it would ever be brought forward by the President for the consideration of Congress. The whole country was astounded, when the Executive, at the extra session, did recommend it. The people then perceived that the "untried expedient" from the banks of the St. Lawrence had been put forth in the official organ as a mere feeler. And with the characteristic boldness of all experimenters, it was determined that if it did not conform to the public pulse, the public pulse should be made to conform to it. To accomplish this, there must be no apparent force nor unnecessary rashness. Hence, the Executive, with great meekness and humility, expressed his entire willingness to co-operate in any other measure, if this should not meet the approbation of Congress. This declaration was received with great satisfaction by those who foresaw, from their knowledge of the business wants of the country, that such a measure would be destructive of its best interests.

They hoped to be able to demonstrate its utter impracticability and inapplicability to the state of the times, and that the President would cheerfully unite with them in some plan which would afford relief to a suffering and almost desperate community. It was however, soon perceived, from the pertinacity with which this unexpected measure was urged forward by its advocates that the whole power of the Executive influence was brought into requisition in order to force it through in the shortest possible period, and before the People had time to deliberate upon it, or to send their remonstrances against a project so fatal to their interests and so destructive to their hopes. I will not detain the Senate with a history of its progress. It is familiar to us all. Suffice it to say, that the bill passed the Senate, and was laid on the table in the other House by a decisive vote. This was deemed equivolent to a rejection of the bill. It could not have been called up again at this session if it had been desired. Many votes against the State bank deposite system, which was offered as an amendment, for the express purpose of killing the bill in its original shape. After all this, the President, in his next Message, seems to think that Congress, in its extra session, made an expression against a national bank; against the State banks; but not against the Sub-Treasury project! And as the late elections were carried by bank influence, he deems those overwhelming expressions of the popular will as no evidence that the People are against this wild and visionary scheme! He considers his election as evidence that a majority of the People of the United States are against a national bank, because he had expressed himself decidedly hostile to such an institution. I am free to admit that his inference is a fair as can be drawn from a popular election where a thousand other considerations enter into the canvass. But it cannot be disguised that many electors, who were in favor of a national bank, always voted for General Jackson, notwithstanding his avowed hostility to it. He had a personal popularity which scarcely any man before him possessed, and which I hope to see no man hereafter enjoy. Often have I heard it said by many, that although they disapproved of his measures, they would support him, because they believed him honest, and would not suffer him to be abused for the honest exercise of his opinions, though they led to the adoption of bad measures. Sir, this feeling was extended to the present Executive in his election. He was known to be the favorite candidate of the late President, and many electors supported him on account of their ancient prepossessions in favor of General Jackson. I say, then, that the success of a candidate for office, who is for or against a particular measure, is not conclusive evidence that the People accord with his views on that measure.

The State elections, in my judgment, were more conclusive against the Sub-Treasury than the President's election was against a national bank. There were, undoubtedly, other causes which mingled in the contest. But still, the expression of the popular will, in every State where an election was held after this project was first recommended by the Executive, was such as ought to have commanded his respect, and prevented him from again urging a measure so odious to the People, and if carried out, so fatal to their prosperity.

But, Mr. President, this hard money policy must be persisted in. The Executive had embarked in it, and he seemed determined that no obstacles should impede his progress. He, therefore, charged all this outbreaking of the people to the influence of the banks, and considered it as no evidence of an honest opinion against this ill-fated measure. Notwithstanding the decisive vote against it in the House of Representatives; notwithstanding his declared willingness to adopt any substitute for it, it is again brought forward with the same expressed deference to public opinion, and again urged with the same open contempt of it.

Sir, this charge, though general in its terms, seems peculiarly intended for the State of New York. As a representative of the people of that State, I repel it as unworthy of the Chief Magistrate, as it is undeserved by them. In the lawful exercise of the elective franchise, they have seen fit to rebuke the Administration for its destructive policy, and their action is attributed to the influence of the banks! They saw industry paralyzed, the energies of a whole population frozen up, business of all kinds at a stand, the wives and children of a portion of them famishing for want of bread, and suffering for want of clothes to cover them, and they resorted to the ballot box as the only means in their power to express their disapprobation, and that expression, thus made, is charged to the influence of the banks! Sir, the President has forgotten the character of the people of his own State. He treats them as mere slaves—as men born to obey the Executive mandate, and not to think or act for themselves. Sir, let me tell you that the people of New York "know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain them;" and, as long as I remain here, they shall not want a representative to assert them on this floor. No man, be he high or low, shall go behind the ballot box to canvass the motives of my constituents, without being rebuked for his presumption. I care not what the result of an election may have been; when the people have spoken, their voice is to be respected and obeyed, and they shall not be called to an account, with my consent, by an officer of the General Government for their conduct in their local elections. No matter what party succeeds, such a charge is an indignity to the whole people. I am utterly astonished to hear it from such a quarter. I knew that the official organ here, and other Locofoco prints, had, in this way, attempted to account for this overwhelming result in New York, but I also knew that this charge, from such sources, ha een indignantly repelled by the Democratic press of the State; and notwithstanding all this, the President, as in the case of the Sub-Treasury, adopts the repudiated explanation of the Globe, and ushers it forth to the world.

Sir, I have said that there was no pretence of foundation for this charge. I will demonstrate by statistics and by figures, as clear as any proposition in Euclid, the truth of my assertion. New York has 56 counties—all, except 13, have one or more banks; of those thirteen, five are Opposition, and eight are Administration counties. These eight counties gave the Administration a majority at the Presidential election in 1836 of 6,781; in 1837, they gave 2,617; making an Opposition gain of 4,164 in a nett vote of less than 18,000. These are counties where there are no banks. It is another remarkable fact that the Opposition gain in these eight counties is nearly double what the other counties in the State averaged in their gains. Now, sir, if the banks influenced the results of the election, why do we find the Administration losing more, in proportion, in counties where there are no banks, than in those where there are banks? The truth is, the influence of the banks, as such, was exerted on neither side; but, so far as there was an influence exerted by their officers of those connected with them, it was greater on the part of the Administration than the other. There never was a charge made which is so entirely destitute of any one circumstance to justify it, and which so entirely fails. Coming from such a source, it is an assault upon our free institutions. It is impeaching the principle of self-government. What becomes of our boasted liberty, if the petty incorporations of the States can so far influence the exercise of the elective franchise, that the expression of the ballot-box is not to be taken for what it is intended to represent? What will be our character abroad? The eyes of all Europe are turned to our experiment of self-government, and are confidently expecting a failure of the system which we have predicted would regenerate the civilized world. What will they now think, when they have the authority of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, that in the great State of New York, the "Empire State," the influence of her local banks has controlled her elections, so that their results cannot be relied on as any evidence of the popular will? Sir, under such an imputation as this, a citizen of the United States in a foreign land would blush for his country. And should he repel it, he would be confronted with the President's message, as conclusive evidence in support of the charge. As to my own State, so far as my action will go, I will endeavor to wipe out the blot from the fair escutcheon of her fame.

Mr. President, having shown that the election in New York was in no way controlled by the interference or influence of the banks, it may not be amiss to inquire what causes produced those results which were so astounding to the whole Union. Sir, it was the principles understood to be entertained by the Administration and its prominent friends, and the measures which they were pursuing to carry out those principles. What were they? They are to be found in the creed of a faction, which had its origin in the city of New York in 1829. I do not say they embraced the whole creed, but I do say they were a part of it. And if any man, at that day, had predicted that a Democratic Republican Administration would have countenanced any portion of the principles of this faction, he would have gained no more credence, nor as much, as he now would, if he predicted that, in an equal period, the Administration would adopt the other part of the same creed.

Sir, it will hardly be believed by the people of other States that any portion of those doctrines has been adopted by the Administration and its prominent friends. I do not say that they have been, but I say their course of measures has been such as to impress upon the people the belief of their adoption. I will not undertake to go into the documentary evidence at this time, as the ground of that belief, although I may deem it not inappropriate on some other occasion. This faction was the origin of that party which is now termed Loco Foco, and which, in the pure days of the Democratic Republican party, was turned out of Tammany Hall, and held their meetings in the open air, whenever it was necessary to take measures to reduce the price of flour, or carry out any other great principle in political economy! After their principles received the countenance of the Administration, they again returned to the old wigwam, displaced the ancient sachems, and there they now illustrate their ideas of freedom of speech and free discussion, by violent inroads and forcible interruption of the assemblages of quiet and orderly citizens who happen to entertain opinions on matters of public policy contrary to their own. They are now the leaders of the party, and are the prominent candidates for Executive favor.

The leading feature of their creed was THE DESTRUCTION OF THE WHOLE BANKING SYSTEM OF THE COUNTRY, THE REPEAL OF CHARTERS, AND THE ABROGATION OF VESTED RIGHTS. This was a part of their doctrines, and was understood by the people to be the policy of the Administration.

Why was it so understood? I will endeavor to answer the question.

After the war on the Bank of the United States had ceased, a more ruthless and unrelenting warfare was commenced and carried on against the State banks. The success which had attended the former emboldened the assailants, and they supposed they could make an easy conquest of the latter. It never occurred to them that they might not be able to bring the same force into the field in the one case as in the other. They never stopped to inquire whether the people entertained any different views in regard to the State institutions and a National Bank. They seemed to have forgotten that, during the progress of the first war, they had persuaded the people that there were monstrous evils connected with the one, and equal benefits to be enjoyed with the others. They left out of view all their promises of a sound currency, and an equalization of the domestic exchanges of the country by means of the State banks. They forgot the oft-repeated pledges and assurances that the State institutions could perform equally well all the duties which the Bank of the United States had performed for the Government. In short, they had no recollection that those institutions were to give even a "better currency" than we had enjoyed under a National Bank.

But, sir, although they had overlooked all these things, the people had not forgotten them. Those who opposed the recharter of the Bank of the United States were honest in their opposition. The present generation has principally grown up and come on to the political stage since the incorporation of the Bank of the United States in 1816. They have enjoyed its benefits; and that it possessed great benefits no rational man has ever denied; but they were not able fully to appreciate them, whilst in the full fruition of them. They could see what seemed to them to be its dangerous powers; and with the assurance that the State banks could perform all its duties to the Government, and confer all its benefits on the people, without possessing those powers, they were content that it should go down, and that the State banks should be substituted in its place. Another consideration which influenced their action was the popularity of Gen. Jackson, who led the forces in this contest. Many believed in his sagacity in this matter, and pinned their faith upon him; and others, although they doubted the policy of the measure, still believed in his honesty of purpose, and therefore went with him, "right or wrong." But they had no idea of breaking down the State institutions, so intimately connected, as they believed them to be, with the business wants of the whole country; and when these attacks were made on those institutions, the people began to suspect that they had been used as the instruments in assailing the National Bank, with a view of destroying the others in their turn: such they thought they discovered to be the policy of the Administration.

How did they discover it? By the principles which seemed to be maintained by the Administration and its leading friends; by the manner in which they repudiated the State bank deposite system after they had suspended specie payments—a suspension brought about by causes beyond their control, and which certain measures of the Executive had essentially contributed to produce—and the subsequent introduction of an "untried expedient," in the shape of the Sub-Treasury scheme—a scheme fraught with more mischief to the community, with more hazard to the public funds, with a more dangerous augmentation and concentration of Executive power, than has ever been suggested in the history of this or any other Government. And here, sir, permit me to say, that when the friends of this abominable measure, for I can characterize it by no milder term, present the alternative of it or a National Bank, rest assured that there are thousands and thousands who have been opposed to such an institution, who will, without hesitation, give it their preference. But, sir, that alternative is not yet presented. Gentlemen are attempting to make up a false issue. They vainly imagine that they can conjure up the ghost of the old Bank of the United States to frighten men, as they would frighten children. Sir, that day has gone by. The people are looking for relief amidst the disasters which surround them. They see in the Sub-Treasury scheme nought but ruin; they look with horror upon its adoption as a consummation of ruin; they look to the State bank deposite system as the means of present, and, if the anticipations of its friends be realized, of permanent relief. Some of the friends of a National Bank have proposed plans for State institutions, which they think will supersede the necessity of a Bank of the United States. At all events, those who are in favor of a National Bank know that it cannot be had, if it be had at all, for some time to come; and they know that something must be done for the relief of the country. There is no other plan which can be adopted but the one proposed by the Senator from Virginia. If it answers his expectations, it may satisfy the country; if it does not, the public mind will then be settled down as to what the remedy should be. As to the Sub-Treasury, I say with the Senator from Massachusetts, give me any thing, or give me nothing, in preference to it.

What further evidence had the people that the destruction of the State banks was a part of the policy of the Administration? Meetings were held by the Loco Focos, at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and other places, where resolutions were adopted against the whole banking system, and in favor of an exclusive metallic currency. These proceeding were responded to by men in high official stations, and their responses were perfectly satisfactory. Being thus sanctioned by men in authority, these wild and visionary doctrines began to spread. Many who had viewed them as destructive of the best interests of society, began to renounce former opinions, and adopt this radical creed, because they believed it met the approbation of those who held the reins of party discipline, and who had the power of party dispensation.

The next evidence of the prevalence of this radical spirit was the manner in which the subject of the suspension of specie payments was treated. By the law of New York, when a bank neglects or refuses to redeem its notes in specie for ten days, the Chancellor is directed to issue his injunction, close its doors, appoint a receiver, to take charge of its concerns, whose duty it is to proceed to collect the amount due to the bank, to pay the amount owing by it, and, finally, under the direction of the Chancellor, to distribute to the stockholders the residue of its effects, according to their respective interest. There was due to the banks, at this time, by the people of the State, about SEVENTY MILLIONS OF DOLLARS. A forced collection of this amount, by receivers, would have spread ruin and desolation throughout the whole State. The most valuable estates would have been sold to satisfy these demands. There would have been no competition at the sales—for very few indeed could have commanded the means to become the purchasers. The result would have been, that the most desirable property must have been sacrificed, and bought in by some miserly hard money man, who had hoarded his vile trash for the purpose of preying upon the misfortunes of his fellow citizens, or by the receivers for the benefit of the stockholders. In either event, the community would have been the sufferers, and the hope of present business or of future prosperity would have been utterly blighted. Every rational man foresaw this result. The Legislature was then in session, and a law was forthwith passed, by an almost unanimous vote, to suspend the forfeiture of the charters of the banks for one year. This act of the Legislature was openly denounced by public meetings in the city of New York, composed of those claiming to be the exclusive friends of the Administration. And this denunciation was reiterated by the official organ of the Government here, claiming to speak the sentiments of the Administration on all important public matters. Why was this act thus denounced? Because, if there had been no such interference, the banks would have all been prostrated, as I have already shown, and we should at once have been brought to the "golden age" which has been so long desired. It is true, the great interests of the community would have been sacrificed. But, what of that? We should have had the "constitutional currency"—"a hard money Government"—"a successful experiment"—and, let me add, a prostrate country and a ruined people! Sir, the people were saved from this awful calamity, by the patriotism of the Legislature. The suspension act was not a boon to the banks; it was a favor to the people. Whilst it saved the bank charters from forfeiture, it saved the people from destruction. Other States passed similar laws, and thus were frustrated the designs of those who deemed the suspension of specie payments the proper occasion to carry out their favorite plan of breaking down the whole banking system of the States. I will not say that the President entertained this design. But the people judged him by the effect of his measures. On his call, Congress assembled at the extra session to take into consideration the "great and weighty matters" which he was to submit to them. The Message was delivered, and the people no longer doubted that the President and the Administration intended to destroy the banks. At all events, they could not doubt that such would be the effect of the measures recommended by him. They could only infer the intent from the result which must inevitably follow.

By the Constitution, it is made the duty of the President, from time to time, to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He can recommend no others; and, if he deems such as he does recommend both necessary and expedient, he, of course, desires that Congress shall adopt them, and that they shall be carried into full execution. He had already seen that, by the intervention of the State Legislatures, the bank charters of the different States had been saved from forfeiture, and that the designs of those who wished to destroy them had been frustrated by these acts. Well now, sir, what were his recommendations, and what their inevitable results? He recommended a "uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations, and other bankers," as a measure "fully authorized by the Constitution." Such a law, under his oath of office, he must have deemed "necessary and expedient." And he must, too, have desired its enactment by Congress, otherwise he would not have recommended it. What would have been its effect, its practical operation, if Congress had concurred in the views of the President, and passed a bankrupt law as recommended by him? Why, sir, every bank in the Union would have been forthwith handed over to commissioners to be appointed by the Executive, under such a law, and their concerns closed up—for they had all suspended specie payments, and of course would have come within its provisions. This would have accomplished what was prevented by the action of the Legislatures: namely, a forfeiture of their charters, and a consequent destruction of the banks themselves. Sir, I do not state this case too strongly—such would have been the inevitable result throughout the Union—there is no escape from it. The President could not but have foreseen it. It was the unavoidable consequence of his recommendation. He must have made it with his eyes open, and seen its effects, unless he was blinded and bewildered by this ignis fatuus of Loco Focoism. What would have been the effects upon the business and credit of the country? Utter ruin and destruction from one extremity of the Union to the other. Sir, "war, pestilence and famine" could not more effectually have done their dreadful work.

Fortunately for the country, Congress did not adopt the recommendation of the President, although it was urged with great power by one of the most prominent friends of the Administration, [Mr. BENTON.]

Sir, there is another feature of this measure which deserves consideration. This subject was not new to the President. It had received his careful examination and full deliberation on a former occasion. In 1826, when he stood upon this floor as a Senator from the State of New York, he maintained on this subject the same principles which I am now endeavoring to maintain. He then represented all the great interests of the State, as I am now attempting to represent them. The banking interest was one of the most important, because it gave life to commerce, stimulated agriculture, aided the mechanic and manufacturing industry of the country, and produced a healthy action in the whole body politic. This was at a period anterior to the origin of the faction in New York, whose doctrines have since been adopted. Mr. Van Buren, on the discussion of the BANKRUPT BILL, at that time before the Senate, opposed its application to banking incorporations "as an odious exercise of power not granted by the Constitution." In 1826, Senator Van Buren opposes a bankrupt law in reference to our banking institutions, "as an odious exercise of power not granted by the Constitution," and, in 1837, President Van Buren proposes "a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations, and other bankers," as a measure "fully authorized by the Constitution." Now, sir, permit me to ask, if such a measure was unconstitutional in 1826, can the recommendation of the President make it constitutional in 1837? I think not, unless the Constitution changes as the party changes! But, whether it does or not, is immaterial to the present question. The President recommended a bankrupt law in reference to banking incorporations. He must have reviewed his former opinions on that subject. He must have deemed the crisis so important as to overcome his old constitutional scruples, and that it was now "necessary and expedient" that such a law should pass, and thereby rid the country of the curse of paper money, and thus restore the "constitutional currency" of gold and silver.

Mr. President, I have said that the people believed the design of the Administration and its prominent friends was to destroy the banking institutions of the States. They foresaw what would have been the effect of the adoption of the bankrupt law. They also saw, and still see, the effect of the Sub-Treasury scheme. They know that both are equally fatal. They saw the manner in which the Sub-Treasury was urged at the extra session. They saw by the official organ that, after it was defeated in the House, it was again to be forced upon Congress at the present session, and they see clearly now that its adoption at this time will be as fatal to the banks as a bankrupt law would have been before. Its adoption would prevent the resumption of specie payments. Or, if the banks should resume, it would compel them to stop again. Or, if they continued to pay specie, it would be merely a nominal thing, and they could do no business. If this were the proper occasion, I would undertake to demonstrate these propositions to the satisfaction of every rational man. But I did not rise for that purpose. Suffice it to say, that if a deliberate plan had been formed for the total destruction of the banking system of the whole country, it could not have been more skilfully devised. What was the process by which it was to be accomplished?

1st. By inducing the Legislature not to interfere.

2d. By a bankrupt law.

3d. By the Sub-Treasury scheme, which is the only proposition now under consideration. Under it, the banks cannot resume; and if the Legislature grants no farther indulgence, their concerns must be closed up. If they do resume, they will be compelled to stop again, and they will be in the same situation as if they had not attempted it. If they do not stop, it will be because their circulation is all called in, and they continue because they do no business. In this event the stockholders will wind them up, for the reason that they cannot afford to have an investment which produces no income. In either case the result is the same—the destruction of the banks. I have already shown the disastrous consequences to the whole community from such a state of things; and I will add, in the same language which I employed at the last session, "that it would even be better for the country that a tornado or an earthquake should spread its desolation around, than that we should have this scheme inflicted upon us."

Mr. President, these were some of the causes which produced the results of the late elections in New York. There was another. The people saw the treatment which those received who opposed these measures. They saw some of their representatives here pursuing the straight-forward track of principle, and maintaining the ancient and honored creed of the party; they saw them turning neither to the right nor to the left to gratify the ambition of any man, or to court the favor of any faction; they saw them maintaining the same principles which the whole party maintained but a short period before, and refusing to turn about at the word of command; they saw them opposing a measure which the whole party, with General Jackson at their head, opposed in 1834, and which the official organ of the Administration then pronounced "disorganizing and revolutionary," and manfully resisting the Executive mandate to swallow the Sub Treasury scheme now, which they all repudiated then; they saw them standing in their places, and, with that moral courage and undaunted firmness which should ever characterize the representatives of a free people, resisting the encroachments of Executive power; they saw them, with an independence worthy of the better days of the Republic, combatting the heresies and interpolations which were attempted to be introduced amongst the ancient canons of their political faith; they saw them endeavoring to revive the drooping energies of the country, to resuscitate its trade and commerce, to stimulate its industry, to invigorate its enterprise, to give hope and animation and life to its benumbed and palsied faculties, and to pour consolation into the wounded and broken spirits of the mercantile community. They saw all this; and they also saw, that for all this their representatives were DENOUNCED AND PROSCRIBED by the official organ of the Administration! They saw the despotism which had been introduced by the discipline of party. They saw that neither party men nor the party press dare speak their sentiments on any political subject, until they knew the Executive will. They saw the manner in which the machinery of party was brought into requisition to manufacture public opinion, to sustain that will when it was once made known. They saw that there was no independence of thought or of action within the sphere of Executive influence. They saw, in short, established at the seat of Government the most perfect despotism on earth, THE DESPOTISM OF OPINION!

Sir, this system of dictation, of proscription, and denunciation commenced during the second term of General Jackson's administration. He would not tolerate a difference of opinion on any subject in which his feelings were enlisted. I hope it was the infirmity of age. I might instance the distribution bill, the Specie Circular, and the currency bill. In all these measures the great body of his friends in both Houses were opposed to him. Still the official organ did not hesitate to maintain the Executive will, and to denounce the actions and opinions of those who constituted the legislative branch of the Government.

The present Executive, on entering upon the duties of his high station, promised to "follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." This Sub-Treasury scheme is the darling project of the late President; and, I presume, in pursuance of the above pledge, it has been brought forward for our consideration. To my mind this is its only merit; and no one would be more desirous than myself of gratifying the feelings of that illustrious man, and of smoothing the path of his declining years, by the adoption of his favorite measure, if my judgment did not tell me it would be at the expense of the great and paramount interests of the country. If he himself were here, in the zenith of his power, he perhaps might see his way more clearly. But when his successor attempts to imitate his great strides, he will follow him as Iulus followed Æneas from the flames of Troy, haud passibus equis.

Sir, my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] has spoken of that portion of the friends of the Administration who oppose the Sub-Treasury scheme as a small party, and, with seeming reproach, has kindly extended to them his charity, and more than intimates that they ought to give up their opinions to the majority of their friends. Sir, that small party are maintaining the same principles which the whole party maintained but a short time since; and the difference between them being a matter of principle, cannot be compromised. It is, indeed, a small party, and should on that account have been protected from the apparent sneer of the Senator from New Hampshire, when he said they had assumed the name of "Conservatives." Whether that name has been assumed by them, or has been given to them, I will not stop to inquire. This much, however, I will venture to affirm, that we shall be as well satisfied with that appellation as the gentleman and his friends will be with the name of "Subservatives," with which they have been honored, and with how much justice I leave to themselves to determine. Sir, this small party has been, not inappropriately, called "A SPARTAN BAND;" and let me tell those gentlemen who have reproached them with the peculiarity of their position, and the paucity of their numbers, that when they are asked to lay down their arms, they will give the Spartan answer, "Come and take them." Sir, my colleague, from the peculiarity of his own position, should have seen the indelicacy of commenting upon ours. The time has been when he has been left in a smaller minority of political friends than we are now; but I will do him the justice to say that his opinions, on all matters in difference, have always coincided with the Executive; and had the Executive seen fit to recommend the resuscitation of the State bank deposite system, instead of the Sub-Treasury, we should have seen my colleague, with my friend from Virginia and myself by his side, leading on his faithful troops, and instead of the golden banner under which he is now fighting against the institutions of the States, he would have raised aloft the stars and stripes of his country, the emblem of those rights, and under that sign he would have conquered; and the man who should have had the rashness to introduce the Sub-Treasury scheme, in opposition to the Executive recommendation, would have found himself with not even a corporal's guard.

Mr. President, the Constitution guaranties the liberty of speech and of the press; but, under the present system of party discipline and Executive intimidation, there is virtually an abrogation of both. The Executive department has become too powerful for the Legislative branch of the Government. The great apprehensions of the framers of the Constitution were from the Legislative power. They little dreamed that in the short space of half a century, short in the lifetime of a nation, the Executive department would become so formidable as to overawe the Legislative branch, and dictate to them the measures which he himself was to execute. Sir, the very theory of the Constitution has been reversed. The Legislature has become the weaker power, and the Executive arm is already strengthened beyond what the fathers of the Constitution deemed consistent with the safety and freedom of the Government. Add to that strength the powers of a Treasury bank, which are contained in this bill, and you have given all that can define a despot.

Mr. President, I have spoken with some feeling on this subject. I have reason so to speak. I have seen the distresses of the country. I have seen the embarrassments of my fellow-citizens. I have seen them imploring this Government to afford that relief which they are entitled to ask, and which they are bound to give. I have seen the Government impairing public confidence in the institutions of the States, withdrawing itself upon its own resources, and leaving the people, unaided and alone, to buffet the storms of adversity which it has aided to bring upon them. I have seen the Executive enter upon a system of experiments, destructive of our dearest interests, and subversive of our brightest hopes. I have seen him persist in those experiments after a decisive negative by the Legislative branch of the Government, and after his wild and visionary schemes have been most signally rebuked through the ballot box. I have seen him turn a deaf ear to all the remonstrances which have been made in every part of the country, and, with a cold and dogged indifference, set at nought all those demonstrations of the popular will. Sir, I aver, in the face of the American people, that there is no cause for the continuance of the distress under which the country now labors. It is in the power of the Administration to remove it by its simple fiat. This war upon the banks has dried up the sources of sustenance to the people, as well as of revenue to the Government. Let the Executive abandon this Sub-Treasury scheme—a scheme unworthy of the age in which we live—let him, in good faith, resolve to revive the State bank system, and forthwith, as fast as the joyous news could travel, hope, and life, and activity, and confidence, would spring up on every side to gladden it on its way. I would say, then, to the people of this country, if I could flatter myself that my voice would reach them, rouse from your lethargy; burst the Lilliputian ties that bind you; walk forth in the dignity of freemen; and teach your public servants that you will not silently submit to have your credit destroyed, your prosperity sacrificed, and your wives and children deprived of their bread, to minister to the partisan ambition or unholy caprice of any man or set of men, whom your misplaced confidence may have elevated to stations beyond their deserts. And let me tell you, sir, if the voice which New York has already uttered be disregarded, and these destructive measures be persisted in, I warn you to beware of the IDES OF NOVEMBER; for her voice will then be heard from the Atlantic to the Lakes, louder than the mighty cataract which thunders on her Western border.

SPEECH OF MR. ROBBINS, OF RHODE ISLAND,

In Senate, March 14, 1838—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill, (the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute)—

Mr. ROBBINS addressed the Senate as follows:

In the fall of the Roman empire—in the most corrupt age of that fall—a subtle and fatal poison was devised and compounded, that, without destroying life, destroyed the constitution, wasted by slow degrees all the sources of health, of vigor, of animation, in the victim; reduced his manly form to a mere skeleton of skin and bones, and made the yet living man to resemble the spectre of the dead. Just such a poison to this country, as it appears to me, has been devised and compounded in this Sub-Treasury bill; and that, if forced down, and kept down, it will work a change no less frightful and hideous in her condition and aspect. For I think it must destroy a very great proportion of all the regular business of this country, such as it has hitherto, till of late, existed; as much, I think, as nine parts in ten of that business. That it will involve millions and millions of your fellow-citizens in all the calamities of that destruction; that it will fill your country, from one end of it to the other, with the mouldering monuments of that extensive ruin—monuments of our once great, but then departed prosperity. That it will disable the country entirely, and for ever, from developing her physical resources; will lock up that great storehouse of the elements of national wealth and power—elements bestowed upon us by a kind Providence, and bestowed in a bounty, and with a profusion, without a parallel in any other country, hardly in all other countries put together; resources which, if fully developed, would sustain in happiness and splendor a population of two hundred millions. But a still more calamitous effect of this deleterious policy, I fear, would be, that with the means it would destroy the mind of the country, would make this great people spiritless, helpless, hopeless. Talk of the calamities of foreign war in the comparison! Why, this, to me, is to belittle the subject; it is to compare the greater evil to the less, to the much less. For, though war has its calamities, it has its compensations too; it imparts to a country its own vigor; and that vigor never fails, on the return of peace, soon to obliterate every trace of those calamities. But what hope is left to a country when the mind is gone? It is then prepared for, and exposed to, every other calamity, and especially to that greatest of all calamities—to foreign domination, or to domestic usurpation. What availed it to Rome—her vast extent of empire—an empire that covered the whole of the then civilized world, and much of the barbarian—when once the Roman mind was gone? With what facility then the rude barbarian of the north trampled that empire in the dust! At the flash of his sword, her countless millions cowered, and sunk in trembling submission beneath his sway.

Will it be said that all this is but declamatory rant and wild speculation; that, if this policy be a poison, the proof must come from the trial; that beforehand we can have nothing to oppose to it but conjecture and imagination; and that a sufficient offset to this is conjecture and imagination per contra? Is it indeed so? Have we no proof? Recollect a portion of this same poison we have taken, and have been forced to take, and the effects of that leave no room to doubt what will be the effects of the whole compound and prescription. I mean that portion of the bill which consists in the exaction of the public dues in specie. We are now undergoing that experiment, and have been since May last—the experimentum crucis. Attend now only to one result of that experiment, and to its necessary consequences, which I will endeavor to lay before you, and then doubt if you can whether this policy will be a poison to this country—a most deadly poison.

Why is specie now an article of merchandise, and banished from circulation as a currency? as you all know it is, and has been since May last. It is because Government has exacted its dues in specie, and thereby has kept specie at a premium in the market. What other cause can there be? Specie is not now wanted for exportation, for foreign exchange is below par. Instead of exporting, we now import specie. It is not wanted for internal exchanges; for none of these exchanges are effected in specie. There is no such thing as a draft from one part of the country upon another part of the country, payable in specie. Nor could such a draft be obtained at any known rate of exchange. Every draft or inland bill of exchange is purchased with paper and paid in paper, and in nothing else. It is not because the banks have suspended specie payments; for, notwithstanding that, their credit has remained good, and their paper constitutes the currency of the country, the sole currency. What cause, then, other than this exaction of the public dues in specie can be assigned for this extraordinary fact, that specie has become an article of merchandise, and has ceased to be a currency? I know of none.

When Government, to relieve this demand for specie, thus created by itself, authorized the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes, made receivable in the payment of the public dues, and, besides, had given further time for the payment for so large an amount of those dues, the premium on specie immediately fell in the market, in proportion as the demand had thus been relieved. If that leaves any, doubt as to the cause of the premium on specie, suppose this case: suppose the Government now, to-day, were to say to all their debtors, "we will henceforth receive our dues, as the private citizen receives his dues, and is content to receive them, namely, in the paper of solvent banks," would specie remain at a premium another day? Why should it? How could it? There would be no longer any special demand for specie; and without a special demand specie could not be at a premium in the market.

This exaction of public dues in specie, if this bill is adopted is to be the standing policy of the Government for all future time; and its steady and continued effect must be, as it has been, to keep specie at a premium in the market, and thereby to banish it from circulation as a currency; that is, so long as paper is in circulation as a currency. This must be so in the nature of things. There cannot be, at the same time, in the same place, two currencies of different values. For the more valuable will cease to be a currency, and become an article of merchandise; and the less valuable will become the exclusive currency. The demonstration is before us presented in our daily experience. I say so long as paper is in circulation as a currency.

But this policy, by producing this effect, will produce another effect as its necessary consequence, which must, in the end, destroy that paper currency, make a final end of it, drive every dollar of it out of circulation, and out of existence. When this work is accomplished, then, to be sure, specie will cease to be at a premium in the market, will then return to circulation as a currency, and will be the only currency. Then will come the times so devoutly prayed for by the hard money party—the reign of their constitutional currency. But here let me advise that party to indulge all their transports now, and in anticipation of that happy reign, lest, when those times do come, they should witness scenes very little calculated to enkindle those transports. I feel myself the better authorized to give this caution, as I am old enough to have witnessed such times. Of such times I will only say, at present, that I have no desire to see them renewed. And I beg to assure those hard money gentry, that those times are very far from inspiring transports into any who did witness them; but, on the contrary, that the sufferings of the country were then such as to bring some degree of discredit upon the Revolution itself; and that such then was the general distress, that freedom itself began to lose its value. It was not an unusual quere then with the People, whether the Revolution had, on the whole, proved a blessing to the country.

How will this policy, by keeping specie at a premium in the market, as it must, destroy the paper currency? Why, by making it impossible for the banks to resume and to continue specie payments, and to continue to do further business as banks of discount. Yes, impossible. I know the banks are anxious to resume—think they can resume, and can maintain themselves in the teeth of this policy. But they are mistaken, the thing is impossible. For I ask whether any bank can get on as a bank who cannot keep their bills in circulation for a day? And I ask who would keep their bills on hand for a day, when he could return them to the bank, take the specie, go into the market with that, and make a profit to himself? If a bank cannot keep its bills in circulation for a day, can that bank do any further business as a bank of discount? Why every further discount would, in effect, be a loan in specie. In that situation no bank can make a discount. What then is the condition of all the banks in the country, and in what dilemma do they stand? If they resume specie payments, they have to meet all their bills at once; to go on redeeming so long as they have specie to redeem with; and to suspend all further discounts. And this would make an end of them. On the other hand, if they do not resume specie payments, they forfeit their charters; and this forfeiture must, in the end, be enforced against them. For no State would tolerate, as a settled thing, a bank to issue irredeemable paper, or redeemable only at the will of the bank. And this would make an end of them. This policy, then, if adopted and fastened upon the country, will be a death warrant to all the banks in the country. When all the banks of the country are thus destroyed, of course there will no longer be any paper currency. Then will be accomplished the end intended by this policy—the end not avowed indeed, but hardly disguised; but whether intended or not, that end will be accomplished: namely, the destruction of all the paper currency of the country. How will this affect the business of the country? Why, all that portion of the business which has been created and sustained by the banking system will fall with the system; as all that portion of the medium of exchange, created by that system, will then be abstracted from the business of the country and gone. For the business of every country will adjust itself, and proportion itself, to the medium of exchange, of the standard commercial value, which it possesses, and may command in business. It is so in theory, it is found to be so in fact. Go to what country you will, and you find its business corresponding in amount to its amount of such a medium.

Now, what proportion of the business of the country has been created and sustained by the banking system? I have stated, and I think not less than nine parts in ten.

In order to throw a discredit upon the banking system, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, near me, [Mr. NILES,] have both told us of the enormous disproportion between the circulating credits of the banks, and the specie in their vaults; the one a little less than five hundred millions; and the specie not one-tenth of that amount. In this view of the subject, and with their view, the honorable gentlemen have not done justice to their own argument. For they might have added the immense amount of bank credits which never appear in circulation, which appear only on the books of the bank; but which make a part of bank credits, and as much so as their bills in circulation. I mean the transfer of credits on the books of the bank, founded on deposites, and these made up of discounts. In all our great commercial cities these transfers probably exceed in amount the amount of bills in circulation there. While arraying before us, and arraigning the sins of the banking system, (which seems to consist in extending the business of the country,) these honorable gentlemen might have put another criminal charge into their bill of indictment. It is this: That part of the business of the country which is to be placed to the credit of the specie portion of the currency is more than doubled by means of the banks. For, without banks, a great part of the specie of the country would be dead stock lying idle in private coffers; and that portion of it in the hands of business men would be idle much of the time; for it must be accumulated beforehand, and kept on hand to meet engagements. But with banks all the specie of the country is kept in activity, constant activity. When these honorable gentlemen revise and republish their criminal calendar against the banks, I hope they will not omit then to place these two offences in the criminal list. Let them put all the bank crimes together—their bills in circulation beyond their specie—their transfer credits which are not in circulation—the augmented activity and operation given by them to specie, and I have no doubt they will prove banks guilty of having created and sustained at least nine parts in ten of the whole business of the country. Their task, I admit, would have been still easier to make manifest this enormous guilt of the banking system, if we still had a National Bank existing. For then they might add to the criminal account all that business which had been destroyed by destroying that bank. Be it remembered, that bank had been a great offender in this same criminal business of extending the business of the country; much greater than the local banks were or could be. For that bank had not only given to the country a national currency everywhere of the same uniform value and that value of the specie standard, but had thereby created a collateral currency of ten times the amount of its bills. For it had converted every inland bill of exchange into currency, as much so as their bank bills; and this collateral currency had grown up to the enormous amount of six hundred millions annually. But by destroying that bank you, at one stroke, destroyed the whole system of inland exchanges.

This I look upon as the primary and great cause of all our commercial difficulties and embarrassments. I know that there were other causes in other acts of the Government; but these were but subordinate causes, such as the removal of the deposites, the instructions given to the deposite banks as to the deposites, the specie circular, and the indiscreet mode of transferring the surplus to the States; but the great mother cause was the entire destruction of the whole system of inland exchanges.

I shall not now dwell further upon the idea of the expansion of currency by means of inland bills of exchange, as suggested, as I have been anticipated in this idea by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in his splendid effort on yesterday; and knowing as I do that all I could say on that topic would but weaken the effect of what has been better said by him.

To return, then, to the point I was upon: will it be said that where nine parts in ten of the circulating medium is abstracted from the business of the country, specie will flow in to fill up that mighty void, and to sustain that business? Alas! the specie of the country, instead of being augmented by that event, will be diminished by it greatly diminished; for doubtless we owe much of the specie now in the country to that very business which has been created and sustained by the banks. Though specie is said to be a fluid that will keep its level in the commercial world, (by which is meant its relative commercial value,) yet, though in this sense it is every where at the same level, it is not every where at the same depth. That depth depends upon and is measured by the amount of business of any given country. That amount is the true gauge of that depth. Why is the specie of England so great in comparison with the specie of other commercial countries? Only because her business is great in comparison with theirs in the same proportion.

The country, then, is to be deprived of nine parts in ten of her circulating medium. She is to content herself as she may with the remaining tenth part; that part is to diminish, we know not how much, but greatly to diminish; and our business is to fall off in the same proportion, and to dwarf itself down to that diminutive scale.

If there be a man who could contemplate the consequences of such a tremendous crash in the business of the country, and feel no remorse at being the author of them, or in any degree the author, I will only say that should another Shakspeare arise, he would have no occasion to go to Italy for another Shylock, nor for a thousand Shylocks concentrated in one. For what would he see? He would see his country reduced, and by his means, to one wide waste of ruin, one universal scene of desolation; and the more shocking to every other eye, as it would be filled, as I have said, from one end of it to the other, with the mouldering monuments of her once great but then departed prosperity. In all our great commercial cities, a death-like silence reigning in all their streets, unthronged, untrodden even, except by the casual and solitary passenger; their houses untenanted, unrepaired, and crumbling to decay; all our manufacturing villages unpeopled, unvoiced—heaps of ruin, and scenes of desolation; our agriculture without a market, her crops a drug, and perishing on hand; our commercial marine, instead of spreading the sail in every sea, rotting at our wharves; all our works of internal improvement, begun but not finished, abandoned to decay; and all our finished works unoccupied, unprofitable, and a dead stock to the proprietors. What shall I say of the poor, the laboring classes, making in the aggregate, with their families, so many millions of our fifteen, unhoused, unfed, unclad, exposed to bide the pelings of this pitiless storm, sent upon them by their own Government! And here let me add that the Government itself will not be exempt from the consequences of the calamities of which it will have been the author; the Government will be without money and without credit. Then that Eagle, once fabled to have borne in his talons the thunderbolts of Jove, but certainly born with a wing to rise from the earth, and soar to the Heavens, and to survey the world beneath his noble flight, will no longer be the proud but just emblem of our country; no longer, then, poised on his outstretched wings, should he be seen above the stars in the flag of the Union; no; let him then be expunged (we shall have learned the process) from the star-spangled banner; and let the meanest in the troop of the barn-door fowl, or the lowest of creeping things, occupy his place, as the fittest emblem to represent the humility of our condition, and to tell the world of our fallen pride and abdicated pretensions.

But, if these things must be so, if you will have them to be so, why, let them be so. But I pray you to consider how, in the mean while, you are fulfilling the high behest of the Constitution—which is to promote the general welfare of the country by the enlightened exercise of your delegated powers; and to look, for a moment, at the wide waste of the future, as well as present happiness of the country, you are committing by this suicidal policy.

I have said that this policy would disable the country, entirely and forever, from developing her physical resources. No proof of this now is necessary; all must see that the state of things described, and which must exist under this policy, would make the thing impossible—would make the attempt even impossible. Taking this to be so, let us look for a moment at the magnitude of the object thus to be attained. It is difficult to give any just idea of this magnitude; because some, perhaps many, of their resources are yet to be discovered as well as developed; but especially because of the boundless extent in which they severally exist.

Consider the immensity of the resource existing in the manual labor of this great people, if that resource was fully called forth, as it might be, by a proper policy. A people multiplying with such rapidity; doubling in twenty-five years; increasing in geometrical ratio; with room and means for that rapidity of increase for ages and ages to come. A people, too, distinguished, above all others, for inventive ingenuity; for hardy adventure; and for indomitable perseverance. A people, before whom all difficulties vanish—because, to them, they do not seem to be difficulties—such is their boundless confidence in their own powers of achievement. But this active and enterprising people, whose spirit alone, if properly fostered, would make the fortune of any country, is to be forced down, and kept down, to a state of inaction by their own Government; and to have all their faculties benumbed, to fit them for this torpid state, by its stupid and stupifying policy.

Again, consider the immensity of our resource in agriculture, if that resource was to be fully developed. Why, the imagination sinks under every effort to conceive its magnitude, or to make any approach to its comprehension. Now, this resource can never be fully developed, but by adequate markets; and these to be created by ourselves; which this policy will forever render impossible.

Of our mineral riches, below the surface and buried in the earth, we know, as yet, comparatively but little; but we know enough, to know that this, like all our other resources, will be found to exist in measureless extent. One character of infinitude belongs to them all.

The resource, too, in mechanical power in our streams and in our coal regions, who would undertake to calculate and define its extent? The power of numbers would fail him; and all other powers; some new calculus must be invented and applied to solve the problem.

But, above all, and to crown all these, is our resource in works of internal improvement, which are to give value to all our resources; indeed, without them, the comparative value of all our other resources would be as nothing contrasted to the value which this would give them. These improvements are to give concentration to all these resources, and to bring them all to bear, with all their united influence, upon the growth of every part of the country.

This sketch, imperfect as it is, will give us some idea of the magnitude, or rather of the infinitude, of our physical resources, the development of which is to be forever abandoned under this policy. Look at England, and see what she has done for herself, simply by developing her physical resources. What one of these resources has she left undeveloped to the utmost? What in the industry and ingenuity of her people? What in her agriculture? What in her mineral riches? What in her means of mechanical power? And, above all, what in her internal improvements? Not one. And what thereby has she done for herself, I ask again?

She has thereby placed herself in the front rank of nations for wealth and power, and made herself the first in that rank. She has thereby accumulated a capital that is a prodigy upon the earth, a capital that not only fills up every channel in every department of her own industry, but which overflows and spreads itself to the extreme verge of the habitable globe. There is not a civilized country on the earth whose industry and enterprise are not invigorated more or less by that capital. And what are the physical resources of England compared to ours? Why, not a tithe, I might say not one per cent.

Oh! the heart sickens when it contemplates and contrasts what this country might be, under the full development of these resources, with what it must be under the total abandonment of that work, to which it is to be compelled by this policy; and it sickens the more, if he reflects that we were, and not long since, on the high road to that full development—that the pathway to it was then direct before us—that we were making rapid advances in that pathway, and that our final and complete success was certain. The rivers do not find their way with more certainty nor more rapidly to the ocean, than that course of policy was carrying the country on to that final and complete success; and when he reflects, too, that we have only to return to the same course of policy still to reach that glorious destination.

But there is a lion in the path. A phantom is conjured up to fill the people with imaginary terrors, and to frighten them from a return to that path. They are told that the money power wielded by the banks is dangerous to the liberties of the country, as if that money power could have any possible interest in arraying itself against those liberties. Why the prosperity of the country is the very element in which the banks live and breathe and move and have their being; of which prosperity they are at once both the effect and the cause. Destroy that prosperity, and you destroy them: They to array themselves against those liberties, when those liberties are intimately blended with that prosperity, and essential to it! Destroy those liberties, and you destroy that prosperity. But if the banks were foolish enough and wicked enough to attempt this now, could they act in combination to this end? Banks have nothing of the esprit du corps, nor is it in the nature of things that they should have. They are made up of individuals scattered far and wide, mostly unknown to each other, and who have no meetings together, for the annual meetings for the choice of directors are never attended but by a few. Besides, the members are made up of all parties, and are changing constantly; the members to-day not being the members to-morrow. A bank is a mere money-making concern, and looks only to that business. It is true that when their existence is attacked, they act upon the common principle of human nature, in self-defence, and stand upon their chartered rights In no case (and here I defy contradiction) has any bank corporation in this country ever been known to move with a concerted action to any political object whatever. I speak not of the individual members; I speak of the corporate body moving as a corporate body. The truth is, they have less of the esprit du corps than any other corporations whatever. Even religious corporations have far more of that spirit.

The money power wielded by the banks dangerous to the liberties of the country! I marvel that the State Legislatures have never had the sagacity to perceive this danger. They have now been in the practice of creating these corporations, the old States for forty years, and the new States ever since they have been States, and are still in the practice. This proves, as it seems to me, either that the danger is so small as to be invisible to them, or that they are indifferent to those liberties. If the danger is too small to be visible, it seems to me it is too small to be talked about; and if these State Legislatures are really indifferent to those liberties, why, the danger comes from them, and the war should be made against them. Then we should fight the danger at the fountain head, and in its headquarters.

I know that there is a little band of Loco Focos in each of the several States, (who, by-the-by, I would not speak disrespectfully of them now, since the President has seen fit to put himself at their head, and to make himself their chief,) a little band, I say, who are frightened, or affect to be, at this danger; who are raising a terrible outcry against banks on this account; and who are incessantly warning their Legislatures of this danger. But strange to tell, and lamentable as strange, these Legislatures seem to pay as little heed to their warning voices as they would to the barkings of so many; I will not say what. And there is reason to fear that the outcry here about this danger, even in the Senate chamber of the United States, will be as little heeded by them, and that they will still go on creating these corporations. I think I have seen it stated in the papers that Mississippi, this Loco Foco cry of danger to the contrary notwithstanding, is now engaged in the horrid act of creating a bank with a capital of some ten millions.

There is, too, another lion in the path, another phantom. The banks, it is said, are dangerous to the stability of property, by their power at will to elevate or depress its standard of value; to elevate by their expansions, and to depress by their contractions. If they had this power, (for which there is not a shadow of a pretext,) what possible interest can they have in causing these elevations and depressions? They deal only in money; not at all in property. The interest on their discounts is all they can make; that interest is fixed by law; that interest they cannot enlarge without forfeiting their charters. So, if they had this power, they could gain nothing by its exercise.

Besides, these expansions depend not upon the will of the bank, but upon the community where they exist. They can make no discounts, if no discounts are demanded, nor beyond the demand; and that demand will be governed by the exigencies of business at the time. As for contractions, they have this power, and they must have it for their own safety. No bank would be safe for a day without this power. But there is no danger of the abuse of that power; for every contraction is so far a direct loss to the bank itself.

Besides, farther, this imaginary power supposes a condition which it is impossible should ever exist. It supposes that the eight hundred banks of the country (if there be so many) will all by concert expand on the same day, and all by concert contract on the same day: and further, as to expansions, that all the business men of the country, in concert with the banks, will simultaneously make a demand for discounts on that day. Of all the preposterous ideas that ever entered into the head of a man, the idea of such a concert and combination appears to me the most preposterous.

As to the idea that a National Bank would be still more dangerous in both these respects, that is, if possible, a still more preposterous idea; for it supposes that a bank which we have under our absolute control, and our constant inspection, would be more dangerous than the eight hundred banks of the States, with ten times the capital, over which we have no control, into whose affairs we have no right of inspection.

As to expansions and contractions with regard to every bank, these do and must take place. They are the necessary consequence of their connection with the business of the country, and the ebbs and flows in that business; but these are compensated, and a thousand times compensated, by the benefits of that business to the country.

These two phantoms, namely, the danger of banks to the liberties of the country, and the danger of banks to the stability of property, I hope have had their day, and will soon vanish. The dawn seems to be breaking upon the country, when these phantoms, like all unreal beings, who mock the benighted vision of men, will disappear. For in every quarter we hear an outcry against this barbarous and chimerical attempt to carry the country back to a metallic currency, as the only medium of exchange. Every where we see the people taking their stand on the side of that capital which the banks with their credits alone can give to the business of the country. Every where their complaints are reproaching the Government for the want of that national currency, by which alone the exchanges on which the whole business of the country depends, can be put on a convenient and prosperous footing.

These are the harbingers of that dawn to which I have alluded. But though we have the dawn, we have yet to wait for the day; that is, we have yet to wait the time when the people can interpose and act for their own relief. Yes, the people are yet to suffer; and to suffer yet more severely. That great pause in the whole business of the country, which has now endured so many months, is yet to endure for months to come; and that general distress, which is the consequence of that pause, and which has deepened from month to month, is yet to deepen and to deepen still further upon the people. For I take it be a settled thing that this Administration is not to concede to the people any of those measures, which they consider and demand as measures of relief; and that the hand which has afflicted is not to be the hand which is to relieve the country.

SPEECH OF MR. BAYARD, OF DELAWARE.

In Senate, March 9 and 10, 1838.—On the Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill (the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute,)—

Mr. BAYARD addressed the Senate as follows:

MR PRESIDENT: I have listened attentively to the debate on this subject, in its different stages, from the grave and elaborate opening of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to the florid harangue of the Senator from Ohio, [MR. ALLEN,] and again to the ornate speech of my classical friend from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] and I have felt the truth of the saying of the great dramatist—

"There is no vice so simple but assumes
Some mark of virtue on its outward parts."

We have been appealed to in the most spirit-stirring strains to rescue the Government from its helpless dependence on the banking system of the country; and have been told that the measure is intended merely to provide for its proper independence, by enabling it to keep and disburse its own revenues. That is all! says the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] That is all! echoes the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES.] And we have had it repeated, with every variety of inflection, in every note of the gamut. But, sir, I beg leave to say that is not all! No act of legislation can be an insulated measure; it has its antecedents and its consequents: it cannot, like the fabled coffin of Mahomet, be suspended between earth and heaven, having no connection with either; it forms part of the web of human events and actions, and must have its influence upon them.

The present measure is objectionable, both for its acts and omissions. The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] says it is very simple! No, doubt, sir, considered with reference to itself alone; but time, place, and circumstance, enter into the propriety of human action and the fitness of things. That the Government should possess the means of keeping safely its revenues, and should enjoy every facility for their transfer and disbursement, is a proposition which, as a mere abstraction, no one will deny. But the wisdom and propriety of the measure which professes to accomplish those objects must depend on its nature and the circumstances of the times. What, then, sir, are the circumstances which must be regarded in judging of the fitness of this? They are, the condition of society and the constitutional duty of the Government. The practical statesman looks always to the actual condition of society, and is bound to use the delegated powers, whatever they may be, whether few or many, to promote the welfare and happiness of the whole community. What, then, is the condition of society? Commercial confidence impaired, industry paralyzed, the domestic exchanges burdensome from their inequality, and the currency of the country an inconvertible paper! The Government, in common with the rest of the community, feels the inconvenience of this state of things, and seeks to escape from it, to relieve itself, while it leaves society, that is, the people of the country, to suffer all its evils with the most selfish and heartless indifference.

It may be, Mr. President, that this Sub-Treasury is only a Government Bank in disguise; an artful method of uniting the money power with the sword, of swelling inordinately the Executive power and influence; but I am willing to consider it, as it is presented, as a measure of divorce between the Government and the banks, and as if intended merely to enable the former to keep and disburse its revenues by its own immediate officers. But, sir, does the Government owe no duty to the nation, connected with this matter? Was it created merely that it might exist, or are its powers trusts which were confided that they might be employed to promote the general welfare? I hold it to be a fundamental principle that its delegated powers, such as they are, should be used so as to promote to the utmost the happiness and prosperity of the whole community. If one mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the revenues of the Government is more conducive to that general prosperity than another, that mode should be adopted. Thus, in exercising the taxing power, which covers every mode of taxation, direct and indirect, the selection of one mode of taxation rather than another, of imposts rather than excises, or of imposts rather than a direct tax on persons or property, must be made in reference to the convenience and welfare of the entire community. So in the mode of keeping and disbursing the revenues of the country. If it can be shown that the general prosperity is better promoted by using the banks as fiscal agents than any other, or than the mode proposed, the Government is bound, notwithstanding there may be temporary and occasional inconvenience in so doing, to adopt that which, in the most comprehensive view, accomplishes the great purpose of its creation—the national welfare. But, sir, independently of this general duty, it owes to the country the specific, constitutional one of establishing a uniform national currency; and, as a branch of that duty, it is bound to supply a sufficient quantity of gold and silver coin for the use of society.

The Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] sensible that if this proposition is sound, his bill is not only an abandonment of that duty, but hostile to it, took care in the outset, as the President did in his September Message, to deny its truth; and we are called upon to show that clause of the Constitution which gives the power and imposes the duty. It must be recollected that the Constitution is a collection of general principles, expressed in general phrases, and that their import is to be gathered from the context and the subject matter in relation to which they are used. Bearing this in mind, there is no difficulty in showing, from the circumstances under which the Constitution was adopted, from the positive provisions which it contains, from the subject matter of those provisions, and from the authority of its commentators, that such power is given and such duty imposed. One of the highest wants of the social state is a common medium of exchange; some species of property which, having universal value, is exchangeable for all other commodities, and the possession of which will enable every individual to command such of the necessaries of life as his condition requires. That species of property is money. In all ages, and in all countries, its regulation has been regarded as one of the highest and most important functions of sovereign power, and for the simple reason that society cannot exist without it. It is the lifeblood of the moral being, which we call the State. This is no idle metaphor. No, sir; it seems to me that no two subjects can bear a more striking analogy to each other than the blood of the natural and the circulating medium of the moral being. You might as well expect the continuance of health and power in man after drawing off the purple current of life, as the preservation of the welfare or existence of civilized society after the loss of its circulating medium. The rude condition of savage life and its bonds of union might be preserved without it, but the slightest advances in civilization and its necessary result, the division of labor, render its presence indispensable. As civilization advances, its utility becomes intense in the compound ratio of the division of labor and the variety of individual consumption. What would become of the hatter or the saddler if they had nothing to offer in exchange for the necessaries of life, for their bread and their beef, but their hats and saddles? And how still more helpless would be the condition of the man whose industry was employed in furnishing only the stirrup, or in plating the stirrup after it had been produced by the labor of another? Without a common circulating medium civilized society would be a curse rather than a blessing. The savage might find in the chase, or in the spontaneous productions of nature, the means of livelihood; but starvation would be the lot of masses of individuals whose support was to be derived only from a particular branch of labor, unless the products of that labor could be exchanged for some common species of property, the possession of which would enable them to command the necessaries of life.

Can it be believed that a matter of such vital importance was overlooked by the convention? or that one which concerns the welfare of the whole community should have been left to accident, or the irregular action of the component parts of this great Confederacy? No, sir; the Constitution, in giving to Congress the power to coin money, and regulate its value, did give, and meant to give, the whole and exclusive control over the general currency, as a matter of the highest national concernment. This might be supposed from the slightest consideration of the circumstances of the times, which were those of the greatest embarrassment in money matters, owing to the existence of an inconvertible paper currency issued by the old Congress and by the several States; and is apparent from the provisions of the Constitution, which, while it gives to Congress the power "to coin money," denies that power to the States, as well as the power "to emit bills of credit;" and yet provides that nothing "but gold and silver coin shall be a tender in payment of debts." It is manifest that the convention had in mind the subject of currency which is one of general interest and of absolute necessity; and if the States could neither supply coin or paper to serve that purpose, without which society could not exist, it is a necessary consequence that, in giving the power to Congress "to coin money," with the other provisions connected with that subject, it was designed to impose upon it the duty of providing a national currency. That such was the object of those provisions, is established by the authority of the illustrious statesman who had the largest share in framing that instrument, as well as in afterwards explaining its meaning, and recommending its adoption to the American people. Mr. Madison, in treating upon that portion of the Constitution, in the 44th number of the Federalist, thus expresses himself:

"The extension of the prohibition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen in proportion to his love of justice, and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained, since the peace, from the pestilent effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man; on the necessary confidence in the public councils; on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of republican government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States, chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or rather an accumulation of guilt, which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating the coin, prove with equal force that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. Had every State a right to regulate the value of its coin, there might be as many different currencies as States; and thus the intercourse among them would be impeded; retrospective alterations in its value might be made, and thus the citizens of other States be injured, and animosities kindled among the States themselves. The subjects of foreign powers might suffer from the same cause, and hence the Union be discredited and embroiled by the indiscretion of a single member. No one of these mischiefs is less incident to a power in the States to emit paper money than to coin gold or silver. The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts is withdrawn from the States on the same principle with that of issuing a paper currency."

We have here the contemporary exposition of one of the ablest expounders of the Constitution as to the object of those provisions; and no one who reads the passage can doubt that it was the intention of the framers of that instrument to give to Congress the exclusive power over the general currency of the country.

More than twenty-seven years afterwards, we have the authority of the same statesman, then at the head of the Federal Executive, who, in his annual message in December, 1815, expresses himself to this effect:

"It is true that the improved condition of the public revenue will not only afford the means of maintaining the faith of the Government with its creditors inviolate, and of prosecuting successfully the measures of the most liberal policy, but will also justify an immediate alleviation of the burdens imposed by the necessities of the war. It is, however, essential to every modification of the finances that the benefits of a uniform currency should be restored to the community. The absence of the precious metals will, it is believed, be a temporary evil; but until they can again be rendered the general medium of exchange, it devolves on the wisdom of Congress to provide a substitute, which shall equally engage the confidence, and accommodate the wants of the citizens throughout the Union."

I must say, then, Mr. President, that to my mind nothing can be clearer than that the Constitution, in giving the power to Congress "to coin money," with the cognate provisions, designed by that form of expression to confer upon it the absolute control over the monetary system of the country.

I admit, sir, that gold and silver coin is the legal and constitutional currency; or, in other words, was designed by the framers of that instrument to be the standard of value. But it by no means follows that it is absolutely necessary that the entire currency should consist of gold and silver. On the contrary, provided the main object can be obtained of preserving a sufficient supply of coin for the uses of society; if the general prosperity can be best promoted by having an admixture of convertible paper, the Government is bound to use its constitutional power over the subject in such manner as best to promote that prosperity, by suffering the use of paper. The entire currency may be regarded as consisting of two branches: first, the commercial currency, and secondly, the currency of common use. The first would naturally consist of bills of exchange and promissory notes, the latter of coin and bank notes; but they run into each other, and, under our system of banking, the commercial currency is in a great measure supplied by the banks. As to the currency of common use, there can be no doubt that it should consist in great measure of coin, for by that the great mass of the common contracts, consisting of the wages of labor and the purchase of the necessaries of life, is to be discharged.

The question as to the sufficiency of the supply of coin to preserve the currency in a wholesome condition is one of experience. Whether the ratio of the mixture of coin and paper shall be a fourth, a third, or a half, in order to maintain its constitutional character, can be settled only by practical observation; but whatever that ratio may be, inasmuch as the use of coin as currency is a heavy expense to the nation in the loss of interest, it results, as a necessary consequence, from the fiduciary character of the powers of this Government, that Congress is bound to exercise a sound discretion in its action on the monetary system, and is not compelled, because it has the power, to "provide an exclusive metallic currency for the country; or, in other words, sir, the powers of Government are not like mechanical powers which blindly continue to act until arrested, but, on the contrary, suppose intelligence and judgment in their execution, which are to keep constantly in view the great end and purpose for which they are bestowed—the prosperity and welfare of the whole community.

Now, sir, let me ask, what is the present condition of the currency? The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report on the finances, exhibits, in one of his tabular statements, the amount of bank notes in circulation as being $99,561,000. The currency, then, is composed of these $99,561,000 of inconvertible paper of every denomination, from one dollar to a thousand, with some millions in notes of individuals and corporate bodies for fractional parts of the dollar, and without a dollar or a dime of coin as its component part, whilst coin itself itself is at a premium of from 3 to 5 per cent.

What is the duty of the Government under these circumstances? Why, sir, clearly to restore specie payments by its proper action on the subject, and for the same that it is to coin money; because the Constitution has imposed on Congress the duty of controlling the monetary system, and providing a sufficient supply of coin for the uses of society. Let me, then, ask whether this measure has any the slightest tendency to perform this duty? So far from it, its tendency is to postpone and defeat that measure. The condition of the banks, as appears from the Secretary's report, is this: their immediate liabilities on account of circulation and deposites are $211,521,236, while their immediate means are $32,145,242, little more than one of the latter for seven of the former. How, then, is it possible for these banks to resume and continue specie payments without confidence on the part of the community? While specie is at a premium and confidence impaired, they could not maintain their ground for forty-eight hours. And yet the Government is holding up these institutions in the most odious light to the People, as fraudulent bankrupts, and declares, by this measure, its determination to trust them no further. Is this a wise and judicious exercise of the powers of this Government? Is this seeking, in the administration of its powers, the prosperity and welfare of the community?

But, sir, this Sub-Treasury scheme is not only a dereliction of the duty of the Government in the existing circumstances of the currency, but is in truth an abandonment of its control over the circulating medium altogether. The whole banking system of the country, as at present conducted, is vicious. The banks have usurped that control over the currency which the Constitution designed Congress alone should exercise. They have usurped it, because it is a law of currency that paper expels coin; or, to state the proposition more broadly, that, in every description of currency, the least valuable supplants that which is more so.

The practical effect of this principle upon the currency of our country is seen in the following facts: in his annual report on the finances, made in December, 1836, the Secretary states the whole amount of coin in the country, in the month of October, 1833, to have been about $50,000,000, of which he supposes $26,000,000 were in the vaults of the banks as the bases of their issues, and $4,000,000 in active circulation. At that time, as appears from a document laid on our tables at this session, the Mint had coined in amount, of various denominations, $18,758,560. So that at least $18,000,000 of our own coined money had been not only excluded from circulation, but driven from the country, or, to speak more properly, exported as superfluous, owing to the use of paper money. I am not to be understood as expressing any opinion on this result, but as stating a fact in illustration of a principle which I shall presently have occasion to use in relation to the subject under discussion. In order to comprehend its bearing and force, it is necessary to ascertain, with such precision as the subject is susceptible of, the condition of the currency before the suspension of specie payments. I take the condition of the currency stated by the Secretary to have existed on the first of December, 1836, namely, $120,000,000 of paper and $28,600,000 of coin. This he thinks was redundant in its paper part, which should not have exceeded $80,000,000, making the entire currency $108,000,000, instead of $148,000,000. Upon that point it is not necessary to express any opinion, nor is it material which amount is assumed to be the entire currency. The sufficiency of coin in circulation will depend, first, on the ordinary, and, secondly, on the extraordinary demand for it. It is manifest that while confidence prevails, the sum of $28,000,000 is more than enough to meet the ordinary demand, since that demand was in truth satisfied, and the convertible character of bank notes preserved, in 1833, with one-fourth of that sum; but experience has shown that $28,000,000 are not sufficient to meet the extraordinary demand which may arise out of an unfavorable balance of trade; and that, to place the currency on a sound footing, there must be a larger admixture of coin in the circulating medium. But, sir, how is this to be brought about? Certainly, not by merely demanding the Government dues in coin, since the President expressly tells us that $10,000,000 will be sufficient to keep up the operations of the scheme. And no doubt this is true, as the stream of receipts and payments is never stagnant, but flowing in and out of these reservoirs. It is manifest that this measure of the Government can have no teadency to increase the amount of coin, and better the condition of the currency as it existed prior to the suspension of specie payments, as I have already stated that amount to have been $28,000,000, which is greatly more than sufficient to meet the ordinary demand, which would not in truth require beyond 8 or $10,000,000, leaving the balance of $18,000,000, to answer this demand of the Government. How, then, is the quantity of coin in circulation to be increased? It can only be done by suppressing the small bank notes which expel it. This scheme, then, instead of asserting the constitutional control of Congress over the currency, is in truth an abandonment of the whole subject to the banks, leaving it in their power, by substituting their notes for coin, to expel all but what may be absolutely necessary to carry on the operations of the Government. The result of the measure, then, is, that Congress, at the same time that it is neglecting one of its most important functions, is in effect providing the better currency for the Government, and leaving the worse for the people. If it be the duty of this Government to provide a sound and uniform national circulating medium, which shall consist of coin or its equivalent, then I hold it to be most clear that, in the present action of those who administer the Government, there is a most manifest and palpable abandonment of that duty. There are two modes in which the evil might be cured: the one is, by means of a Bank of the United States; the other, by a resort to the taxing power, that is, by imposing a stamp duty of such amount on small notes as effectually to suppress them. It is not now necessary, for the purpose of my argument, to consider what denomination of notes should be suppressed, in order to secure the requisite supply of coin in circulation; it is sufficient that such supply does not exist, and that it can only be commanded by the suppression of small notes.

The substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] is no favorite of mine, for it, also, is open to the objection that it does not exercise that legitimate control over the currency which it belongs to this Government to exercise; nor has it any tendency to correct the radical defect of our monetary system; since it is manifest that twenty-five banks, of small capital, cannot check eight hundred in their issues of small notes. It is better, however, than the Sub-Treasury scheme: first, because it will facilitate the return to specie payments, by creating confidence in the banks; secondly, because it is a mode of keeping the revenue which is most beneficial to the community; and, thirdly, it is safer, as respects the preservation of the funds of the Government, against the malversations and peculations of its officers.

The two first points are too clear to require any thing to be said with regard to them. As to the last, it may be observed that, so far as the security of official bonds is concerned, there can be no comparison between the security resulting from the liability of the whole capital of the bank for the fidelity of its trust, and the fluctuating solvency of private individuals. But there is one important objection on this score, that it places the whole treasure of the nation at once in the hands of the Executive and his agents, in certain contingencies, without the slightest guard or check. The Senator from Kentucky has already asked, what becomes of the custody of the funds upon the death of a receiver general: are they not at the mercy of his widow, his children, his friends, his personal representatives; in fine, of any person who may get possession of his keys, without the slightest security growing out of his official bond? But, I now ask, what security is there against the tortuous act of the Executive when he may please to exercise the power of removal from office? Supposing the sum of ten millions of dollars to be collected in gold and silver coin at any one of these places of deposite, and the President desires to get possession of the fund, he has nothing to do but to remove the receiver from office, and the whole is placed at once at his disposal, without the slightest official responsibility upon the part of the subordinate officer. The result of a removal from office is very different when the funds are deposited in a bank, to the credit of the officer, from whence they cannot be drawn but by that officer, or his lawful successor, whose official responsibility attaches to all his acts. The President is thus in a condition to accomplish his purpose at less cost than the Roman dictator, who could obtain access to the Roman treasury only by threatening its guardian with death.

Much has been said about the liability of the banks to a recurrence of the recent disaster of a suspension of specie payments, and we have been told that the arm of Government was struck down in a single night; while our commiseration has been invoked for its helpless condition, and our indignation roused against its wanton aggressors. In reply to this rhetorical exaggeration, I have only to say, that, notwithstanding the suspension, the Government has found means to meet all its engagements, has been conducting a most expensive war in the extremity of the Union, and that the Secretary of the Southern his last annual report, takes credit for the extent Treasury, in of the operations of his department. It may be and magnitude of the probability of such an occurrence further remarked, that ened by the proper action of this in future may be much less ase of the precious metals in Government in causing an increa sion of small notes; and the circulating medium by the suppres nce or loss sustain that, even if it does occur, the slight inconve of the temporary depreciation of bank notes, in order to meet such claims as require it, is, after all, a charge upon the public Treasury, which is of little moment, in comparison with the public benefits conferred, and the actual saving to the Government in the ordinary and sound condition of the currency, by adhering to the old system, and using them as fiscal agents.

I come now, sir, to the consideration of the constitutional objections which have been urged by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] The Senator begins by supposing that the connection between the banks and the Government, immediately after its organization, was suffered quietly to take place, which he describes as the seminal principle of all the evils of the banking system, excessive duties, profuse disbursements, and a protective tariff, a perfect Pandora's box, because there was a false conception of the nature of banking.

"So erroneous was it (says the Senator) that a bank note was then identified in the mind of the public with gold and silver, and a deposite in bank was regarded as under the most safe and sacred custody that could be devised."

And he supposes that this impression was derived from the Bank of Amsterdam:

"Where every note or certificate in circulation was honestly represented by an equal and specific quantity of gold and silver in bank."

Now, sir, how stands the fact? The Bank of Amsterdam was established in 1609; the Bank of England in 1694; and the Bank of Scotland in the following year. Adam Smith published his work on the wealth of nations in 1775–6, and it appears that at that time the distinction between banks of deposite and banks of circulation was perfectly understood, and the advantages as well as disadvantages resulting from the latter fully appreciated. But, again, so far from bank notes being identified with gold and silver in the public mind, or any misapprehension existing in relation to the functions of banks, we find that Secretary Hamilton, in his report, in 1790, upon the subject of a Bank of the United States, felt himself called upon to review the popular objections to banks, one of which is expressly stated to be "that they have a tendency to banish gold and silver from the country." The Senator, is, therefore, manifestly wrong in his preliminary observations. But I proceed to the consideration of his objections.

The Senator denies that we have any right to make the proposed arrangement with the banks; and, as the corner stone of his argument, assumes the position that this Government has no implied powers, and that there is no possible ground on which the right can be placed, but that of the broad principle of the general welfare; which he pronounces to be an old and exploded principle. In a subsequent part of his speech this assumption is thus enlarged upon:

"The genius of our Constitution is opposed to the assumption of power. Whatever power it gives, is expressly granted; and if proof were wanted, the numerous grants of power far more obvious, and apparently much more safe to be assumed than the one in question, would afford it. If any powers might be assumed, one would suppose that of adplying money to pay the debts of the Government, and borrowing it to carry on its operations, would be among them; yet both are expressly provided for by the Constitution. Again: to Congress is granted the power to declare war and raise armies and navies; yet the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules for the regulation of the army and navy, are not left to assumption, as obvious as they are, but are given by express grant."

This mode of reasoning, Mr. President, has not even the merit of novelty, but was adopted at the inception of the Government in the discussion on the Bank charter. It is founded in the idea that the Constitution, as a literary composition, is perfect; and that, while on the one hand it is free from pleonasms, it is on the other chargeable with no omissions: the reverse of all this is true. It was the work of men of various degrees of intelligence, of education, and of comprehensiveness of mind, and "the result of a spirit of amity and of mutual deference and concession." But, sir, I do not mean to let this matter stand upon mere assertion, but shall appeal to the authority of one name at least that commands the confidence of the American people, and is free from the suspicion of ever having sought to extend, by unconstitutional assumption, the powers of this Government. As to the literary character of the Constitution, and the force of any argument to be derived from the precision of its general provisions, and its particular forms of expression, Mr. Madison, in his letter of the 18th of September, 1828, to Joseph C. Cabell, esq. thus expresses himself:

"The Constitution vests in Congress, expressly, 'the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises,' and the power to regulate trade.' That the former power, if not particularly expressed, would have been included in the latter as one of the objects of a general power to regulate trade, is not necessarily impugned by its being so expressed. Examples of this sort cannot sometimes be easily avoided, and are to be seen elsewhere in the Constitution. Thus the power 'to define and punish offences against the law of nations,' includes the power afterwards particularly expressed, 'to make rules concerning captures, &c. from offending neutrals;' so also a power 'to coin money,' would doubtless include that of 'regulating its value,' had not the latter power been expressly inserted. The terms taxes, if standing alone, would certainly have included duties, imposts, and excises. In another clause it is said, 'no tax or duties shall be laid on exports,' &c. Here the two terms are used as synonymous: and in another clause, where it is said, 'no State shall lay any imposts or duties,' &c. the terms imposts and duties are synonymous. Pleonasms, tautologies, and the promiscuous use of terms and phrases, differing in their shades of meaning, (always to be expounded with reference to the context, and under the control of the general character and manifest scope of the instrument in which they are found,) are to be ascribed sometimes to the purpose of greater caution; sometimes to the imperfections of language; and sometimes to the imperfections of man himself. In this view of the subject, it was quite natural, however certainly the general power to regulate trade might include a power to impose duties on it, not to omit it in a clause enumerating the several modes of revenue authorized by the Constitution."

The same train of thought is presented in the second opinion which Edmund Randolph, then Attorney General of the United States, gave to General Washington, in relation to the bank charter in 1791; and who, should be remembered, was acting in concert with Mr. Jefferson in his opposition to the bank charter:

"The enemies of the bill have contended that a rule of construction adverse to the power of incorporation springs out of the Constitution itself; that after the grant of certain powers to Congress, the Constitution, as if cautious against usurpation, specially grants several other powers more akin to those before given than the incorporation of a bank is to any of those from which it is deduced. This position, they say, has been exemplified in four instances."

After stating them, the Attorney General then proceeds:

"Whosoever will attentively inspect the Constitution will readily perceive the force of what is expressed in the letter of the convention, 'that the Constitution was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual deference and concession.' To argue then from its style or arangement as being logically exact, is perhaps a scheme of reasoning not absolutely precise. But if the Constitution were ever so perfect, considered even as a composition, the difficulties which the above doctrine has stated may be solved by the following remarks: these similar powers on which stress is laid, are either incidental or substantive, that is, independent powers. If they be incidental powers, and the conclusion be, that because some incidental powers are expressed, no others are admissible, it would not only be contrary to the common forms of construction, but would reduce the present Congress to the feebleness of the old one, which could exercise no powers not expressly delegated. So that the advocates for the power of incorporation, on the principle of incidentality to some specified power, would, notwithstanding this supposed rule of interpretation, be as much at liberty to insist on its being an incidental power as ever."

The concluding paragraph of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof," is a distinct recognition of the fact that it does not profess distinctly and expressly to set forth all the powers of the Government, but merely the great leading heads or classes of power which were designed to be delegated. That clause adds nothing to the powers of Congress, but was inserted ex majore cautela, to prevent cavil upon the part of disaffected individuals as to the essential powers of the Government, when any crisis should arise, inasmuch as their efficacy would depend on the mode in which the incidental power of making proper laws was exercised.

And here, sir, let me invoke once more the authority of that great and good man, whom I have before cited in relation to this point. I read to you, sir, Mr. Madison's commentary upon this very clause, in the 44th number of the Federalist:

"Few parts of the Constitution have been assailed with more intemperance than this; yet on a fair investigation of it, as has been elsewhere shown, no part can appear more completely invulnerable. Without the substance of this power the whole Constitution would be a dead letter. Those who object to the article, therefore, as a part of the Constitution, can only mean that the form of the provision is improper."

After stating that the convention might have adopted four other methods, namely:

1st. Positively to have prohibited the exercise of any power not expressly delegated;

2d. To have attempted a positive enumeration of all the powers granted;

3d. To have attempted a negative enumeration of those denied; or,

4th. To have been altogether silent on the subject; and showing that the first method would have rendered the Constitution a dead letter, and the second and third been attended with insuperable difficulties—he proceeds thus to notice the last:

"Had the Constitution been silent on this head, there can be no doubt that all the particular powers requisite as means of executing the general powers would have resulted to the Government by unavoidable implication. No axiom is more clearly established in law, or in reason, than that wherever the end is required, the means are authorized: wherever a general power to do a thing is given, every particular power necessary for doing it is included.

"Had this last method, therefore, been pursued by the convention, every object now urged against their plan would remain in all its plausibility; and the real inconveniency would be incurred of not removing a pretext which may be seized on critical occasion for drawing into question the essential powers of the Union."

No, sir! So far is it from being true that this Government has no other powers than those expressly given, that I propose from another part of the Constitution to show that the practical enforcement of some of its most important stipulations, and those, too, in which the Southern States are most deeply interested, depend altogether upon an implied power on the part of Congress to carry them into effect. And I will make it appear also that the Senator's [Mr. CALHOUN'S] rule of construction, that the expression of certain powers which might have been implied is a proof that others are excluded, contrary to the well known maxim that "expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatum," is wholly without foundation.

The greater part of the powers delegated by the Constitution are enumerated in the 8th section of the 1st article, but not all of them. There are some others, and those very important ones, which are derived from the fourth article. Thus, in the first section of that article it is declared that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State," and Congress is authorized to prescribe by law their effect and the manner in which they shall be proved.

In the next section of the same article are the following provisions:

"A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

"No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Here are two provisions of vital consequence to the Union, and there cannot be a doubt that the Constitution never would have been adopted unless the latter provision for the preservation of the property of the South had been inserted. And yet there is no express power given to Congress to legislate on the subject. Indeed, the latter, and, to the South, the most important provision is conceived in negative terms, and would seem, at a first and superficial view, to be a mere restraint on the powers of the States. Here is not only no express grant of power to Congress to pass any law on the subject, but, according to the Senator's mode of reasoning, that the expression of an incidental power excludes others not expressed, the fact, that in the first section of this article the general provision with regard to records is followed by an express authority to pass general laws on that subject, would effectually exclude any implied power to carry these provisions into execution. And yet, sir, who ever doubted the power of Congress to give efficacy to these provisions by legislative enactment? So far from it, we find that as early as February, 1793, at the second session of the second Congress, when the vigilance of public attention had been drawn to the doctrine of implied powers in the discussion which had previously taken place in relation to the bank charter, an act of Congress was passed to give them effect, and which guarded its execution, in relation to the first, by fine and imprisonment; and, in relation to the second, by a penalty of five hundred dollars, besides preserving the right of action for the injury sustained, against such as interfere with the claimant. A stronger case of implied power could not be put, or one more at war with the Senator's rule of construction, than that of the law in relation to fugitive slaves. Not only is there no express grant of power to Congress, but the terms used are negative, implying inhibition in relation to the States; and in the very same article where a general provision was made in relation to another subject, care was taken expressly to add an authority to Congress to make the proper laws for carrying it into effect. Yet, sir, every one must perceive that these are great national provisions, without which the Union could not have been formed, and without which it could not long be preserved. That construction, then, which would render them a dead letter, must be erroneous, as frustrating the very end and purpose for which they were intended. The power to make the law in question is fairly implied on these grounds: that the provisions in question are of vital importance to the Union; that some legislation is absolutely necessary to settle the details of proof and mode of proceeding, and some penalty necessary to guard the rights which are meant to be enforced; all which can alone be uniformly and certainly provided for by the legislation of Congress; and as they were introduced to insure practical benefits which can only be realized by the action of Congress, it follows, by necessary consequence, it was the design of the Constitution to confer the power to make the laws proper for that purpose. The result of the whole, then, sir, is, both upon reason and authority, that the Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] is wrong in his premises; and that there are implied or incidental powers, without which the Constitution would be a dead letter. I do not wish, however, to be misunderstood on this point, or to have it supposed that I am disposed to extend the powers of the Government one particle beyond what is warranted by a fair and sound construction of the Constitution. The Government is one undoubtedly of limited powers, some of which are express, and others implied. What those implied powers are, will often cause much diversity of opinion, since there is an infinite diversity in the capacity and education of those who may pass upon the question; but there exists at all times a salutary restraint upon the action of Congress, first in the supervision of the Supreme Court when the question presents itself in a judicial form, and, secondly, in the judgment of the people, who will take care to check the usurpation of power, by withdrawing the functions of those who have abused their trust.

Having, sir, now disposed of the question of incidental powers, I come to the more precise one of the right which Congress has to make any disposition, temporary or permanent, of the property and revenues of the country to promote the general welfare; for, upon this right, which the Senator pronounces to be an exploded doctrine, depends that of making the proposed arrangement with the banks. And here, sir, let me remark, that the old dispute between Mr. Jefferson on the one hand, and Mr. Hamilton on the other, was not whether the words "general welfare," used in connection with the power to lay and collect taxes, gave a distinct power to do any thing which might promote that welfar —for no one ever contended for that—but simply whether they did not imply the power of applying the revenues of the Government to the promotion of the general welfare. The words of the Constitution are, "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Mr. Jefferson, as may be seen in his argument on the Bank charter, did not deny the right to collect taxes in order to provide for the general welfare, but he denied that the money, when collected, could be applied to any and every purpose of general welfare; but insisted that its appropriation must be confined to the execution of the subsequently enumerated powers. Mr. Hamilton, on the other hand, contended that the jus disponendi, the right of disposal, was inherent in the right of property; and that if taxes could be collected in order to provide for the general welfare, the money could be disbursed after it came into the Treasury for the same general purpose. This the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] calls an exploded doctrine. It is true, sir, that on one occasion, in the heat of party strife, and in a political paper which grew out of that strife, the doctrine of Mr. Jefferson was sustained by the pen of Mr. Madison; but, sir, no sooner did the former gentleman come into power, than he himself practically abandoned his own construction; and it has been abandoned and the opposite doctrine asserted, both in word and in deed, by every successive Administration. The construction contended for by Mr. Hamilton is sanctioned by the authority of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, the intimate political friends and auxiliaries of Mr. Jefferson, and who at the moment of party strife to which I have alluded, thought and acted with him, but who, subsequently, changed their opinion upon more mature consideration of the subject.

Mr. Madison, in his veto on the bill setting apart and pledging certain funds for internal improvement in March, 1817, after denying the power of Congress to make those internal improvements by its own authority, which was the ground of his veto, expressly observes: "A restriction of the power 'to provide for the common defence and general welfare' to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money, would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of Government; money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution."

At a subsequent period Mr. Monroe, in his communication to Congress connected with his veto on the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, which proposed to establish toll gates on that road, took occasion to say that, in the early stages of the Government, he had inclined to the construction that it had no right to expend money, but in the performance of acts authorized by the other specified grants of power; but that, on further reflection and observation, his mind had undergone a change, and his opinion then was "that Congress have unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defence and of general welfare, of general, not local, national, not State benefit."

General Jackson, in his veto message on the Maysville road bill, as late as May, 1830, in relation to this very doctrine, remarks:

"The symmetry and purity of the Government would, doubtless, have been better preserved if this restriction of the power of appropriation could have been maintained without weakening its ability to fulfil the general objects of its institution: an effect so likely to attend its admission, notwithstanding its apparent fitness, that every subsequent Administration of the Government, embracing a period of thirty out of forty-two years of its existence, has adopted a more enlarged construction of the power."

Mr. Jefferson himself departed from his own construction in two conspicuous acts of his administration, in the instance of the appropriation for the Cumberland road, and in that of the purchase of Louisiana, for which fifteen millions of dollars were paid out of the public Treasury. It is somewhat remarkable that, throughout the whole discussion on the subject of the power of Congress to appropriate money for purposes of general welfare, it was claimed and treated as an incidental power growing out of the right of property; the right of disposal being considered as inherent in the right of property. But, in truth, it is an express power, given in express terms, in the 3d section of the 4th article, as follows: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Nothing could be mo e comprehensive than this grant of power, which respects the territory and other property of the United States; embracing its personal or moveable property of every description, arms, ships, revenues, etc. without any qualification or limitation whatever, except that which results from the very nature of the trust, that it shall be used "to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare"—a qualification which attaches to the exercise of all and every power that is delegated, as being the end and purpose for which the Constitution was adopted. It may be further observed, that as the power "to lay and collect taxes, etc. to provide for the common defence and general welfare," is expressly given in the 1st article, and the unqualified power "to dispose of the property of the United States" is given in the 4th article, upon every fair principle of construction, they must have reference to each other, and the power to dispose of cannot be more restricted than the power to provide the revenues of the country, that is, for the purposes of general welfare. The practical exercise of this power has been exhibited in every administration of this Government, from its organization to the present moment, beginning with bounties to fishermen, and ending with the purchase of Mr. Madison's manuscripts. It has been exercised in the subscription to roads and canals; in the instances of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, in that of the Potomac and Ohio canal; and in the instance of the Cumberland road, in relation to which between twenty and thirty laws have been passed, approved by every President of the United States, and appropriating more than two millions of dollars for its construction and support. It was exercised in the purchase of Louisiana, and in the purchase of Florida, in appropriations for testing the strength of steam boilers, in the appropriation for an exploring expedition, and in various gratuities, as in the case of the inhabitants of St. Domingo, and the people of Caraccas. And yet, sir, this doctrine the Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] calls the exploded doctrine of the general welfare.

I am now prepared, sir, to answer the Senator's objection, that we have no power to make the proposed arrangement with the banks, by replying to him with perfect confidence, that if the public welfare requires that such an arrangement should be made, which is nothing more than a temporary disposition of the funds of the Government, we have not only the power to make it, but we are bound to do so, in fulfilment of the sacred trust for which the power was given. The question between us, Mr. President, is not whether the public welfare will or will not be promoted by the measure, but simply as to the power or right to make the arrangement; and I say unhesitatingly, that if the public welfare requires it, we have the undoubted right to make it. I am merely answering the Senator's constitutional objections, not discussing the question of advantage to the community, about which public opinion seems to be pretty well settled.

The Senator's [Mr. CALHOUN'S] next objection to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia is, that, in requiring the selection of the banks made by the Secretary of the Treasury to be confirmed or rejected by a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, it proposes a palpable violation of the Constitution, and then causes the Secretary very gravely to read that provision which directs every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of both Houses of Congress may be necessary to be presented to the President for his approval, and argues that the President is deprived of his veto, contrary to that express provision. How deprived of his veto? The amendment of the Senator from Virginia says not one word on the subject; it simply proposes that the selection shall be confirmed or rejected by a joint resolution; but does it follow tha the resolution is not to pass through the constitutional forms? Does the Senator suppose that it ever entered into the head of the mover of the amendment to alter the Constitution by legislative enactment? It was not necessary to state in the bill that the constitutional provisions, which are the supreme law, should be observed in relation to the joint resolution, any more than it is in the passage of any law, to declare that it shall not become such until submitted to the President. In providing that the selection shall be approved or rejected by joint resolution, you do effectually, and of necessity, provide that it shall be submitted to the President, because the constitutional provision then attaches and controls the subject. The object which the mover had in view was not to oust the President of his veto, but to give to Congress the ultimate decision of the matter, instead of leaving it entirely in the breast of the Executive, as would be the case if the Secretary were permitted to exercise his own absolute discretion in making the selection. And this is accomplished by requiring the selection to be submitted to Congress, to be approved or rejected by joint resolution, subject, of course, to the veto of the President, but that veto may in its turn be controlled by the constitutional action of the two Houses, if, in their judgment, it is unwisely or unfairly used. The practical effect of the provision, in fact, is, that the constitutional majority of two-thirds of both Houses is thus enabled at all times to exercise a final and absolute control over the subject, notwithstanding any improper views or bias of the Executive.

The Senator's [Mr. CALHOUN'S] third objection is, that we have no right to make a general deposite in banks, first, because it is giving the use of the money to them, and, secondly, because it is a violation of that clause of the Constitution which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." He then argues that the banks are, when such deposite is made, the Treasury, and that to suffer them to use it is to draw the money from the Treasury without appropriation by law. Were it not that the argument proceeds from that distinguished Senator, it would scarcely be worth a reply. The answer to the first branch of the objection, that we have no right to give the use of the people's money to the banks, is, that it assumes a fact which is not strictly true. It is not giving the use of the money to the banks alone, but to the people themselves, through the medium of the banks. The object and operation of the general deposite, so far as it augments the banking capital, is to enable the banks to extend further accommodation and facilities to trade, which is, in the end, to promote the general welfare. It is true that the banks may derive some incidental profit, but that profit does not more than compensate them for the risks they encounter and the services they perform in the transfer of the public funds. If, then, the system of general deposites, which may be regarded as one mode of exercising that power of disposition which the Government has over its funds, will more promote the general welfare than any other mode of keeping them, the Government ought to adopt that mode, as being in harmony with the great principle which lies at the foundation of the trust. This is precisely the view which was taken of the subject by the last Administration, when it urged the banks to extend their accommodations to the public, and lauded them for the benefits which they had conferred on trade and the business operations of society, as well as for the magnitude and fidelity of the services rendered, as fiscal agents.

But, sir, I proceed to examine the second branch of his objection, which respects the constitutional provision in relation to drawing money from the Treasury. And here it becomes necessary to settle precisely the meaning of the phrase used in the Constitution. The passage referred to occurs in the 9th section of the 1st article, and is in these words: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The word Treasury nowhere else occurs in the Constitution, and is found in this 9th section, which is a series of restrictive provisions on the powers of Congress. The general power is given to collect revenue, and to dispose of it, but not a syllable is said about the mode of keeping it during the period of receipt and disbursement. This negative provision is the only one on the subject. It is then true that this negative provision is to be understood in a literal sense, requiring, by implication, some great central place of deposite with its vaults and boxes for the preservation and security of the public Treasury, and which would be necessary to satisfy the literal meaning of the terms "drawn from the Treasury," or it is only a figurative mode of expression by which the idea is meant to be conveyed, that the public money should not be disbursed by any of its officers unless under the authority of law. If the phrase is used literally, and must be understood as implying the existence of some great place of deposite, then this absurdity would follow, that in a country covering more than one million of square miles, the revenue collected at points from fifteen hundred to two thousand miles' distance must be brought to that place of deposite in order to be put in the Treasury, and then drawn out to be carried back to the same points to be disbursed. Why, sir, it is only necessary to state the case to show that such an absurdity never entered into the minds of the framers of the Constitution. None but the smallest States, such whose territory is confined to the limits of a city, or a few square miles about it, could have a local Treasury, or a place of general deposite for all its revenues. A great nation might have a place of deposite for its accounts, and for some portion of its property or revenue, as the Temple of Saturn in Rome was called the Roman Treasury, and was the place in which their archives and banners were deposited, and some of the spoils of war brought home by their generals, and such portion of the revenues as were to be disbursed within the city; but not the revenue of the various provinces of the Empire, which were collected, and, for the most part, disbursed on the spot where collected. When Cæsar returned to Rome, and determined to seize the public treasure, all that he found in the Temple of Saturn did not exceed in amount a million and a half of dollars. The idea of a local treasury as a place in which money is hoarded, is contrary to the genius of our Government, and of the age. It belongs only to the age of barbarism. It savors of the policy and government of a despotic monarch, whose accumulated treasures are the fruits of war and of confiscation, and are one of the props or pillars of an authority which rests not on the consent of the people. It is the policy of a Dey of Tripoli, or an Emperor of Morocco. No, sir, so far is it from being true that the framers of the Constitution designed any such absurdity, that we find from the earliest period of the Government, from the moment of its organization, the system of deposites in banks was adopted, and the general rule established, that the Treasurer should be the medium of all receipts and disbursements, which should be sanctioned by warrants drawn in favor of or upon that officer by the Secretary of the Treasury, which respected the formal mode of keeping accounts: but the disbursements, in point of fact, were made either by warrant on the Treasurer, or by drafts of the Treasurer on the collectors or other officers having funds in their hands, or by directions of the Secretary of the Treasury to the collectors or other officers having funds to make provisional advances for certain local expenses, and the two latter modes were afterwards made to assume a formal shape by proper warrants. The system of deposites in banks was universal, and, when placed to the credit of the Treasurer, was esteemed to be in the Treasury. It must be recollected that this system was introduced and established under the administration of Washington, and by the framers of the Constitution, who certainly understood its import in this particular. Besides this, we have the express authority of Mr. Jefferson on this point, who was not prone to a lax construction of the powers of Government, and whose jealous vigilance would never have slept on so important a subject. In his written opinion, addressed to President Washington, on the subject of the bank charter which he is opposing, he expresses himself in February, 1791, less than two years after the organization of the Government, in the following terms:

"The report on the subject states the only general convenience to be, the preventing the transportation and retransportation of money between the States and the Treasury, (for I pass over the increase of circulating medium ascribed to it as a merit, and which, according to my ideas of paper money, is clearly a demerit.) Every State will have to pay a sum of tax money into the Treasury; and the Treasury will have to pay, in every State, a part of the interest on the public debt, and salaries to the officers of Government resident in that State. In most of the States there will be a surplus of tax money to come up to the seat of Government for the officers residing there. The payment of interest and salary in each State may be made by Treasury orders on the State Collector. This will take up the greater part of the money he has collected for his State, and consequently prevent the great mass of it from being drawn out of the State."

He subsequently remarks, that "Treasury orders, and bills of exchange may prevent the displacement of the main mass of of the money collected without the aid of any bank." Then follows a passage which is an authority, upon both branches of this objection, of the Senator to general deposites:

"Perhaps, indeed, bank bills may be a more convenient vehicle than Treasury orders; but a little difference in the degree of convenience cannot constitute the necessity which the Constitution makes the ground for assuming any non-enumerated power. Besides, the existing banks will, without doubt enter into arrangements for lending their agency; and the more favorably, as there will be a competition among them for it."

It is clear, therefore, Mr. President, that the phrase referred to in the Constitution, conceived as it is in negative terms, was not meant to imply the existence of a local place of deposite for the funds of the Government, but merely to provide that those funds in the hands of the collecting officers should not be disbursed without authority of law. If the Senator should say that he does not mean to contend that the word Treasury means one grand place of deposite, but implies that there shall be local places of deposite, which, taken together, constitute the Treasury, then, I say, he abandons the literal meaning, and that those places may as well be banks as the strong boxes of particular officers. But, sir, after all, the true answer to the Senator is, assuming with him that the banks are, for the time being, the Treasury, when money is deposited in them, that, by the general deposite, you convert your funds into a bank credit, just as you might convert, or might have received them, in bank notes or bills of exchange, all of which rest precisely upon the same foundation; namely, a legal liability for the amount; and therefore the use of the funds by the banks is not drawing money from the the Treasury. The money in the Treasury, in legal contemplation, is the funds in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, and those funds may consist of gold and silver coin, in bank notes, in bills of exchange, and in bank credits. The bank notes, bills of exchange, and bank credits are as much funds in the Treasury as the coin, and can no more be consumed in the disbursements of the Government than the coin. The bank then, in using the funds deposited and which she has received in exchange for a credit on her books, as she might in exchange for her promissory notes or drafts, is using her own property, and not the property of the United States, which has been converted into a credit on her books, and therefore no money is drawn from the Treasury, and the Constitution is not violated in this particular.

But, sir, the Senator, [Mr. CALHOUN,] rising, as he says, to higher ground, and striking at the root of the evil, denies the right of the Government to treat bank notes as money, or to receive any thing but gold and silver coin in payment of the dues of the Government. The drift of his argument to sustain this position is, that there is no express power given to do so; and that the right to receive any thing else would give the right to regulate whatever was so received. In reply to this argument, I have to observe that there are implied powers, as I have before shown, as well as express ones, and which are as much a part of the Constitution, the one as the other. The Constitution expressly gives the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties,' imposts, and excises," and says not a word about the medium in which they shall be collected. Now, the general power to lay and collect taxes of necessity implies the right and the duty to prescribe the time of payment, the manner of payment, and the quantity to be paid; since it is impossible to exercise the power without specifying these three particulars. But the manner of payment is precisely the question of what shall be received; and, since it is indispensable that it should be prescribed in order to execute the power, and there is no limitation on the discretion of Congress, it follows as a necessary consequence that it may prescribe what manner of payment it pleases, and therefore receive what it pleases in payment of its dues. The right to prescribe the manner of payment is necessarily implied in the right to collect taxes. If it be said that taxes are ordinarily collected in money, and the phrase should be understood to imply that, I answer that though, ordinarily, it does not follow that they are always or necessarily so, they may be, and sometimes are, collected in kind, of which many instances are to be found in the early history of some of the States. Besides, it might be very expedient for the Government, in the case of excise duties, as in the instance of an excise duty on whiskey, to receive the duty in that article, of which it is a pretty large consumer in the army and navy, and, in so doing, it might be a mutual convenience both to the payer and to the Government. But, again, if it were admitted that, in the phrase to collect taxes, &c. money was implied as the medium in which taxes are ordinarily collected, which is not true, for the reason I have mentioned, still the money of a country is the currency of the country, and that currency may consist of paper and coin, as well as of paper alone, or coin alone; and, in that view of the matter, as there is no limitation on the discretion of Congress, it would have the right to receive paper as well as coin, if it performed the functions of money. But, in truth, the receipt of bank notes which are convertible on demand into coin is equivalent to the receipt of coin. If the Government has the right to deal in foreign and domestic bills of exchange, in order to transfer its funds to foreign countries, or from one part of the country to another, without the risk and expense of transporting coin, then it would have the right equally to receive them in payment of its dues, as to purchase them afterwards; and the receipt of bank notes would be justified on the same principle, since, in effect, they are bills of exchange, drawn upon the party himself, and payable at sight. So far as the question of receiving any thing but coin in payment is concerned, the bill of exchange, draft, check, and promissory note, stand precisely on the same footing, as being the evidence of a legal demand for the amount stated on their face, and, where they are payable and paid on demand in coin, are equivalent to it.

So much of the Senator's objection as assumes that the right to receive any other property than money would necessarily imply the right of regulating and inspecting the thing received, and which is held up to the South as a scarecrow, as importing a right to regulate the entire property, a part of which might thus be received, is entirely fallacious, since the right of inspection and regulation would, so far as it results from this particular power, be confined to such portion of the property as the Government actually received. Thus, in the instances put of cotton and tobacco, the necessity and right of inspection would extend no farther than to the cotton and tobacco received by the Government, and not to the entire crop.

The Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] next tells us that the right to receive bank notes is hostile to the power to coin money, the object of which is to furnish a currency of uniform and steady value, and that as long as the notes of banks are received in the transactions of the Government, as money, it is impossible to give stability to the standard of value, and the coining power is defeated. If the possible conflict between the two powers is relied upon as an argument to prove that one of them does not exist, then I say that it is an argument addressed to discretion in their use, rather than a proof that one of them does not exist. But, sir, it is not true that the uniformity of the currency is impaired by the mixture of paper and coin in the circulation. We had the best currency in the world before the destruction of the Bank of the United States, as I shall presently show, of greater uniformity than could be produced by gold and silver alone. Nor, sir, is it true that paper can depreciate the standard of value. The standard of value throughout the United States is and must be gold and silver coin, since that alone is a tender in payment of debts. It is true, that the inordinate issue of bank notes banishes coin by supplying its use as currency, but not as a standard of value, and, so far as the mere question of standard is concerned, could work no mischief; but it produces mischief, in preventing that proper admixture of coin and paper in the circulation which constitutes a sound state of the currency, having reference to the ordinary and extraordinary demands for coin. It is equally true, that in case of a temporary suspension of specie payments, the paper itself may become depreciated with reference to that standard; but it cannot depreciate the standard; that must ever remain the same. Where the paper, which composes part of the circulation, is payable and paid on demand, in coin, there can be no depreciation of the paper within its natural sphere of circulation, with reference to that standard, for when issued beyond the wants of the community it is immediately returned to the banks. Thus it appears, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in December, 1836, that the amount of bank notes issued on the first of January, 1836, was $140,000,000, while the actual amount in circulation did not exceed $108,000,000, making a difference of $32,000,000, which was returned upon them as superfluous. The difference of prices in ordinary articles of consumption and trade, which follow the inordinate increase of bank facilities, is not the result of a depreciation of the paper issued by the banks, or of the currency generally, but results from disturbing the ordinary relation between supply and demand, by increasing the number of consumers. But I will not go further into this matter. I have thus gone through the Senator's constitutional difficulties.

Independently of these, it seems, Mr. President, that one of his most powerful objections is, that the Bank of the United States, or Mr. Biddle's Bank, as he is pleased to call it, will place itself at the head of this league of banks which are proposed by the amendment. Why, sir! the objection, and the tone and tenor of the remarks which accompany it, are in the true spirit of Macbeth when he exclaims:

"We have scotched the snake, not killed it;
"She'll close and be herself; whilst our poor malice
"Remains in danger of her former tooth."

And in the same spirit the whole party would exclaim:

"But let
"The frame of things disjoin, both the worlds suffer
"Ere we will eat our meal in fear, and sleep
"In the affliction of these terrible dreams,
"That shake us nightly."

I must say, however, Mr. President, that the danger dreaded from that institution is a mere "coinage of the brain." And here, sir, let me make an observation on the subject of banks generally. If one were to form an idea of a bank from the rhetorical denunciations which are used here and elsewhere, he would be led to suppose that it was some natural monster sent to spread devastation and ruin in a prosperous community, instead of a mere association of individuals, authorized by law to act as an individual in their contracts and in the management of their property. One of the most important benefits conferred on society by them is, that small masses of capital which would otherwise be useless, because unemployed, are thus brought together, and made to subserve the general welfare, by augmenting the commercial capital. They furnish an investment for the funds of widows, orphans, guardians, administrators, and trustees generally, who constitute a large proportion of the stockholders; and give activity and life to the mass of property thus held, which, to a considerable extent, would otherwise be dormant and useless to society. Besides this, they do effectually increase the capital of the country for all practical purposes, by using their own credit, which enables them to extend the sphere of their usefulness. I have, however, already said that there are abuses connected with the banking system which require correction, particularly in the control which they have usurped over the currency of the country, and which this Government has the power and is bound to correct.

I will not longer detain the Senate upon the general subject, although there are many other parts of the Senator's [Mr. CALHOUN'S] speech which I should have liked to notice, and which seems to me to contain doctrines as little tenable as those I have reviewed; but I will proceed to answer the inquiry made by the Senator from Connecticut. He asks with a confident and triumphant tone, how the Administration is made responsible for the deterioration of the banking system and of the currency? I will tell him, sir: By destroying the bank of the United States, and by the subsequent blundering efforts that have been made in a series of experiments to conceal from the country the extent of the wound inflicted on its prosperity, and to occupy and divert public attention from that wanton act of party warfare.

When General Jackson came into power there were but 330 banks, with an estimated capital of $145,192,268. In destroying the Bank of the United States, he at the same time created a seeming necessity and gave an apology for the chartering of a multitude of others, so that in the end, when his Administration terminated, we had 677 banks, with 146 branches, in all exceeding 300, with an authorized capital of $378,421,168, and these were left without any check or control whatever, to furnish their notes as the currency of the country. Permit me, sir, to advert for a moment to the condition of the currency in 1830, before that fatal measure was adopted—the removal of the deposites—which was the first act of hostility. It is thus described in the report of Mr. McDuffee to the House of Representatives in April, 1830. Speaking of the Bank of the United States, he says:

"It now remains to show its effect in equalizing the currency. In this respect it has been productive of results more salutary than were anticipated by the most sanguine advocates of the policy of establishing the bank. It has actually furnished a circulating medium more uniform than specie."

This he shows to be true by the fact that the merchant who had his specie in New Orleans could not transport it to Philadelphia under one per cent.; but, by means of the Bank and its system of domestic exchanges, he is enabled to do so for one-half of that premium. He then proceeds to say:

"For all the purposes of revenue, it gives to the national currency a perfect uniformity, that ideal perfection to which a currency of gold and silver in so extensive a country could have no pretensions."

After illustrating this point, he adds:

"Upon the whole, then, it may be confidently asserted that no country in the world has a circulating medium of greater uniformity than the United States, and that no country of any thing like the same geographical extent has a currency at all comparable to that of the United States, on the score of uniformity."

To the same effect we have the testimony of General Smith, at that time chairman of the Committee on Finance in this body, and a decided friend and supporter of President Jackson. In his report to the Senate in March, 1830, after stating the fact that the revenues of the Government are collected through the medium of 9000 persons, dispersed throughout the whole Union, he goes on to say:

"From these persons the Government has, for the ten years preceding January 1, 1830, received $230,068,855. This sum has been collected in every section of this widely-extended country. It has been disbursed at other points, many thousand miles distant from the places where it was collected; and yet it has been so collected and distributed without the loss, as far as the committee can learn, of a single dollar, and without the expense of a single dollar to the Government."

After stating various proofs and illustrations of the facts mentioned in the following passage, he proceeds thus:

"This seems to present a state of currency approaching as near to perfection as could be desired; for here is a currency issued at twenty-four different parts of the Union, obtainable by any citizen who has money or credit. When in his possession, it is equivalent to silver in all his dealings with all the 9,000 agents of the Government throughout the Union. In all his dealings with the interior, it is better than silver; in all his dealings with the commercial cities, it is equal to silver; and if, for any purpose, he desires the silver with which he bought it, it is at his disposal, almost universally without any diminution, and never more than a diminution of one quarter per cent. It is not easy to imagine, it is scarcely necessary to desire, any currency better than this."

We next have the testimony of Mr. McLane, then Secretary of the Treasury, as to the usefulness, nay, the necessity of such an institution. In his annual report, made on the 7th December, 1831, he thus expresses himself:

"The indispensable necessity of such an institution for the fiscal operations of the Government in all its departments, for the regulation and preservation of a sound currency, for the aid of commercial transactions generally, and even for the safety and utility of the local banks, is not doubted, and, as is believed, has been shown in the past experience of the Government, and in the general accommodation and operations of the present Bank."

And for what purpose was this halcyon state of things disturbed, and why has this blight been brought upon the national prosperity? For the sole and selfish purpose of personal and party aggrandizement. The attempt was made to convert that institution into a political engine of the Government, to use its influence and power to strengthen and secure the control of the dominant party, and, having failed in that attempt, the resolution was formed to destroy it upon the gratuitous assumption that, if it was not for, it must be against the party.

Such, sir, is the testimony of a man who seems to have been more attached to the true glory of President Jackson, than those who were more pliant instruments of his will; a man of republican simplicity of character, of an elevated tone of moral feeling, and of unquestioned loyalty to truth; one who preferred the sacrifice of official honor and emolument to the violation of his duty and of his principles. Such, sir, is the testimony of William J. Duane. The following is an extract from his letter of October, 1833, to a friend in New Orleans:

"It is but too obvious, either that we have misunderstood the qualities of Gen. Jackson's head, or else he has been wonderfully altered; on all the cardinal questions agitated, he has failed to be consistent; he promised purity in selections for office, yet few have been purely made; he professed to be a friend to domestic industry, yet he has done more than any body else to prostrate it; he advocated a national Government bank, and yet affects to dread a moneyed aristocracy; he complained of the corruption of one bank, and yet takes forty or fifty irresponsible paper-circulating banks under the national wing; he has been for and against internal improvement; he denounced nullification, yet has of late been unsaying all that he said in his proclamation. In short, I do not believe he ever had fixed principles, or ever arrived at any result by the exercise of the mind; impulses and passions have ruled."

* * * * * * *

"The state of things at present is this: the good of the country is no more thought of than if every thing ought to be left to chance. The factious schemes and pretensions of individuals seeking office, and of moneyed corporations struggling for the use of the public funds, are alone thought of or talked about; to promote the happiness of the people, or to promote the love of liberty elsewhere, by exhibiting its existence here, is not the object of what we call leading men; their design is to rule, and to gratify avarice and ambition. By such combinations and distribution of duty or agency as effect so great results in manufactures and mechanics, speculation or scheming enters into all things."

In a subsequent letter to the honorable Littleton W. Tazewell, in January, 1834, he expresses himself to this effect:

"The service which I was asked to perform seems not to be distinctly understood. The official reasons for performing what I refused to do, do not embrace an explanation which I consider due to myself, if not to the people or their representatives. The true nature of the service required consisted, not in the mere act of removing the deposites, but in removing them from an unwillingness to await the action of Congress, or to resort to the appropriate agency of the Judiciary, upon questions connected with the Bank of the United States; not in the mere substitution of one fiscal agent for another, but in exercising for penal ends a power given solely for conservative purposes. Hostile as I was to the bank, and willing as I was to investigate the transactions of its officers in the strictest manner, in the legitimate way, I perceived that a co-operation in the scheme proposed would be inconsistent with my duty as a public agent, my principles as a citizen, and my sympathies as a man."

But, sir, it is in his third letter to the people of the United States, in February, 1834, that the veil is withdrawn, and the motives of action brought home to the Administration. He states the fact, that his commission as Secretary of the Treasury bore date May 29, 1833, and that he arrived the following day in Washington. On the 1st of June he took the oath of office, and on the same evening Mr. Whitney called upon him to tell him "what had been done, and what was to be done in relation to the Bank." The following evening, June 2d, Whitney and Kendall came together, and on the next morning, June 3d, he waited upon the President. I now proceed, sir, to read his account of what passed between himself and Gen. Jackson:

"The next morning, June 3, I waited upon the President, and, as I had been apprized by Mr. Whitney would be the case, he soon introduced the subject of the Bank. I stated that Mr. Whitney had made known to me what had been done, and what was intended; and had intimated that his communication was made at the President's desire. The President replied, in a tone of dissatisfaction, that it was true he had conferred with Mr. Whitney, and obtained information from him as to the Bank, but that he was not his confidant, nor had he told him to call on me. I enumerated the representations which Mr. Whitney had made; and their correctness was admitted. I said I feared that I should not be able to see the subject in the light in which the President viewed it; to which he remarked that he liked frankness, that my predecessor and himself had sometimes differed in opinion, but it had made no difference in feeling, and should not in my case: that the matter under consideration was of vast consequence to the country; that unless the Bank was broken down, it would break us down: that if the last Congress had remained a week longer in session, two-thirds would have been secured for the Bank by corrupt means, and that the like result might be apprehended at the next Congress: that such a State bank agency must be put in operation before the meeting of Congress as would show that the United States Bank was not necessary, and thus some members would have no excuse for voting for it."

In the prosecution, sir, of these selfish purposes, your party have undervalued the character and intelligence of the American people. You have addressed yourselves to them as if they were in the same condition, and actuated by the same motives, as the serfs of Russia and the lazzaroni of Naples. You have mistaken their condition, and the interest they have in the preservation of social order. There is no populace here; no inordinate accumulation of property in the hands of a few individuals. The genius of your institutions is against it. You no where find the gorgeous palace by the side of the wretched hut of squalid poverty; property is equally distributed, and every man is interested in the preservation of the peace, the property, and the welfare of society. You have been intoxicated with power, and have praised the gods of gold and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone.

"In the same hour came forth the fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the King's palace, Mene, mene, tekel upharsin."

Look about and around you, Mr. President, and you will see some of the fingers of that hand which has written these words. But your astrologers and wise men cannot interpret their meaning. It is ever so, sir. The web of destiny is woven, and it belongs not to mortal hands to ravel its tissue.

You have passed from one experiment to another; you have convulsed and agitated the country long enough; you have destroyed a most perfect currency, and brought us to one of inconvertible paper; and now, sir, in conclusion, let me beseech that you will pause for a moment; give us a breathing spell—a moment of tranquillity. Let me say to this Administration, Jam satis! Sir, Jam satis!

"Terruit urbem, terruit gentes, grave ne rediret Seculum Pyrrhæ, nova monstra questæ."

SPEECH OF MR. MRREICK,
OF MARYLAND,

In Senate, March 5, 1838—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill (the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute)—

Mr. MERRICK rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The observations which modesty drew from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] the other day, in the commencement of his able and instructive speech upon this question, may be applied with justice to me. I feel, in attempting to discuss before this august assembly a question of such magnitude as the one now pending—one, too, to the proper elucidation of which the brightest intelligences of the country have heretofore tasked themselves on both sides of this Hall, that I may seem to be guilty of a boldness bordering on temerity. Were I, therefore, free to act for myself as an individual, every consideration would prompt me to remain silent; but in times like these, under circumstances such as our country is now placed, when so much of good or of evil depends upon the measures to be adopted by this Government, the people expect, duty requires of every one holding the high trust confided to members of this body, to exert whatever power he may possess towards producing the good or arresting the evil. Every one, the humble as well as the exalted, is bound to contribute his mite, to endeavor to perform his part of the common duty as best he may. The people of Maryland, too, whom I in part represent on this floor, and amongst whom there is some diversity of opinion in relation to the measure now pending before the Senate, expect that I should render a reason for the faith that is in me. Impelled by these reflections, but entertaining no vain hope of being able to do justice to the subject, I proceed, at whatever hazard to myself personally, with the effort to discharge my obligations to my State and country; and to give the reasons for the course I intend to pursue.

Before I attempt to grapple with the merits of the real question, allow me, Mr. President, a word or two upon collateral matters much dwelt upon on the other side, and unwisely in my opinion, if not improperly, mingled with this discussion.

I have heard many observations from gentlemen on the other side, which I regretted to find Senators could indulge in. Much has been said which, it seemed to me, became not the place or the occasion. Some of these I must allude to very briefly. The old, and hackneyed, and worn out party designations of Federalists and Democrats have been freely and frequently used. Black cockades and other insignia of party divisions and party strifes long forgotten have "danced through the mazes" of eloquent speeches, certainly not to the end of assisting the reasoning power in its searches after correct conclusions, and without the effect of enlightening the Senate or the public upon the grave questions of constitutional power and governmental policy now before us. The acts and doings of a certain party during the late war with England, and even prior to that time, have been summoned from the oblivion into which they had sunk, and spread in odious array before the Senate and the nation; the only possible effect of which would be, were any produced by it, to excite feelings and awaken prejudices inimical to the cause of truth and justice. The honorable Senators from North Carolina dwelt with peculiar emphasis on these topics, and said, or seemed to say, that the Whig party of the present day, embracing those who with myself are contending here against the course of measures pursued and recommended by the present Administration, was identical with and responsible for all the sins and misdeeds they lay at the door of the old Federal party during the late war, and other periods of our past history, and claim for their associates, the friends of the Administration here, exemption from all participation in, or responsibility for, those misdeeds.

Now, sir, I, for one, disclaim the responsibility and identity the gentleman would throw upon us. I claim to have been, in the good old times of the reign of Democratic principles and the Democratic party in this Government, a member of that party; and I could not but think, in casting my eyes over the Senate, while the gentlemen were picturing the deformities of old Federalism, how thoughtless they were of the feelings of some of their most distinguished associates. They certainly touched not me by any of their strictures upon those topics; and if they tread not upon the toes of many of their own best friends, they injured not us. Shall I go through a comparison with the gentlemen of the elements, in this regard, of which the two great parties of the country at the present day are made up? Shall I draw the parallel, and show them (as probably I could) if either party is now to be held to answer for all that is attributed, justly or unjustly, to the old Federalists, that the weight of responsibility would not be on the shoulders of the Whigs, but might press heavily upon the supporters of the present Administration, no matter what name they may now be pleased to assume? Who, sir, stood foremost in the councils of the nation to uphold and sustain the Democratic party in the days of its trial and purity? Where is the patriot, distinguished above all others during the most gloomy periods of the late war with England, for untiring devotion to the public service, whose courage and constancy, eloquence and wisdom, turned back the swelling tide of opposition, and contributed more than any other to carry the nation successfully through that struggle? He sits beside me, [Mr. CLAY,] then, as now, the pride and boast of his country. I need not cite another instance. It is vain for gentlemen to invoke against us the ghost of departed party divisions. In calling upon their names, in crying out Democrats and Federalists, the friends of the Administration use words once of magic power, but their charm is now gone. The country is awakened to a sense of its danger, the people are moved by suffering and distress, and demand now at your hands sense and substance, and can be no longer satisfied or led off by sounds and shadows. Too dearly have they paid for the delusions hitherto practised upon them: the effort cannot succeed again.

It is agreed upon all sides that the country is plunged in the deepest embarrassment and distress. All classes, all descriptions of people suffer, and all look anxiously to this Government for that relief to which no other power in the country is competent. Petitions have been pouring in upon you, particularly from the laboring part of different communities, praying for relief. They have besought you, in some instances, to give them leave to toil for you, that they might earn a scanty subsistence. How, and by whom, has all this distress been produced? The odious detail has been given by others who preceded me. The rise, progress, and all but consummation, of the deliberate design to destroy the monetary system of the country, have been lucidly expounded, link by link, as they were evolved from the last and present Executives of this Union, by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] I shall not attempt to travel again over that ground.

Suffice it for me now to give, in reply to what has fallen on this branch of the subject from the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] a brief view to Asia, and other ports beyond seas, in search of facts to sustain his theory, a few domestic facts, which I prefer on that account, though, perhaps, they may not suit the taste of the Senator any better than domestic manufactures, to which he has declared his unqualified aversion. It is a fact, then, that we have twice had a National Bank: that, during the whole period of the existence of both, the country was prosperous and happy, and had an abundant, sound, safe circulating medium, always convertible at the pleasure of the holder into gold or silver. It is a fact that very soon after the first Bank of the United States was put down, there ensued a great multiplication of local banks, with trifling capitals, their paper depreciated, exchanges between different parts of the country fell into the greatest confusion, sharpers and shavers preyed upon the honest industry of the country, specie payments were suspended, the energies and enterprise of the People were paralyzed, and the whole society seemed involved in inextricable confusion and embarrassment. It is a fact, that recourse was then had to the second Bank of the United States, and very soon confidence was revived, specie payments were resumed, your currency was restored to a sound and healthy condition, domestic exchanges were equalized and regulated, industry met every where, in every department, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing, a liberal and just reward; the whole country prospered beyond all parallel. The decree went forth that this Bank must be destroyed; the system of unwise and pernicious experiments upon the currency was commenced by the late Administration, and is still obstinately persevered in by our present rulers. What are the consequences? Let the present condition of a suffering People tell; let the prostrate condition of every branch of business, let your miserably depreciated irredeemable paper, let your rag currency tell. Similar benefits were produced by each of these institutions, and disasters have attended the destruction of both; the lessons of experience are dear, but they are valuable and abiding. It is charged that it was not the prostration of the United States Bank, but the putting up of local banks in the States, and consequent excitement of a wild spirit of speculation, which occasioned the present state of things. Suppose this to be so, the inquiry results, what caused the multiplication of State banks? The answer is, the prostration of the National Bank, the currency tinkering of the late Administration. Witness the great increase of the number of banks immediately after the refusal to recharter the first Bank of the United States, and their rapid multiplication as soon as the fate of the second was known. Upon this point I can speak knowingly, and as a witness, so far as the State of Maryland is concerned. I have been for several years a member of the Legislature of that State, and was at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means in that body when all the recent bank charters were granted, and they all passed through that Committee.

That Legislature had refused for years back all applications (and they were repeatedly made) for any increase of the banking capital. This course was steadily persevered in until it became certain that the charter of the United States Bank would not be renewed. Earnest appeals were then again made to the Legislature by our commercial city for an augmentation of banking capital to supply the vacuum about to be created by the withdrawal of the branch of the national institution which had been located there. It was urged upon us that the trade and business of the town required an increase of banking facilities by State authority, at least equal to the amount about to be withdrawn. It was known that other and neighboring States were providing by increasing their banking capital for the anticipated reduction in the amount of the circulating medium, by the winding of the national institution. Our citizens were also known to possess the requisite capital for the establishment of such institutions upon a safe and secure basis. It was foreseen that the demands of trade would seek and obtain a medium of exchange sufficient for its purposes elsewhere, if our own people were denied the privilege of supplying themselves, and our State would thus have been rendered tributary to others to the amount of the interest upon their paper employed in our business transactions, which paper, besides the injustice to our people of paying interest for its use, might not, and would not have been as safe and secure as could be furnished by institutions created by our own authority, and subject to our control.

These considerations were urged successfully upon me and other members of that Legislature, we were convinced by them, and again urged them upon the body with equal success. Hence came the charter of the first of the new banks created in Maryland—which was granted the Legislature in the session of 1834-5; others followed at the succeeding session, called for by the growing wealth and commerce of the State, and created to supply our citizens with the requisite facilities; but they were never in excess, nor did they, nor could they, under their charters, make excessive issues of paper; of this the late and present enviable condition of all the banks of that city is sufficient proof. Similar causes produced similar effects all over the Union. Banks were multiplied every where; yet I do not admit that there was any general excess in their issues of paper. My purpose is to show, and that, I think, is now apparent, at least so far as my State is concerned, that the late and present Administrations cannot escape from their just responsibility to the people for the state of things now existing, by charging it upon the creation of banks by the States, or the excessive issues of those banks; for, if those things did exist, they were the consequence of the previous action of the Executive of this Union. The unwise and improper interfere of the Administration with the monetary affairs of the country, and the destruction of the Bank of the United States, was the causa causans of the whole.

It has been said by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] that there was great commercial distress in England and elsewhere, and he asks, with an air of triumph, who produced this? I answer that, to a very great extent, you did. In citing such facts and reasoning from them, in extenuation of the conduct of the late administration, gentlemen are again assigning effects for causes, or rather arguing from effects against causes. You had, by your unwise policy, created an unnatural demand for coin in this country; your pernicious Treasury order was daily carrying off large sums against the course of trade, from points where it was necessary as a basis of circulation, and for the adjustment of foreign balances, to points where it was worse than useless; you had been draining England of her coin while you were largely her debtor; increasing, by importations of coin, instead of reducing by exportations, your debt to her: till, feeling the effects in her own necessary supply, your credit there was checked to produce a return; your unnatural demand here to answer the avowed purposes of the specie circular, as well as that other and probably greater demand, occasioned by it, for poarding in anticipation of coming events, precluded the possibility of that return; your credit, as an inevitable consequence, was destroyed, and all the immense amount of your foreign debt, which might have been kept afloat, and available to the holders of your securities, till your products could have met it, by the timely payment of comparatively a small sum, fell at once a dead weight upon you and your foreign creditors, and through them upon all the ramifications of their business connections, commercial and manufacturing. Not only this, but your foreign trade was thereby totally suspended. Could England fail to be embarrassed to a considerable extent by this sudden failure of her heavy debtor and largest customer? Could the commercial world fail to be affected, directly or indirectly, by the sudden prostration and total derangement of so vast a trade as that carried on by this country?

But I will dwell no longer upon the causes of the present state of things, it is waste of time and words; so much was necessary in reply to the gentleman [Mr. STRANGE] who last preceded me in the debate. The people know who have warred upon their currency, they know who undertook to make it better; and now that it is destroyed, having witnessed the strife, they cannot be deceived as to the parties chargeable with the destruction. And now, after you have produced all the distress and suffering which it is admitted afflict the country, when the eyes of the whole nation are turned to you with intense anxiety you relief, what do you propose to do? Why, you present this bill, this Sub-Treasury scheme! you propose to divorce the Government from the banks, and business, and currency of the country The people have called upon you for relief, and they are repelled, and told they must take care of themselves, and that Government will take care of itself! What, sir, separate yourselves from the people! from your masters! Who and what are you, and by what authority sit you here in high places? I had thought you were here as the agents of the people—that Government was instituted solely for the good of the people—that you held your commissions from them, and were here to promote their happiness and welfare! and yet you disregard their wants and suffering, and talk of your Sub-Treasuries, your vaults, and your caverns, and divorces. You have plunged the country, by your experimenting, into an agony of distress; in many places the industrious and laboring classes are suffering for bread, they call to you for help, they cry thirst, and you give them "gall and vinegar to drink;" you present them this bill to augment their distresses. But you say the people are apt to look to Government for too much, as the Message has it. These are times of great distress and difficulty, dangers and embarrassments thicken on every side, the Government must abandon the country to its fate and take care of itself, the head must be preserved though the body perishes.

The attitude you propose to assume reminds me of the ridiculous habit ascribed by Goldsmith to the ostrich. This bird, the largest of the feathered tribe, appears sometimes to be courageous, but will fly from the near approach of even trifling danger; at first it relies upon its fleetness for escape, but, when closely pursued, even the degree of instinct common to all other animals seems to forsake it, and hiding its head in some small fissure of a rock or hole in the earth, it imagines itself safe because the head is covered, although all other parts of its body remain exposed, and are left to be preyed upon at will by the pursuing enemy. Not very dissimilar, it seems to me, will be the interesting spectacle exhibited by the passage of this bill. Whether the members of the body whose head is buried in the Sub-Treasury vaults will be particularly pleased with their exposed situation, time must show. There can be no doubt, however, but that a smile of no equivocal character will play upon the countenance of every disinterested observer.

To return: we have been earnestly and emphatically told, this is a Government of limited powers, and cannot, constitutionally, do any thing. Yes, sir, the distinguished and highly gifted Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] has argued that we cannot even pass the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] consistently with the Constitution. Let us examine and see if this difficulty really exists; if it does, then has this Government failed of the ends of its institution, and our condition is hapless and hopeless indeed. Before, however, I proceed with the examination of this branch of the subject, I must pause to notice, and put myself right before the country, upon another point alluded to in this connection by the Senator. He says, in maintaining his construction of the Constitution, (after enumerating evils which he thinks would flow from a different construction,) "and thus a door might be opened to an interference with State institutions, of which we of a certain section ought at this time to be not a little jealous."

I very much regret this allusion; the section appealed to cannot be mistaken, nor can the disturbing passions thereby likely to be awakened assist in our search for truth. The honorable gentleman tells us his object is truth, and I doubt him not; but why touch a chord that vibrates so strongly? To arrive at truth, reason should be calm, a condition we of a certain quarter are not likely to be placed in by such appeals. I, sir, and the people I in part represent here, are of that quarter. We have interests, feelings, habits, susceptibilities, all in common with the whole South; our situation upon a certain question is even more critical and dangerous in some respects than theirs, but we dread nothing so much as agitation and excitement upon that subject; all discussions upon it here are fraught with danger to the whole country. We of Maryland have suffered much painful anxiety in relation to it; our feelings have been often harrowed up both by unwise and wicked agitation of this matter; at one time we are taunted and goaded by erring Christians, by fanatics, and friends; and at another our passions are inflamed and feelings played upon by party politicians. No people are more alive upon this question than we are, none perhaps more determined in the course they will pursue in relation to it; but we have been silent, our feelings are wrought to that point where true dignity imposed silence. We believe the great danger is in agitation, we know there are many reckless fanatics in the North, but we also know there is much virtue, patriotish and intelligence there; and in that virtue, patriotism and intelligence we still have an abiding confidence. We rely upon these to hold in check and repress the evil spirits among them. If they do this, we shall love them still, and better than before. We do not believe the dangers predicted in other quarters are so imminent; we trust they will never come upon us; but if, contrary to our just hopes, extremes of evil should come, we cannot but brace ourselves to the storm, and meet it, when it comes, with fearless determination. Should the necessity ever arise, (which may Heaven in its mercy avert!) we shall in sadness take our stand under the Southern banner, but as determined as sad we shall abide there to the death.

Such things have nothing to do with the inquiry as to the true extent of the powers of this Government upon this or any other occasion; the claim of power over this matter admits of no discussion. It cannot be inferred; and, if assumed, must be assumed over the ruins of the whole Constitution. I recognise not, then, the justice of such appeals; nor can I be induced, under the influence of any apprehensions they may excite, to give such a strained construction to the Constitution as will defeat the beneficent ends for which it was framed. The rights and interests of each and every quarter of the Union are amply secured and fully protected by that instrument in its fair and full scope. I wise to see it operate to its legitimate end—the happiness and welfare of all. Extreme wickedness may pervert to the destruction of the country all or any of the vast powers expressly granted; but no one would say, we should therefore argue, from the possible abuse, against the existence of the grant. When such a degree of depravity shall exist in the country, there will be but one remedy. Modes of construction will give no security. We have yet, however, I trust, sufficient virtue and patriotism remaining to construe and administer the Constitution according to its true meaning and spirit, with a single eye to its beneficent designs. Discarding, then, all such disturbing passions and fears, let us inquire into the rationale of the objections to the powers of the Government as urged by the Senator To do this, one or two preliminary points must be established. I set out, then, with asserting this proposition: that this Government, in the exercise of its expressly delegated powers may select the most convenient and appropriate means, provided, in that selection, it impinge not upon prohibited ground, The proof: the powers of Government are generally given in classes; such as the power to regulate commerce, the power to coin money, and the like. The classes are specific, but given in concise and general terms, and given that they may be exercised to certain and declared ends, namely, the "promotion of the general welfare," as stated to be the object of the grant, in the preamble to the Constitution. How and by what means to be exercised, the particular grants are silent. The things cannot be done without the use of some means. Where is the specific grant of means? Nowhere. How then do you get the command of them? They are incidental, or granted by the last clause of the article containing these grants, (the 8th,) by which power is given to Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof. But this only gives the means necessary and proper; and I have claimed the right to such as are most convenient and appropriate within the limits of express prohibition. We must therefore inquire, what is the true meaning of the words necessary and proper in the connection in which they stand in that clause. The word necessary is the stricter term; about the word proper there can be no dispute. I will therefore leave this, as equivalent to the term appropriate, and discourse only on the term necessary. This word, as it stands in the clause quoted, must have its meaning explained in one or two ways: it either means indispensably necessary, that is, something for which no equivalent or substitute can be found, or it means something most convenient or conducive to the main object. That it does not mean indispensably necessary, will, I think, be conceded, when it is recollected that in the exercise of several of the powers, and in the performance of several of the duties of the Government, there are many different means, any of which will answer the purpose, with different degrees of convenience; but there being several means, either of which would answer, neither is indispensable. Some one is indispensable, certainly; for, without some means, the power cannot be exercised, nor the duty be performed at all. But neither of several things can be considered indispensable, when either will answer the same end; because, dispensing with either, some other can be resorted to. The indispensable necessity goes no farther than the adoption of some one of the many means which may be adequate to the end; but in the selection between the several sorts of means capable of answering the purpose, you can only be governed by considerations of greater convenience and propriety. Give the clause the construction contended for, admit that no particular means can be used unless it be indispensably necessary, and you can use none at all in cases where several different means exist; because whichever you select is not indispensably necessary, so long as there are others which could be used when the selected means are dispensed with.

Take, for example, the taxing power. What a variety of means there are of laying and collecting taxes! Neither of these is indispensably necessary to the exercise of the power, for either will answer. If, then, you can use only such as is indispensably necessary; if you have no discretion, no right to select, you can use neither, and your power cannot be exercised. So of keeping and disbursing the public money, the question now under consideration. This Sub-Treasury bill is proposed as means; it is not indispensable, because there are other means of doing the same thing. The State banks are not indispensable for this purpose, because there are still other means by which it can be effected. Not at liberty to choose, restricted to the use of that mean only which is indispensable, there being none such, you can use none, and the public money cannot be kept at all. It must now be apparent that the word necessary is not used in the strict and narrow sense contended for; and it follows that the only and most restricted practical construction which can be given to this part of the Constitution is, that Congress has power to adopt necessary and proper means of exercising the powers granted, and of performing the duties imposed upon it, and that, in the adoption of those means, they are to select such as are most convenient and appropriate.

I mean not to contend, nor need I contend, for the broad construction of the terms "general welfare," as used either in the preamble or the first clause of the 8th section of the Constitution, against which the Senator has protested. I admit, nay, I insist, they are limited by the subsequent specifications of powers, and can justly be held to import no more than a declaration of the end and object for which the specific grants of power are to be used; in other words, they are declaratory of the nature of the trust. What I contend for is, that the several specific grants of powers carry along with them the right to use necessary and proper means for their execution; and that these terms necessary and proper, as used in the Constitution, are not to be, and cannot be, construed in a strict and narrow sense, but are, as there used, within the express restrictions, equivalent to most convenient and appropriate. I shall use, however, these terms general welfare in their declaratory sense, to deduce from them certain obligations of duty on the part of this Government in the selection of the most convenient and appropriate means for exercising its specific powers. Of this hereafter.

Having now established the preliminary points, I recur to the particular objections to the constitutional power to pass the substitute for the bill, as urged in the argument of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He asserts, in the first place, that this Government has no right, constitutionally, to make the contract or arrangement with the banks for the safe-keeping of the public money, as proposed by the substitute; and, holding up the Constitution, he demands that the specific grant of power to make this arrangement be shown. Now, in reply, I say it is not claimed as a separate, independent power; it is claimed only as a mean incidental to the collection and disbursement of revenue, and as such does most undoubtedly belong to this Government, and is a more convenient and appropriate mean of doing the same thing, namely, keeping and disbursing the public money, than this Sub-Treasury bill. The inquiry might be retorted, by asking where can be found in the Constitution a specification of the power to establish all the machinery proposed by this bill? Nowhere; there are no such specifications; it can be claimed and exercised only as incidental, as a mean; and the only question is, whether it be a more convenient and appropriate mean; and that it is not so convenient or appropriate as the arrangement proposed by the substitute will be apparent to any one who takes the trouble to inquire into the inferiority of the security for the public money thereby afforded, and to reflect upon the fatal effects of its adoption upon the "general welfare" of the country. If we have not power to enter into this arrangement with the banks to use them as means of managing our fiscal concerns, unless a specific grant of power to that effect can be shown in the Constitution, whence comes the power to contract for carrying the mail, or to carry the mail at all? The Constitution gives you in terms simply the power "to establish post offices and post roads;" that is all; and yet, under this grant, you make contracts with individuals and corporations for carrying your mail, and have established all the immense machinery of the Post Office Department. Whence your power to make all the other thousand contracts, continually being made for supplies of various sorts, and for the performance of various services for Government? All these, as well as the power to make the proposed arrangement with the banks, result to the Government as incidental to the several classes of powers to which they relate, and which are specifically granted. They are necessary as means of executing those powers—are claimed and exercised on that ground; and if the power to use means not specified and detailed in the Constitution for the administration of the granted powers, and performance of duties enjoined, are now to be denied, all the operations of Government must come to a stand.

The Senator again denies the right to make general deposites of the public revenue in a bank, and quotes in support of this position, the clause next the last in the 9th section, first article of the Constitution, which is in these words: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." How is a general deposite of the public money in a bank an infraction of this clause? When we make a deposite in bank, a general deposite, we are putting money into the Treasury, not drawing it out. No expenditure of the money is thereby made or authorized. It is placed there for safe-keeping, is passed to the credit of the Government on the books of the bank, and so remains until it is drawn out or disbursed in consequence of appropriations made by law; or is transferred to some more convenient point for the purpose of being so disposed of. The bank is your agent to keep safely, and return whenever called upon lawfully, the money deposited with it; it is always there and always subject to your order, and therefore always in the Treasury. Being in bank it is not separated from the business and trade of the country, but instead of lying dead and useless to every body until wanted in the course of your expenditures, they so keep it as to make it in the interval useful and conducive to the general good; yet it is not drawn from the Treasury or expended. The terms drawn from the Treasury as used in the clause quoted, signify plainly to expend, to part with, to appropriate in payment, or otherwise apply on Government account; and the whole clause is intended merely as a restraint upon the dirbursement of the public money. And can a sum of money be said to be disbursed which stands to your credit on the books of a solvent bank? Certainly not; it is in the Treasury. All money of the Government, in the hands or custody of any agent who may be appointed to take care of and keep it, is in the Treasury, a term not used to designate a particular place or building, but the treasure actually in the possession of Government and its agents, subject to disbursement. But it is argued the banks discount upon these deposites, and they are therefore drawn from the Treasury. What has the Treasury to do with the discounts made by the banks? They have undertaken to keep your money safely, and on deposite. With them it is always subject to your order. What though in consequence of these deposites they do lend more to their customers than they otherwise would? It is their own affair, and whether they keep the funds intrusted to them in vaults, or in the hands of their customers, it cannot be said to amount to an expenditure of the public money, or any infraction of the clause of the Constitution quoted; they are responsible for the safety of the money, however or wherever they may keep it, and it is still so much to your credit in their hands as your agents, subject to the order of Government for disbursement, and therefore in the Treasury, not drawn from it. I am not now arguing as to the liability of banks to diminish their security or safety as depositories by too great an extension of their discounts; that is another question. What I have said was to show that the discounts or loans made by banks in which public money was deposited do not amount to a drawing of money from the Treasury. If a removal from any particular place, or transfer from hand to hand of the money of the Government, be to draw money from the Treasury, then all your transfers from place to place as convenience may require for future disbursement, are unconstitutional. Then, when money is once collected, it must never be touched or moved on any pretence whatever, either to provide for its greater safety, or for any other purpose, "but in consequence of appropriations made law." Such a construction can never obtain, and, until it does, our right to make general deposites of the public revenue in banks remains unquestionable, as it has been hitherto unquestioned.

It is again argued by the Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] as another constitutional objection to the substitute, that this Government has no right to treat bank notes as money in its fiscal transactions, and impart to them receivability in payment of its dues. It is difficult to meet and combat in argument a proposition so plainly untenable, and so contrary to all our habits of thought, and the accustomed course of things. This position needs but to be stated, it seems to me, to be rejected; yet it has been earnestly and most eloquently asserted and reasoned upon by the Senator. Is it not necessarily incident to the power to lay and collect taxes, that you should prescribe the medium in which payment is to be made? Is that medium any where prescribed in the Constitution? Does the Constitution any where say that you shall receive nothing but silver and gold in the payment of dues to Government? And when you by law require that nothing but silver and gold shall be received in such payment, are you not prescribing a medium of payment, and exercising the very power you would be exercising if you authorized the receipt of bank paper, or any thing else? Does it not strike the mind of every man with irresistible force, that the creditor to whom a debt is payable, be that creditor a natural person, or body corporate or politic, may at pleasure relax the rigor of the obligation upon the debtor, and receive in payment that which it is more convenient for the debtor to pay. I agree that equal justice requires that all contributions made by numbers of persons for a common purpose should be regulated by principles of equality, and should be paid by all in a medium of equal value. It is in conformity to this principle of equal justice that your Constitution requires your taxes to be uniform throughout the United States.

But this does not prove that you cannot receive bank notes in payment of those taxes; it only proves that, if received, you must see that such as you do receive in one place are equally valuable with those received in another; an equality of value which I shall presently attempt to show does not, and will not, exist, even in your gold and silver coin itself, at different points, unless you perform what I consider one of your most important duties, namely, to regulate the currency and exchanges of the country. But the Senator argues that if bank notes are received, the Government might, upon the same principle, select tobacco as a medium of payment to itself, and thence deduce the right to regulate that staple in various ways. They could not, under that pretence, claim the right to regulate the article any further than they imparted receivability to it in payment of their dues, that is, they might prescribe the quality and condition of the article itself, and the weight, size, shape, and material of the hogshead or package which they would receive, but there their power would end; they could not assume any control over, nor regulate, in any way, that which the producers might see fit to dispose of otherwise; and so far from being alarmed at the suggestion that Government might make tobacco the medium for the payment of the public dues, I am disposed to think the planters in Maryland (to whom the payment of taxes in tobacco is not a new idea) would have no sort of objection to such a regulation. As one of them, I say for myself, I should be glad of it, for it would occasion an increased demand for our commodity, and of course render it more profitable to the grower.

The Senator says it is unconstitutional to receive bank notes in payment of public dues. I doubt not such is sincerely his opinion, or he would not have advanced it; and such being his opinion, though I differ with him, I claim on that ground, his vote against this Sub-Treasury bill. He would not, certainly, knowingly vote for an unconstitutional measure; and he conscientiously believes it to be unconstitutional to receive bank notes in payments to the Treasury; he cannot, therefore, vote for any law authorizing their reception, and has urged earnestly, in debate, that objection to the substitute. Now, this very Sub-Treasury bill contains a provision in the 23d section authorizing or permitting the receipt of bank notes in payment of portions of the public dues, for six years to come; he cannot, therefore, consistently with his own position, assumed in this very debate, vote for this bill; and although he may, on that and other grounds, vote against the substitute, he must on that ground, at least, vote with me against the bill. For constitutional principles are stubborn things, and cannot be made to yield to considerations of expediency: when a proposition is once admitted or proved to be unconstitutional, there is, or ought to be, an end of it.

Having now disposed of all the constitutional objections which have been urged, I pass to the affirmative proposition, that it is the imperative duty of this Government to see that the country is provided with a currency, sound, safe, and well regulated. This obligation, or duty, on the part of the Government, is now denied by the dominant party, and though claimed and acted upon by the late Administration, throughout its whole career, it is now proposed to repudiate it by the bill before the Senate; and the people of the country are, we are told, in this respect, to take care of themselves, Government can do nothing. I assert this obligation as resulting from the very nature and object of our Union as well as being indispensable to the performance of several of the duties expressly imposed by the Constitution. By the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution, power over these matters is prohibited to the States. They are forbidden to "coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts;" and by a previous clause of that instrument (the 5th of the 8th section) power is given to Congress "to coin money, and regulate the value thereof," &c. Thus the whole subject is, by express words, taken from the States and vested in this Government. For what purpose was this done? Plainly and obviously for the sake of uniformity throughout the country, and to avoid the evils and inconveniences to the whole people of currencies local and of unequal values.

By the clause of the Constitution last quoted, you are authorized and required to regulate the value of money. How is this to be done? Can it be possible that any one will contend that this duty is fulfilled by fixing the denominations of your coin, and prescribing the proportions of alloy and pure metal, of which each piece shall consist? These are not the sole tests of its value, they afford proof to every one who receives a piece of your coin of a particular denomination, and stamped in a particular way, of the quantity of constituent materials in that piece; but its value is not thereby regulated; the value may, and does, notwithstanding this, vary with change of circumstances. This is the mere coinage, not the regulation of the value of your money. You are required to do both, "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." This last you cannot do without regulating the whole currency, every thing which circulates and is used as money, and bringing the whole to some fixed and uniform standard.

It is the money value of your coin you are required to regulate by the Constitution; the words being "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." The value of bullion you have no authority to regulate, and could not regulate, had you the authority and disposition to make the attempt; that depends upon the markets of the world, and must be left to be regulated by them. But the value of your money, coin and paper, you not only have the authority to regulate, but you are expressly enjoined to regulate it. To this end, ample and various means are at your command, and it is precisely because you do not and will not perform this duty, that your coin does not now circulate as money, and is used simply as an article of merchandise; and this condition of things will continue to exist, and all the attendant evils and inconveniences will progressively increase, until this Government shall abandon its present pernicious policy, and exercise the power with which it was clothed for the beneficial purpose of furnishing to this whole Republic a uniform standard of value. I have already stated that the value of your coin cannot be regulated or rendered uniform for purposes of money or currency unless the paper, or that which circulates along with it, and performs the same functions, be also regulated. It being your duty to regulate the value of money, it follows, even if it is admitted that bank notes are not money, yet being in fact a part of the currency, and performing the functions of money, you must regulate them. You will not accomplish this by efforts to destroy; by favor, by imparting confidence, they could now easily be restored to the condition of convertibility into coin, at the pleasure of the holder, and a near approximation to uniformity soon follows. To complete the work, domestic exchanges must be regulated, and to this the local banks are not and cannot be made fully competent. Again: it has been argued, and especially by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] that taxes are required by the Constitution to be uniform, and hence he draws conclusions in favor of the passage of this bill and a purely metallic currency. It is with this as with several other of the constitutional positions assumed on the other side. Far from furnishing an argument in their favor, it fortifies our views of the question, and illustrates the utter incompatibility with the genius, powers, and duties of this Government, of the measures now proposed, and the results to which they inevitably lead. The bill contemplates the ultimate receipt of nothing but gold and silver coin in payment of public dues, and leaving the paper currency of the country to time, chance, and accident. The paper of the banks, then, may continue to circulate, at variously depreciated rates, in different quarters, as chance or accident may direct; so long as it continues inconvertible, there will be no coin in circulation with it. Coin, used or bought and sold in the market, as bullion, will be, like other mercantile commodities, subject to the usual fluctuations of price, occasioned by the relations existing at the time and place, between demand and supply. There being none in circulation as money, the Government debtor will have to go into the market whenever a payment to Government is to be made, to purchase, at whatever price it is to be obtained, (most probably at a price suddenly advanced in consequence, if his payment is large, of the demand created by his own wants,) the amount of dollars he has to pay. And thus it may, and will happen, that on the same day one debtor to Government will be compelled to pay twenty-five per cent. more for a given amount due to Government, in one quarter of the country, than his fellow debtor will have to pay for the same amount in another. This will be an admirable specimen of the uniformity of taxation!

But suppose the other effect is produced by the bill, of which I shall speak presently, namely, the destruction of all banks, and that you have a purely metallic currency only: will your taxes then be collected in a medium of uniform value? Will not that uniformity be destroyed by the unsettled and ever-varying rates of exchange? and the inequality be exactly in proportion as the rate of exchange with other quarters of the country is favorable or otherwise to the place where payment is made? So, in neither event can this requisition of the Constitution be complied with, if the measure proposed is adopted.

Again; it is made by the Constitution the duty of this Government "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States." Can this duty be fulfilled without so regulating the actual currency, the great nerve of commerce, as to give to it a fixed, steady, and uniform value throughout the whole country? Can commerce be regulated, can its operations be equal, fair, and just, unless the chief instrument for carrying it on, the medium of exchange and payment, be of uniform value? Why were the States forbidden by the Constitution to pass tender laws, or any laws impairing by the Constitution to pass tender laws, or any laws impairing the obligation of contracts, but that such acts on their part might disturb values and impede the just and fair operations of commerce among the States? And will not local, unregulated, and variously depreciated currencies have the same pernicious effect?

The duty "to regulate commerce among the several States," implies, in my judgment, that you should regulate, control and adjust its operations according to the principles of justice and equity. That you should take care, by this regulation, that the citizens of every State should be enabled to obtain each his fair and just proportion of the benefits and advantages derivable from the sale or exchange of their several productions and commodities to or with the citizens of another State, without unequal burdens or discriminating charges of any kind; that persons carrying on this commerce shall not be deprived or robbed of any portion of the value of their commodities, either by the direct action of the State authority, or by any contrivance of sharpers, shavers, or money dealers, operating with or upon unsound, depreciated currencies, unregulated exchanges, and the like. To the end that this regulation, this equalization of the benefits and advantages of commerce among the several States might be secured to all, the States themselves have consented to be shorn of portions of their sovereign power, have parted with their authority over the subject, and placed it in your hands as the common agent of all, to be exercised for the common object. It may be said that this duty of the Government is fulfilled so long as the States abstain, or are prevented from encumbering this commerce by discriminating taxes or the like; but, I ask what essential difference does it make to the farmer, or other producer of a marketable commodity, whether he pays ten or twenty per cent. by way of tax directly to the State in which he sells, or through which he carries his produce to market, or pays the same amount to sharpers, swindlers, or shavers, under the names of discounts upon the currency or differences of exchange? I should think he would more willingly submit to a discriminating tax imposed by State authority, because that would generally be known, fixed, and certain and therefore be a matter in reference to which he could make his calculations before he left his home; but the charges of shavers and exchange brokers are always uncertain and variable; things about which no calculations can be made beforehand, and liable to be increased in proportion to the necessities of those having to submit to them. To regulate commerce among the several States, then, to perform that duty according to the spirit and object with which it was given you in charge, you must, as means, regulate and give uniformity of value to the actual currency of the country; without this, you cannot "establish justice," and you will stop short of the effectuation of one great good contemplated by the institution of this Government. I think it may now be fairly assumed, from all that has been said, of the duty on the part of this Government "to regulate the value of money," to see that "taxes shall be uniform throughout the United States," and "to regulate commerce among the several States," that it is a duty imposed by each and all of these to regulate the actual currency of the country, and to take care that it is sound, safe, and of uniform value, as a necessary means, without which neither of those express grants of power can be faithfully exercised, to the attainment of the ends designed.

Let us now inquire how it is proposed to fulfil this duty. The bill under discussion, far from attempting to fulfil it, is an express abandonment of it altogether. It (the bill) proposes not only to do nothing for the country and the people, but to do worse than nothing. Its principles and policy, if carried out must have the effect of greatly augmenting existing difficulties and distress, and of rendering the present confusion in the exchanges and currency of the country more confounded. It will destroy what remains of credit and confidence; it will either remove from circulation entirely all bank paper, and force the country through scenes of ruin and suffering, of which what now exists is but a faint and distant outline, to a purely metallic currency. Or, should the necessities of the people compel a continuance among them of the use of bank paper as a currency, the resumption of specie payments by the banks must be postponed to some period beyond the continuance of such a policy; for it is idle to think of banks resuming specie payments, and continuing to do business in the face of the discredit thus to be thrown upon them by the Government, and the factitious value imparted to coin by its exclusive receivability in payment of public dues. Commerce must languish, droop, and perish, and with commerce will sink also manufactures and agriculture; for commerce circulates the products of both, gives them value, and brings to those employed in these pursuits the fair rewards of their toil and industry. Without her aid what becomes of the surplus productions of the farmer and planter? They perish; they rot upon his hands; they bring no additional comfort or enjoyment to himself or his family. Reaping no reward, how soon will the farmer cease to cultivate more than enough of those things which his farm will produce than are necessary for his own consumption? The same cause will have the same effect upon the exertions of the mechanic and the manufacturer. What a beautiful state of things! How rapidly we shall be approaching the golden age, hard money, and barbarism!

Efforts have been made to excite prejudices against merchants and manufacturers; appeal after appeal has been made to the agriculturists, to the cultivators of the soil, in favor of this measure, and they are to be taught to believe that there exists between them and the other classes of society, especially the merchants and manufacturers, hostile or adversary interests. I am an agriculturist; I live and support my family exclusively by cultivating the earth; and no one could have higher motives of interest and duty to guard that interest with scrupulous care than myself; yet, far from saying that commerce and manufactures, or commercial men, are to be viewed as hostile to the farmer's interests, I can view them only as co-laborers with him—as indispensable assistants.

Why was the regulation of commerce so carefully provided for in the Constitution? The framers of that instrument were, for the most part, agriculturalists; the great interest of the country at that day, as at this, was, and is, agricultural; and the regulation of commerce was provided for, because it was essential to that great interest that it should be carried on, and essential to the protection of the farmer that it should be regulated. The policy of this bill abandons that regulation in a most essential particular, and it is by want of the performance of this duty to regulate, that farmers may expect to suffer. Commerce and manufactures are handmaids of agriculture, and among the strangest of the many strange things of the present day, are the unreasonable jealousies and prejudices excited against those who carry them on, and especially against the merchants, a class of men, (and it is as a class only that I speak of them,) who are the agents and servants of the other great classes of society, chiefly of the farmers and cultivators of the soil; men whose best interest it is to serve us faithfully and well, who grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength; who live by ministering to our wants, and who, in this country, have, by their skill, their high honor and great enterprise, been the wonder and amazement of the world.

Manufactures, too, have been denounced. Yes, sir, we were gravely told the other day by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] that the country was not benefitted by manufactures. I did not at first believe my ears, until the Senator repeated his remark with emphasis. What, the country not benefitted by manufactures! Would the Senator have us go back to a state of absolute barbarism? The country not benefitted by manufactures! Not benefitted by the conversion of the crude elements around us into the comforts, conveniences, and enjoyments of life! Would the Senator have us import from abroad our bricks and lime for building? our tar, turpentine, and lumber, of which, where I live, we get a great deal from North Carolina, and we are very glad to get it, too, thinking ourselves benefitted thereby; and I apprehend the people of North Carolina think themselves benefitted by supplying us, or they would not do so? Would he have us go bare-headed and bare-footed, except as we could purchase hats and shoes from foreign countries? Would he have us ride bare-backed, or go bare-backed ourselves, except as we could procure saddles or coats from foreign countries? Would he have the farmer, the cultivators of the earth, depend upon foreign countries for their ploughs, their hoes, and other implements? Were this the case, I fear there would be but little hope of ever creating such a balance of trade in our favor as would bring specie enough into the country to supply the Sub-Treasury vaults. I say nothing about protective tariffs; whether the country is benefitted by high rates of protective duties is one question; whether it is or has been benefitted by manufactures is another and a very different question. Strange as all these things may appear, they are not half so strange or startling as other effects to be produced by this bill. It is by some contended that it is to produce a return to an exclusive metallic currency, and such a return, it is affirmed, will be beneficial to the poor men of the country. There could not be a greater error; in proportion as you reduce the whole amount of circulating medium, you depress the price of labor and all the products of industry; and he benefits by such operations who already has large sums of money hoarded, not he who has it to acquire by labor. The wealthy capitalist will benefit by a destruction of all currency but gold and silver coin, not the small farmer or laboring man. When you shall have banished from circulation three-fourths of the present currency, it will be as difficult to obtain one dollar as it now is, or lately was, to obtain four. The farmer must consequently give four times as much of the products of his industry, the sinews and muscles of the laboring man must be strained four times as hard to earn a dollar as before. And to whose benefit does this additional labor and toil enure? To the benefit of him who has his hoards of gold, the wealthy capitalist and the salaried officer!

The Senator from North Carolina who first addressed the Senate [Mr. BROWN] stated that in resisting this Sub-Treasury bill, we were contending for the interests of the banks, and and against the interests of the people. The reverse is our position. We are struggling to shield and save the people and their interests. It is admitted that the debt due by the people of the country to the banks at this time is about four hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars. Suppose by this bill you drive from circulation all bank paper, the amount of your currency will of course be thereby reduced four-fifths, if not much more, in amount. What effect so great a reduction of the ordinary supply of money, or circulation, is to have upon prices of all kinds, none can tell; but most certainly it will reduce them in a much greater proportion. But grant that they will be reduced only in the same proportion, say three-fourths, then it will require three times as much of the property and labor of the people to pay the debt to the banks, as it now would, or as was contemplated when the debt was contracted; or in other words, the debt to the banks will in effect be reduced fourteen hundred and twenty-five millions; for property now worth that sum will be required to pay the debt it sold at the reduced rates. The banks will have a rich harvest truly, in their collections. They will be amply compensated for being compelled to cease their operations, by being enabled to appropriate to their own use the fruits of the honest industry of the country for years and years back, in the shape of improved farms, comfortable buildings, and other property, sold to satisfy small arrears due by the oppressed and ruined debtors. Who are these debtors? Not the rich and wealthy, they are on the other side of the account. The debtors are the men of limited means; the small farmers, the industrious, the active and enterprising portions of the community; you annihilate the currency, you compel the banks to collect the debts due them in coin, and wide-spread and incalculable ruin must be the consequence. And yet we are told, that we who would arrest all this, who are striving to prevent it, are sustaining the banks against the people.

No, sir, it is not the banks that are to suffer; it is not for them or their interests we are contending. They will profit by being forced to collect their debts under such circumstances. The moneyed capitalists, too, will be the great gainers, of whom many an one now sits watching the progress of this bill, like a vulture upon his perch, ready to pounce upon the covey beneath.

Pass the bill; then will be their time, and the great body of the people must become victims. Deep, indeed, must be the delusion of those who will not believe the yeomanry of this country have intelligence enough to understand, and, understanding, have courage enough indignantly to denounce the whole scheme. But we are told as the bank paper is withdrawn from circulation, specie will flow in to supply its place. Will it; from whence? Will any body give it to you? No; then you must buy it; you must give an equivalent for it. Where are your means to purchase the vast amount required to supply all your circulation and to maintain values, when your bank paper shall have been all destroyed? The supply, if obtained at all, must come from foreign countries. The quantity you will require is not less than three hundred millions of dollars. Let us look at the amount of your exports and imports for a year or two back, and see what surplus you have, or are likely to have, wherewith to purchase, and cause to flow in this immense amount of specie. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that the amount of imports into the country for 1836, was $189,980,035, from which we must deduct the amount of foreign merchandise exported, amounting to $21,746,360, and there remains as the amount of imports from foreign countries, and entering into the consumption of this country, the sum of $168,233,675. The amount of our domestic productions, exported during the same year, by same report, is $106,916,680, so you fell in arrears $61,316,995; and making the most liberal allowances for profits on trade, differences in reduction, etc. you were still in debt for your supplies, and had certainly nothing left to buy specie with that year. In 1837, by same report, your imports from foreign countries amounted to $140,852,980. Deduct as before amount of foreign merchandise exported $21,722,861, and you have $129,130,119 as the amount of foreign importations entering into domestic consumption in this year. Your exports of domestic produce of all sorts amounted to $95,183,199, leaving you in debt for this year also, apparently to the amount of $33,946,920, so that you had not, make every allowance for profits, etc. any thing in the year 1837 either, to purchase specie with. From this it appears that the amount of domestic products must be greatly increased, or the habits of our people so altered as to dispense with the use of a large part of the foreign productions they have been accustomed to use and enjoy, before we can have any surplus to purchase specie to fill up the channels of our circulation. How many years it will take so to increase our domestic productions or alter the habits of our people it is impossible to tell; but if you suppose, and it is an extravagant supposition, rendered doubly so by the severe trial the country will be passing through, that by self-denials and hard work we so manage as to reduce our consumption and increase our surplus production one-half the whole amount of our consumption of foreign imports for 1837, or sixty millions annually, and apply this whole difference to the procurement of specie, it will require five years to obtain the amount necessary; long before the expiration of which time, the collection of debts will have done its work of ruin upon all, however industrious or meritorious, who now owe even small balances. And after the country shall have passed through all this, the suffering and injustice shall all have been endured, and you have your supply of gold and silver, what warrant have you that it will abide with you? None whatever. The first change in the tide of foreign commerce, the first extraordinary demand that future occurrences may occasion for it abroad, will carry it away more rapidly than it came.

It has been said by some Senators, and particularly by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that the bill will not destroy the banks or bank notes but will leave them still to circulate as local currency. Upon that I have before commented, and will here only add, that such cannot be the case under the operation of this bill, unless necessity forces them to circulate, as at present, an irredeemable, inconvertible paper money, subject to all the evils of excessive augmentation, various degrees of depreciation, insecurity, and injustice, before pointed out. What then is to be done? Restore the credit system—restore to the country a sound, safe, and regulated paper medium of uniform value, and always convertible into gold or silver, at the pleasure of the holder—restore that which we had, and of which we have been deprived by a long series of unwise and pernicious experiments. Cease the war upon the banking institutions of the country, extend to them the smiles of confidence, let them operate to their legitimate ends, namely, to give to credit, within safe limits, the advantages of capital—to give to intelligence and industry, though coupled with poverty, the means of acquiring independence. We want not an exclusive specie currency, it is unsuited to our condition, unsuited to our wide extended country. Its expensiveness in counting the transmission is too burdensome—its immense cost for interest annually is too heavy a drawback upon our prosperity, when the same functions can be better and more cheaply performed in other respects without it. The saving to the country, in the course of a few years, by the use of a paper medium, is amazing to one who has not thought or taken the trouble to make a calculation upon the subject. I have taken the pains to make some calculations upon this point. I will state them. Assuming three for one to be, under ordinary circumstances, a safe relation between bank issues and the metalic basis upon which they rest, and this appears to be generally admitted to be correct, let us suppose $400,000,000 to be the amount of circulating medium required by the country; then, if you use paper, properly regulated, you will require only $100,000,000 of coin; the other three hundred millions is made up of paper which costs the country nothing.

To the country, then, there is a saving of the interest upon these $300,000,000; calculate this interest at six per cent. per annum, and compound it only once in a year, (a rate much slower than the actual accumulations from capital employed in most of the active pursuits of our country,) and you have, in the course of twenty-five years, the enormous sum of $874,478,055, as the amount saved in interest only, by the use of a mixed currency, though regulated and kept always convertible into coin; a sum which, immense as it is, will cease to astonish when we look around upon the country and behold what have been the practical effects of the system during the last twenty years. The effects of the proposed wise policy of employing the dearest of all materials to effect purposes which can be as well or better effected by much cheaper means, of indulging a ridiculous fondness for the glitter and jingle of gold and silver, I will illustrate in another way: suppose two persons, I will say two young farmers, (because I like them, they are of my own kind,) have each five thousand dollars. The one in furnishing his house chooses to lay out his five thousand dollars in gold and silver plate; his tea services and his dinner services, his salvers and his candlesticks, all of precious metal, are rich and beautiful, and valuable certainly, and they are useful, too. The other having no such inordinate desire to have silver and gold always before his eyes, supplies himself for all these purposes with the materials of glass and crockery in common use, and which answer the purpose equally well, and many of them better, and deducting their cost from his five thousand dollars invests the balance in trade, in productive stocks, or another farm; observe the difference in their situations after the expiration of twenty years. The first still has plate, a little worn and somewhat lighter than at first, but he still has it, and if not diminished it is certainly not increased in value, nor has it produced him any thing, though it has served the purposes for which he procured it all the time. The other has the farm he purchased, itself probably more than doubled in value, and an accumulation of annual profits, at least two or three times greater than the worth of the plate. Your gold and silver gentleman will find, in the language of Dr. Franklin, that he has paid pretty "dearly for his whistle;" and so shall we if we are brought to a purely metallic currency.

That a mixed currency can be rendered safe and much more useful and convenient than one purely metallic needs no argument to prove; nor need I reply to the argument that the banks are a heavy tax upon the community. He who borrows money from a bank, and, using their notes, pays an interest for them, pays no more than the lawful equivalent for the benefit or services rendered him. The notes are more convenient to him, answer his purposes as well or better than metal, and the whole country is a great gainer by dispensing with the use of so much coin. A paper medium, to be safe, must be always convertible into coin, at the pleasure of the holder. To preserve this convertibility, the proportion of coin to the amount of issues should never be less than as one to three, to be increased, however, according to the indicia furnished by the rates of foreign exchange; issues, too, can always be guarded with certainty from excess, by reference to demands for coin, and the effects of such issues upon domestic prices, when compared with relative prices in the commercial world; any general tendency to speculative rise in prices indicating a redundant circulation. Such a medium, so guarded and preserved, resting upon sufficient capital, and in sufficient quantity to effect the great exchanges of the country, would relieve from the evils and inconveniences of either paper or coin, used separately, and exclusively, and secure all the advantages of both. It would be an immense saving to the country, in time and in money; it would equalize and give uniformity to values and exchanges, being itself of uniform value, circulating every where, and capable of quick, easy, and safe transmission. To have such a medium, there must be a common regulation, itself well and certainly regulated by laws vigilantly and wisely administered; perhaps one of its safest guards would be a limitation upon its profits, removing temptation to excess. We have been forewarned, however, that there is no hope for such a currency, under the present Administration!! I have to choose now between the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] and the bill. I shall certainly vote for the substitute. And here let me pause, to pay a just tribute to the honorable mover of that substitute, and its chief advocate, the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE.] They are entitled to, and will receive, the thanks of a grateful country, for their independent and patriotic course in presenting and sustaining it. They have stood here during this debate as good and great men, struggling, not with "the storms of fate," but with the storms of party. Their country will remember it.

I shall give my vote in favor of this substitute, because it holds out something of hope and promise to the country. I doubt its sufficiency. I do not think it equal to the exigencies of the times, but it will, at least, do some good; instead of withering powers, it proposes to extend the smiles of confidence to the moneyed institutions of the land; it repudiates the idea of a divorce, of a separation of the Government in its fiscal transactions from the currency and business of the people. It manifests a solicitude for, a sympathy with the people, in the present deranged and embarrassed state of their circulating medium. Possibly, the great resources and energies of our people may enable the business and commerce of the country to revive under it, and specie payments to be partially resumed, but it can never supply the great desideratum—a safe and stable currency of uniform value for the whole country. This it is the duty of Government, by the proper exercise of its powers, to provide, and without the use of which, as a necessary means, they cannot execute their trust according to its nature and spirit. They cannot so exercise their granted powers, as, without transcending prescribed limits, to make the whole tend in the greatest degree to the promotion of the "general welfare."

Mr. President, I have now most imperfectly performed my duty upon this occasion. I have omitted much that I intended to have said, and much of what I have said has probably been better said by those who have preceded me in the debate; and all, and more than all I have omitted, will be better said by those who are to follow me, than it could have been by myself. I have trespassed much longer upon the Senate than I supposed I should; they will pardon me for that. I have announced my purpose in relation to the questions before us, and I have given my reasons for it in the manner you have heard: this done, I shall now patiently abide the final result. I charge this Administration, however, with an abandonment of its duty to the American people, by the bill upon your table, and the policy which dictates it. And the people, sir, will drive home and rivet that charge.

SPEECH OF MR. TALLMADGE, OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, Saturday, June 30, 1838—Against the enlargement of Executive patronage.

MR. PRESIDENT: The proposition of my honorable colleague, considering the circumstances under which it is introduced, and the source from which it comes, is the most extraordinary I have ever known submitted to any legislative body; and let me assure the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] that he is mistaken in saying that my colleague is consistent in making this motion, to repeal the twelve first sections of the deposite act, because he voted originally against the bill. It is true, he voted against that bill in 1836. But, why did he vote against it? Not because he was opposed to that portion which he now proposes to repeal, but because he was opposed to what has been termed the distribution clause; that part which directed the surplus revenues of the Government to be deposited with the States: this was the ground, and the sole ground, upon which he opposed the bill, and finally voted against it. Had not this distribution clause been added, he would have been the foremost to sustain, by all the powers of his mind in argument, as well as by his vote on its final passage, the very portion of the act which he would now repeal. No, sir, his opposition to that bill was to that part of it which, by his present proposition, he consents to leave unrepealed, and still to remain the law of the land.

Mr. President, who ever heard so extraordinary a proposition? What strange infatuation has seized my honorable colleague? What has become of that prudence, and discretion, and sagacity, which usually characterize his legislative action? Where is that far-reaching and cautious foresight by which, in former times, he was enabled to adapt his measures so as to avoid disastrous results? What has become of that nice balancing of political calculation, by which he was so distinguished in the more palmy days of the party? Gone, sir, gone; and gone, I fear, for ever. This is not the act of his deliberate judgment. His feelings, under the excitement of the occasion, may dictate it, but his reason, when left to its own free exercise, can never approve it. I fear he has yielded, too readily, his own better judgment to the hasty and indiscreet suggestions of his friends. He tells us he came here this morning with no intention of offering such a proposition; but that he has been induced to do it by the advice of his friends. Sir, that advice has not been given on due reflection—it is the sudden impulse, not of passion, but of feeling. I fear my honorable colleague and his friendly advisers have taken too much to heart the disasters of the campaign which is just drawing to its close. I fear the death of three successive Sub-Treasury monsters in the other House, and one of their tender offspring here, has affected too sensibly the gentlemen's nerves to allow them to bring their deliberate judgments to the consideration of the monstrous proposition now before us. Sir, I am well assured that, had the gentlemen the benefit of one night's calm and dispassionate reflection, they would never consent to commit themselves in this manner before the country. Because they cannot subject the treasures of the nation to Executive control by law, they are determined to give him that control without law; because they have not been able to impose their "disorganizing and revolutionary" measures upon an unwilling and resisting people, they have determined to place the whole money power of the Government in the hands of the Executive, without even any of those restraints which the Sub Treasury scheme was supposed to throw around it. Sir, it is the desperate act of desperate men. The Executive has led them from the straight-forward path of principle and duty, until they are lost and bewildered in the intricate mazes of his wild and visionary scheming. I cannot but persuade myself that they are convinced of their errors; but that, discarding the ethics of the Christian code, they feel it is too late to repent. They have gone too far to retreat. In the race they are running, it is with them, as in John Gilpin's race, "neck or naught;" and, in regard to this policy, my colleague might say, with Macbeth:

> "I am in this
> Stept in so far, that, should I wade no more,
> Returning were as tedious as go o'er."

Such an act of political suicide I have never seen before. Such an act of folly and of madness I hope never to see again.

Mr. President, let us look for one moment at my colleague's peculiar position in reference to the proposition he has submitted. That portion of the deposite act which he proposes to repeal was originally brought forward by himself. It was brought forward in pursuance of the repeated and urgent recommendations of President Jackson, that the custody of the public money should be regulated by law, and no longer left to Executive discretion or Executive agents. It was one of my colleague's own offspring, which he then nursed with all a parent's fondness, and cherished with all a parent's care. It is this darling child, which has already passed the dangerous period of boyhood and is fast approaching man's estate, which his once doting father now discards, and would turn off upon the cold charity of an unfeeling world, or have to perish by the hand of him who gave him life and being.

Sir, my colleague was chairman of a select committee who reported the deposite act of 1836. Two separate bills were originally introduced; one, to regulate by law the custody of the public money, as recommended by President Jackson; the other, to deposite the surplus revenues of the Government with the several States. These two bills were united in one by the select committee of which my colleague was chairman. He was opposed to that union; for, although he, and General Jackson, and the whole party, were formerly in favor of an absolute distribution of the surplus, still he, and General Jackson, and Mr. Van Buren, and others, were now opposed, not only to a distribution of it, but even to a deposite with the States. An unsuccessful effort was made in the Senate to keep these propositions separate and distinct. I was in favor of both of them; but I voted to separate them, in order that my political friends, who did not like the distribution bill, might have the opportunity of voting for the one and against the other. The two propositions, however, were kept together by a majority of the Senate, and the bill passed with only six dissenting votes, my colleague being one, as the Senator from Missouri expressed it, of the "glorious minority of six." He went against his own favorite measure because of its connection with one which he did not approve. Of this I do not complain. But I think the country will have reason to complain of his course now, in attempting to repeal that part whose enactment he deemed so important then, and to leave unrepealed that portion which was so obnoxious to him at that time as to make him vote against the whole bill. He may be able to explain the matter, but it is, I confess, inexplicable to me. If he had made an effort to repeal the distribution clause, it would not have surprised me; it would have been consistent with his whole action on that bill. But, that he should attempt to repeal the other portion of it, which was his own darling project, is to me astounding, and is indicative of something "more than meets the eye."

Sir, what was the origin and object of that part of the deposite act which my colleague proposes to repeal? It arose from the necessity which President Jackson supposed to exist, in regard to the custody of the public money. After he removed the deposites from the Bank of the United States, he placed them in the State banks, and continued to employ the State banks for the safe custody as well as the disbursement of the public money. But he saw the strong objection which would present itself to every mind, if these deposites should continue entirely at the mercy and under the control of Executive discretion. He uniformly and invariably recommended that they should be regulated by law. In the celebrated paper of September 18th, 1833, read to his cabinet, he says:

"In ridding the country of an irresponsible power, which has attempted to control the Government, care must be taken not to unite the same power with the Executive branch. To give a President control over the currency and power over individuals now possessed by the Bank of the United States, even with the material difference that he is responsible to the people, would be as objectionable and dangerous as to leave it as it is. Neither the one nor the other is necessary, and therefore ought not to be resorted to."

Such was the language employed by General Jackson when he had resolved on removing the public deposites from the Bank of the United States. What was his language after they had been removed? In his message of December, 1834, he thus speaks of dispensing with the agency of that Bank, and the substitution of the State banks in the performance of its duties to the Government:

"Happily it is already illustrated that the agency of such an institution is not necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government. The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness. They have maintained themselves, and discharged all these duties, while the Bank of the United States was still powerful, and in the field as an open enemy; and it is not possible to conceive that they will find greater difficulties in their operations when that enemy shall cease to exist."

But he is not satisfied with this. He urges upon Congress, most earnestly, that the deposites in the State banks be regulated by law. He adds:

"The power of Congress to direct in what places the Treasurer shall keep the moneys in the Treasury, and to impose restrictions upon the Executive authority in relation to their custody and removal, is unlimited, and its exercise will rather be courted than discouraged by those public officers and agents on whom rests the responsibility for their safety. It is desirable that as little power as possible should be left to the President or Secretary of the Treasury over those institutions, which, being thus freed from Executive influence and without a common head to direct their operations, would have neither the temptation nor the ability to interfere in the political conflicts of the country. Not deriving their charters from the national authorities, they would never have those inducements to meddle in general elections which have led the Bank of the United States to agitate and convulse the country for upwards of two years."

By reason of some difference of opinion as to the details of a bill, no law to regulate the deposites with the State banks was passed at that session of Congress. In the mean time the public mind became much excited on this subject, and President Jackson, in his message of December, 1835, found it necessary to repel in the strongest terms all idea of keeping the public money under Executive control, and thereby extending Executive influence. He says:

"Although clothed with the legal authority, and supported by precedent, I was aware that there was, in the act of the removal of the deposites, a liability to excite that sensitiveness to Executive power which it is the characteristic and the duty of freemen to indulge: but I relied on this feeling, also, directed by patriotism and intelligence, to vindicate the conduct which, in the end, would appear to have been called for by the best interests of my country. The apprehensions natural to this feeling, that there may have been a desire, through the instrumentality of that measure, to extend the Executive influence, or that it may have been prompted by motives not sufficiently free from ambition, were not overlooked. Under the operation of our institutions, the public servant who is called on to take a step of to such apprehensions his highest security. When unfounded, the attention which they arouse and the discussions they excite deprive those who indulge them of the power to do harm: when just, they but hasten the certainty with which the great body of our citizens never fail to repel an attempt to procure their sanction to any exercise of power inconsistent with the jealous maintenance of their rights. Under such convictions, and entertaining no doubt that my constitutional obligations demanded the steps which were taken in reference to the removal of the deposites, it was impossible for me to be deterred from the path of duty by a fear that my motives could be misjudged, or that political prejudices could defeat the just consideration of the merits of my conduct. The result has shown how safe is this reliance upon the patriotic temper and enlightened discernment of the people. That measure has now been before them, and has stood the test of all the severe analysis which its general importance, the interests it affected, and the apprehensions it excited, were calculated to produce: and it now remains for Congress to consider what legislation has become necessary in consequence.

"I need only add to what I have, on former occasions, said on this subject, generally, that in the regulations which Congress may prescribe respecting the custody of the public moneys it is desirable that as little discretion as may be deemed consistent with their safekeeping should be given to the Executive agents. No one can be more deeply impressed than I am with the soundness of the doctrine which restrains and limits, by specific provisions, Executive discretion, as far as it can be done consistently with the preservation of its constitutional character. In respect to the control over the public money, this doctrine is peculiarly applicable, and is in harmoney, with the great principle which I felt I was sustaining in the controversy with the Bank of the United States; which has resulted in severing, to some extent, a dangerous connection between a moneyed and political power. The duty of the Legislature to define, by clear and positive enactments, the nature and extent of the action which it belongs to the Executive to superintend, springs out of a policy analagous to that which enjoins upon all the branches of the Federal Government an abstinence from the exercise of powers not clearly granted. In such a Government, possessing only limited and specific powers, the spirit of its general administration cannot be wiser just when it opposes the reference of all doubtful points to the great source of authority, the States and the people; whose number and diversified relations, securing them against the influences and excitements which may mislead their agents, make them the safest depository of power. In its application to the Executive, with reference to the Legislative branch of the Government, the same rule of action should make the President ever anxious to avoid the exercise of any discretionary authority which can be regulated by Congress. The biases which may operate upon him will not be so likely to extend to the Representatives of the people in that body."

In pursuance of these recommendations, my colleague brought forward a proposition for that purpose, which became a law, and which he now proposes to repeal. Do not the same reasons exist now in favor of retaining it that existed when President Jackson first recommended it? Most assuredly they do. Then why repeal it? The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] says it was first recommended on account of the large surplus then on hand, and having none now, the cause for its adoption has ceased to exist. I say, not so. The Senator is mistaken. There was no more surplus at the time this measure was first recommended than we have reason to anticipate, and ought to have, in ordinary times, to meet the current expenses of the Government. We must not take the present state of the Treasury as the criterion of the future, unless the Executive and his friends have determined, by their experiments, to exhaust the resources and dry up the revenues of the country. There is every reason for the continuance of the law now that existed for its enactment then.

We have seen that, after the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States, and before the passage of the deposite act, General Jackson entrusted the custody of the public money to the State banks. He exercised, through the Secretary of the Treasury, his discretion as to the time and manner of its deposite; the banks in which, and the terms upon which, it was deposited; but he felt, from the beginning, the tremendous responsibility he was assuming, and, with all his popularity and his firm hold upon the affections of the people, he foresaw the torrent of popular indignation which would follow the conviction on the public mind that the whole revenues of the country were to be taken out of the custody of the law, and drawn within the absorbing vortex of Executive discretion. He relied upon the prejudices which had been excited against the United States Bank to justify the removal of the deposites; but there was nothing on which he dared rely to shield him from the vengeance of an abused and confiding people, if he should attempt to keep them within the control of Executive discretion, instead of entrusting them to the custody of the law. In his famous manifesto, read to the Cabinet before the removal of the deposites, he carefully guards against any inference of an intention to take them within his own control; and in every message to Congress, from that time down to the passage of the deposite act, he urges most earnestly that the custody of the public money shall be regulated by law. Even his popularity could not have withstood the strong current of public feeling, if he had manifested, in the slightest degree, an intention to keep it within his own control. This intention was charged upon him by the opponents of his administration; but it was repelled by his repeated recommendations that it be taken out of his hands and put into the custody of the law. This recommendation was carried into effect by the passage of the deposite act of 1836; and the public voice acquiesced in the honesty of his intentions as to regulating it by law, however much it might have been distracted on the question of the removal of the deposites. But what do we now behold? We now see a proposition brought forward by one who enjoys, in a peculiar sense, the confidence of the Executive, to repeal the very act which General Jackson had so often recommended to be passed, and which was his only shield against popular jealousy and popular clamor. For what purpose is this intended? Is it to put into the hands of the Executive a power which General Jackson said he ought not to possess? Is it necessary to sustain the sceptre in his hands which the old Hero sustained without it? What else can it be? Gentlemen have told us in this debate that they are for an entire separation of Bank and State, and in favor of the receipt and disbursement of the public revenues in gold and silver only; that they will have no connection in any shape whatever with banks, either as to the receipt of their notes, or as to the deposite of the public money with them. If then, my colleague succeeds in repealing that portion of the deposite act which now regulates the custody of the public money; if he succeeds in taking off all those salutary restraints which the wisdom of a former Congress threw around it, it can be for no other purpose than to put it exclusively under the control of Executive discretion, and thereby enable him to use it to promote his own objects in such a manner as an unrestrained exercise of the money power of any Government is so well calculated to do. In what way is he to keep it, except under his own control, through officers appointed by him, and removable at his pleasure? It has been avowed, on this floor, that if this proposition succeeds, it will not be deposited with the banks as Gen. Jackson deposited it. How then is it to be kept? There is no other mode than the one I have mentioned. Can it be possible that we have already come to this, that we are willing to surrender the purse of the nation to the hand that already holds the sword? Have the American people already become so abased that they will tamely submit to such a usurpation? Shall the President dictate his schemes to Congress; and when, after the most violent struggle ever known in the history of this Government between Representative independence and Executive dictation, those schemes are rejected, shall it be tolerated that he shall extort from you, without restraint and without law, the very treasure of the nation, which you would not entrust to him even with all the guards and restrictions which the suggestions of his ingenuity could throw around it? Is the American Senate to sit here, like the Roman Senate in the days of Tiberius, merely to register imperial edicts? Let me not be accused of attempting to raise unnecessary alarm, or to invoke imaginary fears. It is the false security in which we are reposing that most excites my apprehensions. The first encroachments on the liberty of any country are always by the stealthy, noiseless steps of usurped and unsuspected power. The blind confidence reposed in party leaders, the base submission to party dictation, the tame surrender of the independence of the representative character to the Executive will, all, all combine to raise the most painful forebodings in the mind of every one who loves his country and cherishes her free institutions.

Sir, we have every cause for apprehension and alarm. We have seen the country, in the palmiest days of her prosperity, suddenly plunged into the deepest embarrassment and distress through Executive instrumentality. We have seen our merchants sacrificing their ample means to sustain a sinking credit—sinking by the adverse action of the Government upon the confidence of the people. We have seen their families abandoning their homes and their firesides to pine in penury and want, and suffering for the ordinary comforts and conveniences of life. We have seen the husband and the father, after struggling to sustain his wife and his children against the unfeeling action of his own Government, finally sink to an untimely grave, the victim of oppression and despair. We have seen the sturdy operations of the mechanic industry of the country suspended. We have seen the looms and the spindles of the manufacturer stopped. We have seen the farmer, with his hand to the plough, look back to see if he, too, was to be overtaken by the "desolating tornade," which had swept away every other occupation around him. Sir, he is the last to be reached; but his time is yet to come, if the Administration persist in these destructive measures. When the products of his industry shall remain upon his hands—when, by reason of the destruction of other branches of business, it shall not pay the cost of production—when the price of his land shall sink so far as not to meet the incumbrance which may chance to rest upon it, he will then wipe the sweat from his brow, and with his brawny arm hurl from the high seats of power those who have forgotten the great interests of the country in the ignoble pursuits of party. Sir, we have seen the Government itself become bankrupt under the very operations by which it has bankrupted the community. We have seen the Executive asking of Congress the means of keeping its wheels in motion, and at the same time dictating, through his organs, the amount and the manner in which those means should be granted. We have seen the Administration plunging the country into a national debt without the ingenuousness to acknowledge it. We have seen them resorting to every expedient to meet the current expenses of the Government, and, at the same time, by their destructive policy, cutting off the sources of revenue by which alone the means can be supplied; and we shall see a still further application for supplies, rendered necessary by the blindness, the fatuity, the wilfulness, nay, the incompetency, of those who have brought us to this state of bankruptcy, of shame, and of degradation. We have seen thousands and thousands of our fellow-citizens utterly and irretrievably ruined by the hostile attitude of the Government towards the banking institutions and the credit system of the country. Yes, Mr. President, thousands and thousands who, but for this attitude, would have saved from the wreck of their fortunes an ample competency for themselves and their families—thousands and thousands who would have bent beneath the storm of adversity which howled around them, and would have again risen to bask in the sunshine of returning prosperity. But the spirit of Loco Focoism was the very fiend which mingled in the tempest; and, although it "put the wild waters in this roar," it would not consent to "allay them." Amidst the desolation and darkness which surrounded the unhappy victims of this policy, their cries and their entreaties were sent up to the Executive ear, but were unanswered and unheeded. Even the few that survived the wreck of their fortunes, and whilst they were yet struggling to keep their heads above water, rari gantes in gurgite vasto, received no aid nor even encouragement from Executive clemency. Appeals, which would have melted the heart of an Ocracoke wrecker, found that his was not made of such "penetrable stuff." Wrapped in a mysterious and unapproachable dignity, neither the advice of friends nor the fear of foes could reach him. Shut out from a real knowledge of the extent of the disasters which his own measures had brought upon the country, he neither sympathised with the sufferings of the people nor came to their relief.

Mr. President, we have seen all these, and much more than all these things; and what do we now behold? As if the cup of humiliation and of misery was not yet full; as if our constituents had not already drank it to the very dregs, my colleague now "commends the ingredients of a poisoned chalice to our own lips," not as an act of "even handed justice," but as a draught which we are forced to swallow, by way of showing the complete supremacy of Executive control over both the will of the representative and the wishes of the constituent. Sir, to him and to the Executive, whose opinions he is supposed to represent, this may be a "consummation devoutly to be wished." But to the people, it will be a consummation of that power in the hands of the Executive which converts the Government into an absolute monarchy, no matter by what name your Chief Magistrate may be called, or by what idle forms of an elective franchise he may rule over you. He has, by the Constitution, the command of the army and navy—he has shown you that his will can already well nigh control the legislative power—give him the money power also, and you will have given all that the most perfect despot could desire, or that the friends of civil liberty could fear.

Let it not be said that all this is idle declamation. The signs of the times have filled me with the most fearful apprehensions—this is a bold and daring effort, appalling from its very boldness, to clothe the Chief Magistrate with a power which General Jackson himself dared not retain, and which he said should never be entrusted, for one moment, to Executive discretion. The President outstrips his "illustrious predecessor." He is no longer the "Ascanian boy" who followed him with unequal steps. He has in turn become Æneas himself, and "footsteps" it as if he could carry old Anchises on his shoulders.

Sir, what are we to infer from this proposition? Nay, what may we not fear from it? Having thrice failed to force the Sub-Treasury scheme upon Congress; having received the most unequivocal demonstrations of the popular will against it, from the St. Croix to the Sabine; instead of acquescing in that public sentiment which he himself has told us is "the supreme law of the Republic," there is an effort now made to put the whole revenues of the country within the unlimited control of the Executive, and thereby establish a Sub-Treasury system without law, free from all legislative restraints, and more odious, infinitely more odious than that "BILL OF ABOMINATIONS" which has so often been put down, notwithstanding the unparalleled efforts to carry it. Do I mistake the design of this measure? Have I not high authority for what I say? Has it not been stated, at the other end of this Capitol, by one [Mr. CAMBRELENG] holding the same relation to the Executive that my colleague holds to him here, each at the head of the Finance Committees of their respective Houses, that "THE SUB-TREASURY MUST CONTINUE, AS IT IS NOW, THE LAW OF THE LAND, AND WILL CONTINUE THROUGH 1838, '39, 40, and 41, IN SPITE OF ALL THE LAMENTATIONS HERE OR ELSEWHERE." Sir, when I first saw this in the gentleman's printed speech, carefully written out by himself, I confess I was utterly astounded. I could hardly believe him serious. I thought it might be a little hyperbole in introducing, for the third time, the Sub-Treasury in the House. But I find that "coming events cast their shadows before." This declaration was but the precursor of my colleague's proposition, which is to fasten the Sub-Treasury upon us till the year 1841. And how is he to fasten it upon us? Pass this bill, repeal the deposite act, as it proposes, and we at once place ourselves within the VETO power of the President, and without a concurrence of two-thirds in both Houses of Congress, all legislative control over the revenues of the country is gone, and gone, perhaps, forever.

This done, what becomes of those salutary checks and balances of the Constitution? Where is that distribution of the powers of the Government which the fathers of the Republic supposed they had made, and which they believed was a sure guarantee of the stability of our institutions? Broken down, abandoned, usurped. Money is the power which overrides all other powers. It is the key which unlocks every heart. By this bill the Executive has it under his entire control. He appoints all the officers into whose hands he puts it, and removes them at his pleasure. He could,

> "having both the key
> Of officer and office, set all hearts
> To what tune pleased his ear."

And if the time shall ever come when the Chief Magistrate of this nation shall aspire to a title beyond the forms of the Constitution, and subversive of the liberties of the country, this bill will place within his grasp the only remaining power which is necessary for the accomplishment of his object.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] has this morning mourned over the humiliated, the fallen, the degraded, the disgraced condition of the Democratic party, as he is pleased to term those who, with him, are attempting to carry out the principles of the ULTRA FEDERALISM of '98. He complains that they have been beaten in their projects, and brought to this horrible predicament, because they have been abandoned by a fragment of their friends. Sir, they have abandoned the fragment, and not the fragment them; this fragment, as the Senator is pleased to call it, is where it always has been. It still remains upon the firm base of principle, and there let it remain for ever. It remains where General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren, and all their friends, were but a short time since. It is they that have been thrown from this granite bed, where they have so long reposed. ULTRAISM, like a convulsion in the physical world, has destroyed the "attraction of cohesion," and precipitated them to the dark abyss in which the Senator now finds himself, and from which he will be unable to emerge. They have abandoned the old and beaten track of principle marked out by the footsteps of Jefferson and Madison, and followed the devious and winding ways of new adventurers in the science of political economy and practical finance. They have entered upon a Quixotic expedition to reform the currency of the country, and after all their toil and trouble, like the knight of the Rueful Countenance, they find themselves tilting against windmills! Sir, it is they, and not we, who have abandoned and gone off. Had the President recommended the revival of the State bank deposite system, we should have heard nothing from the Senator from North Carolina, or from my colleague, about this Sub-Treasury scheme. All the friends of the Administration, with perhaps two or three exceptions, would have united most cordially with us to aid the banks in the resumption of specie payments, to revive business, and to restore the prosperity of the country. The magic influence of the Executive recommendation, like the wand of Prospero, would have allayed the tempest that was raised, and all would again have been peace and quiet. I impeach no man's motives for the course he has taken. I know how silently and imperceptibly the mind is drawn into the support of Executive measures, in spite of its own convictions. Executive influence comes o'er it, not "stealing and giving odor," but robbing it of its high sense of moral accountability, and giving a delicious foretaste of that fruition which always attends the successful issue of every "untried expedient." No, sir, I impeach no man's motives. But I must be permitted to express my unqualified belief, that but for the unfortunate recommendation of this measure by the President, we should now be acting in harmonious concert for the common interests of our common country. Instead of this, the Senator from North Carolina is determined to "sink or swim" with the President; and, however deep this Sub-Treasury millstone round his neck may sink him, he seems to say:

"Like the sweet south that breaths upon a bank of violets;"

> "I'll seek him deeper than e'er plummet sounded,
> And with him there lie mudded."

Mr. President, these experiments and "untried expedients," over whose loss the Senator from North Carolina has wept so bitterly, have well nigh ruined the country. At all events, they have given a shock to its business, and a blow to its prosperity, which it will take a long time to repair. But for the recuperative energies of our people, a half a century would not suffice to restore our credit and our institutions to that proud height from which they have been precipitated by a weak or wicked administration of the Government. And yet we were told the other day, by the Senator from Missouri, that the experimenters had triumphed! They had triumphed, because the banks of New York had resumed specie payments! Sir, those banks resumed in spite of your experiments; and but for the hostile position of the Government, they could have resumed as well in February as in May, when foreign exchange was so reduced as to remove the fear of specie being taken from the country. Your experiments compelled them to curtail their circulation, and reduce their discounts to a ruinous extent, in order to be prepared even for a nominal resumption; and still we hear, with an exulting air, that the experimenters have triumphed! They have triumphed as certain other experiments triumphed over a cat under an exhausted receiver. They pumped out the air till she felt that vitality itself was departing, when, by the very instinct of her nature, she put her paw upon the aperture through which her life was oozing, and philosophy was left to conjecture how much more she could have borne. So with these modern experimenters in currency and finance. The country has borne with their operations till it has become exhausted, and with an instinctive and convulsive throe has loosed itself from their fatal grasp. And yet the experimenters have triumphed! and the Senator from North Carolina mourns over the loss of those Democratic measures, whose success would have extinguished the last ray of hope, and driven the mercantile and business community to utter despair. God deliver me from such Democracy. A Democracy which concentrates all power in the hands of one man—a Democracy which subjects the opinions and actions of party followers to his will, and to his will alone—a Democracy which makes the great and paramount interests of the country subservient to the low and grovelling pursuits of party—a Democracy which permits no action on any question, however urgent the necessity may be, without orders from headquarters—a Democracy that appeals to the passions and prejudices of the people, instead of enlightening their judgments and relying upon their reason and their patriotism—a Democracy which attempts to set up one class of the community against the other, as if their interests were not reciprocal and identical—a Democracy which denies to every man the right to think and act for himself on those great questions in which the vital interests of the country are so deeply involved—a Democracy which attempts, by party drill and party discipline, to subvert the very spirit of the Constitution, to substitute Executive for Legislative power, to subject the will of the Representative to the will of the Executive, to compel him to act contrary to his own opinions, against his own judgment, in violation of his own conscience, and in open defiance of the expressed will and wishes of his constituents—a Democracy which extends its influence from the seat of the General Government to the respective States, which swallows up the reserved rights of the States in the consolidation of the central power; a Democracy, in short, which establishes in the heart of the country the most perfect despotism under the delusive forms of free institutions.

Yes, Mr. President, such is the Democracy of this Federal Administration—an Administration that has adopted the ultra Federalism of "the reign of terror," and now charges upon its former friends the sins of its own commission. Sir, the people of the United States cannot be deceived by these vain and hollow pretences. Democracy, like monarchy, will be known by its fruits. The bitter fruits of this Administration have already ripened sufficiently to indicate the tree on which they grew—and the people have long since tasted enough to enable them, like our first parents, to distinguish between good and evil. Sir, the contest which is now waging is to determine the future character of our Government. Upon its result depends the question of the independence of the legislative branch, and also that of the supremacy of the popular over the Executive will. As these shall be determined, so will the character of our Government be. This contest will form a new epoch in our annals, and the future historian, with the "luminous philosophy of Gibbon," will date from this period the RISE OR FALL of our Republican institutions.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, March 12, 1838—On the Sub-Treasury Bill.

Mr. PRESIDENT: Having, at an early stage of the debate, expressed, in a general manner, my opposition to this bill, I must find an apology for again addressing the Senate, in the acknowledged importance of the measure, the novelty of its character, and the division of opinion respecting it which is known to exist in both Houses of Congress.

To be able, in this state of things, to give a preponderance to that side of the question which I embrace, is, perhaps, more than I ought to hope; but I do not feel that I have done all which my duty demands, until I make another effort.

The functions of this Government, which, in time of peace, most materially affect the happiness of the people, are those which respect commerce and revenue. The bill before us touches both these great interests. It proposes to act directly on the revenue and expenditure of Government, and it is expected to act, also, indirectly, on commerce and currency; while its friends and supporters altogether abstain from other measures, deemed by a great portion of Congress and of the country to be indispensably demanded by the present exigency.

We have arrived, Mr. President, towards the close of a half century from the adoption of the Constitution. During the progress of these years, our population has increased from three or four millions to thirteen or fourteen millions; our commerce, from little or nothing, to an export of a hundred and ninety millions, and an import of a hundred and twenty-eight and a half millions, in the year 1836. Our mercantile tonnage approaches near to two millions. We have a revenue and an expenditure of thirty millions a year. The manufactures of the country have attained very great importance, and, up to the commencement of the derangement of the currency, were in a prosperous and growing state. The produce of the fisheries has become vast; and the general production of the labor and capital of the country is increasing far beyond all example in other countries, or other times, and has already reached an amount which, to those who have not investigated the subject, would seem incredible.

The commerce of the United States, sir, is spread over the globe. It pursues its objects in all seas, and finds its way into every port which the laws of trade do not shut against its approach. With all the disadvantages of more costly materials, and of higher wages, and often in despite of unequal and unfavorable commercial regulations of other States, the enterprise, vigor, and economy which distinguish our navigating interest, enable it to show our flag, in competition with the most favored and most skilful, in the various quarters of the world. In the mean time, internal activity does not lag nor loiter. New and useful modes of intercourse and facilities of transportation are established, or are in progress, everywhere. Public works are projected and pushed forward in a spirit, which grasps at high and vast objects, with a bold defiance of all expense. The aggregate value of the property of the country is augmented daily. A constant demand for new capital exists, although a debt has already been contracted in Europe, for sums advanced to States, corporations, and individuals, for purposes connected with internal improvement; which debt cannot now be less than a hundred millions of dollars. Spreading over a great extent embracing different climates, and with vast variety of products, we find an intensely excited spirit of industry and enterprise to pervade the whole country; while its external commerce, as I have already said, sweeps over all seas. We are connected with all commercial countries, and, most of all, with that which has established and sustained the most stupendous system of commerce and manufactures, and which collects and disburses an incredible amount of annual revenue; and which uses, to this end, and as means of currency and circulation, a mixed money of metal and paper.

Such a mixed system, sir, has also prevailed with us, from the beginning. Gold and silver, and convertible bank paper, have always constituted our actual money. The people are used to this system. It has hitherto commanded their confidence, and fulfilled their expectations. We have had, in succession, two National Banks, each for a period of twenty years. Local or State banks have, at the same time, been in operation; and no man of intelligence or candor can deny that, during these forty years, and with the operation of a national and these State institutions, the currency of the country, upon the whole, has been safe, cheap, convenient, and satisfactory. When the Government was established, it found convertible bank paper, issued by State banks, already in circulation; and with this circulation it did not interfere. The United States, indeed, had themselves established a bank, under the old Confederation, with authority to issue paper. A system of mixed circulation, therefore, was exactly that system which this Constitution, at its adoption, found already in existence. There is not the slightest evidence of any intention, in establishing the Constitution, to overthrew or abolish this system, although it certainly was the object of the Constitution to abolish bills of credit, and all paper intended for circulation, issued upon the faith of the States alone. Inasmuch as whatever then existed, of the nature of money or currency, rested on State legislation; and as it was not possible that uniformity, general credit, and general confidence, could result from local and separate acts of the States, there is evidence—I think abundant evidence—that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to give to Congress a controlling power over the whole subject, to the end that there should be, for the whole country, a currency of uniform value. Congress has heretofore exercised this authority, and fulfilled the corresponding duties. It has maintained, for forty years out of forty-nine, a national institution, proceeding from its power, and responsible to the General Government. With intervals of derangement, brought about by war and other occurrences, this whole system, taken altogether, has been greatly successful in its actual operation. We have found occasion to create no difference between Government and people—between money for revenue, and money for the general use of the country. Until the commencement of the last session, Government had manifested no disposition to look out for itself exclusively. What was good enough for the people, was good enough for Government. No condescending and gracious preference had, before that period, ever been tendered to members of Congress over other persons having claims upon the public funds. Such a singular spectacle had never been exhibited, as an amicable, disinterested, and patriotic understanding between those who are to vote taxes on the people for the purpose of replenishing the Treasury, and those who, from the Treasury, dispense the money back again among those who have claims on it. In that respect I think the Secretary stands alone. He is the first, so far as I know, in our long list of able heads of Departments, who has thought it a delicate and skilful touch, in financial administration, to be particularly kind and complaisant to the interest of the law makers—those who hold the tax-laying power; the first whose great deference and cordial regard for members of Congress have led him to provide for them, as the medium of payment and receipt, something more valuable than is provided at the same time for the army, the navy, the judges, the Revolutionary pensioners, and the various classes of laborers in the pay of Government.

Through our whole history, sir, we have found a convertible paper currency, under proper control, highly useful, by its pliability to circumstances, and by its capacity of enlargement, in a reasonable degree, to meet the demands of a new and enterprising community. As I have already said, sir, we owe a permanent debt of a hundred millions abroad; and in the present abundance of money in England, and the present demand here, this amount will probably be increased. But it must be evident to every one, that so long as, by a safe use of paper, we give some reasonable expansion to our own circulation, or at least do not unreasonably contract it, we do, to that extent, create or maintain an ability for loans among ourselves, and so far diminish the amount of annual interest paid abroad.

But let me now, Mr. President, ask the attention of the Senate to another subject, upon which, indeed, much has already been said; I mean that which is usually called the credit system.

Sir, what is that system? Why is credit a word of so much solid importance, and of so powerful charm, in the United States? Why is it that a shock has been felt through all classes and all interests, the first moment that this credit has been disturbed? Does its importance belong, equally, to all commercial States? Or are there peculiarities in our condition, our habits, and modes of business, which make credit more indispensable, and mingle it more naturally, more intimately, with the life-blood of our system?

A full and philosophical answer to these inquiries, Mr. President, would demand that I should set forth both the ground work and the structure of our social system. It would show that the wealth and prosperity of the country have as broad a foundation as its popular constitutions. Undoubtedly there are peculiarities in that system, resulting from the nature of our political institutions, from our elementary laws, and from the general character of the people. These peculiarities most unquestionably give to credit, or to those means and those arrangements, by whatever names we call them, which are calculated to keep the whole, or by far the greater part, of the capital of the country in a state of constant activity, a degree of importance far exceeding what is experienced elsewhere.

In the old countries of Europe there is a clear and well defined line, between capital and labor: a line which strikes through society, with a horizontal sweep, leaving on one side wealth, in masses, holden by few hands, and those having little participation in the laborious pursuits of life; on the other, the thronging multitudes of labor, with here and there, only, an instance of such accumulation of earnings as to deserve the name of capital. This distinction, indeed, is not universal and absolute in any of the commercial States of Europe, and it grows less and less definite as commerce advances; the effect of commerce and manufactures, as all history shows, being, every where, to diffuse wealth, and not to aid its accumulation in few hands. But still the line is greatly more broad, marked, and visible to European nations, than in the United States. In those nations, the gains of capital, and wages, or the earnings of labor, are not only distinct in idea, as elements of the science of political economy, but, to a great degree, also, distinct in fact; and their respective claims, and merits, and modes of relative adjustment, become subjects of discussion and of public regulation. Now, sir, every body may see that that is a state of things which does not exist with us. We have no such visible and broad distinction between capital and labor; and much of the general happiness of all classes results from this. With us, labor is every day augmenting its means by its own industry; not in all cases, indeed, but in very many. Its savings of yesterday become its capital, therefore, of to-day. On the other hand, vastly the greater portion of the property of the country exists in such small quantities that its holders cannot dispense altogether with their own personal industry; or if, in some instances, capital be accumulated till it rises to what may be called affluence, it is usually disintegrated and broken into particles again, in one or two generations. The abolition of the rights of primogeniture; the descent of property of every sort of females as well as males; the cheap and easy means by which property is transferred and conveyed; the high price of labor; the low price of land; the genius of our political institutions; in fine, every thing belonging to us, counteracts large accumulation. This is our actual system. Our politics, our Constitutions, our elementary laws, our habits, all centre in this point, or tend to this result. From where I now stand, to the extremity of the northeast, vastly the greatest part of the property of the country is in the hands and ownership of those whose personal industry is employed in some form of productive labor. General competence, general education, enterprise, activity, and industry, such as never before pervaded any society, are the characteristics which distinguish the people who live, and move, and act in this state of things, such as I have described it.

Now, sir, if this view be true, as I think it is, all must perceive that, in the United States, capital cannot say to labor and industry, "Stand ye yonder, while I come up hither;" but labor and industry lay hold on capital, break it into parcels, use it, diffuse it widely, and, instead of leaving it to repose in its own inertness, compel it to act at once as their own stimulus and their own instrument.

But, sir, this is not all. There is another view still more immediately affecting the operation and use of credit. In every wealthy community, however equally property may be divided, there will always be some property-holders who live on its income. If this property be land, they live on rent; if it be money, they live on its interest. The amount of real estate held in this country on lease, is comparatively very small, except in the cities. But there are individuals and families, trustees and guardians, and various literary and charitable institutions, who have occasion to invest funds for the purpose of annual moneyed income. Where do they invest? where can they invest? The answer to these questions shows at once a mighty difference between the state of things here, and that in England. Here, these investments, to produce a moneyed income, are made in banks, insurance companies, canal and railroad corporations, and other similar institutions. Placed thus immediately in active hands, this capital, it is evident, becomes at once the basis of business; it gives occupation, pays labor, excites enterprise, and performs, in short, all the functions of employed money. But, in England, investments for such purposes usually take another direction. There is, in England, a vast amount of public stocks, as eight or nine hundred millions sterling of public debt actually exists, constituting, to the amount of its annual interest, a charge on the active capital and industry of the country. In the hands of individuals, portions of this debt are capital; that is, they produce income to the proprietors, and income without labor; while, in a national point of view, it is mere debt. What was obtained for it, or that on account of which it was contracted, has been spent in the long and arduous wars, which the country has sustained, from the time of King William the Third, to our own days. There are thousands of individuals, therefore, whose fixed income arises, not from the active use of property, either in their own hands, or the hands of others, but from the interest on that part of this national charge to which they are entitled. If, therefore, we use the term capital, not in the sense of political economy exactly, but as imply ng whatever returns income to individuals, we find an almost incalculable mass so circumstanced as not to be the basis of active operations.

To illustrate this idea further, sir, let us suppose that, by some occurrence, (such as is certainly never to be expected,) this debt should be paid off; suppose its holders were to receive, to-morrow, their full amounts; what would they do with them? Why, sir, if they were obliged to loan the one quarter part into the hands of the industrious classes, for the purposes of employment in active business, and if this operation could be accompanied by the same intelligence and industry among the people which prevail with us, the result would do more toward raising the character of the laboring classes, than all reforms in Parliament, and other general political operations. It would be as if this debt had never been contracted; as if the money had never been spent, and now remained part of the active capital of the country, employed in the business of life. But this debt, sir, has created an enormous amount of private property, upon the income of which its owners live, which does not require their own active labor or that of others. We have no such debt; we have no such mode of investment; and this circumstance gives quite a different aspect and a different reality to our condition.

Now, Mr. President, what I understand by the credit system is, that which thus connects labor and capital, by giving to labor the use of capital. In other words, intelligence, good character, and good morals bestow on those who have not capital, a power, a trust, a confidence, which enables them to obtain it, and to employ it usefully for themselves and others. These active men of business build their hopes of success on their attentiveness, their economy, and their integrity. A wider theatre for useful activity is under their feet, and around them, than was ever spread before the eyes of the young and enterprising generations of men, on any other spot enlightened by the sun. Before them is the ocean. Every thing in that direction invites them to efforts of enterprise and industry in the pursuits of commerce and the fisheries. Around them, on all hands, are thriving and prosperous manufactures; an improving agriculture, and the daily presentation of new objects of internal improvement: while behind them is almost half a continent of the richest land, at the cheapest prices, under healthful climates, and washed by the most magnificent rivers that on any part of the globe pay their homage to the sea. In the midst of all these glowing and glorious prospects, they are neither restrained by ignorance, nor smitten down by the penury of personal circumstances. They are not compelled to contemplate in hopelessness and despair, all the advantages thus bestowed on their condition by Providence. Capital though they may have little or none, CREDIT supplies its place; not as the refuge of the prodigal and the reckless; not as gratifying present wants with the certainty of future absolute ruin; but as the genius of honorable trust and confidence; as the blessing, voluntarily offered to good character and to good conduct; as the beneficent agent, which assists honesty and enterprise in obtaining comfort and independence.

Mr. President, take away this credit, and what remains? I do not ask what remains to the few, but to the many? Take away this system of credit, and then tell me what is left for labor and industry, but mere manual toil and daily drudgery? If we adopt a system that withdraws capital from active employment, do we not diminish the rate of wages? If we curtail the general business of society, does not every laboring man find his condition grow daily worse? In the politics of the day, sir, we hear much said about divorces; and when we abolish credit, we shall divorce labor from capital; and, depend on it, sir, when we divorce labor from capital, capital is hoarded, and labor starves. The declaration so often quoted, that "all who trade on borrowed capital ought to break," is the most aristocratic sentiment ever uttered in this country. It is a sentiment which, if carried out by political arrangement, would condemn the great majority of mankind to the perpetual condition of mere day-laborers. It goes to take away from them all that solace and hope which arises from possessing something which they can call their own. A man loves his own; it is fit and natural that he should do so; and he will love his country and its institutions, if he have some stake in it, although it be but a very small part of the general mass of property. If it be but a cottage, an acre, a garden, its possession raises him, gives him self-respect, and strengthens his attachment to his country. It is our happy condition, by the blessings of Providence, that almost every man of sound health, industrious habits, and good morals, can ordinarily attain, at least, to this degree of comfort and respectability; and it is a result devoutly to be wished, both for its individual and its general consequences.

But even to this degree of acquisition, that credit, of which I have already said so much, (as its general effect is to raise the price of wages, and render industry productive,) is highly important. There is no condition so low, if it be attended with industry and economy, which this credit does not benefit, as any one will find, if he will examine and follow out its operations.

Such, Mr. President, being the credit system in the United States, as I understand it, I now add that the banks have been the agents, and their circulation the instrument, by which the general operations of this credit have been conducted. Much of the capital of the country, placed at interest, is vested in bank stock, and those who borrow, borrow at the banks: and discounts of bills and anticipations of payment in all its forms, the regular and appropriate duty of banks, prevail universally.

In the North, the banks have enabled the manufacturers of all classes to realize the proceeds of their industry at an early moment. The course has been, that the producers of commodities for Southern consumption, having despatched their products, draw their bills. These bills are discounted at the banks, and with the proceeds other raw material is bought, and other labor paid; and thus the general business is continued in progress. All this is well known to those who have had opportunity to be acquainted with such concerns.

But bank credit has not been more necessary to the North than to the South. Indeed, nowhere has interest been higher, or the demand for capital greater, or the full benefit of credit more indispensable, than in the new cotton and sugar-growing States. I ask gentlemen from those States if this be not so? Have not the plantations been bought, and the necessary labor procured, to a great extent, on credit? Has not this credit been obtained at the banks? Even now do they not find credits, or advances on their crops, important in enabling them to get those crops to market? And if there had been no credit—if a hard-money system had prevailed, let me ask them what would have been, at this moment, the condition of things in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas? These States, sir, with Tennessee and the South Atlantic States, constitute the great plantation interest. That there has been a vast demand for capital to be invested in this interest is sufficiently proved by the high price paid for the use of money.

In my opinion, sir, credit is as essential to the great export of the South as to any other interest. The agriculture of the cotton and sugar-producing States partakes, in no inconsiderable degree, of the nature of commerce. The product and sale of one great staple only, is an operation essentially different from ordinary farming pursuits. The exports of the South indeed, may be considered as the aggregate result of various farms and modes of industry, carried on by various hands, and in various places, rather than as the mere product of the plantation. That product itself is local; but its indispensable aids and means are drawn from every part of the Union. What is it, sir, that enables Southern labor to apply itself so exclusively to the cultivation of these great articles for export? Certainly, it is so applied, because its own necessities for provision and clothing are supplied, meanwhile, from other quarters. The South raises to sell, and not to consume; and with the proceeds of the sales it supplies itself with whatever its own consumption demands. There are exceptions; but this is the general truth. The hat-makers, shoe-makers, furniture-makers, and carriage-makers of the North, the spinners at Lowell, and the weavers at Philadelphia, are all contributors to the general product both of cotton and sugar, for export abroad; as are the live-stock raisers of Kentucky, the grain-growing farmers, and all who produce and vend provisions, in Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. The Northern ship-owner and the mariner, who carry these products to market, are agents acting to the same end; and so are they too who, little thinking of cotton-fields, or sugar estates, are pursuing their adventurous employment in the whale fisheries, over the whole surface, and among all the islands, of the Pacific and the Indian oceans. If we take the annual cotton crop at sixty millions of dollars, we may, perhaps, find that the amount of forty-five millions is expended, either for interest on capital advanced, or for the expense of clothing and supporting labor, or in the charges which belong to the household, the education of families, and to the domestic expenditure of the proprietor.

Thus, sir, all the laborious classes are in truth, cotton growers and sugar makers. Each in its own way, and to the extent of its own productiveness, contributes to swell the magnitude of that enormous export, which was nothing at the commencement of this Government, and which now has run up to so many millions. Through all these operations the stream of credit has constantly flowed, and there is not one of them that will not be checked and interrupted, embarrassed, and thwarted, if this stream be now dried up. This connection of the various interests of the country with one another forms an important and interesting topic. It is one of the natural ties of the Union. The variety of production, and mutual wants mutually supplied, constitute a strong bond between different States, and long may that bond last, growing with their growth, and strengthening with their strength.

But, Mr. President, that portion of our productions which takes the form of export, becomes distinct and visible; it is prominent and striking, and is seen and wondered at, by everybody. The annual returns all show it, and every day's commercial intelligence speaks of it. We gaze at it with admiration, and the world is no less admiring than ourselves.

With other branches of industry the case is quite different. The products of these branches, being put in the train of domestic exchanges, and consumed in the country, do not get into statistical tables, are not collected in masses, and are seldom presented, in the aggregate, to the public view. They are not of the character of a few large and mighty rivers, but of a thousand little streams, meandering through all the fields of business and of life, and refreshing and fertilizing the whole.

Few of us, Mr. President, are aware of what would be the amount of the general production of the country, if it could be accurately ascertained. The Legislature of Massachusetts, under the recommendation of the intelligent Chief Magistrate of that State, has caused to be prepared and published a report on the condition and products of certain branches of its industry, for the year ending in April, 1837. The returns of the authorities of each city and town were made, apparently, with much care; and the whole has been collated by the Secretary of State, and the result distinctly presented in well arranged statistical tables. From a summary of the statements in these tables, I will take the liberty of selecting a few articles, and of adverting to them here, as instances, or specimens, of the annual product of labor and industry in that State.

And to begin with a very necessary and important article. I find, that of boots and shoes, the value of the whole amount manufactured within the year exceeds fourteen millions and a half of dollars. If the amount of other articles of the same class, or material, be added, viz: leather, saddles, trunks, harness, &c. the total will not be far from eighteen millions and a half of dollars.

I will read the names of some other articles, and state the amount of annual product belonging to each:

Cotton fabrics	$17,409,000
Woollen fabrics	10,399,000
Fisheries	7,592,000
Books and stationery, and paper	2,592,000
Soap and candles	1,620,000
Nails, brads and tacks	2,500,000
Machinery of various kinds	1,235,000
Agricultural implements	645,000
Glass	831,000
Hats	700,000
Clothing, neckcloths, &c.	2,013,000
Wool	539,000

These, sir, are samples. The grand total is ninety-one million seven hundred thousand dollars. From this, however, deductions are to be made for the cost of the raw material when imported, and for certain articles enumerated under different heads. But, then, the whole statement is confined to some branches of industry only; and to present an entire and comprehensive view, there should be added the gains of commerce within the year, the earnings of navigation, and almost the whole agricultural product of the State.

The result of all, if it could be collated and exhibited together, would show that the annual product of Massachusetts capital and Massachusetts industry exceeds one hundred millions of dollars. Now, sir, Massachusetts is a small State, in extent of territory. You may mark out her dimensions seven or eight times on the map of Virginia. Yet her population is seven hundred thousand souls; and the annual result of their laborious industry, economy, and labor, is as I have stated.

Mr. President, in looking over this result, it is most gratifying to find, that its great mass consists in articles equally essential and useful to all classes. They are not luxuries, but necessaries and comforts. They belong to food and clothing, to household conveniences, and education. As they are more and more multiplied, the great majority of society becomes more elevated, better instructed, and happier in all respects. I have looked through this whole list, sir, to find what there is in it that might be fairly classed among the higher luxuries of life, and what do I find? In the whole hundred millions, I find but one such item; and that is an item of two or three hundred thousand dollars for "jewellery, silver, and silver plate." This is all that belongs to luxury in her annual product of a hundred millions; and of this, no doubt, the far greater portion was sent abroad. And yet we hear daily, sir, of the amassing of aristocratic wealth by the progress of manufactures and the operations of the credit system! Aristocracy, it is said, is stealing upon us, and, in the form of aggregate wealth, is watching to seize political power from the hands of the people! We have been more than once gravely admonished that, in order to improve the times, and restore a metallic currency for the benefit of the poor, the rich ought to melt down their plate! Whatever such a melting process might find to act upon elsewhere, Mr. President, I assure you that in Massachusetts it would discover little. A few spoons, candlesticks, and other similar articles, some old family pitchers and tankards, and the silver porringers of our nurseries, would be about the whole.

Sir, if there be any aristocrats in Massachusetts, the people are all aristocrats; because I do not believe there is on earth, in a highly civilized society, a greater equality in the condition of men than exists there. If there be a man in the State who maintains what is called an equipage, or drives four horses in his coach, I am not acquainted with him. On the other hand, there are few who are not able to carry their wives and daughters to church in some decent conveyance. It is no matter of regret or sorrow to us that few are very rich; but it is our pride and glory that few are very poor. It is our still higher pride, and our just boast, as I think, that all her citizens possess means of intelligence and education, and that, of all her productions, she reckons among the very chiefest, those which spring from the culture of the mind and the heart.

Mr. President, one of the most striking characteristics of this age is the extraordinary progress which it has witnessed in popular knowledge. A new and powerful impulse has been acting in the social system of late, producing this effect in a striking degree.

In morals, in politics, in art, in literature, there is a vast accession to the number of readers, and to the number of proficients. The present state of popular knowledge is not the result of a slow and uniform progress, proceeding through a lapse of years, with the same regular degree of motion. It is evidently the result of some new causes, brought into powerful action, and producing their consequences rapidly and strikingly. What, sir, are these causes?

This is not an occasion, sir, for discussing such a question at length: allow me to say, however, that the improved state of popular knowledge is but the necessary result of the improved condition of the great mass of the people. Knowledge is not one of our merely physical wants. Life may be sustained without it. But, in order to live, men must be fed, and clothed, and sheltered; and in a state of things in which one's whole labor can do no more than procure clothes, food, and shelter, he can have no time nor means for mental improvement. Knowledge, therefore, is not attained, and cannot be attained, till there is some degree of respite from daily manual toil, and never ending drudgery. But whenever a less degree of labor will produce the absolute necessaries of life, then there come leisure and means, both to teach and to learn.

But if this great and wonderful extension of popular knowledge be the result of an improved condition, it may, in the next place, well be asked, what are the causes which have thus suddenly produced that great improvement? How is it that the means of food, clothing, and shelter, are now so much more cheaply and abundantly procured than formerly? Sir, the main cause I take to be the progress of scientific art, or a new extent of the application of science to art. This it is, which has so much distinguished the last half century in Europe and in America: and its effects are everywhere visible, and especially among us. Man has found new allies and auxiliaries in the powers of nature, and in the inventions of mechanism.

The general doctrine of political economy is, that wealth consists in whatever is useful or convenient to man, and that labor is the producing cause of all this wealth. This is very true. But, then, what is labor? In the sense of political writers, and in common language, it means human industry; but, in a philosophical view, it may receive a much more comprehensive meaning. It is not, in that view, human toil only—the mere action of thews and muscles; but it is any active agency which, working upon the materials with which the world is supplied, brings forth products useful or convenient to man. The materials of wealth are in the earth, in the seas, and in their natural and unaided productions. Labor obtains them, works upon them, and fashions them to human use. Now, it has been the object of scientific art, or of the application of science to art, to increase this active agency, to augment its power, by creating millions of laborers in the form of automatic machines, all to be diligently employed, and kept at work by the force of natural powers. To this end these natural powers, principally those of steam and falling water, are subsidized and taken into human employment. Spinning machines, power looms, and all the mechanical divices, acting, among other operatives, in the factories and workshops, are but so many laborers. They are usually denominated labor-saving machines, but it would be more just to call them labor-doing machines. They are made to be active agents; to have motion, and to produce effect; and though without intelligence, they are guided by those laws of science which are exact and perfect, and they produce results, therefore, in general, more accurate than the human hand is capable of producing. When we look upon one of these, we behold a mute fellow-laborer, of immense power, of mathematical exactness, and of ever-during and unwearied effort. And while he is thus a most skilful and productive laborer, he is a non-consumer—at least, beyond the wants of his mechanical being. He is not clamorous for food, raiment, or shelter, and makes no demands for the expenses of education. The eating and drinking, the reading and writing and clothes-wearing world, are benefited by the labors of these co-operatives, in the same way as if Providence had provided for their service millions of beings, like ourselves in external appearance, able to labor and to toil, and yet requiring little or nothing for their own consumption or subsistence; or rather, as if Providence had created a race of giants, each of whom, demanding no more for his support and consumption than a common laborer, should yet be able to perform the work of a hundred.

Now, sir, turn back to the Massachusetts tables of production, and you will see that it is these automatic allies and co-operators, and these powers of nature, thus employed and placed under human direction, which have come, with such prodigious effect, to man's aid, in the great business of procuring the means of living, of comfort, and of wealth, and which have so swollen the products of her skilful industry. Look at these tables once more, sir, and you will see the effects of labor, united with and acting upon capital. Look yet again, and you will see that credit, mutual trust, prompt and punctual dealings, and commercial confidence, are all mixed up as indispensable elements in the general system. I will ask you to look yet once more, sir, and you will perceive that general competence, great equality in human condition, a degree of popular knowledge and intelligence, nowhere surpassed, if anywhere equalled, and the prevalence of good moral sentiment, and extraordinary general prosperity, is the result of the whole. Sir, I have done with Massachusetts. I do not praise the old "Bay State" of the Revolution; I only present her as she is.

Mr. President, such is the state of things actually existing in the country, and of which I have now given you a sample. And yet there are persons who constantly clamor against this state of things. They call it aristocracy. They beseech the poor to make war upon the rich, while, in truth, they know not who are either rich or poor. They complain of oppression, speculation, and the pernicious influence of accumulated wealth. They cry out loudly against all banks and corporations, and all the means by which small capitals become united, in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on a mad hostility against all established institutions. They would choke up the fountains of industry, and dry all its streams. In a country of unbounded liberty, they clamor against oppression. In a country of perfect equality, they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where property is more equally divided than anywhere else, they rend the air with the shouting of agrarian doctrines. In a country where the wages of labor are high beyond all parallel, and where lands are cheap, and the means of living low, they would teach the laborer that he is but an oppressed slave. Sir, what can such men want? What do they mean? They can want nothing, sir, but to enjoy the fruits of other men's labor. They can mean nothing but disturbance and disorder; the diffusion of corrupt principles, and the destruction of the moral sentiments and moral habits of society. A licentiousness of feeling and of action is sometimes produced by prosperity itself. Men cannot always resist the temptation to which they are exposed by the very abundance of the bounties of Providence and the very happiness of their own condition; as the steed, full of the pasture, will, sometimes, throw himself against its enclosures, break away from its confinement, and, feeling now free needless restraint, betake himself to the moors and barrens, where want, ere long, brings him to his senses, and starvation and death close his career.

Having said so much, sir, on the general condition of the country, and explained what I understand by credit, I proceed to consider the present actual state of the currency.

The most recent Treasury estimate, which I have seen, supposes that there are eight millions of metallic money now in the country. This I believe, however, to be a good deal too high; I cannot believe it exceeds sixty, at most; and supposing one-half this sum to be in the banks, thirty millions are in circulation, or in private hands. We have seven hundred banks and branches, with capitals assigned for the security of their notes and bills, amounting to two hundred and eighty millions. The amount of bank notes in actual circulation is supposed to be one hundred millions; so that our whole circulation is about one hundred and thirty millions. The amount of debts due to the banks, or the amount of their loans and discounts, may be taken at four hundred and fifty millions.

Now, sir, this very short statement exhibits at once a general outline of our existing system of currency and credit. We see a great amount of money or property in banks as their assigned and appropriate capital, and we see a great amount due to these banks. These bank debtors generally belong to the classes of active business, or are such as have taken up credits for purposes of investment in lands or merchandise looking to future proceeds as the means of payment. If we compare this state of circulation of bank capital and bank debt, with the same things in England, important differences will not fail to strike us.

The whole paper circulation of England, by the latest accounts, is twenty-eight millions sterling—made up of eighteen millions of Bank of England notes, and ten millions of the notes of private bankers and joint-stock companies; bullion in the bank, nine and a half millions; debts due the Bank of England, twenty-two and a half millions. The amount of loans and discounts by private bankers and joint-stock companies is not usually stated, I believe, in the public accounts. If it bear the same proportion to their notes in circulation, as in the case of the Bank of England, it would exceed twelve millions. We may, therefore take the amount of bank debts in England to be thirty-five millions. But I suppose that, of the securities held by the Bank of England, exchequer notes constitute a large part; in other words, that a large part of the bank debt is due by the Government. The amount of coin in actual circulation, is estimated to be thirty and a half millions. The whole amount of circulation in England, metallic and paper, is usually stated, in round numbers, at sixty millions; which, rating the pound sterling at $4 80, is equal to two hundred and eight-eight millions of dollars.

It will be seen, sir, that our paper circulation is one-half less than that of England, but our bank debt is, nevertheless, much greater; since thirty-five millions sterling amount to only one hundred and sixty-eight millions of dollars; and this sum, too, includes the amount of exchequer bills, or Government debt in the form of such bills, which the Bank holds. These facts are very material to any just comparison of the state of things in the two countries. The whole, or nearly the whole, capital of the Bank of England, is lent to Government, not by means of exchequer notes, but on a permanent loan. And as to the private banks and joint-stock companies, though they issue bills for circulation, they have no assigned or appropriated capital whatever. The bills circulate on the private credit of the individual banker, or of those who compose the joint stock companies. In the United States, an amount of capital, supposed to be sufficient to sustain the credit of the paper and secure the public against loss, is provided by law, in the act of incorporation for each bank, and is assigned as a trust fund for the payment of the liabilities of the bank; and if this capital be fairly and substantially advanced, it is a proper security, and in most cases, no doubt, it is substantially advanced. The directors are trustees of this fund; and they are liable, both civilly and criminally, for mismanagement, embezzlement, or breach of trust.

This amount of capital, thus secured, is the basis of loans and discounts; and this is the reason why permanent, or at least long, loans are not considered so inappropriate to banking operations with us, as they are in England. With us, it is evident that the directors are agents, holding a fund intended to be loaned, and acting between lender and borrower; and this form of loan has been found exceedingly convenient, and useful in the country.

In some States, it is generally preferred to mortgages, though there are others, in which mortgages are usual. Whether exactly conformable to the true notion of banking, or not, the truth is, that the object and operation of our banks is to loan money; and this is mostly on personal security. The system, no doubt, is liable to abuse, in particular instances. There may be directors who will loan too freely to themselves and their friends. Gross cases of this kind have recently been detected and exposed, and, I hope, will be suitably treated; but, considering the great number of banks, these instances, I think, are remarkably few. In general, the banks have been well conducted, and are believed to be solvent and safe.

We have heard much, sir, in the course of this debate, of excess in the issue of bank notes for circulation. I have no doubt, sir, that there was a very improper expansion some years ago. When President Jackson, in 1832, had negatived the bill for continuing the Bank of the United States, (which act I esteem as the true original source of all the disorders of the currency,) a vast addition was immediately made to the number of State banks. In 1833, the public deposites were actually removed from the Bank of the United States, and placed in selected State banks. And, for the purpose of showing how much better the public would be accommodated without, than with, a Bank of the United States, these banks were not only encouraged, but admonished, to be free and liberal in loans and discounts, made on the strength of the public moneys, to merchants and other individuals. The circular letter from the Treasury Department, addressed to the new deposite banks, under date of September 26, 1833, has this significant clause, which could not have been misunderstood:

"The deposites of public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend your accommodations to individuals; and as the duties which are payable to the Government arise from the business and enterprise of the merchants engaged in foreign trade, it is but reasonable that they should be preferred in the additional accommodation which the public deposites will enable your institution to give, whenever it can be done without injustice to the claims of other classes of the community."

Having read this letter, sir, I ask leave to refer the Senate to the 20th section of the bill now before us. There we find that, "if any officer, charged with the safe-keeping of the public money, shall loan the same, or any portion thereof, with or without interest, such act shall be deemed an embezzlement and a high misdemeanor, and the party convicted thereof shall be sentenced to imprisonment." Sir, what a pretty piece of consistency is here! In 1833 the depositories of the public money were not even left to their own desire for gain, or their wishes to accommodate others, as being sufficient incentives to lend it out: they were admonished and directed to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend their accommodations to individuals, since the public moneys in their vaults would enable them to give such additional accommodation! Now, sir, under this bill, any officer who shall do any one of the same things, instead of being praised, is to be punished: he is to be adjudged guilty of embezzlement, and of a high misdemeanor, and is to be confined, for aught I know, in cells as dark and dismal as the vaults and safes which are to contain our metallic currency. But, although I think, sir, that the acts of Government created this expansion, yet I am certainly of opinion that there was a very undue expansion created. A contraction, however, had begun; and I am of opinion, that had it not been for the specie order of July, 1836, and for the manner in which the deposite law was executed, the banks would have gone through the crisis without suspension. This is my full and firm belief. I cannot, however, discuss these points here. They were treated with very great ability, last year, by a gentleman who then occupied one of the seats of Georgia on this floor. Whomsoever he did not satisfy, I cannot convince. Still, sir, the question is, whether there was an excess in the general amount of our circulation, in May last, or whether there be now such excess.

By what standard is this to be judged? If the question be, whether there be too much paper in circulation, it may be answered by reference to the amount of coin in the banks from which the paper issues; because I am unquestionably of opinion—an opinion which I believe nothing can ever shake—that the true criterion by which to decide the question of excess, in a convertible paper currency, is the amount of that paper, compared with the gold and silver in the banks. Such excess would not be proved, absolutely and certainly in every case, by the mere fact of the suspension of specie payments; because such an event might be produced by panic, or other sudden cause, having power to disturb the best regulated system of paper circulation. But the immediate question now is, whether, taking the whole circulation together, both metallic and paper, there was an excess existing in May, or is an excess now existing? Is one hundred and thirty millions an excessive or undue amount of circulation for the United States? Seeing that one part of this circulation is coin, and the other part paper, resting upon coin, and intended to be convertible, is the whole mass more than may be fairly judged necessary to represent the property, the transactions, and the business of the country? Or, in order to sustain such an amount of circulation, and to keep that part of it which is composed of paper in a safe state, should we be obliged to attempt to draw to ourselves more than our just proportion of that metallic money, which is in the use of all the commercial nations? These questions appear to me to be but different modes of stating the same inquiry.

Upon this subject we may, perhaps, form some general idea, by comparing ourselves with others. Various things no doubt exist in different places and countries, to modify, either by enlarging or diminishing, the demand for money or currency in the transaction of business; still the amount of trade and commerce may furnish a general element of comparison between different States or nations. The aggregate of American imports and exports in 1836 was three hundred and eighteen millions; that of England, reckoning the pound sterling at $4 80, again, was four hundred and eighty millions, as near as I can ascertain; the currency of England being, as already stated, sixty millions sterling, or two hundred and eighty-eight millions of dollars. If we work out a result from these proportions, the currency of the United States, it will be found, should be one hundred and ninety millions, in order to be equal to that of England; but, according to the estimates of the Treasury, it did not, even in that year, exceed one hundred and eighty millions.

Our population is about equal to that of England and Wales. The amount of our mercantile tonnage, perhaps, one-fifth less. But then we are to consider that our country is vastly wider, and our facilities for internal exchange, by means of bills of exchange, greatly less. Indeed, there are branches of our intercourse in which remittances cannot be well made, except in currency. Take one example: the agricultural products of Kentucky are sold to the South; her purchases of commodities made at the North. There can be, therefore, very little of direct exchange between her and the places of purchase and sale. The trade goes round in a circle. Therefore, while the Bank of the United States existed, payments were made to a vast amount in the North and East by citizens of Kentucky and of the States similarly situated, not in bills of exchange, but in the notes of the Bank.

These considerations augment the demand for currency. More than all, the country is new, sir; almost the entire amount of our capital active; and the whole amount of property, in the aggregate, rapidly increasing. In the last three years thirty-seven millions of acres of land have been separated from the wilderdess, purchased, paid for, and become subject to private individual ownership, to transfer and sale, and all other dispositions to which other real estate is subject. It has thus become property, to be bought and sold for money; whereas, while in the hands of Government, it called for no expenditure, formed the basis of no transactions, and created no demand for currency. Within that short period our people have bought from Government a territory as large as the whole of England and Wales, and, taken together, far more fertile by nature. This seems incredible, yet the returns show it. Suppose all this to have been bought at the minimum price of a dollar and a quarter per acre; and suppose the value to be increased in the common ratio in which we know the value of land is increased, by such purchase, and by the preliminary steps and beginnings of cultivation; an immense augmentation, it will readily be perceived, is made, even in so short a time, of the aggregate of property, in nominal price, and, to a great extent, in real value also.

On the whole, sir, I confess I know no standard by which I can decide that our circulation is at present in excess. I do not believe it is so. Nor was there, as I think, any depreciation in the value of money, up to the moment of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, comparing our currency with the currency of other nations. An American paper dollar would buy a silver dollar in England, deducting only the charge of transporting a dollar across the ocean, because it commanded a silver dollar here. There may be excess, however, I admit, where there is no present depreciation, in the sense in which I now use the term.

It is hardly necessary to dwell, Mr. President, on the evils of a suddenly depreciated circulation. It arrests business, puts an end to it, and overwhelms all debtors, by depression and downfall of prices. And even if we reduce circulation—not suddenly, but still reduce it farther than is necessary to keep it within just and reasonable limits—we produce many mischiefs; we augment the necessity of foreign loans; we contract business, discourage enterprise, slacken the activity of capital, and restrain the commercial spirit of the country. It is very important to be remembered, sir, that, in our intercourse with other nations, we are acting on a principle of equality; that is to say, we do not protect our own shipping interest by peculiar privileges; we ask a clear field, and seek no favor. Yet, the materials for ship building are high with us, and the wages of ship builders and seamen are high also. We have to contend against these unfavorable circumstances; and if, in addition to these, we are to suffer further by unnecessary restraints on currency, and by a cramped credit, who can tell what may be the effect? Money is abundant in England, very abundant; the rate of interest, therefore, is low, and capital will be seeking its investment wherever it can hope to find it. If we derange our own currency, compulsively curtail circulation, and break up credit, how are the commerce and navigation of the United States to maintain themselves against foreign competition?

Before leaving, altogether, this subject of an excessive circulation, Mr. President, I will say a few words upon a topic which, if time would permit, I should be glad to consider at more length; I mean, sir, the proper guards and securities for a paper circulation. I have occasionally addressed the Senate on this subject before, especially in the debate on the specie circular, in December, 1836; but I wish to recur to it again, because I hold it to be of the utmost importance to prove, if it can be proved, to the satisfaction of the country, that a convertible paper currency may be so guarded as to be secure against probable dangers. I say, sir, a convertible paper currency: for I lay it down as an unquestionable truth, that no paper can be made equal and kept equal to gold and silver, but such as is convertible into gold and silver, on demand. But, I have gone farther and still go father than this; and I contend that even convertibility, though itself indispensable, is not a certain and unfailing ground of reliance. There is a liability to excessive issues of paper, even while paper is convertible at will. Of this, there can be no doubt. Where, then, shall a regulator be found? What principle of prevention may we rely on?

Now I think, sir, it is too common with banks, in judging of their condition, to set off all their liabilities against all their resources. They look to the quantity of specie in their vaults, and to the notes and bills becoming payable, as means or assets; and, with these, they expect to be able to meet their returning notes, and to answer the claims of depositors. So far as the bank is to be regarded as a mere bank of discount, all this is very well. But banks of circulation exercise another function. By the very act of issuing their own paper, they affect the amount of currency. In England, the Bank of England, and in the United States, all the banks, expand or contract the amount of circulation, of course, as they increase or curtail the general amount of their own paper. And this renders it necessary that they should be regulated and controlled. The question is, by what rule? To this I answer, by subjecting all banks to the rule which the most discreet of them always follow—by compelling them to maintain a certain fixed proportion between specie and circulation; without regarding deposites on one hand, or notes payable on the other.

There will always occur occasional fluctuations in trade, and a demand for specie, by one country on another, will arise. It is too much the practice, when such occurrences take place, and specie is leaving the country, for banks to issue more paper, in order to prevent a scarcity of money. But exactly the opposite course should be adopted. A demand for specie to go abroad should be regarded as conclusive evidence of the necessity of contracting circulation. If, indeed, in such cases, it could be certainly known that the demand would be of short duration, the temporary pressure might be relieved by an issue of paper to fill the place of departing specie. But this can never be known. There is no safety, therefore, but in meeting the case at the moment, and in conforming to the infallible index of the exchanges. Circulating paper is thus always kept nearer to the character, and to the circumstances of that, of which it is designed to be the representative—the metallic money. This subject might be pursued, I think, and clearly illustrated; but, for the present, I only express my belief that, with experience before us, and with the lights which recent discussions, both in Europe and America, hold out, a National Bank might be established, with more regard to its function of regulating currency than to its function of discount, on principles, and subject to regulations, such as should render its operations extremely useful; and I should hope that, with an example before them of plain and eminent advantage, State institutions would conform to the same rules and principles; and that, in this way, all the advantages of convertible paper might be enjoyed, with just security against its dangers.

I have detained the Senate too long, sir, with these observations upon the state of the country, and its pecuniary system and condition.

And now, when the banks have suspended payments, universally; when the internal exchanges are all deranged, and the business of the country most seriously interrupted, the questions are—

Whether the measure before us is suitable to our condition? and,

Whether it is a just and proper exercise and fulfilment of the powers and duties of Congress?

What, then, sir, will be the practical operation and effect of this measure, if it should become a law?

Like its predecessor of the last session, the bill proposes nothing for the general currency of the country; nothing to restore exchanges; nothing to bring about a speedy resumption of specie payments by the banks. Its whole professed object is the collection and disbursement of the public revenue. Some of its friends, indeed, say, that when it shall go into operation, it will, incidentally, produce a favorable effect on the currency, by restraining the issue of bank paper. But others press it as if its effect was to be the final overthrow of all banks, and the introduction of an exclusive metallic currency for all the uses of the country.

Are we to understand, then, that it is intended, by means, of which this is the first, to rid the country of all banks, as being but so many nuisances, and to abolish all paper currency whatever?

Or is it expected, on the contrary, that after this system shall be adopted for the use of Government, there will still be a paper currency in the country for the use of the people?

And if there shall still be a paper currency, will that currency consist of irredeemable Government paper, or of convertible bank notes, such as have circulated heretofore? These questions must be answered, before we can judge accurately of the operation of this bill.

As to an exclusive metallic currency, sir, the Administration on this point is regularly Janus-faced. Out doors, and among the people, it shows itself "all clinquant, all in gold." There, every thing is to be hard money—no paper rags—no delusive credits—no bank monopolies—no trust in paper of any kind. But in the Treasury Department, and in the Houses of Congress, we see another aspect—a mixed appearance, partly gold and partly paper; gold for Government, and paper for the people. The small voice which is heard here, allows the absolute necessity of paper of some sort, and to some extent. But the shouts in the community demand the destruction of all banks, and the final extermination of all paper circulation.

To the people the lion roars against paper money in all the loudness and terror of his natural voice; but to members of Congress he is more discreet. Lest he should frighten them out of their wits, he here restrains and modulates, and roars "as gently as any sucking dove, or, as it were, any nightingale." The impracticability of an exclusive metallic currency, the absurdity of attempting any such thing in a country like this, are so manifest, that nobody here undertakes to support it by any reasoning or argument. All that is said in its favor is general denunciation of paper, general outcry against the banks, and declamation against existing institutions, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

The moment any one considers it, he sees how ridiculous any such attempt would be. An exclusive metallic circulation for the second commercial country on earth, in the nineteenth century! Sir, you might as well propose to abolish commerce altogether.

The currency of England is estimated at sixty millions sterling: and it is Mr. McCulloch's calculation, that if this currency were all gold, allowing only one-quarter of one per cent. for wear of materials, the annual expense attending such a currency, would be three millions and a quarter a year, or nearly five per cent. upon the whole. With us, this charge would be much greater. The loss of capital would be more, owing to the higher rates of interest; and besides all this, is the cost of transportation, which, in a country so extensive as ours, would be vast, and not easily calculated. We should also require, proportionally, more specie than is requisite in England, because our system of exchange, by means of bills of exchange, is, at present, and would be, under such a system as is proposed, much less perfect and convenient than that of England. Besides, the English metallic circulation is mostly gold, gold being in England the standard metal. With us, silver and gold both are made standards, at a fixed relation; and if we should succeed to keep this relation so true as to preserve both of the precious metals among us, (which, indeed, is not very probable,) our circulation would be still more expensive and cumbrous, from the quantity of silver which it would contain. The silver in the world is estimated to be fifty times that of gold in amount, and consequently something more than three times in value. If both should circulate, therefore, equally, in proportion to value, the currency would be three parts silver, and one gold.

Now, sir, the annual expense of such a circulation, upon the basis of Mr. McCulloch's estimate, would exceed the whole annual expenditure made for our army and navy. Consider, sir, the amount of actual daily payments made in the country. It is difficult to estimate it, and quite impossible to ascertain it, with any accuracy. But we can form some notion of it, by the daily amount of payments in the banks in some of the cities. In times of prosperous business and commerce, the daily amount of payments in the banks of New York alone has been equal to eight millions. Whether we call this a tenth, a twentieth, or a fiftieth part of all the payments and receipts made daily in the country, we see to what an aggregate result the whole would rise. And how is it possible that such amount of receipt and payment could be performed by an actual passing of gold and silver from hand to hand?

Such notions, sir, hardly require serious refutation.

Mr. President, an entire metallic currency would necessarily create banks immediately. Where would the money be kept, or how could it be remitted? Banks of deposite must and would be instantly provided for it. Would the merchants of the cities be seen, in their daily walks of business, with servants behind them, with bags of gold and kegs of silver on their wheelbarrows? What folly is great enough to imagine this? If there were not now a bank note, nor a bank in the country, and if there should be an exclusive specie currency to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, there would be fifty banks before sunset. From necessity, there would be created at once places of deposite; and persons having money in such depositories would draw checks for it, and pass these checks as money, and from one hand they would pass to another; or the depositary himself would issue certificates of deposite, and these would pass as currency. And all this would do no more than just to carry us back two or three hundred years, to the infancy of banks. We should then have done nothing but reject the experience of the most civilized nations, for some centuries, as well as all our own experience, and have returned to the rude conceptions of former times. These certificates of deposite would soon be found to be often issued without any solid capital, or actual deposite. Abuses arising from this source would call for legislative interference, and the Legislature would find it necessary to restrain the issue of paper intended for circulation, by enacting that such issue should only be made on the strength of competent capital, actually provided and assigned, placed under proper regulations, and managed by persons responsible to the laws. And this would bring us again exactly to the state of things in which we now are; that is to say, to the use of the paper of banks, established, regulated, and controlled by law. In the mean time, before this process could be carried through, half the community would be make bankrupt by the ruin of their business, and by the violent and revolutionary changes of property which the process would create. The whole class of debtors, all that live more by industry than on capital, would be overwhelmed with undistinguishing destruction.

There will then, sir, be no such thing as an exclusive paper currency. The country will not be guilty of the folly of attempting it.

I should have felt that I have occupied too much time with such a senseless and preposterous suggestion, were it not the manifest object of partisans to press such notions upon the attention of the people, in aid of the war against the banks.

We shall then, sir, have paper of some sort, forming a part of our currency. What will that paper be? The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, admitting that paper is necessary as a part of the currency, or circulation, has contended that the paper ought to be Government paper—Government paper, not convertible nor redeemable, only so far as by being receivable for debts and dues to Government. My colleague has endeavored to satisfy the Senate, that the aim of the whole system, of which he regards this bill as but part, is to establish a circulation of Government paper and a Government bank. Other gentlemen have taken the same view of it. But, as the bill itself does not profess any such purpose, I am willing to discuss it in the character in which it presents itself. I take it for what its friends say it is—a bill making further provision for collecting the revenues.

We are then, sir, still to have paper as a general medium of circulation; that paper is to be the paper of banks; but Government is to be divorced from these banks, altogether. It is not to keep its funds in them, as heretofore It is to have nothing to do with them, but is to collect and disburse its revenues by its own means, and its own officers.

The receipt of the notes of specie paying banks is to be partially allowed for some time, but it is to be gradually discontinued; and six years hence, we are to arrive at the maturity and the perfection of the system. When that auspicious day comes, Government is to receive and to pay out gold and silver, and nothing but gold and silver.

Now, Mr. President, let us anticipate this joyous epoch; let us suppose the six years to have expired; and let us imagine this bill, with its specie payments and all, to be in full operation at the present hour. What will the operation be? In the first place, disregarding all question of public convenience, or the general interests of the people, how will this system work as a mere mode of collecting and paying out revenue? Let us see.

Our receipts and expenditures may be estimated, each, at thirty millions a year. Those who think this estimate either too high or too low, may make the necessary allowance. Here, then, is the sum of thirty millions, to be collected and paid out every year; and it is all to be counted, actually told over, dollar after dollar, and gold pice after gold piece; and how many times counted? Let us inquire into that. The importing merchant, whose ship has arrived, and who has cash duties to pay, goes to the bank for his money, and the teller counts it out: that is once. He carries it to the custom-house, pays it, and the clerks count it over: that is twice. Some days afterwards, the collector takes it out of his bags and chests, carries it to the receiver general's office, and there it is counted again, and poured into the bags and chests of that office: that is the third time. Presently a warrant comes from the Treasury, in favor of some disbursing officer, and the boxes are opened, and the necessary sums counted out: this is the fourth counting. And, fifthly and lastly, the disbursing officer pays it to the persons entitled to receive it, on contracts, or for pensions, salaries, or other claims. Thirty millions of hard money are thus to be handled and told over five times in the course of the year; and if there be transfers from place to place, then, of course, it is to be counted so much oftener. Government officers, therefore, are to count over one hundred and fifty millions of dollars a year; which, allowing three hundred working days in the year, gives five hundred thousand dollars a day. But this is not all. Once a quarter, the naval officer is to count the collector's money, and the register in the land office is to count the receiver's money. And, moreover, sir, every now and then the Secretary of the Treasury is to authorize unexpected and impromptu countings, in his discretion, and just to satisfy his own mind!

Sir, what a money-counting, tinkling, jingling generation we shall be! All the money-changer's in Solomon's temple will be as nothing to us. Our sound will go forth into all lands. We shall all be like the king in the ditty of the nursery:

"There sat the king, a counting of his money."

You observe, sir, that these receipts and payments cannot be made in parcels, without the actual handling of each piece of coin. The marks on kegs of dollars, and the labels on bags of gold, are not to be trusted. They are a part of credit—and all credit, all trust, all confidence, is to be done away with. When the surveyor, for instance, at the custom-house, is to examine the money on hand, in possession of the collector, or receiver general, he is, of course, to count the money. No other examination can come to any thing. He cannot tell, from external appearance, nor from the weight, whether the collector has loaned out the money, and filled the bags and boxes up with sand and lead, or not. Nor can counterfeit pieces be otherwise detected than by actual handling. He must open, he must examine, he must count. And so at the land offices, the mints, and elsewhere. If these officers shall have a taste for silver sounds, they are likely to be gratified.

Mr. President, in all soberness, is not this whole operation preposterous?

It begins by proposing to keep the public moneys. This, itself, in the sense the word is here used, is a perfect novelty, especially in the United States. Why keep the public moneys; that is to say, why hoard them, why keep them out of use? The use of money is in the exchange. It is designed to circulate, not to be hoarded. All that Government should have to do with it, is to receive it to-day, that it may pay it away to-morrow. It should not receive it, before it needs it; and it should part with it as soon as it owes it. To keep it—that is, to detain it, to hold it back from general use, to hoard it, is a conception belonging to barbarous times and barbarous Governments. How would it strike us, if we should see other great commercial nations acting upon such a system? If England, with a revenue of fifty millions sterling a year, were found to be collecting and disbursing every shilling of it in hard money, through all the ramifications of her vast expenditure, should we not think her mad? But the system is worse here, because it withdraws just so much active capital from the uses of a country that requires capital, and is paying interest for capital wherever it can obtain it.

But now, sir, allow me to examine the operation of the measure upon the general interest of commerce, and upon the general currency of the country. And in this point of view, the first great question is, What amount of gold and silver will this operation subtract from the circulation of the country, and from the use of the banks?

In regard to this important inquiry, we are not without the means of forming some judgment. An official report from the Treasury, made to the other House, shows that, for the last ten years, there has been, at the end of each year, on an average, fifteen millions and four hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury. And this sum is exclusive of all that had been collected of the people, but had not yet reached the Treasury; and also of all that had been drawn from the Treasury by disbursing officers, but which had not yet been by them paid to individuals. Adding these sums together, sir, and the result is that on an average, for the last ten years, there have been at least twenty millions of dollars in the Treasury. I do not mean, of course, that this sum is, the whole of it, unappropriated. I mean that this amount has in fact been in the Treasury, either not appropriated or not called for under appropriations; so that if this Sub-Treasury scheme had been in operation in times past, of the specie in the currency twenty millions would have been constantly locked up in the safes and vaults. Now, sir, I do not believe that, for these ten years, the whole amount of silver and gold in the country has exceeded, on the average, fifty or sixty millions. I do not believe it exceeds sixty millions at the present moment; and if we had now the whole system in complete operation, it would lock up, and keep locked up, one full third of all the specie in the country. Locked up, I say—hoarded—rendered as useless to all purposes of commerce and business, as if it were carried back to its native mines. Sir, is it not inceivable that any man should fall upon such a scheme of policy as this? Is it possible that any one can fail to see the destructive effects of such a policy on the commerce and the currency of the country?

It is true the system does not come into operation all at once. But it begins its demands for specie immediately; it calls upon the banks, and it calls upon individuals, for their hard dollars, that they may be put away and locked up in the Treasury, at the very moment when the country is suffering for want of more specie in the circulation, and the banks are suffering for means to enable them to resume their payments. And this, it is expected, will improve the currency, and facilitate resumption.

It has heretofore been asserted, that the general currency of the country needed to be strengthened, by the introduction of more specie into the circulation. This has been insisted on for years. Let it be conceded. I have admitted it, and, indeed, contended for the proposition heretofore, and endeavored to prove it. But it must be plain to every body, that any addition of specie, in order to be useful, must either go into the circulation, as a part of that circulation, or else it must go into the banks, to enable them the better to sustain and redeem their paper. But this bill is calculated to promote neither of those ends, but exactly the reverse. It withdraws specie from the circulation and from the banks, and piles it up in useless heaps in the Treasury. It weakens the general circulation, by making the portion of specie, which is part of it, so much the less; it weakens the banks, by reducing the amount of coin which supports their circulation. The general evil imputed to our currency, for some years past, is, that paper has formed too great a portion of it. The operation of this measure must be to increase that very evil. I have admitted the evil, and have concurred in measures to remedy it. I have favored the withdrawing of small bills from circulation, to the end that specie might take their place. I discussed this policy, and supported it, as early as 1832. My colleague, who, shortly after that period, was placed in the chair of the chief magistracy of Massachusetts, pressed its consideration, at length, upon the attention of the Legislature of that State. I still think it was a right policy. Some of the States had begun to adopt it. But the measures of the Administration, and especially this proposed measure, throw this policy all aback. They undo at once all that we have been laboring. Such, and so pertinacious has been the demand of Government for specie, and such new demand does this bill promise to create, that the States have found themselves compelled again to issue small bills for the use of the people. It was a day of rejoicing, as we have lately seen, among the people of New York, when the Legislature of that State suspended the small-bill restraining law, and furnished the people with some medium for small payments, better than the miserable trash which now annoys the community.

The Government, therefore, I insist, is evidently breaking down its own declared policy; it is defeating, openly and manifestly defeating, its own professed objects.

And yet, theory, imagination, presumptuous generalization, the application of military movements to questions of commerce and finance, and the abstractions of metaphysics, offer us, in such a state of things, their panacea. And what is it? What is it? What is to cure or mitigate these evils, or what is to ward off future calamities? Why, sir, the most agreeable remedy imaginable; the kindest, tenderest, most soothing, and solacing application in the whole world! Nothing, sir, nothing upon earth, but a smart, delightful, perpetual, and irreconcilable warfare, between the Government of the United States and the State banks! All will be well, we are assured, when the Government and the banks become antagonistical! Yes, sir, "antagonistical!" that is the word. What a stroke of policy, sir, is this! It is as delicate a strategem as poor old King Lear's, and a good deal like it. It proposes that we should tread lightly along, in felt or on velvet, till we get the banks within our power, and then, "kill, kill, kill!"

Sir, we may talk as much as we please about the resumption of specie payments, but I tell you that, with Government thus warring upon the banks, if resumption should take place, another suspension I fear would follow. It is not war, successful or unsuccessful, between Government and the banks, it is only peace, trust, confidence, that can restore the prosperity of the country. This system of perpetual annoyance to the banks, this hoarding up of money which the country demands for its own necessary uses, this bringing of the whole revenue to act, not in aid and furtherance, but in direct hindrance and embarrassment of commerce and business, is utterly irreconcileable with the public interest. We shall see no return of former times till it be abandoned—altogether abandoned. The passage of this bill will create new alarm and new distress.

People begin already to fear their own Government. They have an actual dread of those who should be their protectors and guardians. There are hundreds of thousands of honest and industrious men, sir, at this very moment, who would feel relieved in their circumstances, who would see a better prospect of an honest livelihood, and feel more sure of the means of food and clothing for their wives and children, if they should hear that this measure had received its death. Let us, then, sir, away with it. Do we not see the world prosperous around us? Do we not see other Governments and other nations, enlightened by experience, and rejecting arrogant innovations and theoretic dreams, accomplishing the great ends of society?

Why, sir, why are we, why are we alone among the great commercial States? Why are we to be kept on the rack and torture of these experiments? We have powers, adequate, complete powers. We need only to exercise them; we need only to porform our constitutional duty, and we shall spread content, cheerfulness, and joy, over the whole land.

This brings me, sir, to the second inquiry.

Is this measure, Mr. President, a just exercise of the powers of Congress, and does it fulfil all our duties?

Sir, I have so often discussed this point, I have so constantly insisted, for saveral years past, on the constitutional obligation of Congress to take care of the currency, that the Senate must be already tired of the speaker, if not weary of the topic; and yet, after all, this is the great and paramount question. Until this is settled, the agitation can never be quieted. If we have not the power, we must leave the whole subject in the hands of those who have it, or in no hands; but if we have the power, we are bound to exercise it, and every day's neglect is a violation of duty. I therefore again insist that we have the power, and I again press its exercise on the two Houses of Congress. I again assert that the regulation of the general currency—of the money of the country, whatever actually constitutes that money—is one of our solemn duties.

The Constitution confers on us, sir, the exclusive power of coinage. This must have been done for the purpose of enabling Congress to establish one uniform basis for the whole money system. Congress, therefore, and Congress alone, has power over the foundation, the groundwork of the currency; and it would be strange and anomalous, having this, if it had nothing to do with the structure, the edifice, to be raised on this foundation! Convertible paper was already in circulation when the Constitution was framed, and must have been expected to continue and to increase. But the circulation of paper tends to displace coin; it may banish it altogether: at this very moment it has banished it. If, therefore, the power over the coin does not enable Congress to protect the coin, and to restrain any thing which would supersede it, and abolish its use, the whole power becomes nugatory. If others may drive out the coin, and fill the country with paper which does not represent coin, of what use, I beg to know, is that exclusive power over coins and coinage which is given to Congress by the Constitution?

Gentlemen on the other side admit that it is the tendency of paper circulation to expel the coin; but when they say, that, for that very reason, they will withdraw from all connection with the general currency, and limit themselves to the single and narrow object of protecting the coin, and providing for payments to Government. This seems to me to be a very strange way of reasoning, and a very strange course of political conduct. The coinage power was given to be used for the benefit of the whole country, and not merely to furnish a medium for the collection of revenue. The object was to secure, for the general use of the people, a sound and safe circulating medium. There can be no doubt of this intent. If any evil arises, threatening to destroy or endanger this medium or this currency, our duty is to meet it, not to retreat from it; to remedy it, not to let it alone; we are to control and correct the mischief, not to submit to it. Wherever paper is to circulate, as subsidiary to coin, or as performing, in a greater or less degree, the function of coin, its regulation naturally belongs to the hands which hold the power over the coinage. This is an admitted maxim by all writers; it has been admitted and acted upon, on all necessary occasions, by our own Government, throughout its whole history. Why will we now think ourselves wiser than all who have gone before us?

This conviction of what was the duty of Government led to the establishment of the Bank in the administration of General Washington. Mr. Madison, again, acted upon the same conviction in 1816, and Congress entirely agreed with him. On former occasions, I have referred the Senate, more than once, to the clear and emphatic opinions and language of Mr. Madison, in his messages in 1815 and 1816, and they ought to be repeated, again and again, and pressed upon the public attention.

And now let me say, sir, that no man in our history has carried the doctrine farther, defended it with more ability, or acted upon it with more decision and effect, than the honorable member from South Carolina. His speech upon the bank bill, on the 26th February, 1816, is strong, full, and conclusive. He has heretofore said that some part of what he said on that occasion does not appear in the printed speech; but, whatever may have been left out by accident, that which is in the speech could not have got in by accident. Such accidents do not happen. A close, well conducted, and conclusive constitutional argument is not the result of an accident or of chance; and his argument on that occasion, as it seems to me, was perfectly conclusive. He founds the right of regulating the paper currency directly on the coinage power. "The only object," he says, "the framers of the Constitution could have in view, in giving to Congress the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, must have been to give a steadiness and fixed value to the currency of the United States." The state of things, he insisted, existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, afforded an argument in support of the construction. There then existed, he said, a depriciated paper currency, which could only be regulated and made uniform by giving a power, for that purpose to the General Government.

He proceeded to say that, by a sort of under current, the power of Congress to regulate the money of the country had caved in, and upon its ruin had sprung up those institutions which now exercised the right of making money for and in the United States. "For gold and silver (he insisted) are not only money; but whatever is the medium of purchase and sale; in which bank paper alone was now employed, and had, therefore, become the money of the country." "The right of making money," he added, "an attribute of sovereign power, a sacred and important right, was exercised by two hundred and sixty banks, scattered over every part of the United States."

Certainly, sir, nothing can be clearer than this language; and, acting vigorously upon principles thus plainly laid down, he conducted the Bank bill through the House of Representatives. On that occasion, he was the champion of the power of Congress over the currency, and others were willing to follow his lead.

But the Bank bill was not all. The honorable gentleman went much farther. The Bank, it was hoped and expected, would furnish a good paper currency to the extent of its own issues; but there was a vast quantity of bad paper in circulation, and it was possible that the mere influence of the Bank, and the refusal to receive this bad money at the Treasury, might not both be able to banish it entirely from the country. The honorable member meant to make clean work. He meant that neither Government nor people should suffer the evils of irredeemable paper. Therefore, he brought in another bill, entitled "A bill for the more effectual collection of the public revenue." By the provisions of this bill, he proposed to lay a direct stamp tax on the bills of State banks; and all notes of non-specie-paying banks were, by this stamp, to be branded with the following words, in distinct and legible characters, at length—"NOT A SPECIE NOTE." For the tax laid on such notes, there was to be no composition, no commutation; but it was to be specifically collected, on every single bill issued, until those who issued such bills should announce to the Secretary of the Treasury, and prove to his satisfaction, that, after a day named in the bill, all their notes would be paid in specie on demand.

And now, how is it possible, sir, for the author of such a measure as this to stand up and declare that the power of Congress over the currency is limited to the mere regulation of the coin? So much for our authority, as it has heretofore been admitted and acknowledged, under the coinage power.

Nor, sir, is the other source of power, in my opinion, at all more questionable.

Congress has the supreme regulation of commerce. This gives it, necessarily, a superintendence over all the interests, agencies, and instruments of commerce. The words are general, and they confer the whole power. When the end is given, all the usual means are given. Money is the chief instrument or agent of commerce; there can, indeed, be no commerce without it, which deserves the name. Congress must, therefore, regulate it as it regulates other indispensable commercial interests. If no means were to be used to this end but such as are particularly enumerated, the whole authority would be nugatory, because no means are particularly enumerated. We regulate ships; their tonnage; their measurement; the shipping articles; the medicine chest; and various other things belonging to them; and for all this we have no authority but the general power to regulate commerce; none of these, or ther means or modes of regulation are particularly and expressly pointed out.

But is a ship a more important instrument of commerce than money? We protect a policy of insurance, because it is an important instrument of ordinary commercial contract; and our laws punish with death any master of a vessel, or others, who shall commit a fraud on the parties to this contract by casting away a vessel. For all this we have no express authority. We infer it from the general power of regulating commerce, and we exercise the power in this case, because a policy of insurance is one of the usual instruments, or means, of commerce. But how inconsiderable and unimportant is a policy of insurance, as the means or an instrument of commerce, compared with the whole circulating paper of a country?

Sir, the power is granted to us, and granted without any specification of means; and therefore we may lawfully exercise all the usual means. I need not particularize these means, nor state, at present, what they are, or may be. One is, no doubt, a proper regulation of receipts at the custom-houses and land offices. But this, of itself, is not enough. Another is a national bank, which, I fully believe, would, even now, answer all desired purposes, and reinstate the currency in ninety days. These, I think, are to be first tried; and if, notwithstanding these, irredeemable paper should overwhelm us, others must be resorted to. We have no direct authority over State banks; but we have power over the currency, and we must protect it, using, of course, always, such means, if they be found adequate, as shall be most gentle and mild. The great measure, sir, is a bank; because a bank is not only able to restrain the excessive issues of State banks, but it is able also to furnish for the country a currency of universal credit, and of uniform value. This is the grand desideratum. Until such a currency is established, depend on it, sir, what is necessary for the prosperity of the country can never be accomplished.

On the question of power, sir, we have a very important and striking precedent.

The members of the Senate, Mr. President, will recollect the controversy between New York and her neighbor States, fifteen or sixteen years ago, upon the exclusive right of steam navigation. New York had granted an exclusive right of such navigation over her waters to Mr. Fulton and his associates; and declared, by law, that no vessel propelled by steam should navigate the North river or the Sound, without license from these grantees, under penalty of confiscation.

To counteract this law, the Legislature of New Jersey enacted, that if any citizen of hers should be restrained, or injured, in person or property, by any party acting under the law of New York, such citizen should have remedy in her courts, if the offender could be caught within her territory, and should be entitled to treble damages and costs. New Jersey called this act a law of retortion; and justified it on the general ground of reprisals.

On the other side, Connecticut took fire, and as no steamboat could come down the Sound from New York to Connecticut, or pass up from Connecticut to New York, without a New York license, she enacted a law, by which heavy penalties were imposed on all who should presume to come into her ports and harbors, having any such license.

Here, sir, was a very harmonious state of commercial intercourse! a very promising condition of things, indeed! You could not get from New York to New Haven by steam; nor could you go from New York to New Jersey, without transshipment in the bay. And now, sir, let me remind the country, that this belligerent legislation of the States concerned was justified and defended, by exactly the same arguments as those which we have heard in this debate. Every thing which has been said here, to prove that the authority to regulate commerce does not include a power to regulate currency, was said in that case, to prove that the same authority did not include an exclusive power over steamboats or other means of navigation. I do not know a reason, a suggestion, an idea, which has been used in this debate, or which was used in the debate in September, to show that Congress has no power to control the currency of the country and make it uniform, which was not used in this steamboat controversy, to prove that the authority of this Government did not reach the matter then in dispute. Look to the forensic discussions in New York! Look to the argument in the court here! You will find it every where urged that navigation does not come within the general idea of regulating commerce; that steamboats are but vehicles and instruments; that the power of Congress is general, and general, only; and that it does not extend to agents and instruments.

And what, sir, put an end to this state of things? What stopped these seizures and confiscations? Nothing in the world, sir, but the exercise of the constitutional power of this Government. Nothing in the world, but the decision of the Supreme Court that the power of Congress to regulate commerce was paramount; that it overruled any interfering State laws; and that these acts of the States did interfere with acts of Congress enacted under its clear and constitutional authority.

As to the extent of the power of regulating commerce, allow me to quote a single sentence from the opinion of one of the learned judges of the Supreme Court, delivered on that occasion; a judge always distinguished for the great care with which he guarded State rights. I mean Mr. Justice Johnson. And when I have read it, sir, then say if it does not confirm every word and syllable which I have uttered on this subject, either now, or at the September session. "In the advancement of society," said the Judge, "labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various means of exchange, become commodities, and enter into commerce; and the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and these various operations, become the objects of commercial regulation."

These just sentiments prevailed. The decision of the court quieted the dangerous controversy; and satisfied, and I will add gratified, most highly gratified, the whole country.

Sir, may we not perceive at the present moment, without being suspected of looking with eyes whose sight is sharpened by too much apprehension—may we not perceive, sir, in what is now passing around us, the possible beginnings of another controversy between States, which may be of still greater moment, and followed, if not arrested, by still more deplorable consequences? Do we see no danger, no disturbance, no contests ahead? Sir, do we not behold excited commercial rivalship, evidently existing between great States and great cities? Do we not see an emulous competition for trade, external and internal? Do we not see the parties concerned enlarging and proposing to enlarge, to a vast extent, their plans of currency, evidently in connection with these objects of trade and commerce? Do we not see States themselves becoming deeply interested in great banking institutions? Do we not know that, already, the notes and bills of some States are prohibited by law from circulating in others?

Sir, I will push these questions no farther: but I tell you that it was for exactly such a crisis as this—for this very crisis—for this identical exigency now upon us—that this Constitution was framed, and this Government established. And, sir, let those who expect to get over this crisis without effort and without action, let those whose hope it is that they may be borne along on the tide of circumstances and favorable occurrences, and who repose in the denial of their own powers and their own responsibility—let all such look well to the end.

For one, I intend to clear myself from all blame. I intend, this day, to free myself of the responsibility of consequences, by warning you of the danger into which you are conducting our public affairs, by urging and entreating you, as I do now urge and entreat you, by invoking you, as I do invoke you, by your love of country, and your fidelity to the Constitution, to abandon all untried expedients; to put no trust in ingenuity and contrivance; to have done with projects which alarm and agitate the people; to seek no shelter from obligation and duty; but with manliness, directness, and true wisdom, to apply to the evils of the times their proper remedy. That Providence may guide the counsels of the country to this end, before even greater disasters and calamities overtake us, is my most fervent prayer!

Mr. President, on the subject of the power of Congress, as well as on other important topics, connected with the bill, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina has advanced opinions, of which I feel bound to take some notice.

That honorable gentleman, in his recent speech, attempted to exhibit a contrast between the course of conduct which I, and other gentlemen who act with me, at present pursue, and that which we have heretofore followed. In presenting this contrast, he said, he intended nothing personal: his only object was truth. To this I could not object. The occasion requires, sir, that I should now examine his opinions; and I can truly say, with him, that I mean nothing personally injurious, and that my object, also, is truth, and nothing else. Here I might stop; but I will even say something more.

It is now five and twenty years, sir, since I became acquainted with the honorable gentleman, in the House of Representatives, in which he had held a seat, I think, about a year and a half before I entered it. From that period, sir, down to the year 1824, I can say, with great sincerity, there was not, among my political contemporaries, any man for whom I entertained a higher respect, or warmer esteem. When we first met we were both young men. I beheld in him a generous character, a liberal and comprehensive mind, engrossed by great objects, distinguished talent, and particularly, great originality and vigor of thought. That he was ambitious, I did not doubt; but that there was any thing in his ambition low or sordid, any thing approaching to a love of the mere loaves and fishes of office, I did not then believe, and do not now believe. If, from that moment down to the time I have already mentioned, I differed with him on any great constitutional question, I do not know it.

But, in 1824, events well known to the Senate separated us; and that separation remained, wide and broad, until the end of the memorable session which terminated in March, 1833. With the events of that session, our occasions of difference had ceased; certainly for the time, and, as I sincerely hoped, forever. Before the next meeting of Congress, the public deposites had been removed from their lawful custody by the President. Respecting this exercise of the Executive power, the honorable gentleman and myself entertained the same opinions; and, in regard to subsequent transactions connected with that, and growing out of it, there was not, so far as I know, any difference of sentiment between us. We looked upon all these proceedings but as so many efforts to give to the Executive an unconstitutional control over the public moneys. We thought we saw, every where, proofs of a design to extend Executive authority, not only in derogation of the just powers of Congress, but to the danger of the public liberty. We acted together, to check these designs, and to arrest the march of Executive prerogative and dominion. In all this, we were but co-operating with many other gentlemen here, and with a large and intelligent portion of the whole country.

The unfortunate results of these Executive interferences with the currency had made an impression on the public mind. A revolution seemed in progress, and the people were coming in their strength, as we began to think, to support us and our principles.

In this state of things, sir, we met here at the commencement of the September session; but we met, not as we had done; we met, not as we had parted. The events of May, the policy of the President in reference to those events, the doctrines of the message of September, the principles and opinions which the honorable gentleman, both to my surprise and to my infinite regret, came forward then to support, rendered it quite impossible for us to act together, for a single moment longer. To the leading doctrines of that message, and to the policy which it recommended, I felt, and still feel, a deep, conscientious, and irreconcilable opposition. The honorable gentleman supported, and still supports, both. Here, then, we part. On these questions of constitutional power and duty, and on these momentous questions of national policy, we separate. And so broad and ample is the space which divides us, and so deep does the division run, touching even the very foundations of the Government, that, considering the time of life to which we both have arrived, it is not probable that we are to meet again. I say this with unfeigned and deep regret. Believe me, sir, I would most gladly act with the honorable gentleman. If he would but come back, now, to what I consider his former principles and sentiments; if he would place himself on those constitutional doctrines which he has sustained through a long series of years; and if, thus standing, he would exert his acknowledged ability to restore the prosperity of the country, and put an end to the mischiefs of reckless experiments and dangerous innovation, I would not only willingly act with him, I would act under him; I would follow him, I would support him, I would back him, at every step, to the utmost of my power and ability. Such is not to be our destiny. That destiny is, that we here part; and all I can say further is, that he carries with him the same feeling of personal kindness on my part, the same hearty good-will which have here ofore inspired me.

There have been three principal occasions, sir, on which the honorable gentleman has expressed his opinion upon the questions now under discussion. They are, his speech of the 15th September, his published letter of the 3d November, and his leading speech of the present session. These productions are all marked with his characteristic ability; they are ingenious, able, condensed, and striking. They deserve an answer. To some of the observations in the speech of September, I made a reply on the day of its delivery; there are other parts of it, however, which require a more deliberate examination.

Mr. President, the honorable gentleman declares in that speech, "that he belongs to the State Rights party; that that party, from the beginning of the Government, has been opposed to a National Bank as unconstitutional, inexpedient and dangerous; that it has ever dreaded the union of the political and moneyed power, and the central action of the Government, to which it so strongly tends; that the connection of the Government with the banks, whether it be with a combination of State banks, or with a national institution, will necessarily centralize the action of the system at the principal point of collection and disbursement, and at which the mother bank, or the head of the league of State banks, must be located. From that point, the whole system, through the connection with the Government, will be enabled to control the exchanges, both of home and abroad, and, with it, the commerce, foreign and domestic, including exports and imports."

Now, sir, this connection between Government and the banks, to which he imputes such mischievous consequences, he describes to be "the receiving and paying away their notes as cash; and the use of the public money from the time of the collection to the disbursement."

Sir, if I clearly comprehend the honorable gentleman, he means no more, after all, than this: that, while the public revenues are collected, as heretofore, through the banks, they will lie in the banks between the time of collection and the time of disbursement; that, during that period, they will be regarded as one part of the means of business and of discount possessed by the banks; and that, as a greater portion of the revenue is collected in large cities than in small ones, these large cities will, of course, derive greater benefit than the small ones from these deposites in the banks. In other words, that, as the importing merchants in a great city pay more duties to Government than those in a small one, so they enjoy an advantage to be derived from any use which the banks may make of these moneys while on deposite with them. Now, sir, I would be very glad to know, supposing all this to be true, what there is in it either unequal or unjust? The benefit is exactly in proportion to the amount of business, and to the sums paid. If individuals in large cities enjoy the incidental use of more money, it is simply because they pay more money. It is like the case of credit on duty bonds. Whoever imports goods with the benefit of giving bond for duties, instead of making present payment, enjoys a certain benefit; and this benefit, in a direct sense, is in proportion to the amount of goods imported—the large importer having credit for a large sum, the small importer having credit for a smaller sum. But the advantage, the benefit, or the indulgence, or whatever we call it, is, nevertheless, entirely equal and impartial.

How, then, does the collection of revenue through the banks "centralize" the action of the commercial system? It seems to me, sir, the cause is mistaken for the effect. The greatest amount of revenue is collected in the greatest city, because it is already the greatest city; because its local advantages, its population, its capital and enterprise, draw business towards it, constitute it a central point in commercial operations, and have made it the greatest city. It is the centralization of commerce by these just and proper causes—causes which must always exist in every country which produces a large collection of revenue in the favored spot. The amount of capital is one very important cause, no doubt; and leaving public moneys in the banks till wanted, allows to merchants, in places of large import, a degree of incidental benefit, in just proportion to the amount of capital by them employed in trade, and no more.

I suppose, sir, it is the natural course of things in every commercial country, that some place, or a few places, should go ahead of others in commercial business importance. This must ever be so until all places possess precisely equal natural advantages. And I suppose, too, that, instead of being mischievous, it is rather for the common good of all, that there should be some commercial emporium, some central point, for the exchanges of trade. Government, certainly, should not seek to produce this result by the bestowal of unequal privileges; but surely, sir, it would be a very strange and indefensible policy which should lead the Government to withhold any portion of the capital of the country from useful employment, merely because that, if employed, while all enjoyed the benefit proportionately, all would not enjoy it with the same absolute mathematical equality.

So much, sir, for concentration, arising from depositing the revenues in banks. Let us now look to the other part of the connection, viz: the receiving of bank notes for duties. How in the world does this "centralize" the commercial system? The whole tendency and effect, as it seems to me, is directly the other way. It counteracts centralization. It gives all possible advantage to local currency and local payments, and thereby encourages both imports and exports. It tends to make local money good everywhere. If goods be imported into Charleston, the duties are paid in Charleston notes. New York notes are not demanded. Nothing, certainly, can be fairer or more equal than this, and nothing more favorable to the Charleston importers.

But how would that system work, which the gentleman himself proposes?

If his plan could prevail, he would have the duties collected either in specie, or in a Government paper to be issued from the Treasury. He would reject all bank notes whatever. If the gentleman, sir, fears centralization, I am astonished that he does not see centralization in all its terrors in this very proposition of his own. Pray allow me to ask, sir, where will this Government paper, in the course of its issue and circulation, naturally centre? To what points will it tend? Certainly, most certainly, to the greatest points of collection and expenditure; to the very heart of the metropolitan city, wherever that city may be. This is as inevitable as the fall of water or the results of attraction. If two-thirds of the duties be collected in New York, it will follow, of course, that two-thirds of any Government paper received for duties will be there received; and it will be more valuable there than elsewhere. The value of such paper would consist in its receivability, and nothing else. It would always tend, therefore, directly to the spot where the greatest demand should exist for it for that purpose. Is it not so at this moment with the outstanding Treasury notes? Are they abundant in Georgia, in Mississippi, in Illinois, or in New Hampshire? No sooner issued than they commence their march toward the place where they are most valued and most in demand; that is, to the place of the greatest public receipt. If you want concentration, sir, and enough of it—if you desire to dry up the small streams of commerce, and fill more full the deep and already swollen great channels, you will act very wisely to that end, if you keep out of the receipt of the Treasury all money but such paper as the Government may furnish, and which shall be no otherwise redeemable than in receipt for debts to Government, while at the same time you depress the character of the local circulation.

Such is the scheme of the honorable member in its probable commercial effect. Let us look at it in a political point of view.

The honorable member says he belongs to the State rights party; that party professes something of an uncommon love of liberty; an extraordinary sensibility to all its dangers; and of those dangers, it most dreads the union of the political and money power. This we learn from the authentic declaration of the gentleman himself. And now, oh, transcendent consistency! oh, most wonderful conformity of means and ends! oh, exquisite mode of gratifying high desires! behold, the honorable member proposes that the political power of the State shall take to itself the whole function of supplying the entire paper circulation of the country, by notes or bills of its own, issued at its own discretion, to be paid out or advanced to whomsoever it pleases, in discharging the obligations of Government, bearing no promise to pay, and to be kept in circulation merely by being made receivable at the Treasury! The whole circulation of the country, excepting only that which is metallic, and which must always be small, will thus be made up of mere Government paper, issued for Government purposes, and redeemable only in payment of Government debts. In other words, the entire means of carrying on the whole commerce of the country will be held by Government in its own hands, and made commensurate, exactly, with its own wants, purposes, and opinions; the whole commercial business of the country being thus made a mere appendage to revenue.

But, sir, in order that I may not misrepresent the honorable member, let me show you a little more distinctly what his opinions are respecting this Government paper.

The honorable member says, sir, that to make this Sub-Treasury measure successful, and to secure it against reaction, some safe and stable medium of circulation, "to take the place of bank notes in the fiscal operations of the Government, ought to be issued;" that, "in the present condition of the world, a paper currency, in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable, in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities;" that "the great desideratum is to ascertain what description of paper has the requisite qualities of being free from fluctuation in value, and liability to abuse, in the greatest perfection;" that "bank notes do not possess these requisites in a degree sufficiently high for this purpose." And then he says, "I go farther. It appears to me, after bestowing the best reflection I can give the subject, that no convertible paper, that is, no paper whose credit rests upon a promise to pay, is suitable for currency." "On what, then, (he asks,) ought a paper currency to rest?" "I would say," he answers, "on demand and supply simply; which regulate the value of every thing else—the constant demand which Government has for its necessary supplies." He then proceeds to observe, "that there might be a sound and safe paper currency, founded on the credit of Government exclusively." "That such paper, only to be issued to those who had claims on the Government, would, in its habitual state, be at or above par with gold and silver;" that "nothing but experience can determine what amount, and of what denominations, might be safely issued; but that it might be safely assumed that the country would absorb an amount greatly exceeding its annual income. Much of its exchanges, which amount to a vast sum, as well as its banking business, would revolve about it; and many millions would thus be kept in circulation beyond the demands of the Government.

By this scheme, sir, Government, in its disbursements, is not to pay money, but to issue paper. This paper is no otherwise payable or redeemable, than as it may be received at the Treasury. It is expected to be let out much faster than it comes in, so that many millions will be kept in circulation; and its habitual character will be at or above par with gold and silver. Now, sir, if there is to be found any where a more plain and obvious project of paper money, in all its deformity, I should not know where to look for it.

In the first place, sir, I have suggested the complete union which it would form, if it were, in itself, practicable, between the political and the money power.

The whole commerce of the country, indeed, under such a state of law, would be little more than a sort of incident to Treasury operations—rather a collateral emanation of the revenue system, than a substantial and important branch of the public interest. I have referred, also, to its probable consequences, upon that which the gentleman regards as so great an evil, and which he denominates "the centralization of commercial action."

And now I pray you to consider, Mr. President, in the next place, what an admirable contrivance this would be to secure that economy in the expenses of Government which the gentleman has so much at heart. Released from all necessity of taxation, and from the consequent responsibility to the people; not called upon to regard at all the amount of annual income; having an authority to cause Treasury notes to issue whenever it pleases,

> "In multitudes, like which the populous North
> Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass
> Rhene, or the Danau;"

what admirable restraint would be imposed on Government; how doubly sure would assurance be made for it, that all its expenditures would be strictly limited to the absolute and indispensable wants and demands of the public service!

But, sir, fortunately, very fortunately, a scheme so wild, and which would be so mischievous, is totally impracticable. It rests on an assumption, for which there is not the least foundation, either in reason or experience. It takes for granted that which the history of every commercial State refutes, and our own, especially, in almost every page. It supposes that irredeemable Government paper can circulate in the business of society, and be kept at par. This is an impossibility. The honorable gentleman rejects convertible bank notes, which are equivalent to specie, since they will always command it, and adopts in their stead Government paper, with no promise to pay, but a promise only to be received for debts and taxes; and he puts forth the imagination, as I have said, so often and so long refuted, that this paper will be kept in circulation in the country, and will be able to perform the great business of currency and exchange, even though it exist in quantities exceeding, by many millions, the demands of Government.

If it be necessary, sir, at this day, to refute ideas like these, it must be because the history of all countries, our own included, is a dead letter to us. Even at the very moment in which I am speaking, the small amount of Treasury notes which has been issued by Government, hardly a fifth part of the ordinary annual revenue—though those notes bear an interest of five per cent.—though they are redeemable in cash at the Treasury, at the expiration of the year—and though, in the mean time, they are every where received in Government dues, are not only of less value than specie, but of less value, also, than the notes of non-specie-paying banks; those banks whose paper is daily denounced here as "rags—filthy rags." In my opinion, sir, the whole scheme is as visionary and impracticable as any which the genius of project ever produced.

Mr. President, toward the close of this speech of September, I find a paragraph in which several other subjects are brought together, and which I must ask permission to read.

Having commended the wise and noble bearing of the little State Rights party, of which he says it is his pride to be a member throughout the eventful period through which the country has passed since 1824, he adds:

"In that year, as I have stated, the tariff system triumphed in the councils of the nation. We saw its disastrous political bearings; foresaw its surpluses, and the extravagancies to which it would lead; we rallied on the election of the late President to arrest it through the influence of the Executive Department of the Government. In this we failed. We then fell back upon the rights and sovereignty of the States; and, by the action of a small but gallant State, and through the potency of its interposition, we brought the system to the ground, sustained, as it was, by the Opposition and the Administration, and by the whole power and patronage of the Government."

Every part of this most extraordinary statement well deserves attention.

In the first place, sir, here is an open and direct avowal that the main object for rallying on General Jackson's first election, was to accomplish the overthrow of the protecting policy of the country. Indeed! Well, this is very frank. I am glad to hear the avowal made. It puts an end to all suspicions.

It was, then, to overthrow protection, was it, that the honorable gentleman took so much pains to secure Gen. Jackson's first election? I commend his candor, in now acknowledging it. But, sir, the honorable member had allies and associates in that rally. They thronged round him from all quarters, and followed his lead. And pray, sir, was his object, as now avowed by himself, the joint object of all the party? Did he tell Pennsylvania, honest, intelligent, straight-forward Pennsylvania, that such was his purpose? And did Pennsylvania concur in it? Pennsylvania was first and foremost in espousing the cause of General Jackson. Everybody knows she is more of a tariff State than any other in the Union. Did he tell her that his purpose was to break the tariff entirely down? Did he state his objects, also, to New York? Did he state them to New Jersey? What say you, gentlemen from Pennsylvania? gentlemen from New York? and gentlemen from New Jersey? Ye who supported Gen. Jackson's election, what say you? Was it your purpose, also, by that election, to break down the protective policy? Or, if it were not your purpose, did you know, nevertheless—pray let us understand that—did you know, nevertheless, that it was the purpose, and the main purpose, of the honorable member from Carolina? and did you, still, co-operate with him?

The present Chief Magistrate of the country was a member of this body in 1828. He and the honorable member from Carolina were, at that time, exerting their united forces, to the utmost, in order to bring about Gen. Jackson's election. Did they work thus zealously together, for the same ultimate end and purpose? or did they mean merely to change the Government, and then each to look out for himself?

Mr. Van Buren voted for the tariff bill of that year, commonly called the "bill of abominations;" but, very luckily, and in extremely good season, instructions for that vote happened to come from Albany! The vote, therefore, could be given, and the member giving it could not possibly thereby give any offence to any gentleman of the State Rights party, with whom the doctrine of instructions is so authentic.

Sir, I will not do gentlemen injustice. Those who belonged to tariff States, as they are called, and who supported General Jackson for the Presidency, did not intend thereby to overthrow the protecting policy. They only meant to make Gen. Jackson President, and to come into power along with him! As to ultimate objects, each had his own. All could agree, however, in the first step. It was difficult, certainly, to give a plausible appearance to a political union, among gentlemen who differed so widely, on the great and leading question of the times—the question of the protecting policy. But this difficulty was overcome by the oracular declaration that Gen. Jackson was in favor of a "JUDICIOUS TARIFF."

Here, sir, was ample room and verge enough. Who could object to a judicious tariff? Tariff men and anti-Tariff men, State Rights men and Consolidationists, those who had been called prodigals, and those who had been called radicals, all thronged and flocked together here, and with all their difference in regard to ultimate objects, agreed to make common cause, till they should get into power.

The ghosts, sir, which are fabled to cross the Styx, whatever different hopes or purposes they may have beyond it, still unite, in the present wish to get over, and therefore all hurry and huddle into the leaky and shattered craft of Charon, the ferryman. And this motley throng of politicians, sir, with as much difference of final object, and as little care for each other, made a boat of "Judicious Tariff," and all rushed and scrambled into it, until they filled it, near to sinking. The authority of the master was able, however, to keep them peaceable and in order, for the time, for they had the virtue of submission, and though with occasional dangers of upsetting, he succeeded in pushing them all over with his long setting pole.

"Ratem conto subigit."

Well, sir, the honorable gentleman tells us that he expected, when General Jackson should be elected, to arrest the tariff system through the influence of the Executive Department. Here is another candid confession. Arrest the tariff by Executive influence! Indeed! Why, sir, this seems like hoping, from the first, for the use of the veto. How, but by the veto, could the Executive arrest the tariff acts? And is it true, sir, that, at that early day, the honorable member was looking to the veto, not with dread, but with hope? Did he expect it, and did he reply upon it? Did he make the rally of which he speaks, in order that he might choose a President who would exercise it? And did he afterwards complain of it, or does he complain of it now, only because it was ill-directed—because it turned out to be a thunderbolt, which did not fall in the right place?

In this reliance on Executive influence—sir, I declare I hardly can trust myself that I read or quote correctly, when I find, in what I read, or from what I quote, the honorable member from South Carolina, by his own confession, hoping or expecting to accomplish any thing by Executive influence; yet so was it spoken, and so is it printed—in this reliance, or this hope, or expectation, founded on Executive influence, the honorable gentleman and his friends failed; and, failing in this, he says, they fell back on the sovereignty of the States, and brought the system to the ground "through the potency of interposition;" by which he means neither more nor less than Nullification. So then, sir, according to this, that excessive fear of power which was so much cherished by the Nullifiers, was only awakened to a flame in their bosoms, when they found that they could not accomplish their own ends by the Executive power of the President.

I am no authorized commentator, sir, on the doctrines or theories of Nullification. Non nostrum. But, if this exposition be authentic, I must say it is not calculated to diminish my opposition to the sentiments of that school.

But the gentleman goes on to tell us that nullification, or interposition, succeeded. By means of it, he says, he did bring the protective system to the ground. And so, in his published letter of November 3d, he states that "State interposition has overthrown the protective tariff, and, with it, the American system."

We are to understand, then, sir, first, that the compromise act of 1833 was forced upon Congress by State interposition, or nullification.

Next, that its object and design, so far as the honorable gentleman was concerned in it, was to break down and destroy, forever, the whole protective policy of the country.

And lastly, that it has accomplished that purpose, and that the last vestige of that policy is wearing away.

Now, sir, I must say, that in 1833, I entertained no doubt at all that the design of the gentleman was exactly what he now states. On this point, I have not been deceived. It was not, certainly, the design of all who acted with him; but, that it was his purpose, I knew then, as clearly as I know now, after his open avowal of it; and this belief governed my conduct at the time, together with that of a great majority of those in both Houses of Congress, who, after the act of 1824, felt bound to carry out the provisions of that act, and to maintain them reasonably and fairly. I opposed the compromise act with all my power. It appeared to me every way objectionable; it looked like an attempt to make a new Constitution; to introduce another fundamental law, above the power of Congress, and which should control the authority and discretion of Congress, in all time to come. This, of itself, was a conclusive objection with me; I said so then, have often said so since, and say so now. I said, then, that I, for one, should not be bound by that law more than by any other law, except that, as it was a law passed on a very important and agitating subject, I should not be disposed to interfere with it, until a case of clear necessity should arise. On this principle I have acted since. When that case of necessity shall arise, however, should I be in public life, I shall concur in any alteration of that act, which such necessity may require. That such an occasion may come, I more than fear I entertain something stronger than a doubt upon the possibility of maintaining the manufactures and industry of this country, upon such a system as the compromise act will leave us, when it shall have gone through its processes of reduction. All this, however, I leave to the future.

Having had occasion, Mr. President, to speak of Nullification and the Nullifiers, I beg leave to say, that I have not done so for any purpose of reproach. Certainly, sir, I see no possible connection, myself, between their principles or opinions, and the support of this measure. They, however, must speak for themselves. They may have intrusted the bearing of their standard, for aught I know, to the hands of the honorable member from South Carolina; and I perceived last session, what I perceive now, that in his opinion there is a connection between these projects of Government and the doctrines of Nullification. I can only say, sir, that it will be marvellous to me if that banner, though it be said to be tattered and torn, shall yet be lowered in obeisance, and laid at the footstool of Executive power. To the sustaining of that power the passage of this bill is of the utmost importance. The Administration will regard its success as being to them, what Cromwell said the battle of Worcester was to him—"a crowning mercy." Whether gentlemen, who have distinguished themselves so much by their extreme jealousy of this Government, shall now find it consistent with their principles to give their aid in accomplishing this consummation, remains to be seen.

The next exposition of the honorable gentleman's sentiments and opinions is his letter of November 3d.

This letter, sir, is a curiosity. As a paper, describing political movements, and exhibiting political opinions, it is without a parallel. Its phrase is altogether military. It reads like a despatch, or a bulletin from headquarters. It is full of attacks, assaults and repulses. It recounts movements and countermovements, speaks of occupying one position, falling back upon another, and advancing to a third; it has positions to cover enemies, and positions to hold allies in check. Meantime, the celerity of all these operations reminds one of the rapidity of the military actions of the King of Prussia, in the seven years' war. Yesterday he was in the South, giving battle to the Austrian; to-day he is in Saxony or Silesia; instantly he is found to have traversed the Electorate, and is facing the Russian and the Swede on his northern frontier. If you look for his place on the map, before you find it he has quitted it. He is always marching, flying, falling back, wheeling, attacking, defending, surprising, fighting every where, and fighting all the time. In one particular, however, the campaigns described in this letter differ from the manner in which those of the great Frederick were conducted. I think we nowhere read in the narrative of Frederick's achievements of his taking a position to cover an enemy, or a position to hold an ally in check. These refinements in the science of tactics and of war are of more recent discovery.

Mr. President, public men must certainly be allowed to change their opinions and their associations, whenever they see fit. No one doubts this. Men may have grown wiser; they may have attained to better and more correct views of great public subjects. It would be unfortunate, if there were any code which should oblige men, in public or private life, to adhere to opinions once entertained, in spite of experience and better knowledge, and against their own convictions of their erroneous character. Nevertheless, sir, it must be acknowledged that what appears to be a sudden, as well as a great change, naturally produces a shock. I confess, for one, I was shocked when the honorable gentleman, at the last session, espoused this bill of the Administration; and when I first read this letter of November, and, in the short space of a column and a half, ran through such a succession of political movements, all terminating in placing the honorable member in the ranks of our opponents, and entitling him to take his seat, as he has done, among them, if not at their head, I confess I felt still greater surprise. All this seemed a good deal too abrupt. Sudden movements of the affections, whether personal or political, are a little out of nature.

Several years ago, sir, some of the wits of England wrote a mock play, intended to ridicule the unnatural and false feeling, the sentimentality, of a certain German school of literature. In this play, two strangers are brought together at an inn. While they are warming themselves at the fire, and before their acquaintance is yet five minutes old, one springs up and exclaims to the other, "A sudden thought strikes me! Let us swear an eternal friendship!"

This affectionate offer was instantly accepted, and the friendship duly sworn, unchangeable and eternal! Now, sir, how long this eternal friendship lasted, or in what manner it ended, those who wish to know may learn by referring to the play.

But it seems to me sir, that the honorable member has carried his political sentimentality a good deal higher than the flight of the German school; for he appears to have fallen suddenly in love, not with strangers, but with opponents.

Here we all had been, sir, contending against the progress of Executive power, and more particularly, and most strenuously, against the projects and experiments of the Administration, upon the currency. The honorable member stood among us, not only as an associate, but as a leader. We thought we were making some headway. The people appeared to be coming to our support and our assistance. The country had been roused; every successive election weakening the strength of the adversary, and increasing our own. We were in this career of success carried strongly forward by the current of public opinion, and only needed to hear the cheering voice of the honorable member,

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more!"

and we should have prostrated, forever, this anti-constitutional, anti-commercial, anti-republican, and anti-American policy of the Administration. But, instead of these encouraging and animating accents, behold! in the very crisis of our affairs, on the very eve of victory, the honorable member cries out—to the enemy—not to us, his allies—but to the enemy—"Holloa! A sudden thought strikes me! I abandon my allies! Now I think of it, they have always been my oppressors! I adandon them, and now let you and me swear an eternal friendship!"

Such a proposition, from such a quarter, sir, was not likely to be long withstood. The other party was a little coy, but, upon the whole, nothing loath. After proper hesitation, and a little decorous blushing, it owned the soft impeachment, admitted an equally sudden sympathetic impulse on its own side; and, since few words are wanted where hearts are already known, the honorable gentleman takes his place among his new friends, amidst the greetings and caresses, and is already enjoying the sweets of an eternal friendship.

In this letter, Mr. President, the writer says, in substance, that he saw, at the commencement of the last session, that affairs had reached the point when he and his friends, according to the course they should take, would reap the full harvest of their long and arduous struggle, against the encroachments and abuses of the General Government, or lose the fruits of all their labors.

At that time, he says, State interposition (viz. Nullification) had overthrown the protecting tariff, and the American system, and put a stop to Congressional usurpation; that he had previously been united with the National Republicans; and that their joint attacks had brought down the power of the Executive; but that, in joining such allies, he was not insensible to the embarrassment of his position; that, with them, victory itself was dangerous; and that, therefore, he had been waiting for events; that now, (that is to say, in September last,) the joint attacks of the allies had brought down Executive power; that the Administration had become divested of power and influence, and that it had become clear that the combined attacks of the allied forces would utterly overthrow and demolish it. All this he saw. But he saw, too, as he says, that in that case the victory would enure, not to him or his cause, but to his allies and their cause. I do not mean to say that he spoke of personal victories, or alluded to personal objects, at all. He spoke of his cause.

It proceeds to say, then, that never was there before, and never, probably, will there be again, so fair an opportunity for himself and his friends to carry out their own principles and policy, and to reap the fruits of their long and arduous struggle. These principles and this policy, sir, be it remembered, he represents, all along, as identified with the principles and policy of nullification. And he makes use of this glorious opportunity, by refusing to join his late allies in any further attack on those in power, rallying anew the old State Rights party to hold in check their old opponents, the National Republican party. This, he says, would enable him to prevent the complete ascendancy of his allies, and to compel the Southern division of the Administration party to occupy the ground of which he proposes to take possession, to wit, the ground of the old State Rights party. They will have, he says, no other alternative.

Mr. President, stripped of its military language, what is the amount of all this, but that, finding the Administration weak, and likely to be overthrown, if the Opposition continued with undiminished force, he went over to it, to join it; to act, himself, upon nullification principles; and to compel the Southern members of the Administration to meet him on those principles?—in other words, to make a nullification Administration, and to take such part in it as should belong to him and his friends. He confesses, sir, that in thus abandoning his allies, and taking a position to cover those in power he perceived a shock would be created, which would require some degree of resolution and firmness. In this he was right. A shock, sir, has been created; yet there he is.

This Administration, sir, is represented as succeeding to the last, by an inheritance of principle. It professes to tread in the footsteps of its illustrious predecessor. It adopts, generally, the sentiments, principles, and opinions, of General Jackson—Proclamation and all: and yet, though he be the very prince of Nullifiers, and but lately regarded as the chiefest of sinners, it receives the honorable gentleman with the utmost complacency; to all appearance the delight is mutual: they find him an able leader, he finds them complying followers. But, sir, in all this movement, he understands himself. He means to go ahead, and to take them along. He is in the engine-car; he controls the locomotive. His hand regulates the steam, to increase or retard speed, at his own discretion. And as to the occupants of the passenger-cars, sir, they are as happy a set of gentlemen as one might desire to see, of a summer's day. They feel that they are in progress; they hope they shall not be run off the track; and when they reach the end of their journey, they desire to be thankful!

The arduous struggle is now all over. Its richest fruits are all reaped; Nullification embraces the Sub-Treasuries, and oppression and usurpation will be heard of no more.

On the broad surface of the country, sir, there is a spot called "the Hermitage." In that residence is an occupant very well known, and not a little remarkable both in person and character. Suppose, sir, the occupant of the Hermitage were now to open that door, enter the Senate, walk forward, and look over the chamber to the seats on the other side. Be not frightened, gentlemen, it is but fancy's sketch. Suppose he should thus come in among us, sir, and see into whose hands has fallen the chief support of that Administration, which was, in so great a degree, appointed by himself, and which he fondly relied on to maintain the principles of his own. If gentlemen were now to see his steady military step, his erect posture, his compressed lips, his firmly knitted brow, and his eye full of fire, I cannot help thinking, sir, they would all feel somewhat queer. There would be, I imagine, not a little awkward moving, and shifting in their seats. They would expect soon to hear the roar of the lion, even if they did not feel his paw.

I proceed, sir, to the speech of the honorable member, delivered on the 15th of February last, in which he announces propositions, respecting the constitutional power of Congress, which, if they can be maintained, must necessarily give a new direction to our legislation, and would go far towards showing the necessity of the present bill.

The honorable member, sir, insists that Congress has no right to make general deposites of the public revenue in banks; and he denies, too, that it can authorize the reception of any thing but gold and silver in the payment of debts and dues to the Government.

These questions, sir, are questions of magnitude, certainly, and, since they have been raised, ought to be answered. They may be considered together. Allow me in the first place, however, to clear them from some extraneous matter. The honorable member puts the first question thus: Have we the right to make deposites in the banks, in order to bestow confidence in them, with a view to enable them to resume specie payments? And, by way of illustration, asks the further question, whether Government could constitutionally bestow on individuals, or a private association, the same advantages, in order to enable them to pay their debts? But this I take not to be the question. The true inquiry is, may not Congress authorize the public revenue, in the intervening time between its receipts and its expenditure, to be deposited in banks, for the general purpose of safe-keeping, in the same way as individuals deposite their own money? And if this mode of safe-keeping be attended with incidental advantages, of considerable importance to the community, is not that a reason which may properly govern the discretion of Congress in the case? To benefit the banks, or to benefit the community, is, in this case, not the main object; it is only the incident; and as to the case put for illustration, it would not be expected of Congress, certainly, to make deposites with individuals with a view, principally, of enabling such individuals to pay their debts; it might, nevertheless, be very competent to Congress, in some cases, and a very proper exercise of its power, to deposite money, even with individuals, in such manner as that it might be advantageous to the depositary. This incidental or consequential advantage results, often, from the nature of the transaction, and is inseparable from it. It may always be enjoyed, more or less, by any one, who holds public money for disbursement. In order to the necessary exercise of any of its powers, Government doubtless may make contracts with banks or other corporations as well as with individuals. If it has occasion to buy bills of exchange, it may buy them of banks. If it has stock or Treasury notes to sell, it may sell to banks, as the Secretary of the Treasury has lately proposed. It may employ banks, therefore, at its discretion, for the keeping of the public moneys, as those moneys must be kept somewhere. It can no more need a specific grant of power in the Constitution for such a purpose, than one merchant, becoming agent for another to receive any pay out money, would need a particular clause in his authority, enabling him to use banks for these purposes as other persons use them. No question has ever been raised in this Government about the power of Congress to authorize such deposites. Mr. Madison, in opposing the first bank charter in 1791, argued, strenuously, that a Bank of the United States was not necessary to Government as a depository of the public moneys, because, he insisted, its use could be supplied by other banks. This sufficiently shows his opinion. And in 1800, Congress made it the duty of the collectors of customs to deposite bonds for duties in the bank and its branches for collection.

When the charter of the first bank expired, in 1811, almost every gentleman who opposed its renewal contended that it was not necessary for the purpose of holding deposites of revenue, because State Banks could answer all such purposes equally well. A strong and prevailing tone of argument runs through all the speeches on that occasion, tending to this conclusion, viz. that Government may derive from State banks all the benefit which a Bank of the United States could render. In 1816, when the charter of the last bank was granted, it contained, as originally presented, no provision for making the public deposites in the Bank. The bill was probably drawn, in this particular, from the model of the first charter, in which no such clause was contained, without adverting to the law of 1800; but a section was introduced, on my motion, making it the duty of collectors to deposite the public moneys in the Bank and its branches. It was this section of the law which some of us thought was violated by the removal of the deposites. The main object of the deposite bill of 1836, as we know, was to regulate deposites of the public money with the State banks; so that, from the commencement of the Government to the present time, nobody has thought of making any question of the constitutional power of Congress to make such arrangements.

The gentleman's other proposition, and which he lays down with still more confidence and emphasis, is, that Congress cannot, constitutionally, authorize the receipt of bank notes, though they be notes of specie-paying banks, in payment of debts to Government; because, he says, that would make them money; and if we make them money, then we are bound to control and regulate that money. Most certainly, sir, I agree with the honorable member, that when bank notes become money, we are bound to control and regulate them. I thank him for this admission, since it goes a great way to support that proposition, for which I have been contending. That bank notes have become money in fact, that they answer the uses of money, that, in many respects, the law treats them as money, is certain. Why, then, are we not already bound to control and regulate them? The gentleman will say, because we have not ourselves made them money. But is that any answer? If they have become money in fact, they require the same regulation, and we have the same authority to bestow it, as if they had acquired that character by any acts of our own, because our power is general; it is to take care of the money of the country, and to regulate all the great concerns of commerce.

But let us see how this opinion of the honorable member stands upon the authorities in our own history.

When the first bank was established, the right of Congress to create such a corporation was, as we all know, very much disputed. Large majorities, however, in both Houses, were of opinion that the right existed, and they therefore granted the charter; and in this charter there was an express provision that the bills of the Bank should be receivable in all payments to Government. Those who opposed the Bank did not object to this clause: on the contrary, they went even much farther; and Mr. Madison expressly insisted that Congress might grant or refuse, to State banks, the privilege of having their notes received in revenue. In 1791, therefore, men of all parties supposed that Congress, in its discretion, might authorize the receipt of bank notes. The same principle was incorporated into the Bank charter of 1816: indeed, it was in the bill which the gentleman himself reported; and it passed without objection from any quarter. But this is not all. Mr. President, let us look into the proceedings of the session of 1815-16, a little more closely. At the commencement of that session, Mr. Madison drew our attention to the state of the currency; by which he meant the paper currency of the country, which was then very much disordered, as the banks had suspended specie payment during the war, and had not resumed. Early in the progress of the session, the honorable member from South Carolina moved that this part of the message should be referred to a select committee. It was so ordered. The committee was raised, and the honorable gentleman placed at its head. As chairman of the committee, he introduced the Bank bill, explained it, defended it, and carried it triumphantly through the House, having in it the provision which I have before mentioned.

But there is something more. At the same session the gentleman introduced the bill for the further collection of the revenue, to which I have already referred, and in which bill he carried the receivability of bank notes much further, and provided that notes of any bank or bankers which were payable and paid, on demand, in specie, might be also received and accepted in all payments to the United States. So that the honorable gentleman himself drew, with his own pen, the very first legal enactment in the history of this Government, by which it was provided that the notes of State banks should be considered and treated as money at the Treasury. Still further, sir. The bill containing this provision did not pass the House; and as I deemed some provision necessary, indispensably necessary, for the state of things then existing, I introduced, I think the very next day after the failure of the honorable gentleman's bill, three resolutions. The two first were merely declaratory, asserting that all duties, taxes, and imposts, ought to be uniform, and that the revenues of the United States ought to be collected and received in the legal currency, or in Treasury notes, or the notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided. These two resolutions I agreed to waive, as it was thought they were not essential, and that they might imply some degree of censure upon past transactions. The third resolution was in these words.

"And resolved, further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as aforesiad; and that from and after the 1st day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as aforesaid."

The Senate will perceive that, in this resolution of mine, there was no provision whatever for receiving bank notes, except of the Bank of the United States, according to its charter. Well, what happened thereon? Why, sir, if you look into the National Intelligencer of a succeeding day, you will find it stated, that Mr. Calhoun moved to amend Mr Webster's resolution by "extending its provisions to the notes of all banks which should, at the time specified therein, pay their notes in specie on demand."

This amendment was opposed, and for a time defeated; but it was renewed, and finally prevailed. It was incorported into the resolution, became part of the law of the land, and so remains at this very moment. Sir, may I not now say to the honorable member, that if the Constitution of the country has been violated by treating bank notes as money—"Thou art the man!"

How is it possible, sir, the gentleman could so far forget his own agency in these most important transactions, as to stand up here, the other day, and with an air not only of confidence but of defiance, and say: "But I take a still higher ground; I strike at the root of the mischief. I deny the right of this Government to treat bank notes as money in its fiscal transactions. On this question I never have before committed myself, though not generally disposed to abstain from forming or expressing opinions."

I will only add, sir, that this reception and payment of bank notes was expressly recognised by the act of the 14th April, 1836; by the deposite act of June of that year, and by the bill which passed both Houses in 1837, but which the President did neither approve nor return. In all these acts, so far as I know, the honorable member from South Carolina himself concurred.

So much for authority.

But now, sir, what is the principle of construction upon which the gentleman relies to sustain his doctrine? "The genius of our Constitution," he says, "is opposed to the assumption of power." This is undoubtedly true: no one can deny it. But he adds, "whatever power it gives, is expressly granted."

But I think, sir, this by no means follows from the first proposition, and cannot be maintained. It is doubtless true that no power is to be assumed; but then powers may be inferred, or necessarily implied It is not a question of assumption; it is a question of fair, just, and reasonable inference. To hold that no power is granted and no means authorized, but such as are granted or authorized by express words, would be to establish a doctrine that would put an end to the Government. It could not last through a single session of Congress. If such opinions had prevailed in the beginning, it never could have been put in motion, and would not have drawn its first breath. My friend near me, from Delaware, has gone so fully and so ably into this part of the subject that it has become quite unnecessary for me to pursue it. Where the Constitution confers on Congress a general power, or imposes a general duty, all other powers necessary for the exercise of that general power, and for fulfilling that duty, are implied, so far as there is no prohibition. We act every day upon this principle, and could not carry on the Government without its aid. Under the power to coin money, we build expensive mints—fill them with officers—punish such officers for embezzlement—buy bullion—and exercise various other acts of power.

The Constitution says that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in certain courts. Under this general authority we not only establish such courts, but protect their records by penalties against forgery, and the purity of their administration by punishing perjuries.

The Department of the Post Office is another, and signal instance, of the extent and necessity of implied powers. The whole authority of Congress over this subject is expressed in very few words; they are merely "to establish post offices and post roads." Under this short and general grant, laws of Congress have been extended to a great variety of very important enactments, without the specific grant of any power whatever, as any one may see who will look over the post office laws. In these laws, among other provisions, penalties are enacted against a great number of offences; thus deducing the highest exercise of criminal jurisdiction, by reasonable and necessary inference, from the general authority. But forbear from traversing a field already so fully explored.

There are one or two other remarks, sir, in the gentleman's speech, which I must not entirely omit to notice.

In speaking of the beneficial effects of this measure, one, he says, would be, that "the weight of the banks would be taken from the side of the tax consumers, where it has been, from the commencement of the Government, and placed on the side of the tax payers. This great division of the community necessarily grows out of the fiscal action of the Government."

Sir, I utterly deny that there is the least foundation, in fact, for this distinction. It is an odious distinction, calculated to inspire envy and hatred; and being, as I think, wholly groundless, its suggestion, and the endeavor to maintain it, ought to be resisted, and repelled. We are all tax payers in the United States, who use articles on which imposts are laid; and who is there that is excused from this tax, or does not pay his proper part of it, according to his consumption? Certainly not one.

On the other hand, who are the tax consumers? Clearly, the army, the navy, the laborers on public works, and other persons in Government employment. But even these are not idle consumers; they are agents of the Government and of the people. Pensioners may be considered as persons who enjoy benefit from the public taxes of the country, without rendering present service in return; but the legal provision for them stands on the ground of previous merits, which none deny. If we had a vast national debt, the annual interest of which was a charge upon the country, the holders of this debt might be considered as tax consumers. But we have no such debt. If the distinction, therefore, which the gentleman states, exists anywhere, most certainly it does not exist here. And I cannot but exceedingly regret that sentiments and opinions should be expressed here, having so little foundation, and yet so well calculated to spread prejudice and dislike, far and wide, against the Government and institutions of the country.

But, sir, I have extended these remarks already to a length for which I find no justification but in my profound conviction of the importance of this crisis in our national affairs. We are, as it seems to me, about to rush madly from our proper spheres. We are to relinquish the performance of our own incumbent duties; to abandon the exercise of essential powers, confided by the Constitution to our hands, for the good of the country. This was my opinion in September; it is my opinion now. What we propose to do and what we omit to do, are, in my judgment, likely to make a fearful, perhaps a fatal, inroad upon the unity of commerce between these States, as well as to embarrass and harass the employments of the people, and to prolong existing evils.

Sir, whatever we may think of it now, the Constitution had its immediate origin in the conviction of the necessity for this uniformity or identity, in commercial regulations.

The whole history of the country, of every year and every month, from the close of the war of the Revolution to 1789, proves this. Over whatever other interests it was made to extend, and whatever other blessings it now does, or hereafter may, confer on the millions of free citizens who do or shall live under its protection; even though, in time to come, it should raise a pyramid of power and grandeur, whose apex should look down on the loftiest political structures of other nations and other ages, it will yet be true that it was itself the child of pressing commercial necessity. Unity and identity of commerce among all the States was its seminal principle. It had been found absolutely impossible to excite or foster enterprise in trade, under the influence of discordant and jarring State regulations. The country was losing all the advantages of its position. The Revolution itself was beginning to be regarded as a doubtful blessing. The ocean before us was a barren waste. No American canvass whitened its bosom—no keels of ours ploughed its waters. The journals of the Congress of the Confederation show the most constant, unceasing, unwearied, but always unsuccessful, appeals to the States and the people, to renovate the system, to infuse into that Confederation at once a spirit of union and a spirit of activity, by conferring on Congress the power over trade. By nothing but the perception of its indispensable necessity—by nothing but their consciousness of suffering from its want, were the States and the people brought, and brought by slow degrees, to invest this power, in a permanent and competent Government.

Sir, hearken to the fervent language of the old Congress, in July, 1785, in a letter addressed to the States, prepared by Mr. Monroe, Mr. King, and other great names, now transferred from the lists of living men, to the records which carry down the fame of the distinguished dead. The proposition before them, the great objects to which they so solicitously endeavored to draw the attention of the States, was this, viz: that "the United States, in Congress assembled, should have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade of the States, as well with foreign nations as with each other." This, they say, is urged upon the States by every consideration of local as well as of Federal policy; and they beseech them to agree to it, if they wish to promote the strength of the Union, and to connect it by the strongest ties of interest and affection. This was in July, 1785.

In the same spirit, and for the same end, was that most important resolution which was adopted in the House of Delegates of Virginia, on the 21st day of the following January. Sir, I read the resolution entire.

"Resolved, That Edward Randolph, and others, be appointed commissioners, who, or any five of whom, shall meet such commissioners as may be appointed by the other States in the Union, at a time and place to be agreed on, to take into consideration the trade of the United States; to examine the relative situations and trade of the said States; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony, and to report to the several States such an act relative to this great object, as, when unanimously ratified by them, will enable the United States, in Congress assembled, effectually to provide for the same; that the said commissioners shall immediately transmit to the several States copies of the preceding resolution, with a circular letter requesting their concurrence therein, and proposing a time and place for the meeting aforesaid."

Here, sir, let us pause. Let us linger at the waters of the original fountain. Let us contemplate this, the first step, in that series of proceedings, so full of great events to us and to the world. Notwithstanding the embarrassment and distress of the country, the recommendation of the old Congress had not been complied with. Every attempt to bring the State Legislatures into any harmony of action, or any pursuit of a common object, had signally and disastrously failed. The exigency of the case called for a new movement; for a more direct and powerful attempt to bring the good sense and patriotism of the country into action upon the crisis. A solemn assembly was therefore proposed—a general convention of delegates from all the States. And now, sir, what was the exigency? What was the crisis? Look at the resolution itself; there is not an idea in it but trade. Commerce! commerce! is the beginning and end of it. The subject to be considered and examined was "the relative situation of the trade of the States;" and the object to be obtained was the "establishment of a uniform system in their commercial regulations, as necessary to the common interest and their permanent harmony." This is all. And, sir, by the adoption of this ever-memorable resolution, the House of Delegates of Virginia, on the 21st day of January, 1786, performed the first act in the train of measures which resulted in that Constitution, under the authority of which you now sit in that chair, and I have now the honor of addressing the members of this body.

Mr. President, I am a Northern man. I am attached to one of the States of the North, by the ties of birth and parentage, education, and the associations of early life; and by sincere gratitude for proofs of public confidence early bestowed. I am bound to another Northern State by adoption, by long residence, by all the cords of social and domestic life, and by an attachment and regard, springing from her manifestation of approbation and favor, which grapple me to her with hooks of steel. And yet, sir, with the same sincerity of respect, the same deep gratitude, the same reverence, and hearty good-will, with which I would pay a similar tribute to either of these States, do I here acknowledge the Commonwealth of Virginia to be entitled to the honor of commencing the work of establishing this Constitution. The honor is hers; let her enjoy it; let her forever wear it proudly; there is not a brighter jewel in the tiara that adorns her brow. Let this resolution stand, illustrating her records, and blazoning her name through all time!

The meeting, sir, proposed by the resolution was holden. It took place, as all know, in Annapolis, in May of the same year; but it was thinly attended, and its members very wisely adopted measures to bring about a fuller and more general convention. Their letter to the States on this occasion is full of instruction. It shows their sense of the unfortunate condition of the country. In their meditations on the subject, they saw the extent to which the commercial power must necessarily extend. The sagacity of New Jersey had led her, in agreeing to the original proposition of Virginia, to enlarge the object of the appointment of commissioners, so as to embrace not only commercial regulations, but other important matters. This suggestion the commissioners adopted, because they thought, as they inform us, "that the power of regulating trade is of such comprehensive extent, and will enter so far into the general system of the Federal Government, that to give it efficacy, and to obviate questions and doubts concerning its precise nature and limits, might require a correspondent adjustment of other parts of the Federal system." Here you see, sir, that other powers, such as are now in the Constitution, were expected to branch out of the necessary commercial power; and, therefore, the letter of the commissioners concludes with recommending a general convention "to take into consideration the whole situation of the United States, and to devise such further provisions as should appear necessary to render the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union."

The result of the convention was the present Constitution. And yet, in the midst of all this flood of light, respecting its original objects and purposes, and with all the adequate powers which it confers, we abandon the commerce of the country, we betray its interests, we turn ourselves away from its most crying necessities. Sir, it will be a fact, stamped in deep and dark lines upon our annals; it will be a truth, which in all time can never be denied or evaded, that if this Constitution shall not, now and hereafter, be so administered as to maintain a uniform system in all matters of trade; if it shall not protect and regulate the commerce of the country, in all its great interests, in its foreign intercourse, in its domestic intercourse, in its navigation, in its currency, in every thing which fairly belongs to the whole idea of commerce, either as an end, an agent, or an instrument, then that Constitution will have failed, utterly failed to accomplish the precise, distinct, original object, in which it had its being.

In matters of trade, we were no longer to be Georgians, Virginians, Pennsylvanians, or Massachusetts men. We were to have but one commerce, and that the commerce of the United States. There were not to be separate flags, waving over separate commercial systems. There was to be one flag, the E PLURIBUS UNUM; and toward that was to be that rally of united interests and affections, which our fathers had so earnestly invoked.

Mr. President, this unity of commercial regulation is, in my opinion, indispensable to the safety of the union of the States themselves. In peace it is strongest tie. I care not, sir, on what side, or in which of its branches, it may be attacked. Every successful attack upon it, made anywhere, weakens the whole, and renders the next assault easier and more dangerous. Any denial of its just power is an attack upon it. We attack it, most fiercely attack it, whenever we say we will not exercise the powers which it enjoins. If the court had yielded to the pretensions of respectable States upon the subject of steam navigation, and to the retaliatory proceedings of other States; if retreat and excuse, and disavowal of power had been prevailing sentiments then, in what condition, at this moment, let me ask, would the steam navigation of the country be found? To us, sir, to us, his countrymen, to us, who feel so much admiration for his genius, and so much gratitude for his services, Fulton would have lived almost in vain. State grants and State exclusions would have covered over all our waters.

Sir, it is in the nature of such things, that the first violation, or the first departure from true principles, draws more important violations or departures after it; and the first surrender of just authority will be followed by others more to be deplored. If commerce be a unit, to break it in one part is to decree its ultimate dismemberment in all. If there be made a first chasm, though it be small, through that the whole wild ocean will pour in, and we may then throw up embankments in vain.

Sir, the spirit of union is particularly liable to temptation and seduction, in moments of peace and prosperity. In war, this spirit is strengethened by a sense of common danger, and by a thousand recollections of ancient efforts and ancient glory in a common cause. In the calms of a long peace, and the absence of all apparent causes of alarm, things near gain an ascendency over things remote. Local interests and feelings overshadow national sentiments. Our attention, our regard, and our attachment, are every moment solicited to what touches us closest, and we feel less and less the attraction of a distant orb. Such tendencies, we are bound by true patriotism, and by our love of union, to resist. This is our duty; and the moment, in my judgment, has arrived when that duty is summoned to action. We hear, every day, sentiments and arguments, which would become a meeting of envoys, employed by separate Governments, more than they become the common Legislature of a united country. Constant appeals are made to local interests, to geographical distinctions, and to the policy and the pride of particular States. It would sometimes appear that it was, or as if it were, a settled purpose to convince the people that our Union is nothing but a jumble of different and discordant interests, which must, ere long, be all returned to their original state of separate existence; as if, therefore, it was of no great value while it should last, and was not likely to last long. The process of disintegration begins, by urging the fact of different interests.

Sir, is not the end obvious, to which all this leads us? Who does not see that, if convictions of this kind take possession of the public mind, our Union can hereafter be nothing, while it remains, but a connection without harmony; a bond without affection; a theatre for the angry contests of local feelings, local objects, and local jealousies? Even while it continues to exist, in name, it may, by these means, become nothing but the mere form of a united Government. My children, and the children of those who sit around me, may meet, perhaps, in this chamber, in the next generation; but if tendencies, now but too obvious, be not checked, they will meet as strangers and aliens. They will feel no sense of common interest or common country: they will cherish no common object of patriotic love. If the same Saxon language shall fall from their lips, it may be the chief proof that they belong to the same nation. Its vital principle exhausted and gone, its power of doing good terminated, now productive only of strife and contention, and no longer sustained by a sense of common interest, the Union itself must ultimately fall, dishonored and unlamented.

The honorable member from Carolina himself, habitually indulges in charges of usurpation and oppression against the Government of his country. He daily denounces its important measures, in the language in which our revolutionary fathers spoke of the oppressions of the mother country. Not merely against Executive usurpation, either real or supposed, does he utter these sentiments, but against laws of Congress, laws passed by large majorities, laws sanctioned, for a course of years, by the people. These laws he proclaims, every hour, to be but a series of acts of oppression. He speaks of them as if it were an admitted fact, that such is their true character. This is the language which he utters, these the sentiments he expresses, to the rising generation around him. Are they sentiments and language which are likely to inspire our children with the love of union, to enlarge their patriotism, or to teach them, and to make them feel, that their destiny has made them common citizens of one great and glorious republic. A principal object, in his late political movements, the gentleman himself tells us, was to unite the entire South; and against whom, or against what, does he wish to unite the entire South? Is not this the very essence of local feeling and local regard? Is it not the acknowledgment of a wish and object, to create political strength, by uniting political opinions geographically? While the gentleman thus wishes to unite the entire South, I pray to know, sir, if he expects me to turn toward the polar star, and, acting on the same principle, to utter a cry of Rally! to the whole North? Heaven forbid? To the day of my death, neither he nor others shall hear such a cry from me.

Finally, the honorable member declares that he shall now march off, under the banner of State Rights! March off from whom? March off from what? We have been contending for great principles. We have been struggling to maintain the liberty and to restore the prosperity of the country; we have made these struggles here, in the national councils, with the old flag, the true American flag, the Eagle, and the Stars and Stripes, waving over the chamber in which we sit. He now tells us, however, that he marches off under the State Rights banner!

Let him go. I remain. I am where I ever have been, and ever mean to be. Here, standing on the platform of the general Constitution—a platform broad enough, and firm enough, to uphold every interest of the whole country—I shall still be found. Intrusted with some part in the administration of that Constitution, I intend to act in its spirit, and in the spirit of those who framed it. Yes, sir, I would act as if our fathers, who formed it for us, and who bequeathed it to us, were looking on us—as if I could see their venerable forms bending down to behold us, from the abodes above. I would act, too, sir, as if that long line of posterity were also viewing us, whose eye is hereafter to scrutinize our conduct.

Standing thus, as in the full gaze of our ancestors, and our posterity, having received this inheritance from the former, to be transmitted to the latter, and feeling that if I am born for any good, in my day and generation, it is for the good of the whole country, no local policy, or local feeling, no temporary impulse, shall induce me to yield my foothold on the Constitution and the Union. I move off, under no banner not known to the whole American people, and to their Constitution and laws. No, sir, these walls, these columns "fly

From their firm base as soon as I."

I came into public life, sir, in the service of the United States. On that broad altar my earliest, and all my public vows, have been made. I propose to serve no other master. So far as depends on any agency of mine, they shall continue united States; united in interest and in affection; united in every thing in regard to which the Constitution has decreed their union; united in war, for the common defence, the common renown, and the common glory; and united, compacted, knit firmly together in peace, for the common prosperity and happiness of ourselves and our children.

THE END.
